Nohl's "Youth of Beethoven."

(Concluded.)

"Dawn" (Dämmerung) is the heading of the second period of Beethoven's youth. It extends from 1784 to 1787. As this period begins with the commencement of Maximilian Franz's reign as Elector, it most naturally opens with a description of the character of that prince. The reader is confounded, that the radical Nohl cherishes for his prince a boundless admiration and utters it in overwrought expressions. But then he had here to spin a totally different species of information—which he enjoys with just such devotion, as he had done previously in the case of Schervin—from the sketches of the Elector's life which appeared in 1865 from the pen of the Baron von Seida and Landensberg. His after incapacity of judgment and for the use of general maxims shows itself here with incredible simplicity: the scandal-seeking democrat and the flattering courtier stand for him in precisely the same feet; not even the circumstance startled him that the same Seida, in an Appendix, wrote favorably about the preceding Electors, who have fared so hardly at the hands of Nohl. Just how the work of Perthes (Politische Zustände p. 134 et seq.), should guide him, if he had any idea how to harness knowledge so to be gained. But then Herr Nohl learned an example of that pure and ideal humanity, the idea of which was current at the end of the last century, in order to explain certain preconceived influences upon Beethoven; as such, for better or worse, must Max Franz, brother of Joseph II and sympathizer in his ideas, be taken. Here was a prince, who made his people truly happy—who taught them to think (his speech at the inauguration of the University 1786 is copied entire from Seida) who brought the free intellectual tone of society. Certain opposing opinions of him, such as that in Mozart's letter to his father, yes, even that of Emperor Joseph himself, are passed over lightly, since they contradict the statements of Herr von Seida.

Max Franz took great pains with his music; therefore this is the place to discourse of his own musical attainments. To what Thayer has said (Atl. Monthly, 4:17), Nohl adds some interesting particulars, but finds it necessary to describe once more in full after Jahn the musical life at the Vienna Court and specially Mozart's connection with it, "where touch-remark started thence." (p. 167).

And now as according to him the influences of the Elector produced an entirely new epoch in the finer taste for art, he feels himself obliged again to recall to mind the conditions of theatre in general in which Max Franz makes so noble a figure. By this, it is true, Beethoven is again thrust aside for a long time, but has Herr Nohl's book becomes some dozens of pages larger.

And so, upon p. 178, begins a geographical disquisition upon the Danube and "amuses the fortunes of that city beginning with the Romans, are noted; stress is laid upon the importance to which it attained under Maria Theresa and, finally the noble I ... of musical culture was ... named ... there repeated. "The lively excitable temperament of the Viennese explains these traits: "music assuredly the most vital ... were the atmosphere of that city, and they are the soul from which is created the beautiful" (p. 188). The question why just Austria should become a focus of the high musical art, has according to Herr Nohl, never been adequately answered. He finds the reason in the mingling of German and Oriental elements. Nohl's undertaking to give a picture of the Slavic character—in part from his own opinions, in part from Moritz Hartmann's "Weiner"—and reaches the conclusion that the Slave is good for nothing alone but that the mingling of German and Slavic blood produces something extraordinary. For example, the sharp contrasts in North-East Germany the sensual susceptibility to music in Austria. Particular specimens of these "hybrids of races," who for this reason accomplished great things are (according to Nohl) Luther, Leibnitz, Lessing, Kant,—Gentz; among musicians, Bach (previously the example of German piety), Gluck Haydn. This entire chapter is, as any one may guess, very funny reading.

The most thorough child of Austria was Mozart, who truly had nothing Slavic in his blood* but infused the real German heart into music. His intellectual brother in the North is Goethe, and the same ideal intellectuality, the same amiable humanity of which the two are specimens, were calculated to Beethoven combined in Max Franz. Beethoven—thus Herr Nohl continues his fantasy—comprehended his art, he perceived that a still higher goal in art was to be attained; he even then (the boy of 12 years) hoped to be able to complete the edifice raised by Mozart—to introduce the German spirit into music.

Next, Herr Nohl is pleased to vouchsafe us once more something of fact in relation to Beethoven: his appointment as court organist is mentioned: various matters concerning Count Waldstein, Beethoven's protector, are introduced mostly word for word from Wegeler and in a note (p. 211) some of his new compositions (among these the three P. F. quartets) are stated en passant. But now he hastens to the most important event of Beethoven's youth—his first visit to Vienna—which occupies him from p. 188 to 235, although all the facts known may be stated in a few lines. Beethoven then, made for some unknown reason a journey to Vienna in the spring of 1787 (this is the date given by Nohl correctly,† while Jahn in his Mozart III 306 gives the date of 1790) played there in the presence of Mozart, who foretold his grand future, but where according to the common authorities, he himself did not have, had a meeting also with Joseph II (according to Schindler) and after a short stay journeyed home again. What a valuable field for Herr Nohl, to throw light upon these mysterious matters, by his conjectures! Beyond a doubt, Beethoven had long yearned to visit the fine town "where one might think himself in a true artist, in a true man" (p. 189); oft had he prayed Waldstein (just before Herr Nohl relates, how difficult it was to do a favor to Beethoven) to secure him the opportunity and Waldstein had himself long since recognized the necessity: at last the Elector gave his consent. How man the journey especially how must Vienna with its luxurious life and its musical activity have wrought upon him! But all else is mere the shade by his visit to Mozart. First the accounts given by others of the meeting are given in extenso: then Herr Nohl attempts profounder views (p. 214). Beethoven did not hear Mozart play! What can have been the reason? Certainly Beethoven was not impressed by the outward appearance of Mozart and his easy amiable nature—he, the complete contrast for "defiantly said, The ... youthful Viking appeared this primeval German even then," (p. 218 note) On the other hand Beethoven doubtless bore himself in the consciousness of his position as Court organist somewhat awkwardly which displeased Mozart; moreover Mozart's cares and labors at the time —which are described in extenso from Jahn on pages 218-223—did not allow him to trouble himself much with the youth. Beethoven's self consciousness may even then have actively hindered the two great admirers of another; moreover he soon felt himself repelled by a light and luxurious life running on intellectual force and even in Mozart whom he viewed in the same light he had the presentiment of his own future position. Ripened from the boy to the youth, he returned to Bonn. That is what Herr Nohl calls deeper insight.

The third period of Beethoven's youth is called by Nohl "Awaking," and reaches to 1792. It begins with the return to Bonn, the particulars of which are related. Here Nohl finds himself here to be an original investigator, and imparts not only some bits out of a letter from Beethoven to Dr Schaden of Augsburg heretofore, as he states, utterly unknown in Germany. "I found it," he says, "in the Revue Britannique for 1861 into which it was copied from the Atlantic Miscellany (read Monthly). I do not know the present owner and am also under the necessity to retranslate out of two (?) foreign tongues this interesting document in the history of Beethoven. Perhaps in consequence of having copied very many original letters of the Master I may have done it with considerable success." The original of this letter Herr Nohl might indeed have found quite near him, at all events he should have known that Kalisch printed a copy from it in 1848 in the Vossische Zeitung, No. 194. In that case indeed we should have lost the amusement of comparing what the young Beethoven really wrote, with what Nohl makes him say.

* From Thayer's account.

† Who had not yet come to Bonn.

Here are the two.

[At this point of contemplation follows that in the compact, one of a German translation of a French translation of an English translation of a German letter with the original, would not be understood by a very large number of our readers; we omit the two letters.]

It seems then that the copying of manuscripts is after all not quite enough to form a style. How after the death of the mother [which forms the subject of this letter] the circumstances of the family became more gloomy constantly, how the eldest son had soon to provide for all by his salary and lessons, how at length the younger brothers were provided for Herr Nohl relates principally after Thayer, although he only cites others. He has, however, here been able to gain some new data on these matters and added some new and valuable material from two documents (p. 411) out of the Provincial Archives at Düsseldorf, that were until now unknown.* It appears from them, that as at length Beethoven's father was no longer able to perform his duties, the son petitions the Elector to grant half the salary to the father and the other half to himself [for the education of his brothers, as Thayer's new volume shows]; this was granted. But Beethoven was persuaded by the entreaties of his father and by the promise to transfer regularly the half of his salary not to put the decree in force. But as the father afterwards made way with the decree, which he had retained, after his death Beethoven was forced (p. 92) to petition for its renewal; this time also the petition was granted. The independence with which we here see the young man of 21 years assuming the direction of the family affairs, is an interesting and important new feature in the picture of his youth.*

Like Thayer (in the Atlantic Article) Nohl, in this connection, comes upon Beethoven's affairs of the heart. While, however, Thayer keeps to the traditions and speaks, after Wegeler of two young ladies, who were in the habit of visiting the Breunings, as the first objects of Beethoven's inclinations, Nohl naturally goes farther. Certainly he thinks, must Beethoven have fallen in love with Eleonore Breuning. His fiery nature, and "that Fräulein Leonore that met only chance to the child Lory" (p. 236) make it as clear as the sun! Wegeler's statements, p. 92, to the contrary are not worth mention. Several pages farther on (plan and effort to follow chronological order one must not demand of Herr Nohl) all at once, the beautiful and gifted Barbara Koch appears in the house of the Breunings. Beethoven "after Lory had forced him to restrain his tenderest sentiments within the narrow paths of mere friendship" becomes of course also her devoted.—How much greater had been the deserts of Herr Nohl, if he had endeavored to give a clear picture of the social relations in Bonn and the position of individuals as to the Court and to one another, for which may data may still be found! But Nohl's book utterly wants color.

In connection with the new organization of the Bonn theatre in 1789 he, following Thayer's Article, names the members of the Orchestra (the two Rombergs among them) and draws from Neefe's report a list of the operas given; he then allows, through four pages, pastor Junker, a noted critic of those days, to speak of the excellence of the orchestra and cites also his (Junker's) judgment upon Beethoven's playing. That all this is given in Thayer's article, he passes over.

Shortly before, he had spoken of Beethoven's skill in extemporizing and in depicting the characters of individuals in music. As if by chance he here relates the visit of the orchestra to Mergentheim and Beethoven's meeting with Sterkel, but the close narration of this journey [only yet in Thayer's Article] is by him rendered utterly unobserved, and that again, to superfluity, shows clearly that the talent for narration has not been bestowed upon him.

The following notices of life at Court and of the free and easy tone, while Max Franz infused into it, may well give us another opportunity to exhibit Nohl's style of transcription.

Thayer, p. 20.	Nohl, p. 327
"With the gay [illegible] ready for every [illegible] of life, he [Max Franz] did not fail to throw good-natured attention to others, while [illegible] and so [illegible]. He was ever ready for social [illegible] and [illegible] and generally [illegible] which gained not a little by his presence." &c.	"He, who was himself gay, amiable, friendly and condescending to every one, and in whose joyous disposition every pleasure of life stood open [illegible] good-natured [illegible] [illegible] a pleasing form. Yes, he was always disposed to every social communication and he [illegible] all the pleasures of the Court [illegible] We see also [illegible] gained not a little from his presence." &c.

In one of these Court festivities, a Ballet of Chivalry came to performance, the text by Waldstein, with music by Beethoven; the score was long attributed to Waldstein also and was never printed. Nohl bemoans, p. 327, that this score has never come under his notice, and yet he might have seen it in the closet proximity to other papers which he had looked over.—Smaller concerts were also given in the neighboring village of Godesberg; and here also shone Beethoven as he extemporizing and variations; and then, as Nohl's opinion, among other things, were composed the Variations upon Righini's "Venni Amore." Herr Nohl here expresses his opinion that Beethoven but rarely studied the unfathomable depths of his soul in the Variation form. One is horror-struck at such a specimen of incredible ignorance in the first volume, when one reflects what the fourth will be. Then he by no means approved recommendations for the following compositions, (p. 433) that the Trio, op. 3, the Serenade, op. 8, and even the Serenade op. 25, belong to the Bonn period, the proofs of which are hereafter to be produced. For "Beethoven was by no means of so late maturity as is generally supposed." On the other hand we read p. 231 that, for want of lessons, he began him to work out compositions of real importance.

All that was but by way of practice—more productions had he as to this tone here—out of the French Revolution (chap. 14). Thayer had very appropriately pointed out (p. 800) how well adapted the condition of Bonn was to produce a Beethoven a thoroughly educated musician and to give his taste proper nutriment without cramping his genius. Nohl naturally here also affects deeper insight: "That regular school education, the worth of which none must undervalue, may at first, especially to the stock intercourse, seem to be the main thing. We will not quarrel with them for nothing is more dangerous, than to arouse the sleeping lion in these gentlemen" (p. 257). It seems more safe to him to address the ladies. "Yes, the lovely ones of my readers, especially if they belong to the saloons, will know how to thank me, that I have allowed their favorite to gain a due tone, the 'culture' the possession of which alone gives the most gifted one the right of existence in society" (p. 260). At the same time however he was impelled to action; he was impelled by a native force which "fermented and fomented an order to duly ferment itself" (p. 260). In order to explain this process of fermentation now follows (p. 261 et seq.) a dissertation on the French Revolution which had its origin in the deepest human necessities, and along with which the cry for liberty resounded with equal strength from Germany and Beethoven became "the speaking trumpet of the most real necessity of his times" (p. 261). Certainly he had zealously followed events in Paris, his music proves it clearly—"who cannot read this out of his works—he does not understand the fundamental feelings of his soul" (p. 264). The impetuous force of the times filled him; the impulse it awakened which gives to music its best substance (p. 265). This revolutionary impulse drove him forth, whither? To France? No, to Vienna, and to Mozart whom, according to p. 115, he had never seen heard play, who, however according to p. 214, had already given him some lessons. Mozart however died in 1791 and so now he fixes his hopes upon Haydn. When the latter passed through Bonn in 1790, the proof Beethoven could hardly [according to Nohl] have felt drawn to the humble defenceless man (p. 133); but now Haydn came back from England, again passed through Bonn, examined a Cantata by Beethoven and praised it highly. Max Franz determined, towards the end of 1792 to send Beethoven to Vienna for higher musical culture; his brothers were now cared for, his father died about that time, he was entirely free. Waldstein wrote him prophetic words at parting.

The tone of his mind was elevated and full of lofty presentiment—the cry for liberty sounded more loudly around. Shortly before his departure (November) Mayence had been taken by the French; to the sound of the Marseillaise freedom had entered that city. A memorandum book, which Herr Nohl has seen at Vienna, a possession of Artaria & Co. gives no clue by his journey only to Coblenz; but for Herr Nohl it is indisputable,—what no other biographer has thought of—that Beethoven stopped also in Mayence* and made a short stay there, in order to observe more closely the intoxication of freedom. Here Nohl understands how the Marseillaise here must have wrought upon Beethoven; now he first comprehends the "Eroica," now first "that world-historical clashing of sabres and the war trump," in many of his works.

Beethoven adored, to an extent beyond most others artists, during the whole of his active career, lofty ideas of the dignity of his art, deep sense of the truth, a never flagging sense of duty in his works; what would he have said to a biographer, in whom not a spark of these cardinal virtues also of a biographer is to be found?

* They were sent to him by the director of the Archives.
* See Thayer's work for a more of similar new matter.

* Thayer will naturally [illegible] give the notice of this journey from the only [illegible] to both—by which it proves the [illegible] the Beethoven [illegible] the military post route [illegible] Coblenz and [illegible] Frankfort. That Nohl's idea of Mayence is [illegible] thereby, to [illegible] thereby, "in that [illegible] the story."

Studies for Piano.

HELLER'S STUDIES. Op. 45. Op. 46. The Best Studies. Op. 125. Now Issued in Volumes. Books I & II. [Boston: O. Ditson & Co.]

1. A study, or as the French say Étude, is a work composed with reference to affording the player exercise in some point of mechanical execution, or in some peculiar excellence of delivery, on the perfect attainment of which the artistic success of the piece is made to depend. At first sight this statement of the nature of the study would not seem to indicate two very distinct and well marked classes. Yet so it is. For those of the kind first mentioned aim only at drilling the muscles to various feats of dexterity. They have the form of pieces, it is true, but spiritual inspiration, which is the real life of a piece, is entirely wanting.

Of the second class there have been written studies that are little better than the former. But the works of Stephen Heller* do not fall into this category, for they have the spiritual characteristics of pieces, each study having a character of its own.

2. There lie before us three books of studies by Louis Köhler. These all belong to the category of studies in mechanical execution. The FIRST STUDIES, Op. 50, are possessed of these following peculiarities, all of which are excellent. First, of the twenty and as [illegible], all are short—the longest being only sixteen measures. Second, each study exercises one hand only, the other occupied in playing a simple accompaniment. Third, these exercises consist entirely of the simpler finger work, via. five-finger passages, scales not extending one octave, and arpeggio formations, both direct and broken, in a rate [illegible]. Fourth, the studies are arranged in [illegible] order of succession so as to afford symmetrical cultivation to execution. They are in pairs, of which the first study exercises the right hand and the second the left. The first pair consists of [illegible], the next of arpeggios. The third of [illegible], the fourth arpeggios. And so on.

Another is The NEW SCHOOL OF VELOCITY, Op. 128, Books I and II. This, like the preceding, consists of twenty studies. Their more noticeable points are:—First, they fall into approved forms, being in the three-period song form, in which is much the same thing when the periods are so extended as [illegible] the case) in the second rondo form. This gives it a very desirable [illegible] [illegible] so is gives a character of [illegible] to each exercise, and so leads the pupil to expect it in other cases. Moreover, it in form affords convenient opportunity for the exercises enumerated. While in that second, the [illegible] receive equal attention, yet for the most part only one is earnestly exercised in [illegible] time. The second rondo form consists of a THEME, EPISODE and THEME. If the Andante has concerted the Theme so as to exercise the right hand, the has a ways made the Episode to exercise the left, and vice versa. Third, although aiming at execution, the studies are intrinsically interesting and brilliant. They resemble the compositions of Sydney Smith and there is no reason why pupils should conceive that disgust towards them that they are very apt to entertain toward anything that savors of work.

3. These works, it will be seen, cover the ground formerly occupied by Czerny's "Velocity." The particular superiority we have already made of salient points [illegible] to more idea of their superiority over Czerny's. This consists mainly in three points: —First, more orderly arrangement. Second, the equal training given to both hands, yet the corresponding [illegible] which the hands render afford to attention. Third, the freshness of the music. While it lacks the poetical romantic fancy of Heller, it is simple, pleasing and appropriate to muscular training.

4. These works are sometimes spoken of as rivals to Heller. But as the preceding analysis shows, the two writers occupy different planes of endeavor, and aim in no sense rivals. Perhaps the best of Heller's Studies are his Op. 16. THE ART OF PHRASING; the second book of Op. 15, introductory to Op. 16, and his Dolce Studien, Rhythm and Expression, Op. 17. Each one of the separate studies of these sets is a available piece, and some of these are very beautiful. As a player of taste may properly play these as an art of musical enjoyment. Their study is an artistic exercise. But in Köhler's, and some similar works, the paramount idea is the acquisition of a large number of keys in as short a time as possible. The music results from the technique, is well, but the playing and not the music is of the first importance. The writer endeavored simply to eliminate as far as possible the dead part of mechanical practice by supplying as much artistic charm as is compatible with the work to be done. To a large class of piano players and pupils these studies are a God-send. And we say God-speed!

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, FEB. 1.—Musical matters here have had a slight lowering since my last letter. You already know that our largest hall was burned down a month or more ago. We have still Library Hall, a somewhat plain room with seats for [illegible] hundred or so, and the Opera House. The prospect is thus Farewell! [illegible] who it [illegible] whatever manner.

Ole Bull gave three or four concerts, but they were not well attended. Of his playing different opinions are expressed. Camilla Urso was here with Gilmore, and played at his promenade concerts. I think the general opinion of the connoisseurs places her quite above Ole Bull as an artist. The tout and wind efforts of Gilmore's band were quite novel here, [illegible] were moved to feel more than the smallest possible [illegible] of [illegible] in the orchestra. No one people [illegible] enough "moved out to see" and hear "reeds shaken in the wind."

Just now we are having Italian Opera by a troupe compounded from those of Grover and Maretzek. The operas thus far heard are Ernani, Crispino e la Comare, Romeo and Juliet (Gounod's), Trovatore, Fra Diavolo, Lucrezia Borgia and Faust. Both orchestra and chorus are better than we usually have here, which is saying little in their credit. Moreover Mr. Maretzek manifests a knack [illegible] self together without pounding or stamping, or making any undue fuss. And that we great relief, for the labors of [illegible] a director were so onerous and [illegible] so [illegible], as to make one positively uncomfortable to see him warm at such hard work.

Last night Romeo and Juliet was performed for the first time here. In the case of an opera containing which the director so widely [illegible], it is scarcely becoming [illegible] to speak confidently; yet certain facts became apparent as the work progressed. Among them these:—The instrumentation is an eminently pleasant, appropriate and courageously varied. The accompaniments both in the score and in performance were as in the best sense of the word. The real meaning of the work was brought out better by them, and the voices were never covered up or drowned out by them. The melodies were pleasing and not especially commonplace. But the solo singing was "no better than it should be."

How much the opera would improve if the leading parts were taken by great artists I cannot say; but it is certainly a work that one would love to hear more than once. The best success of last night was by Antonucci as Capulet. He looked, acted, and sang the part.

Dudley Buck, Jr., of Hartford, gives an organ concert tonight at the First Baptist Church. The programme does not embrace [illegible] piece of real noble organ music. Alas! for the times we are fallen on.

DER FREISCHÜTZ.

NEW YORK, FEB. 3.—On Saturday Evening, in the 3d concert of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society at the Academy of Music, the following programme was performed:

Overture, "Jessonda"	Spohr
P. F. Concerto, A minor, Op. 54 [illegible]	Schumann
9th Symphony, Op. 125, D minor	Beethoven

The Overture has all the Spohr mannerisms, together with enough freshness and melody to make it agreeable. Extremely pleasant is the fragmentary splendid march for wind instruments which breaks in upon the quiet tentative character of the first portion of the work. Somewhat like a way or a dessert—to an appetizer for the solid viands to follow.

Although the colossal Choral Symphony was the feature of the programme, the Schumann Concerto was far more attractive to me. It is not easy to say that this or that movement is better than another, whether one chooses the strong, self-contained Allegro affettuoso, with its beautiful little interpolated Nocturne in A flat, the charming Intermezzo with its tutti solo, or the graceful, delightful Intermezzo Finale,—all are so dependent each upon the other, so homogeneous, that one must be content to admire and love it as a complete work of exceptional and wonderful genius. It was played perfectly—the word is not too strong—by Mr. Mills. Nothing nearer or closer than his [illegible] of the last movement, particularly the fascinating episode in which the [illegible] theme enters with the relative key of [illegible] and finally turns into the [illegible] upon itself I ever have heard. Mr. M. was deservedly recalled.

Lastly came the Symphony. It is too much to say [That—Ed.] that had any other man written it, it would never have stood upon the high pedestal which it now occupies? We have often heard absurd ideas raised against the length of the Schubert C major Symphony: compared with this it is short. Good as the Scherzo is, and unquestionably [?] the best movement—it is interminable and tedious, and grows absolutely insupportable before it ends; at the conclusion [?]. Repetition seemed to be Beethoven's idea said in this work. The theme of the last movement—taken in every manner of shape, form, and way by instruments and voices—is abominably commonplace and unworthy of Beethoven's genius. [Our readers know that this is far from our way of thinking.—ED.]

Mrs. Scott sang the ungrateful, almost impossible part as effectively as possible. It is not for a human voice. The other solo [illegible] did fairly; the baritone, however, seemed scarcely sure enough to sing sharp, and succeeded in doing so in one or two instances. The whole performance may be called a good one, and too much praise cannot be given to the conductor for his perseverance and accuracy.

The audience was surprisingly large, the Academy filled from parquette to ceiling. Many had to content themselves with standing room only. Under its new management the society has unquestionably made a great advance in popular favor.

Why will not the stockholders of the Academy give orders for the removal of the unsightly and absurd stands and all the new disguises [?]. Why not light the building after the Steinway Hall fashion? There no one's eyes are blinded by the glare of a huge mass of gas burners.

Mr. Bristow's cantata "Daniel" was a musical item performed on the evening of Thursday, Jan. 30 and—judging from the comments of the daily jour-sole—met with, as I predicted, a favorable reception. One critic lauds the work to the skies and says that there are "few, if any, composers in Europe capable of writing anything equal to it;" which may or may not be true. Mme. Parepa being ill, the soprano part was taken by another lady. V.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The sixth Symphony Concert (Jan. [illegible]) had a rather lighter programme than the two preceding, yet composed exclusively of masterworks of four men all of a high rank among the Dii majores of the realm of harmony. There was every evidence of the liveliest enjoyment, from beginning to end, and on the part of the largest audience which these concerts have yet drawn together:

Overture to "Coriolan"	Beethoven.
Symphony in C, No. [illegible]	Mozart.
Overture: "The Fair Melusina"	Mendelssohn.
Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, Op. 40 (Otto Dresel.)	Mendelssohn.
Symphony in G, second time	Haydn.

The two Overtures, of the very best of their kind and of their authors, were finely contrasted and we think told more significantly than ever before here as an uncommonly effective pairing. The strong, crisp chords in the Coriolan did strike upon the ear like a call; the vigor of the leading motive, fiery and impetuous, relieved by the soft gush of tears from a great heart in the contrasted motive; the wonderful condensation and conciseness of the whole; every phrase so pregnant with meaning and all hurrying to a climax (in this respect only paralleled by the Egmont Overture); the boldness of the portrait, its intensity of expression and the stormy coloring of the background; finally the short broken close in which the proud life seems to have stormed itself away and deep exhausted,—were well brought out.

Of the Overture to the legend (Tieck's) of "The fair Melusina," Mendelssohn in a letter to his sister April, 1834 says: "You ask me what legend you are to read? How many are there, pray? and how many do I know? and how do you know the story of the 'fair Melusina'? and would it not be better for me to hide myself and to creep into all sorts of instrumental music without any title when my own sister does not appreciate such a title? Or did you really never hear of the beautiful fish? [illegible] I wrote this overture for an opera of Conradi's Kreutzer's which I saw the time last year in the Königstadt Theatre. The overture (I mean Kreutzer's) was encored, and I disliked it exceedingly, and the whole opera quite as much; but not Mlle. Hähnel who was very fascinating, especially in one scene where she appeared as a mermaid combing her hair (the mermaid), and with the wish to write an overture which the people might not encore but which would cause them more inward pleasure; so I selected that portion of the subject that pleased me (exactly corresponding with the legend) and, in short, the overture came into the world, and that is its pedigree."—It is certainly romantic music in that it brings scenes and personages. In the two contrasted themes—the first (F major) so watery and cool and rippling, tempting you beneath the waves,—the other (F minor), so chivalric, heroic, proud, impatient,—Mendelssohn clearly had in view the two characters, the personage Melusina (who is supposed to be a mermaid in the hours denied to her lord) and the brave knight who weds her. We translated Schumann's description of the overture a year ago, and need add nothing now. It does indeed revive "those fables of the life deep down beneath the watery abyss," and is full of "darting fishes with golden scales, of pearls in open shells," &c. &c. How exquisitely and yet how easily, how calm the narrative! The mingling colors of the different instruments were all more bright and heart-full than ever; one excellent first clarinet made itself appreciated there.

The Mozart Symphony in D is there one commonly distinguished as having no Menuet; in altogether a more marked and greater work than the one (also in D and without Minuet) called sometimes the "French" Symphony, which was played last year. This one, in wealth and felicity of ideas, and in masterly moulding into a perfect whole, at once captivating to the general ear and full of contrapuntal subtlety, may rank with his best symphonic inspirations, like those in G minor and E flat. It has great breadth too; the power is so intrinsically in the thought and composition, that you do not miss the clarionets, trombones, &c. The opening Adagio is very large and stately. The syncopated theme with which the Allegro starts off makes you very sure that "here is a chase" of what is coming, and presently it develops into a motive in which there is no mistaking the features of that in the Zauberflöte Overture (which I however is at once popular and learned music). As it goes on, each new theme, starts up another in charming sequence and variety. The Andante drops out the trumpets, and limited to strings, reeds, flutes and mellow horns, is one of the sweetest and most graceful of his slow movements. The Finale lures you on again with syncopation at the outset, and soon brings in a charming melody it recalls, which may well have puzzled by its strange furore only those whose memory goes back to our popular music of some thirty years ago. Indeed Mozart's Symphonies, &c. first shall many an English song writer of those days with ideas and this also came out as supposed English in a sentimental ditty about "The last link is broken" &c. (Mozart's bright bit is prolonged into a dragging slow tune). Everybody thought the Symphony delightful. And the still gayer Symphony in G by Haydn, you find the repetitions and sent all home in the pleasure of all humors, not a bit dissipated low Gluckish humor but a really light and buoyant one, with healthy sense of satisfaction.

The D minor Concerto of Mendelssohn is a lovely piece full of genius, not so often heard as the earlier one in G minor, perhaps not so readily appreciated at first hearing, it yet ever to grow upon one. It was first played here, two years ago, by Mr. Lang. It does not demand very extraordinary powers of execution; any one of our leading pianists is equal to it technically. The chief thing is that the artist find the music like an artist and enter into the spirit of it. The of course Mr. DRESEL did; he brought out the whole of it; he made the music felt, it warmed the audience, who responded with unusual unanimity and vigor of applause. Remembering that Schumann had written something about this Concerto at the time of its first appearance (in 1837), we have looked it up, and here it is as closely as we could translate it:—

"Verily, Mendelssohn is ever the same, and ever walks with his old joyous step; the smile about the lips lurks no one more beautifully than his. Virtuosos will hardly find play for their enormous execution in this Concerto; he gives them hardly anything to do, which they have not already done and played a hundred times. Often have we heard them utter this complaint. In one sense they are right; opportunity to show bravura through the novelty and brilliancy of passages should not be excluded from the Concerto. But Music stands above all other considerations, and always are highest praise belongs to him, who gives us always and most richly that.

"But music is the offspring of a finer nature; no matter whether it flow forth in the presence of hundreds, or by itself in silence, provided always that it be the finer nature that expresses itself. Hence it is that Mendelssohn's compositions have such an wonderful influence when he plays them himself; the fingers are mere carriers, and might as well be covered up; it is for the ear alone to perceive, and then it is for the heart to decide. Now if the praise belongs to Mendelssohn that he always gives us such music to hear, yet we will not forget that deep that frequently he bore it in one work in a more slight and airy manner and more emphatically in another. And this Concerto is one of his most fugitive productions. I must be very much mistaken, if he did not write it in a few days, perhaps a few hours. It is as if one shook a tree; the ripe, sweet fruit falls without more ado.

"Some will ask how it compares with his first Concerto (in G minor). It is the same, and not the same. It is the same because it is the work of a thoroughly educated master; it is not the same, because it was written ten years later. Here and there in the conduct of the harmony Sebastian Bach peeps out. For the rest, melody, form, instruments are Mendelssohn's own property. Enjoy then the fugitive and cheering gift; it is just like one of those works of which we know so many by the older masters, which they tossed from their great creations. Our younger masters certainly will not forget how suddenly, after such rest, they often came out with something mighty, the D minor Concerto of Mozart, the one in G major by Beethoven, offer us examples."

This week's Concert consisted of the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, preceded by Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," for the First Part, and Chopin's E minor Concerto, played by Hugo Leonhard, followed by Weber's Jubel-Overture, for Part Second.

The Eighth and last of the Symphony Concerts will come on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 22. It has been decided to close the series with a partition of the glorious Schubert Symphony in C, with forming the second part. The first part to open with Bach's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Organ Toccata in F, followed by Mozart's Bassoon a charming Overture. The Finale, for the first time in these concerts. Then as a novelty of especial interest, never heard before in Boston, the Triple Concerto of Beethoven, for piano, violin and 'cello (Messrs. Lang, Eichberg and Fries), with orchestra. This will complete the list of Beethoven Concertos adding the only one which remains to the five for piano and the one for violin, all of which have been given in these concerts. The first part will end with Mendelssohn's Overture: "Becalmed at Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The second of the four monthly Concerts (Feb. 4) was one of the very best classical Chamber concerts ever enjoyed in the Chickering Hall, whose walls have been consecrated by so many. The room was completely filled with excellent listeners, and the programme was very happy in its selections:—

First Quartet, No. 7, in F, Op. 18	Beethoven.
Allegro con brio—Adagio [illegible]—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro.
Capriccio, for Piano [illegible] Op. [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]
B. J. LANG.
Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, in D, Op. 58 . . .	Mendelssohn.
Allegro [illegible]—Adagio [illegible]—Adagio—Finale [illegible]
Messrs. LANG and FRIES.
Quartet. No. 1, op. 41	Robert Schumann.
Introduction [illegible] and Allegro—Scherzo, Presto—Adagio,—Finale, Presto.

Delighted as the ears of young days was it to hear that early Quartet of Beethoven again; it must be many years since it was played here. How perfectly clear, fresh, full of vigorous health and enthusiasm! It is in the quick movements! and the Adagio so unmistakeably Beethoven, breathes the deep thoughtful passion of a deep nature. After our recent initiation in the more involved and difficult later works of the master, it was like play to listen to one so clear and simple as this, and find it so genial, full of genial charm. Would it not be interesting some time to contrast this No. 1 with one of the great "posthumous" Quartets in the same concert? What a measure of the progress of so great a mind!

Mr. LANG of course played the Mendelssohn Capriccio with all grace and delicacy, and they were much enjoyed, as they always are when well played. But the Sonata Duo was an event of the concert. It is a noble composition, genial, rich in invention, large and elegant in treatment. Here the violoncello of WULF FRIES had full play for its finest power, and admirably he used the opportunity. Admirable [illegible] the part of both artists. Every one was edified by those [illegible] chords of Chorale, answering in sweeter, pleading fragments of recitative from the [illegible] of Mendelssohn's great moments.

Schumann's three Quartets, op. 41, belong to his best event or period; and though difficult, are as artistic [illegible] in respect of form, as they are genial, a romantic. The Club has played all three of them during the last three or four years; most frequently the third, in A major, which is perhaps the richest and most striking one among them. This one in A minor (though after a brief introduction, that key, the principal Allegro is in F major) is also very beautiful and was so well rendered as to [illegible] attention and give general pleasure. We hope to hear it again.

The third concert comes on Tuesday evening, March 4, when Mendelssohn's Octet will be performed, with other rare things not yet determined on.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The fourth Wednesday Afternoon Concert (Feb. 5) had at length the encouragement of a very large audience. This was the programme:

Overture to "[illegible]"	Handel.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] for Piano, with Orchestra, Mendelssohn.
[illegible]
Grand Symphony in C	Franz Schubert.
Potpourri, from Faust	Gounod.

The undertaking of the great Schubert Symphony by this small orchestra, and so soon after hearing it upon a more adequate scale, proved on the whole a [illegible]; although everything that tends to familiarize the ear with its many features is so much preparation for a more receptive hearing when the fuller opportunity shall come. It is at least good as study. But then, the necessity of dividing so long a work for these more miscellaneous programmes, giving only two of the four movements at a time, destroys one of the good times of listening to it fairly; you do not sit yourself down to it in earnest, and expecting a whole, you do give a whole mind to it. The Handel Overture, though it lacked the extra [illegible] for the quartet, was a luxurious treat, as a Handel Overture always is. Mr. [illegible] played that swift, unflagging, brilliant Rondo of Mendelssohn (the same which he gave us last year in the Symphony Concerts), with all that clearness, certainty and charm which we all expect of him whenever he approaches the piano; and he was recalled with enthusiasm.

This week's concert did not bring with it the balance of the Schubert Symphony. Instead of that we were introduced [illegible] performance new work in an old form, namely an orchestral "Suite" by Franz Lachner of Munich, the second of the kind which he has produced and which has found considerable favor in German concert rooms.

This one is in E minor,—not, as the printed bills erroneously had it, in D. It is a singular attempt to follow the old forms of Bach and Handel in a long instrumental work, arranging together a succession (suite) of little pieces, partly in the fugue, and partly in old dance-rhythms, and just enough related to one another to form a certain unity of impression from the whole. These old masters however commonly kept all the string of pieces in the same key, whereas the modern instinct prudently shrinks from that monotony. The Suite was the imperfect, half organized forerunner of the developed unity and symmetry of the Sonata form (which from the time of Emanuel Bach and Haydn holds in all Symphonies, Sonatas, Quartets, Trios, Concertos, &c.) To return to this after the form now is to take a long step back in search of novelty. The quaint tones, nay the certain [illegible] each atmosphere of a past age with which the artist makes cleverly the [illegible] must needs lack the naturalness, the naïveté, the sincerity of the old masters. We would not judge of it from a first hearing. It is an ambitious, interesting, [illegible] quite winning and delightful, but in parts also hard and dry and long. The pieces are, 1) an Adagio introduction, vigorous and sombre organ-like leading into a quick Fugue, with a strongly marked but rather heavy subject, cleverly wrought out, not without traits of coarseness (as it seemed to us) in the instrumentation, and some confusing redundancy of [illegible]. 2) Andante in E major, again mystical and brooding, but in a more sentimental vein reminding us of Schumann in "Paradise and the Peri," much of it fine and delicate. 3) Minuet in E minor, with Trio in E major, that glides along with a refined, half sad, subtle grace. 4) Most charming of all, and quite original, an Intermezzo, with a light, uneven, quickening rhythm. 5) For a finale as is usual in the old Suites, a Gigue or Jig in 6-8 measure, full of life and energy. The rendering was careful and the impression on the audience quite as good as such a novelty of such a Suite (the "Zellner" [illegible]) in a unique form could be expected to make. It should be heard more than once and, if possible, with a greater body of strings.

It was a happy thought to introduce Beethoven's bright little Turkish march right after the "Suite." [illegible] a relief [illegible] Rossini's La Gazza Ladra Overture opened the concert. No one there no [illegible] All [illegible] and inspiriting, the charm of [illegible] the [illegible] child of genius, however light and careless, is infallible.

IN PROSPECT. "Moses" and "Elijah" are to be given by the Handel and Haydn Society on the evenings of Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 22 and March [illegible]. The first is a sop to Cerberus, if we may so call a certain reactionary element in the Society which takes to recent progress in a good direction hard, and is afraid there will be "too much [illegible]" in "Davide" [illegible], an melodious flowery Rossini opera which sing so glibly, to serve up under the solemn cloak of Oratorio! This element succeeded at the last annual election in "reconstructing" the board of Directors and must have its way for once? Perhaps it will be quite as well to let it try its way for once, and see whether the times are as they used to be. Anyhow, Moses will be offset on the next night by the true Oratorio Elijah.

Mendelssohn's charming little Opera, the "Son and Stranger" (Heimkehr aus der Fremde), which he wrote for the "silver wedding" of his parents, is to be produced at the Music Hall, at the annual benefit of Mr. PECK, the worthy superintendent. It will be a novelty. All the vocal and instrumental forces will be given, with various soloists and orchestra, under Mr. B. J. Lang's direction. Every one will wish to hear it, both for its own sake and for Mr. Peck's, who has managed to make his pleasant relations with all music-lovers hereabouts.

LA GRANDE DUCHESSE. Our article of a few weeks since has found an answer here. But where Barnum "is rooted" in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, &c., we recount a few things from newspaper notices. The other day we copied from the Philadelphia Bulletin a brave article on the low taste [illegible] a "the metropolis" New York; glanced [illegible] rubbing its hands and saying, We, of Philadelphia, we are as they are; we shall not be carried away by [illegible] "Barbe Bleue" and "Grand Duchesse." But look you now the Duchess approaches Philadelphia, the "man par all the press" has set out, the flaming advertisements are out and they pay well, and now the Bulletin has changed its tone, has tuned to one joy to the general praise. It [illegible] with "[illegible] the grace of magnificent comparison upon it," while answering the "better [illegible]" [illegible] against Rossini and Mozart, &c.

Then you see [illegible] "[illegible]." Mind you this was not admitted by the newspaper critics when we wrote. It was praised up as a work of genius (the New York Weekly Review even spoke of it [illegible] as "the ruling musical genius of Europe"). It is one crafted that you had to stoop to the task of pointing out the most unfairly and common of the results.

Our critics, as we foresaw, have raised a false issue with us, careful not to state what we did say; they brought us for what we did not say; they charge us with [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible]. We do not quarrel with the "Duchess" simply because it is light, but because it is not a real, beautiful, not genial, but [illegible] as [illegible].

We only wrote after we had been [illegible] with keeping silent, almost when all their newspapers proclaimed "the great musical event" of the day.—The moral of our article was, by inference (as a rule) of what is called "Art criticism" in the press, a being a melancholy fact that most newspaper musical criticism throughout the country is governed mainly by mere business considerations; that the "criticism" is only an expansion of the puffery [illegible], and that the length and frequency and warmth of the critical notice keeps measure with the advertising patronage.

NEW AMERICAN OPERA. We have seen some compositions of Mr. Fairbank, which certainly show musical feeling, taste and mastery of form, and therefore we do not feel greatly surprised about the praise bestowed in the following from the Philadelphia Sunday Times.

A few weeks since we alluded briefly to the opera which Mr. J. [illegible] Fairbank, of this city, is now composing for the [illegible] troupe, and which will be produced next season. [illegible] and friends should prevent the fulfilment of the present [illegible]. We have had the pleasure of hearing much of the music and we [illegible] to [illegible] our readers its ultimate merit.

* * * * * * * * *

Mr. Fairbank has had advantages enjoyed by few of our native musicians. A long residence in Europe, with opportunities for study most enthusiastically improved, was an invaluable benefit to a talent already considerably developed during his [illegible] life in his own land. Personal influence with many prominent musical people gained him a [illegible] in Germany and the more flattering brought to his reward [illegible] from the King of Wurtemburg. Returning home with such endorsement, his path was smoothed to some measure, and he has been encouraged to persevere in the composition of an opera, first conceived in Switzerland. [illegible] he has the aid of a librettist, who is not only a dramatic versifier and fairly acquainted with stage effects, but is himself a fine musician, has some theoretical knowledge [illegible] and is a [illegible] and correct critic. Such a union has been much [illegible] to our composers, and Mr. Fairbank will undoubtedly profit by it. As the scenes [illegible] should be known that the plot and main divisions of the story had been decided upon before the and... of the present gifted [illegible], and he is therefore not responsible for the manner in which an episode from Cervantes' Don Quixote has been transformed into a three-act opera now named "The Interrupted Marriage." Our purpose to-day is not to speak of the music in detail. The Musical Institutions of Berlin.

Berlin has a population of 700,000. It is only within the last decades that Music has received the general and thorough culture in Berlin, which the other arts, Sculpture, Architecture, Painting, already enjoyed there in the last century. Until then it depended almost exclusively upon the individual interest taken in it by the Prussian princes; and although they were for the most part warm supporters of Art, yet they were not able to promote it on a scale commensurate with the zeal and plans pursued by the house of Hohenzollern from an early period in Germany. To those Sculpture and Architecture were more essential, and therefore flourished earlier.

One of the first friends of music mentioned among the rulers of Prussia is the Elector Joachim II, who reigned from 1535–1571. He maintained besides a corps of 24 court trumpeters and 1 kettle-drummer, a stately Capelle, the proportions of which were regulated by a court ordinance of 1570. His successor Joachim Frederick (1598–1608) increased it to 22 chamber musicians and 11 chapel boys. It was under the direction of Nicolaus Zangius, a composer famous in his time. After Joachim Frederick's successor Johann Sigismund (till 1619) supported it at a yearly cost of 1111 florins. In 1616 he engaged also two Italian singers with a salary of 360 thalers each. The distress brought upon the Mark of Brandenburg by the Thirty years War led the Elector George William (1619–1640) to curtail the outlay as much as possible; and soon after entering upon the government he dismissed his Capelle. It was first reinstated by the Elector Frederick William (1640–88), who at the same time enlarged its sphere of action by ordaining that his chamber musicians and chapel boys should participate in the service at the Nicolai, the Marien and the Petri churches. The male voices were supplied by the highly celebrated composer Crüger, then Cantor at the Nicolai church.

Music was particularly cherished at the court of his splendor-loving successor Frederick III, who in 1701 was crowned King Frederick I. His wife, Sophie Charlotte, was passionately fond of music: she not only sang excellently, but she had great facility at the clavichord and she composed. At special festivities foreign virtuosos were attracted to the court. Handel, 1696, while a boy, had plucked his first laurels here.

Frederick's son and follower on the throne had a sense for Art only so far as it served his exclusive love for military matters. Hence he soon dissolved the Capelle, and gave all the greater care to the hautboys corps of his royal regiment. With the military orphan house, which he founded in Potsdam in 1724, he connected a school for the training of military musicians.

Frederick the Great, on the contrary, who ascended the throne in 1740, earned imperishable credit for his furtherance of the musical life in Berlin. He was confessedly not only a connoisseur but a fine connoisseur, and he practised the art in many ways. His favorite instrument was the flute, which he played like a virtuoso; he composed, too, not without inventiveness and skill. Already as crown prince he supported a Capelle in Rheinsberg. He had sent for the famous flute-player Quantz as early as 1728, but he did not enter his service until 1741. Philip Emanuel Bach, too, was already called to Rheinsberg, but he first became court composer in 1740 to the king's capelle,—in which position he remained till 1767.

The example of the king was followed by other princely personages; thus in the years 1740–60 the Margraves Henry and Charles maintained their own private Capelles; so too the crown prince, afterwards king Fred. William II. Kirnberger and J. A. P. Schulz officiated here as directors. Especial mention should be made too of the Princess Amalia, who studied musical theory with great diligence under Kirnberger's direction. The chief event, by which the culture of music in Berlin gained a central point, was the foundation of the Royal Opera. On the 5th Sept. 1741 the corner stone of the Opera House was laid. In December 1742 it was opened with the opera Cleopatra by Graun, and the Berlin Opera soon rose to an important height. It at once gave an impulse to the establishment of societies for other kinds of music. Thus the chamber-musician Janitsch founded the so-called "Academy;" the chamber-musician Schale the "Assemblée," in both of these instrumental music was principally cultivated. Vocal music was practised in the Saturday concerts of chamber-musician Agricola. Still greater importance was gained by the "Music-practising Society" (founded in 1749 by chamber-musician Sack), which among other things arranged a performance of Graun's Tod Jesu in the cathedral.

But none of these societies was able to survive. A greater consequence was rapidly acquired by the "Dilettanten-verein," founded by Carl Fasch in 1789: how the "Singakademie" developed out of this, will be seen hereafter.

Public concerts also came in vogue. In 1770 Benda and Bachmann founded the so-called "Weekly Concert" (from October to May); in 1783 Müller and Lessabbe founded similar concerts in the English House. In 1783 and 84 J. Fr. Reichardt established six subscription concerts, in which Oratorios also were produced. Most of the foreign virtuosos also gave concerts in the English House.

Thus the musical life in Berlin gradually and steadily expanded, the more so as the following Princes have lent it their aid at least on certain sides. It is known that the great Frederick's successor, Frederick William II., tried to win over the greatest master of his time, Mozart. Under Frederick William III. (1797–1840) spectacular Opera especially was cultivated through Spontini. Within his reign too falls the foundation of the "Royal Institute for Church Music" (1822) and of the "Musical Section" in the Royal Academy of Arts (1833).

A zealous further of true and genuine Art again was Frederick William IV (1840–61). The Berlin "Dom chor" (cathedral choir) which has become world-famous, is to be regarded as his creation (1843); and in the preceding year the "Symphony Concerts" of the Royal Capelle (orchestra) were founded, and have always enjoyed the especial protection of the king. It is furthermore well known, that through him Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy received the impulse to some of his most important works.

Finally it must here be mentioned that it was four Berlin artists who prepared that Spring of Song which reached full bloom in Franz Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann, namely Joh. Friedr. Reichardt (1751–1814), C. F. Zelter (1758–1832), Bernhard Klein (1793–1832), and Ludwig Berger (1777–1839).

THE OPERA.

Dramatic representations with music were early provided for in Berlin, even before the building of the Royal Opera house. Over the Rossstall, in the royal stables, on the Breitenstrasse, a theatre was built, bearing the name "Tummelplatz," in which, since the year 1700, ballets with song and dance were frequently performed. The idea of building the Opera house first occurred to Frederick the Great in the beginning of his reign. Even in 1741 before its completion, the members of the opera engaged by Graun were assembled, and a provisional theatre arranged in the Schloss. On the 13th Dec. 1741 it was opened with Graun's Rodelinda. This opera, like all others up to the year 1806, was sung to Italian words; but the book contained a German translation with the Italian. The orchestra consisted of 11 violins, 1 violas, 4 violoncellos, 2 double basses, 1 flute, 1 bassoons, 2 horns, 4 oboes, 1 theorbo, 1 harp and 1 pianos.

On the 7th Dec. 1742 at six in the evening, the new Opera House was opened with the opera "Cæsar and Cleopatra" by Graun. The singers were 1 women and 1 men, with the addition of 1 castrati. The chorus was seldom introduced in the Italian Opera. When it was became necessary they called in Gymnasiasts.

The Royal Opera house was built after a plan of the Baron von Knobelsdorf, and this plan has been essentially retained in the new building after the fire of 1843. It is a three-story edifice, standing free on all sides, 255 Rhenish feet long, and 106 wide. On the outside of the front façade, on each side, a stairway leads up to a portico of six free-fluted Corinthian columns. On the gable stand the statues of Apollo, Melpomene and Thalia; on the pediment an offering to Apollo is represented in half-relief; the whole bears the inscription Fridericus Rex Apollini et Musis. Beside the portico four bas-reliefs are set up on the wall, representing the history of Apollo. The other sides are correspondingly adorned with Corinthian columns and with statues. The year façade the inscription Fridericus Guilelmus IV. Theatrum incendio consumtum restituit 1844. The Opera house was frequented only for the Italian operas during the Carnival. Admission was gratuitous. Only since the year 1801 were there given at first two, and then four performances with an entrance fee for the benefit of the poor. Behind the orchestra was a semi-circle of sofas for the king and those nearest to his person. In the first row were the royal box; the other boxes were for the nobility; the boxes of the parterre and the second and third rows were occupied by the home and foreign ministers, the counsellors of the state colleges, persons belonging to the court and ladies of the burgher rank. In the parterre sat officers, soldiers detached on duty and respectably dressed citizens. The performance as a rule began at 6 o'clock as the [illegible] as soon as the Court appeared, the Baron von Knobelsdorf gave the signal to commence. Under the favor of the great king and with Graun's careful direction the Italian Opera at Berlin soon rose to great importance. The co-operation of such male singers as Salimbeni, Concialini, Porporino, Tombolini and the ladies Astrua, Farinelli, Mara, Todi, made the operatic performances of Berlin at various times the most distinguished in Europe. For the Opera Buffa a theatre was erected at Potsdam. After the death of Graun Agricola became conductor of the Italian Opera and carried it on at first with zeal and with success, but the king's interest began gradually to cool; in 1775 he came very near losing the whole Opera. After the death of Agricola (1774) Fasch, the founder of the Singakademie, undertook the direction, only to turn it over in 1775 to John Fr. Reichardt, and according to his judgment, in a pretty poor condition. It continued to grow worse and worse, especially after a dangerous rival appeared in the German Opera.

Berlin at that time was also visited by travelling dramatic troupes, and one of these, under the Director Schönemann, had as early as 1743 produced an Operetta in a German translation: "Der lustige Schuster" (The Jolly Shoemaker), but with such poor success that no new attempt was risked for a long time. It was not until Koch in 1771 acquired the privilege for a permanent stage, that the German Opera began to be fostered. Hiller, Wolf and Benda writing music for it. When Koch died (1775) Döbbelin undertook this theatre, and he managed so well that in 1786 his was declared to be the National Theatre, and the Schauspielhaus, built for French plays on the Gensd'armen Platz, was given over to him. In 1787 Döbbelin was pensioned off and Professors Ramler and Engel undertook the direction; and now the musical farce and the operetta received such careful attention, that the Italian Opera was gradually crowded into the background. In 1788 the clever musical director [illegible] was succeeded by [illegible] an excellent musician, under whose direction Mozart's Belmonte and Constanze was brought out in 1788; the Marriage of Figaro on the 14th Sept. 1790, and on the 20th Dec. Don Juan, at the National Theatre. In 1792, Aug. 4 Così fan Tutte also was produced there.

The German Opera at the National Theatre took an extraordinary rise when B. A. Weber assumed the direction in 1796. He was an excellent musician and an enthusiastic follower of Mozart and Gluck. His influence hastened the dissolution of the Italian Opera. Neither Righini nor Himmel, who labored with and after Reichardt at the Italian Opera, were able to lend it new splendor. Finally when in 1795 Gluck's Iphigenie came upon the stage of the National Theatre in German, under Weber's direction, the Italian opera gradually lost all foothold; in 1805 it had become wholly inactive, and when misfortune came on Prussia in 1806 it went to pieces; the Royal Opera house was used as a magazine for bread. On the king's return to Berlin (Dec. 23, 1809) Gluck's Iphigenie in Aulis was given in German at the Opera House.

In 1811 Iffland was appointed general director of the royal theatres. Both orchestras, that of the Opera House and that of the National Theatre, were united under the three Capellmeisters Righini, Himmel and A. B. Weber. From this time the operas and ballets and plays with music, like Egmont, Faust, Tell and the Midsummer Night's Dream, were given in the Opera House; in the Schauspielhaus the spoken drama in all its kinds.

Two particularly remarkable days in the history of the Berlin opera are the 18th of May 1816, and the 18th of June of the same year on which the music to Preciosa and the Freyschütz of C. M. von Weber were given for the first time.

A special chapter in the history of the Berlin opera is formed by the time in which Spontini (1770-1851) acted as general director of music, 1820–1841. He has been violently assailed and also enthusiastically defended and praised and both perhaps with reason. The manner in which he ignored all that lay outside of his own narrowly limited sphere deserves all blame, while the care which he bestowed upon grand spectacle opera claims recognition.

Along with Spontini worked F. E. L. Seidel, since 1822 Capellmeister, pensioned in 1830, and Henning, active as Capellmeister from 1836 until he was pensioned in 1848.

At present W. Taubert (born 1811) is first Capellmeister, having acted as musical director at the Royal Opera since 1845. With him, H. Dorn (born in 1804) has worked since 1849 in the place of Otto Nicolai, who belonged to the Berlin Opera only two years (1847–9). Since 1848 Robert Radecke also has been engaged as music director at the Royal Opera. Meyerbeer, who was appointed General Music Director in 1843, has seldom acted as such.

Reminiscences of Carl Maria von Weber*

There was no room in the "kleines Rauchhaus," not so much as the smallest chamber. The landlady, who looked upon me with a favorable eye, because two years previously I had honorably and punctually settled for a fortnight in [illegible] a score of thalers, which he had run up at her establishment, was exceedingly sorry to turn me from her door and, desiring to keep me as near as possible, sent me to the Golden Hart directly opposite. This hostelry, too, was thronged with students—for, in the year 1822 a pleasure trip to Dresden was deemed indispensable by every member of a German University during his autumn vacation. Whoever could manage to scrape together a little "tin," made a pilgrimage to the Florence of the Elbe, and whoever could not was even more likely to go than those who could, because he was sure of meeting with acquaintances from whom he could get something. If a student found an acquaintance, or found they had not any more than himself, he and they added to afternoon some street-goer. I was one of the individuals on whom this honor was conferred by the inmates of the Golden Hart. I did not care for a handful of money more or less. Was not I secretary and poet of the Royal National Theatre, Dresden with a fixed annual salary of three hundred thalers not to mention subordinate sources of income and what I made by literary work! Had I not been despatched by my respected management to engage artists, and had I not so much allowed me a day for expenses? Was I not, moreover making the boldest arrangements for a literary periodical the first number of which under the title of Deutsche Blätter etc. was to appear on the 1st January 1822? I was a man of importance. It struck me as a remarkable piece of condescension on my part that I should be contented with a third-class inn, when hotels of a very different sort were open to me. At first the students took confoundedly little notice of me; my talent did not appear to impress them. But after we had drunk together and they had found out I was a good sort of fellow they became more friendly. We proceeded arm in arm to the theatre, but it was only with great difficulty we could force our way into the pit. Der Freischütz was to be performed and the composer to conduct for the first time after his return from leave of absence. All eyes were directed to where he was to appear. Like every one else I, too, was exceedingly anxious to see the master whose vigorous martial songs I had, when a volunteer, sung with my comrades on the march. A few of the students from the "kleines Rauchhaus" who had already seen him, [illegible] him to being lame. One of them even knew several of his errors, [illegible] assured us that every [illegible] among those [illegible] also lame, and at the same time a musical conductor both the [illegible] and he conducting by being pointed [illegible]. While we were waiting and gazing impatiently before us, there was a movement behind, and, ere we could look round, [illegible] of a tall and [illegible] laurel in a splendid case wreathed with garlands of flowers. Borne aloft by countless hands that rose up from the crowd, the significant gift moves onward towards the orchestra. So active and clever were all those who stood so [illegible] that it reached the conductor's seat at the very moment that Carl Maria von Weber made his appearance.

People become, in time old, dull, and indifferent. I have become so myself. But, even at the present day the recollection of that hour is still present to my mind in all the freshness of youth, and, as I write down these lines, the first sounds of the overture penetrate to my heart as though through the cheers of the audience and a delicious thrill of sweet melancholy runs through me. Good Heavens, how we shouted! I and my students from the Golden Hart, and the others from the "kleines Rauchhaus," and the rest, how we shouted, one and all: "Hurrah, Weber! Hurrah Weber!"

It was in the gentle autumnal sunshine that I met on the Dresden Terrace a famous and popular singer with her husband. I had made their acquaintance some months previously in Silesia, and they were now staying for a short time in Dresden, on their return from a long professional tour. We immediately arranged to meet that same night at Chiapone's Cellar; we agreed to go there after the play, to have macaroni and oysters. As soon as this mighty business was arranged we walked on chatting with each other. I described the recent enthusiasm in the theatre, Weber's reception, and my own delight. My fair companion heard all I had to say, but made no observation. In the evening, as I was waiting beneath the cosy arched roof which had looked down upon so many merry artistic meetings that it had obtained a classic reputation—as I was discussing with friend Chiapone the details of the little banquet and standing in readiness to receive my guests—the door opened, and the Master hobbled in arm in arm with the lovely creature who had made so glorious a creation of his Agatha, and was so fond of appearing in the part. "I have limited myself," he said, "I, also, belong, so to speak, to the gang."

That was indeed a night! Thirty-one years have since elapsed, but, if I could only spend it over again, I should be, I believe, again young. There were six or seven of us. Ludwig Robert, with his Juno-like wife, was also in Dresden. I should be taking the most anxious falsehood were I to assert that the conversation was long maintained at the pitch which learned, intellectual men and wise persons set up as the acme of well bred social joys. That was not Weber's kind of conversation. He could be serious enough, I warrant, but in the proper season for giving way to mirth for joking, merely and without restraint, he abandoned himself like a the surprise of the moment; he became childlike, as if he pleasing example exercised a magic effect upon any one who is a grace of humor in his companion who happened to sit near him. Of the humorous compose he could speak himself and make his neighbors speak his shoulder-shrugging creature, phrase makers, and important-tongued talkers, have not the slightest notion; and it was quite correct that they should not have.

Weber was one of those few musicians with whom sound life education varied aspirations, and preponderating intelligence do not injure the creative flow of original melody or impose any learned restraint upon natural talent. He was one of those rare beings who, in the intercourse of friendship, in the mutual interchange of opinions and views, in no way show off their intellectual superiority but, with amiable good humor and gentleness, take care that every one near him shall have an opportunity of exhibiting his own little light. Supposing, at odd ex, and as terminating Weber greeted his opponent, fairy impulse arose in the course of the conversation to a point where a vehement dispute could be led easily and aptly into the sphere of jocularity and through the latter to a peaceful conclusion. There was but one subject which formed an exception. In one matter alone was the good man little. The mere of one person only was able to make him forget his noble bearing, which otherwise always distinguished him. The subject was Italian opera and its name, Rossini. When these were mentioned, Weber's love gave way to an irritation, whose cause was so good became blind, and would treat upon remaining so. He purposely closed his eyes to beauties which could not in the long run have escaped his notice, had he not obstinately and bitterly been on the watch for defects alone—of which, by the way, there were plenty. But this was perfectly human and perfectly intelligible. His position as conductor of German Opera in the Dresden of that day rendered everything a sin. The Italian Opera, with small ed. Morlacchi, was petted up by the Court. The Italian Opera was the cause of Weber's having to suffer patiently many a slight, which he felt the more keenly, the sharper the contrast which it offered to the respect with which people all over the world had begun to greet his name, since Der Freischütz and Preciosa had spread his fame from every stage. The senseless Rossini mania moreover dinned of judgment and frequently, in contrast with more mighty thinking was scant care so outrageous that even I myself, as a layman, though all the partiality for Rossini, felt angry at it. There was no necessity for a man to have studied counterpoint as Carl Maria had done, under the Abbé Vogler in Darmstadt with Gottfried Weber and Meyerbeer, to be induced to despair at hearing the end of the tremendous La Gazza ladra overwhelmingly applauded at the Garden Concerts of Linke's Baths, or at listening to the confounded triplets and other dance rhymes, by which Rossini, who was otherwise admirable, and Rossini's (the hero) represented despair when, on account of a slave upon or so that had been a slave, the most noble-minded of all her souls was to be unmerited, instead of a roguish trapper. I am speaking of the year twenty-six. At the present day the case is different, and in a Thirty Years' War of criticism against taste we have been taught to perceive Rossini's talent even in his worst mistakes. But Weber would not have anything to do with him.

At this our first meeting, Weber was frequently placed in a quandary by his bitter hatred of Rossini and by his gallantry towards the fair vocalist who paid as much applause to Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Tancredi, and Otello, as to Der Freischütz, and who, consequently, did not appear inclined to agree unconditionally with Weber's half playful, half savage sentences of condemnation. But was to conceal the truth, I must state my impression that Il Barbiere was one of the exceptions to Weber's odio Rossiniano profondissimo, and found grace in his eyes, quand même.

Before we left Chiapone's Cellar to put and take another turn on the mild starlight night, a reconciliation had been effected, and Weber affixed the seal to the treaty of peace by inviting us all to dine with him next day.

In no art is dilettantism more hurtful, and, at the same time, more—indispensable than in music: more hurtful because it may have penetrated deeply into the whole life of the art, in which it imparts a wrong tendency; more indispensable, because its active co-operation has become one of the most important factors in musical matters. Many causes have contributed to its over-extension; the universality of musical talent for developing a capability for greater than ought; and, in any other reproductive art, the social application of music by which the latter has become a universal means of culture; and lastly, the love for art as a feeling, which we would not value lightly, though we more highly than the two grounds first adduced.

In a poem which gives us a splendid and unparalleled picture of German domestic life at the end of the last century—in Hermann und Dorothea, there is a significant scene, most plainly showing how and why dilettantism has taken the upper hand in music. The host of the Golden Lion snapped at when he considers the bourgeois's notion of his son, specifies the qualities necessary for his future daughter-in-law. He does not require that she shall be able to draw or paint her portrait; he does not suppose she will be acquainted with the great authors of her native land, and able to read them; he only asks that she may "I must have her play the piano," and he himself duly gives his reason: "I want the best and most fashionable people of the town to meet in my house as they do at my rich neighbor's, whose daughters are, so surely." Music, in fact, is that art which may be turned to better advantage socially than any other. A man cannot sit down and paint or make a sketching for the company, but he can always sing and play to them. The result is that a number of friends never assemble without such an air of a musical being served and called upon to play or sing something; and this strange to say, causes great frequently a barn less endurance so derived from the source itself than anywhere else. What is called fashionable musical in such assemblies—except there exist certain feelings of consideration for the performer, consideration entirely independent of the performer's competency; a piano-forte piece or a song; is agreed to proceed and not conversation, instead of the isolated staccatissimo spoken in a low tone, in which the company have previously indulged.

To the manner introduced by dilettantism the professional musician is, unfortunately, compelled to submit; unless he happens to give a reputation that the company listen quietly, he has a consequence to make favorable circumstances have rendered him perfectly independent of them—and even in this case he will be able to avoid them sooner than compel them to keep quiet. If we reflect how inseparably social amusements are mixed up nowadays with the public position of a writer, especially if he be a virtuoso, we shall perceive how hard an artist must be to undergo for a moment, an articulately high ideas of art what new fees he is obliged to make to dilettanteism, unless he can resolve on procuring an amount of resignation at variance with artistic self-esteem; can we suppose that such a man will give way to one beneath him, because the latter understands better how to satisfy the desires of society? He must do violence to his better feelings not to relinquish the contest—of the question of gain, and the miserable details connected therewith, we will not say a word.

If we now descend one step, or some two or three steps, out of the region of tea parties and coffee parties into that where beer is drunk, we come to the Liedertafeln. We trust our readers will dispense with the effusive, any observations upon this branch of dilettantism: all that was to be said on the subject has been said—without any effect. The Dresden Sängerfest will hardly do what has been taught the members of Liedertafeln not to climb too high, and then do more good than all the authorized articles and artistic protests in the world. De mortuis of figures is often the most disagreeable sufferers.

It has been satisfactorily shown how dilettantism degraded music into a mere source of amusement. We will point out at some future period, the means for nullifying, to some extent, its injurious influence; at present, we will devote a few words to describing its better influence and to showing how it has become indispensable to art.

That the dilettanteism of the Princes and Nobleness of South Germany in the last, and at the commencement of the present century, was the principal support of instrumental music is a well-known fact. Similar for not affecting musical matters in the present day as high-born dilettanti, who made sacrifices for art (and not merely for their own amusement) have now become myths. On the other hand art has to thank dilettanteism for an increase, which is decidedly very large, of co-operative forces in executing works of more than ordinary magnitude. In north-west Germany, it would be physically impossible ever to hear an oratorio, were it not for the existence of the Gesangvereine (Vocal Unions), the members of which devote themselves with zeal and love to this class of composition in preference to any other. Without such dilettanti associations we should be deprived of the enjoyment of listening to works which may be called the exclusive property of the German spirit of music. In France, Oratorio will never be at home, because Romanism generally will never listen to religious music out of the churches, and because it is repugnant to their nature to hear an action narrated without seeing it represented. Handel's Oratorios, as well as even Bach's Passion-Music and Motets, which rest upon a strictly Protestant basis, may at some future time, be produced in Paris, because everything is used there—but in Paris they will never feel at home. For the present, however, even a mere trial of them is out of the question because there is no choral society which would undertake it. In England, Oratorio is greatly fostered, but more on religious than on musical grounds: there are a large number of families in easy circumstances who attend only sacred concerts; and the grand musical festivals got up in various towns, owe their origin to ecclesiastical objects, and are not conceivable without a preponderance of church music. It must, also, be remembered that Bach's Oratorios and Motets are not at all known, while Handel's Messiah and Israel in Egypt, and Mendelssohn's Elijah, and the "Psalm "As the hart," are looked on as the common property of all vocal dilettanti. Nor must we pass over in silence the fact that in England many persons not professional musicians charge for singing in the chorus, because these concerts are not got up by musical societies, but always by persons who undertake them as money speculations. It is only in Germany, therefore, that we can find that dilettanteism which is always ready to support itself for art, and which as a whole does not shirk over devotion which opposes excellent, sometimes as directors, which pays numerous expenses and even makes up deficits out of its private means. Though many such are in addition to those of no artistic nature may have to do with its efforts and undertakings, what the musician has more especially to acknowledge in the thanks-worthy music. It is never very difficult [illegible] in the case of exceedingly celebrated musicians, to decide whether their everlasting concert-playing, their travelling to and fro in all directions, and their frequently repeating the same programme [illegible] as a whole is the result of [illegible] both [illegible] other motives do not predominate — why should we blame the dilettanti for gratifying a little vanity by taking part in an oratorio by Bach, without having any particular predilection for such profoundly serious music, but merely in order to pay homage to a prevalent taste? It is highly necessary that professional musicians should correctly appreciate the advantages of belletristic, so that they may with some prospect of success, combat its disadvantages. This is certainly very difficult, as we have already hinted, when taking a hasty survey of the matter. Musicians must above all things, have a clear idea of their own position and of their own intentions, as well as of the path they ought to pursue; they will then, supposing they really strive after what is good and beautiful in itself, not soon arrive at the conviction that in reality only the small circle of those who truly love music and those who understand it, combined with the great mass of the public, are the tribunals to which they must appeal for judgment; in other words, that the connoisseurs we have already described as made in society conduce little to fame.

The road to fame, and especially to gain, is perhaps much more difficult, or at any rate more wearisome one when it runs only through the first two classes just mentioned and not through elegant society as well, though it leads perhaps with more certainty to a permanent goal. The musician must not despise dilettanteism, but cautious or he must it where its judgment is not taken as the standard by which to go. With regard to the directors of the Vereine or Associations, these possess, at no artistic right in a far quieter one than that of the virtuosi. In Associations the inclination for good music really predominates, and the members are mostly cultivated and willing. It certainly is not easy to induce them to study new [illegible] long compositions, though Brahms, Bruch, and Hiel succeeded in overcoming these things, such own a part of their reputation to the Associations of dilettanti who have executed with love and artistic zeal their choral works. The greatest difficulties the conductor and to surmount are often of a social nature, and cannot, therefore be taken into account here.

Saxons Tavernerus, dilettanteism is very injurious, very injurious when artists do not clearly understand their own position; it is exceedingly useful when it subordinates itself of its own accord to artistic ends.

Crystal Palace Concerts, (London.)

The temporary cessation of the Crystal Palace whose concerts and the close of the first half of the series, invites a retrospect which neither we nor our readers are at all indisposed to make. Probably no musical enterprise whatever and, certainly none having to do with orchestral works, is well engaged attention so that over which Mr. Manns presides. The history of the Saturday Concerts has now come to be valuable not only for its full's final but also for its representative character. In some avail indicates the progress of the art in this country and is safely accepted as a standard by which that progress can best be judged. So far we may consider ourselves fortunate because no other country can boast such performances, as an indication of audiences so accepted by directors and audiences. But before reckoning the words, of the past, it may be as well to notice more particularly the closing concert of the year, which was thoroughly representative in the character of its programme and the interest it carried. The works selected for performance were the following:—

Overture, Le Siège de Corinth	Rossini.
Cantata, "I have sighed" [illegible] Soprano — Madame Lemmens-Sherrington; with chorus, "Hallelujah" — Mr. Lewis Thomas, and the Crystal Palace Choir	Mendelssohn.
Air, "O sing unto the Lord" (Elijah) Miss Julia Elton.	Gounod.
Air, "If with all your hearts" (Elijah) — Mr. W. H. Cummings.	Mendelssohn.
Hymn, "Hear my Prayer" — Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and the Crystal Palace Choir	Mendelssohn.
The Choral Symphony — Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and the Crystal Palace Choir.	Beethoven.

The chief interest of the concert was centred in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the most gigantic and most difficult of its kind. For the performance of this extraordinary work extraordinary preparations had been made. The band was specially augmented, the chorus thoroughly drilled, and the services of Madame Sherrington, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Lewis Thomas secured for the vocal solos. No work could have been presented under greater advantages, and none could better repay the time and attention spent upon it. It is not always, however, that adequate results follow elaborate preparations, and every one felt relieved from their earnest anxiety when the closing bars of the "Choral" marked the achievement of a genuine triumph. Every movement in the work was well done, the band most distinguishing themselves in the scherzo, playing it with infinite point and delicacy; the chorus doing their portion, if not with refinement, at all events, a strong giving cause for offence (this negative statement is positive praise in the case of the Ninth Symphony) and the principal vocalists discharging their honorable but ungrateful task with all necessary skill and judgment. The audience, who sat out the sixty-five minutes' performance with most exemplary patience, were unanimous in praise of the work and its execution. We shall hardly be expected to enter into a description of the Symphony itself because to the best players, it is well known; and, next, because the theme is so vast and suggestive that as to be it the barest justice requires all our space. The work will ever invite, whose such unapproachableness thing in the shadow of which we find the feebleness of speech. We cannot refer, however, making an extract from the book of words, which every admirer of the great musician will read with interest:—

"The original MS. of the Choral Symphony is at the Royal Library in Berlin. Like the originals in most of Beethoven's works, it is a rough manuscript with many a blot and many an erasure [illegible] [illegible]

Glancing now over the works performed in the fourteen concerts, of which that of Saturday was the last in order, we find a catalogue unequalled for interest and value. At the head of the record appear eleven symphonies, viz.: Beethoven's Nos. 4, 7, and 9, Haydn's "Oxford," Mozart's in E flat, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" and "Reformation," Schubert's in B minor and C, and Schumann's in E flat. Following these come twenty-three overtures and orchestral pieces, of which six belong to Weber (the greater total not be exceeded), one to Auber (L'Enfant Prodigue), one to Rossini (Prometheus), two to Beethoven (Coriolan and Leonora, No. 2), one to Cherubini (Anacreon), one to Gade (Hamlet), two to Mendelssohn (Meeresstille and Trumpet), two to Mozart (Le Nozze and Il Flauto Magico), two to Rossini (Semiramide and Le Siège de Corinth), one to Sullivan (Marmion), one to Gounod (Entr'acte from La Colombe) and two to Schubert (Alfonso and Estrella and the Marche Militaire). The summer solo instrumental solos, eight in number come next, the most remarkable being Mendelssohn's No. 1 in its minor, his own Lieder ohne Worte, and Spohr's Dramatic Concerto for violin. Lastly of cantatas and other choral works, the list contains six, chief among which are Acis and Galatea, the Walpurgis Night, and the Midsummer Night's Dream. The soloists vocal and instrumental, who have appeared in the course of the season are thirty-two in number and comprise many of the most eminent in their respective departments, as well as some (it must in justice be said) whose pretensions to be heard in the Crystal Palace were by no means apparent. This record speaks for itself. The energy and sound judgment of the management, and, no less, the immense value to the art of the winter concerts, need no other accomplishment.

Not satisfactory as is the retrospect, the prospect is even more. A simple enumeration of the works promised during the remaining fourteen concerts will suffice by way of proof. The symphonies will be not in number and include Beethoven's Nos. 6, 7 and 9, Mozart's "Jupiter," Haydn's in D major (first time in England), Schubert's No. 1, "Symphonie Tragique" (first time in any country), Mendelssohn's "Reformation," Schumann's No. 2 in C, Spohr's "Consecration of Sound," and Sullivan's No. 1 in E minor. In addition to these works, the music to A Summer Night's Dream will be repeated. Handel's Cecilian Ode will be given in the opening of a new organ in the concert-room at the end of February, and last, not least, Schubert's Rosamunde music will be performed entire for the first time. Mr. J. Barnett's Ancient Mariner is also announced, and the names of Madame Arabella Goddard, Madame Schumann, and Herr Joachim appear among the engagements.

Extracts from "The Voice in Singing," by Mme. Emma Seiler.

APPLICATION OF THE NATURAL LAWS STATED AT THE PRODUCTION OF MUSICAL SOUNDS TO THE CULTIVATION OF THE VOICE IN SINGING.

The parts of the human voice that generate tone are the membraneous vocal ligaments or chords, which are subject to the same general laws as all sounding bodies; of this we may satisfy ourselves by observing the different registers of the voice by means of the laryngoscope. The lower manner tone in both series of the chest register show the ligaments in full vibration and becoming more strongly stretched with every higher tone. In the second series the glottis appears, by the insertion of the arytenoid cartilages, to be shortened. In the falsetto register the vibrating body is diminished, as only the edges vibrate, while the more prominent are supported as in the chest register by the greatest stretching of the ligaments and the shortening of the glottis. The head register, finally, shows the glottis partly closed, and the vibrating ligaments gradually stretched more and more.

The vocal ligaments are made to vibrate by the air coming from the lungs through the trachea, on which they produce vibrations. These vibrations are communicated at the walls the mouth and outside, and are felt by the ear as sound.

As the strength of the tone depends upon the breadth of the waves of sound, they in their turn depend upon the structure of the organs of singing and of the parts of the mouth serving to resounding board or resonant apparatus and allowing of greater or less waves of sound. And although a tone taken of the most may cause the voice to appear fuller and stronger, yet it is not in our power, when once the vocal organs have been fully developed to make a strong voice out of a weak one.

Always to strike the tone with [illegible] and clearly requires persevering attention, as well from the teacher as from the pupil. And long practice is often required before the intonations become so pure as is indispensably necessary to good singing.

But the most important thing in the culture of the voice is the timbre of the same, for here it is in our power to form out of a sharp, hard and disagreeable voice a more sweet and pleasing.

We have seen that the timbre is dependent on the forms of the vibrating waves, and the different degrees of strength of the over-tones arising from these forms. It has been further shown that the simple round form of the waves of vibration produces the softest, fullest timbre. By this form the fundamental tone is the strongest, and the over-tones are heard according to the depth with decreasing degrees of strength. Such a one is natural to many voices. In most cases it must be more or less acquired.

A good tone in singing is formed,

1. By correctly and correctly directing the air as breath as it is expired; and

2. By a correct direction of the vibrating columns of the air as it is form by a right disposition of the mouth (Timbre).

THE CONTROL OF THE BREATH.

By too great pressure of the breath, the form of the waves of sound most favorable to a good tone is disturbed. One then hears the high over-tones while the fundamental tone sounds weak or not at all. Then the tone takes a shrill, sharp and disagreeable sound when the form of the vibrating waves is more or less disturbed by too great a pressure of air. Too little breath deprives the tone only of its strength but not of its agreeable sound.

Thus every tone requires for its greatest possible perfection only a certain quantity of breath, which cannot be increased or diminished without injury in its strength in the one case, and its agreeable sound in the other.

In looking carefully through the histories of music, and studying the old Italian schools, we find that it was just this point—the correct and right division of the breathing—that the old masters in the manner of song laid the greatest stress, and this it was in which in teaching they gave the most time and labor. The rules which they followed in this respect, in order to obtain a fine tone, accord perfectly with the results of the latest scientific investigations. And it would be far better for the art of singing if in this respect we had followed the old Italian school faithfully and not have forsaken so entirely the right way.

According to the old Italian method, which must not be confounded with the modern, the pupil was required at first to breathe just as he was wont to breathe in speaking, and care was taken, by frequent resting points in the exercises, that the breath should always be renewed at the right time. Accordingly, if the crowding of [illegible] of his breathing was too great, he was required to learn to hold it back. Until the organs were sufficiently practised in the formation of a good tone, and the ear had become familiarized to its sound, pupils were allowed to sing only piano. As soon as the pupil had a feeling for a pure tone awakened in him, and could of himself distinguish the finer variations of timbre, he was taught to fill his lungs more and more: this this was to be done, as much as possible, imperceptibly, noiselessly, slowly and soon enough for him to be able properly to control the [illegible] breathing in the beginning of a song. Only the sides of the body were in so doing to expand, and breathing with raised chest was allowed only in so practised cases, or where long passages were to be sung with special passion. For these places, where breath must be taken, there were certain rules which were strictly observed. These were:

1. Before the beginning of a phrase.
2. Before trill and passages (fioriture).
3. After long tones.
4. Before syncopes, and especially accented tones.
5. Between two tones of the same pitch and the same value in a slow phrase.
6. After a short (staccato) tone.
7. At all pauses and resting-points.
8. Before a tone which, by being accented, was to be especially distinguished in the middle of musical passages.

In light, airy pieces of music, this last mode of taking breath had a charming effect, but was mostly left to the taste of the singer. The earlier singers, moreover, were very skilful in finding those places where, according to the character of the composition, the renewal taking of breath was of special effect. On the other hand it was considered an advantage in a singer to take breath as rarely as possible, and, as we indicated in the introduction of this book, it was esteemed a great accomplishment to sing long with one breath.

After we have named the natural laws which are applicable to music, and which lie at the basis of a full, rich tone in singing, and considered the careful way in which the old Italian taught the control of the breathing, we cannot but be struck with the rude and negligent manner of using the breath in our present mode of singing.

With some distinguished exceptions, it is now almost universally the practice to require the pupil, as the very first thing, to fill the lungs as full as possible, whereby the chest must be raised. Then the tones must be sung in as strong and long sustained a manner as possible, in order "to bring [illegible] the voice," as the phrase is. He is required to begin the tone with a full chest piano and slowly swell it even to the highest forte and then descend as slowly in order to thus "to govern the voice." Thus the pupil is always required to sing as strongly as possible, without any special regard to the [illegible] of the tone, because the timbre is regarded as a peculiarity of different voices, admitting of no change. According to what has been shown in the preceding pages, the present way of using the breath, by which it is supposed that voices are rendered strong and [illegible], only needlessly fatigues the organs and injures the beauty of the tones. In the same way we find, especially in the case of tenor, breath that, the aim is by greater forcing of the breath to extend the registers beyond their limits. Another fault is also taught: the pupil is required to force with the breath to the pitch those tones whose pitch is weakly struck and not [illegible]. No voice was ever made such treatment, and although the organs may be strong enough to remain sound with such continued treatment, the voice will soon sound [illegible], and a tone hard [illegible] thereby.

We often hear more or fresh and unrefined [illegible] a breath [illegible] accompanying the tone, as is the case of [illegible] voices. This [illegible] arises when the air which is inhaled and which rushes [illegible] the cavity of the mouth, is not set in vibration, and it escapes along with the vibrating column of air. If something happens, also, that by the too great pressure of the inhaled air against the glottis, the arytenoid cartilages, even when closed, leave a small opening through which the air escapes with a breath tone. By keeping back the breath in singing these faults may be corrected. Long-sustained singing piano is, otherwise in, moreover, beneficial to the forming of the voice.*

A simple rapid [illegible] here are indeed suffice for the generation of a full sounding singing tone. There is required a certain force by which the air is sent through the narrow and stretched glottis. But so great an expense of force as people are usually at is not necessary.

The influence of the mere stream of air increases in proportion as the breadth of the vibrating ligaments decreases. The tones of the falsetto and head register, therefore, require for less breath than those of the chest register. In wind instruments the tone can be forced upwards by a greater pressure of air, that is, by more powerful blowing, which appears to be practicable also in those instruments in which peculiar forms the highest [illegible] tones [illegible] everywhere [illegible] there?

Together with the skill and self-accustomed attending which this part of instruction in singing requires of the teacher there are here yet other and peculiar difficulties which he has to meet. In opposition to the [illegible] and more correct view as to the importance of tone, the strength of tone, which is now [illegible] the chief excellence of a voice. Accustomed to seek the beauty of the voice in its strength it is interrupted before the tone of instruction begins to sing as strongly as possible from a full chest with the greatest expenditure of breath. Thence is inferred, in the superficial way in which the study of the art of singing is at present conducted, that nothing more is commonly required of a teacher than that he should be able to drill his pupil in some powerful, tolerably well executed vocal music, which the latter is to sing as soon as possible in company. A perfect cultivation of the voice is scarcely any longer expected of an artist. People with a very scanty musical education and voices very poorly trained are regarded as artists if they execute their parts with expression and [illegible] tones out with those [illegible] which have [illegible] to command the applause of the ordinary public.

A conscientious teacher has, therefore, universal opinion against him when he demands a longer time for the education of a voice, and requires of his pupils that they shall practise singing only piano as long as this is necessary.

*The position of the body in singing must be such as to so [illegible] the free [illegible] of the breath. [illegible]

Musical Correspondence

The French Opera in New Orleans.

NEW ORLEANS, FEB. 18.—From all that one sees in the musical [illegible] journals of this country one would never suspect the existence of a permanent and well sustained Opera in this far away Southern metropolis; much less would one suppose that here, even in these depressing times the "stock" Opera establishment is one that, in the judgment of any impartial but cultivated and fastidious critic, would take the palm from any of the "Star" companies of the northern cities, about which so much noise is made. And yet I am convinced here this is the case; and, here the opera-goers of New York and Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago might know that this is no mere provincial boasting; as they will doubtless take it to be. I wish they might only be here on any of the grand-opera nights and hear and judge for themselves. If they did not come away feeling that amid all the financial, civil [illegible] throes of this city, and of all the breaking up and general collapse here and positive ruin of her grand career of wealth and prosperity in times past, there is still left to New Orleans a [illegible] which no other city in the Union can boast, then I am no judge.

"Art is long!" I never felt the force of this adage so [illegible] last night, while I sat in the French Opera witnessing the production of "Le Prophète."

Here in the midst of a city groaning under a financial and political depression never felt before, where care, and anxiety, and dreary forebodings cast their gloom over the out-door world—here is this temple of musical art, beautiful to the eye, and ever ready to lift the mind up to the fair fresh and peaceful world of poetry and harmony. And here the people come; come as of old; come because they love Art, and look to it in times of colossal depression as a sure and blessed means of relief and refreshment. It is not as a mere pleasure, or as the fashion of the hour here the public, that is the old musical public of New Orleans, now patronize their Opera. It is their old friend; their friend of palmy bright days gone by; their friend now. It is their love for Art that makes their opera live in these days, when everything else is going over the board. Not that the season is a prosperous one financially; not that the house is nightly crowded; but that the demand for a high-toned and excellent Opera is one of the popular demands here and consequently while there is money left the people will give it, while here heart their cherished institution go down. And what is the result? We have here for the whole season which season here what it means in Europe, a season of months; not as in the northern [illegible] a "season" of "four" nights to "two weeks," a beautiful, well appointed Opera house where a succession of operas of the highest order are brought out by a stock company, the Grand-opera nights alternating with those devoted to lighter Opera, Vaudeville and the like, as in the French Drama.

It is amusing to witness the sensation produced now-a-days in New York, by that French "Thomas [illegible]" with its Bouffe Operas and its [illegible] dramatic company imported by Bateman to astonish the American world. It would seem as if a new era in high art were inaugurated within those aristocratic walls. But here a New Orleans Offenbach is no new comer. "La Belle Hélène," the "Grande Duchesse" and the "Orpheus" come in in their turn on the off-nights and are, I have no doubt, quite as brilliantly produced as at the French Theatre, or certainly might be so as far as the number [illegible] of the troop here is concerned, if the leading singers stoop to such roles. But with a public accustomed to listen for years to the creations of Adam whose "Si j'étais Roi" is [illegible] of Meyerbeer whose Huguenots and Prophet have had frequent representations the [illegible] of this type it is not strange that Offenbach is not so overpowering in his splendor here as he seems to have proved in the New Yorkers.

The stock company of this establishment is certainly not a common one. It approaches more nearly the perfection of the [illegible] establishments of the Continent than any other in America. The two tenors, [illegible] and [illegible] have voices of great sweetness, richness and compass,—the latter of great power and they sing with true artistic finish, and a nice appreciation of their role. They are intelligent and highly cultivated artists and as well can [illegible] the works of a master. The baritone, [illegible], besides possessing a beautiful figure and elegant bearing has a very rich, round voice, and is graceful and eloquent in every gesture and motion. The soprani Mlle. [illegible] and Mme. [illegible] have sweet and pure voices, the former rather inclined to shrillness in the high notes, both capable of facile and nice execution, and sing truly and conscientiously. Mlle. [illegible], however is in danger of being spoiled in [illegible] of great effect, by too personal attractions which seek the lighter and more popular vaudeville [illegible] She should never descend to the Bouffe if she expects to be great in "Margaret." She sang this part [illegible] and with many charming graces, in the recent performance of "Faust," but a certain, although very slight trace of [illegible] and [illegible] singing the ballad "Il était in Roi de Thulé," revealed too plainly that she had not begun to enter into the true artistic significance of the wonderful morceau. The bass are good, if not superior. VAN HUFFLEN is powerful but a little harsh. DEBOS, a very fair singer and an admirable figure on the stage. Altogether therefore the combination is far above the ordinary: even though the company may not be possessed of one "star" so called. But being all true, careful, artistic performers, the ensemble of the company are such as we may look in vain for among the strolling troupes at the North whose whole dependence is on one or two celebrities, and have a few but indifferent artists at the best, however great their vocal attainments may be. As for those of the Brignoli and LaGrange order, they would stand a poor chance on the boards of the French Opera at New Orleans. But it were spoken as if there were no "one" here. Well, if I do not apply that epithet to Mme. ANDUBERT who sang Fidès in the Prophète last night, then it is because I cannot associate anything of the star [illegible] phraseology with so sincere, great and admirable an artist. She is to be ranked only with such as [illegible] at first of Meyerbeer's Fidès with Jochmann-Wagner of Berlin, and Viardot of Paris. She does not like a young, if so admiring, one, but like a woman imbued with the grand idea of the poet and the composer. The rôle of Fidès is worthy of her: the tenderness, the depth, the majesty of the maternal instincts, found their full expression in her noble singing and acting. Viardot sang this rôle, it will be remembered, at the first production of the Prophète at the Imperial Opera in Paris. Mme. Andubert has succeeded her in it on the same boards, and brought the éclat of such prestige fully worthily on her. To hear such a rendering as Andubert's, is surely a rare and memorable pleasure: and let it be known to the good people of New Orleans that Art has been so plainly [illegible] in the wrecks of other more transient and perishable productions. I do not wonder in that people here meet with excess even to applaud when they do applaud, and a smile that they greet Mme. Andubert with a roar of welcoming when she first comes on the stage: and that she acknowledges their greeting with a sincere smile of great calm and pleasure. In all this good, the communion between the artist and the public: the old friendly feeling of mutual respect almost affection. It reminds me of the reception of Frau Köster at the royal stage in Berlin when she comes from her retirement once or twice a winter to sing "Fidelio." There is nothing of the ephemeral, "starring," sensational fever about this: but something the tolerable plainly of a musical culture and musical patronage of more than a day: and of something in the public taste in these later hard times which is not "ungrateful" nor insensible to the finest and noblest emotions.

Finally I must say a word about the accessories. The orchestra numbers about forty musicians under the able lead of M. CALABRESI. They play with great precision and like everything else about the establishment, seem "used to it." The house is not unlike the Imperial Opera in Paris in general design though of course resembling it only in miniature. The parquette is surrounded with private loges boxes furnished with modest screens. The balcony has two rows of open boxes and behind these a complete row of closed or grilled boxes. Then the whole interior, has a thoroughly foreign air: especially so the gentlemen without exception come well dressed and those in the upper balcony in evening dress: the ladies wearing no hats and appearing in the most brilliant evening toilettes. Here we have, too, the cool and roomy foyer for the entr'acte promenade, the buffet in the basement, the bell to ring the people in, the blue rope or the curtain as the signal for commencing so familiar in all European opera-goers. In a word if you at the north, wearied with the intolerable fragmentary patchwork of Opera which you are put off with, such as every a few nights of an old fashioned mackerel Opera Season, then come to New Orleans and put yourself here at one and find yourself at eight o'clock in your place at the French Opera House. We can promise you a very grand spectacle, not very costly costuming and decorations: we are too poor for such things now a days. but we will insure you a well bred cordial audience to sit among, an efficient and well trained orchestra, and a rendering of the masters in operatic art, which will surprise you with an inclination to do what you can toward the establishment of so genuine an Opera at home. VERITAS.

NEW YORK. FEB. 18.—The Theodore Thomas's 4th Symphony Soirée occurred on Saturday evening at Steinway Hall. This was the programme:

Overture, "Meeresstille"	Beethoven.
Violin Concerto, (Gesangs-scene) No. 8	Spohr.
Ballade, op. 15, "Minstrel's Curse"	Von Bülow.
Symphony, C major, No. 2, op. 61	Schumann.

This array of pieces is perhaps somewhat less attractive rather than that which was performed at the last Soirée; but excepting this is say, one whole the Symphony would of itself lift any programme above the level of an ordinary concert.

Carl Rosa played the Spohr Concerto. Mme Rosa had been originally advertised in Mr. Thomas's prospectus, to appear at this concert; her illness made it necessary to engage some other artist, hence Herr Rosa.

Von Bülow's "Minstrel's Curse" was a most agreeable disappointment. It would be natural to expect, from one supposed to be thoroughly imbued with the Liszt spirit, a work resembling many of those unintelligible, unbearable and nonsensical pieces which form of the music of the latter school. Many of the inevitable evidences of the "future style" were of course there but there was a melody, and occasionally less wild harmonic changes. A 'cello solo which appeared not long after the opening phrase, was most charming. It would be pleasant to hear this composition again.

The crowning glory of Schumann's Symphonies was faithfully and carefully played. In the tender, serious Adagio there was a little indecision and the harsh, scratching of the violins upon the high [illegible] whereas there is but little [illegible] to find. The headlong rush of the Scherzo, especially in the fierce climax which terminates the movement, was given with a unity of purpose deserving of much praise. Could anything be finer than the Finale with its strong vigorous bold pace and [illegible]. There may be a more glorious Symphony—it has not yet been built!

The audience was surprisingly large one, decidedly the best (pecuniarily) with which Mr. Thomas has been favored this season. It would really appear that people are beginning to appreciate Mr. Thomas's untiring efforts to afford them an opportunity of hearing and enjoying the very best music at a very moderate price. R.

FEB. 24.—The 1st Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert, given on Saturday evening, Feb. 22, offered an excellent programme. The soloists were Miss Adelaide Phillipps and Mr. Richard Hoffman.

8th Symphony, F major, op. 93	Beethoven.
Aria, "Rinaldo" [illegible]	Handel.
Miss Phillipps.
Concerto, [illegible]	Mozart.
Mr. Hoffman.
[illegible]	[illegible]
Tarantelle, "Gondola," [illegible]	Heller.
[illegible]	Handel.
Tarantelle [illegible]	Heller.
Mr. Hoffman.
Pastoral	Koppitz.

The theme of Beethoven's Symphony occupied, deservedly, the place of honor in the performance: there is little to say except that the orchestra, numbering only some 45, seemed just small for the work. The playful sunny Allegretto transported one from the cold, biting winter to green fields, running brooks, and embowered shades. Verily descriptive music, so full of meaning, yielding no words than nothing; this Symphony is one of the very few noteworthy exceptions to the rule.

The "Meistersinger" overture was played better than any other orchestral number on the programme: the only drawback being the fact that the opening bars were inaudible on account of the rustling of drapery and the coming in of persons who had been "refreshing" during the intermission.

Miss Phillipps sang, need it be said, artistically and well, but the effects of fatigue were observable in her voice. She left early in a pause in the morning and this with the journey to Brooklyn is fearful undertaking and knowing experience) combined to prevent her doing herself justice. Still she delighted us all, particularly in the Handel Aria and was vigorously encored; she was then rewarded after the truly likeable by Marot. By-the-by whoever wrote "Jeanette," if he had once very popular among sentimental youths, must have thieved it bodily from the "Arcadia" (?) Aria.

Mr. Hoffman gave us the Mozart Concerto (which he played at the first concert of the N. Y. Society) in his usual artistic and admirable style. To Mr. H. a many warm admirers it must be a cause of much regret that he so seldom plays in public: rarely does he favor us oftener than twice in each season. His second solo was charming; it is a hazardous thing to play the "Harmonious Blacksmith" to an American audience. I have heard Joell play it to a fine assembly of 3000 people; but that was in London and there is a vast difference between taste there and here.

In the quaint, fanciful Tarantelle, Mr. H. came nearer than most pianists to the true interpretation of it; those only who have had the great privilege of hearing its author play them can fully understand [illegible] Stephen Heller's compositions.

Now the mending disorder of the weather the Academy was filled to overflowing. This good attendance was either the result of "system" or true appreciation: probably a mixture of both. •

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The audience Feb. 13 was larger than ever before, the programme fine, the orchestra up to its best mark in numbers and in general excellence of performance: and all were manifestly delighted.

Cherubini's genial and happy Overture to "Anacreon" played for the third time in these concerts, charmed more than ever: the rapid violin passages running with electric sweetness and grace. It is not a great work, is somewhat formal and old fashioned as its outlines are the close cousins hardly: but it is nevertheless a very genuine, artistic thing, and we find ourselves always enjoying it though to some of our more experienced musicians it may be rather an old story.

It was good to hear Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony again, the first time for so long a while, and with so good an orchestra. We have never heard all its descriptive movements so well rendered here,—with such precision, light and shade, warmth and freshness of coloring,—with the exception only of a few faulty wind instruments here. The "Storm" was made unusually impressive; there was always during the pianissimos, that one might hear a pin drop.

Part Second began with the E-minor Concerto of Chopin Mr. HUGO LEONHARD'S being the pianist. It is very seldom that we hear this exquisite composition entire, and with the orchestral accompaniment. Chopin's treatment of the instruments, although he has not Mendelssohn's mastery in that, is almost as individual and as interesting as his writing for the piano-forte, which is the most original thing in its way since Beethoven's and Schubert's Sonatas. Both the composition and Mr. Leonhard's thoroughly poetic, clear and finely finished interpretation of it gave unqualified satisfaction. It is much the most difficult Concerto that has been played this winter, and of none have we welcomed a rendering more easy and more perfect. The long and arduous Allegro bristling with difficulties (if they were not beauties); the pensive sweetness of the Romanza (Larghetto), the brilliancy and piquancy of the Rondo vivace each came fairly home to crowds who could not help but listen, must be!

Weber's "Jubilee" Overture alone remained, and that was enough. Broad, richly instrumented, teeming with fascinating, lively melodies all jubilant and swelling as if upon some proud occasion and culminating in the English national anthem glorified amid all sorts of stirring fiery accompaniment, it made indeed a stately finale to a concert rich in contrasts.

Of the Eighth and Last Concert (this week) we shall speak next time. The Committee of the Harvard Musical Association announce an Extra Supplementary Concert for Thursday Afternoon, March 19, in Compliment to their Conductor Mr. Carl Zerrahn and in aid of his design to visit Europe during the coming summer. There can be no doubt that the announcement will meet with a generous and cordial response. Mr. Zerrahn has labored faithfully and well during these three seasons of the Symphony Concerts, and it is to him we all really [illegible] for the steadily increasing excellence of the Orchestra, which is now noted this season.—The programme will rank among the best of the winter. It includes, of Beethoven, the ever welcome Fifth Symphony, and the grand E-flat Concerto for Piano, which Mr. Perabo has kindly offered to repeat; of Schubert the Fierabras Overture, which cannot be heard too often; and for a novelty, one of those "posthumous works" of Mendelssohn, the "Trumpet Overture." Tickets with reserved seats, at One Dollar, may be had at the Music Hall.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS. The Orchestral Union had a good house again for their concert last week, and though one or two important programmes had been called away, a very enjoyable rendering was given of the following selections:

Overture to Ruy Blas	Mendelssohn.
Waltz, Telegramme	Strauss.
Concerto, for Piano, in G minor	Mendelssohn.
Miss Alice Dutton.
Summer Night · Dreamy Song	Lachner.
Suite in E minor, op. 113	Franz Lachner.

The Suite by Lachner did not gain much upon further acquaintance. Its formal [illegible] what the Germans say "Capellmeister style," becomes more palpable after the first novelty is worn off. It is as with some persons, who on a first introduction appear so fresh and versatile, perhaps original, but who on the second or third meeting are grown commonplace already. There is grace and beauty in the Minuet and particularly the Intermezzo, but there is something pale, a weak ghost-like tone about them. We now feel that the dress, the tone of feeling, as well as the forms are of the past. But we sincerely thank the Orchestral Union for giving us a chance to know the work.

The Overture was changed for we forget now what one. Miss Alice Dutton showed very decided progress as a pianist, and played the Mendelssohn Concerto in a very satisfactory manner, so that she was warmly recalled. Mr. Lang took Mr. Zerrahn's place in conducting the orchestra while they accompanied his very interesting pupil.

The feature of this week's concert (the last but one, we regret to say) was something new and lovely: the two movements from the unfinished Symphony in B minor by Schubert, the only one out of the nine he left, except the great one in C, that has yet been performed. And how different from that! Not one at all in the same grand mould; not the form of a Heroic Symphony; not a great work; but a genuine, though slight effusion of a great genius. Both the Allegro moderato and the Andante are more or less of a sweet and meditative, elegiac character, dreamy, sobbing, [illegible] half aloud. It is as if one came upon the poet unawares and overheard him musing to himself unconscious of any audience. The Andante has this character most fully, and is the most beautiful of the two. But it is the Allegro also, where the prevailing tone and background is reverie and sadness. The thinking of this dreamy that stands in (Beautiful as all afterwards) he seems to pursue in vain. For again and again it buds and unfolds, [illegible] off as it deepens and the music droops back again into the pensive melancholy mood;—is it not a confession, of the music to itself that the great creative energy is not to be awakened fully this time? But it was very interesting to hear and we hope we have not heard it for the last time.

The Overture which opened the Concert was Rossini's half brilliant, half old-fashioned overture to the Siege of Corinth. Weber's Concertstück for piano was played by Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, who had a good deal of execution, but did not seem to be quite ripe for such an undertaking.

IN PROSPECT. A rich and various array of good things. First the Oratorios (one of which, however, is an Opera)!

This evening, the Handel and Haydn Society perform Rossini's "Moses in Egypt." Chorus very large: solo singers Madame PAREPA ROSA, the [illegible] returned from [illegible], Miss [illegible], Mr. GEO. SIMPSON from New York; the Messrs. WHITNEY and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY.—To-morrow evening Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Mme. ROSA, Mrs. H. M. SMITH (Cousin to Miss [illegible]), Miss [illegible], Mr. SIMPSON and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN. On both occasions a large orchestra, Mr. LANG at the Great Organ and CARL ZERRAHN Conductor. The competition between the lovers of the two styles of Oratorio (!) will doubtless crowd the Hall both evenings.

Tuesday evening, March 3. Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Third Chamber Concert, with a new programme of three numbers: 1. Quartet by Mozart, No. 1 in D minor; 2. The great Trio of Beethoven, with Miss ALICE DUTTON, Messrs. SCHULTZE and WULF FRIES; 3. The Octet (the double quartet) op. 20 of Mendelssohn, it is played so long ago that it will have novelty, and a delightful one.

Wednesday aft. Eighth and last Afternoon Concert of Orchestral Union. Mr. GEO. W. SUMNER will play Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso with orchestra.

Thursday eve. Mr. Eichberg's new Comic Operetta: The two Cadis, will be performed, at Chickering Hall (half past seven in the evening) for the benefit of the women and children of the nobly struggling Cretans. A short concert will precede the operetta, consisting of eight-hand performances on two pianos by Messrs. [illegible], LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER, and a Mozart Aria by Mr. G. L. OSGOOD. The operetta will be given with scenery and in costume, and will be nicely sung and acted by clever young amateurs, of whom it is enough to say that Mr. [illegible] is one. The plot is very funny, and the music light in a true comic [illegible] and we hope [illegible] that Mr. Eichberg has yet written [illegible]. The tickets, with reserved seats, at $2.00 may be had at the warerooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons.

Thursday, March 12. Fifth Symphony Concert (or altered in compliment to Mr. Zerrahn).

March —. Mr. PAINE's annual concert, with the first production here of the music of Mendelssohn's little Opera "The Son and Stranger" (Heimkehr aus der Fremde), must not be forgotten.

April 12, Easter Sunday. Mr. PAINE's Mass, now in vigorous rehearsal.

ORATORIO IN NEW YORK. The interest in Oratorio appears to be growing in the metropolis, where until within a very few years it has not amounted to much. Last week "over three thousand lovers of oratorio music, filling Steinway Hall to its utmost capacity," listened to the "most perfect interpretation of Handel's Judas Maccabaeus ever achieved on this side the Atlantic." It was done by the Harmonic Society with the aid of Mme. Rosa, Miss Brainerd, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Thomas in the solos. The Society appears to have been inspired with a new life under its present leader, judging from the enthusiasm on the part of its members and the whole audience which accompanied the following "episode," as well as from the systematic abuse which was heaped upon him by some Bohemians of the press. We copy from the World:

An episode occurred between the first and second parts of the Oratorio not down in the bills. Mr. [illegible], President of the Harmonic Society, came forward and announced that the Society had determined to avail itself of the opportunity to make their leader a present, which consisted of a gold medal. Mr. Ritter, the efficient leader of that body, was then brought forward, and Mr. [illegible] said:

Mr. RITTER: The pleasing duty has been assigned me of presenting to you, in behalf of the members of the New York Harmonic Society, this beautiful gold medal.

It is now four years since you were called upon to take charge of the musical interests of our society.

The first performance given by our organization under your leadership was that of the Oratorio Elijah, Mendelssohn, and they have brought [illegible] repetition of the performance [illegible] fitting occasion to suggest their appreciation of the valuable services rendered by you. Allow you assumed the somewhat difficult task of developing the musical materials composing our society [illegible] a chorus, capable of adequately interpreting the wonderful conceptions of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and the other great masters.

How well you have [illegible] what the past seasons and you this evening's performance will bear [illegible] period our society.

Your debt as an artist is [illegible] to the public [illegible] of Oratorio [illegible] the city of New York have enjoyed the privilege of hearing a larger number of performances under your direction during the past four years, than had been given during the ten years preceding.

The thousands and hundreds of thousands who have enjoyed the grand harmonies emanating from the noble chorus under your charge, will bear cheerful testimony to the masterly discipline which has produced such gratifying results and afford ample assurance from the highest [illegible] of connoisseurs [illegible].

The limited time allotted me will not permit me to express in detail the noble qualities of head and heart which have [illegible] you to hold so controlling a place in the esteem of the members of our society. Your geniality of temper has enabled you to deal [illegible] the necessarily imperfect materials of an amateur organization.

Your genius as a [illegible] has not only enabled you to grasp the heavenly conceptions of the greatest masters, and [illegible] adequate interpretation, but also to produce [illegible] which have added materially to the stock of human happiness.

Take then this beautiful medal, and treasure it as a token of the grateful appreciation of our chorus. And may I be permitted to join my wish with theirs that in your journey through life [illegible] "every dream of Him who ever ruled alone," you may derive the agreeable consolation as you gaze upon these inscriptions, that you hold a large place in the affectionate regards of the members of the New York Harmonic Society.

Mr. Ritter, who seemed really much embarrassed, replied in a few words, thanking the society and the orchestra that presented it.

The medal is a chaste affair bearing an appropriate inscription and it seemed to be the opinion of the audience that he eminently deserved it.

(From the Orchestra, Feb. 1 and 8.)

The second series of the Crystal Palace Winter Concerts opened under very fair auspices on Saturday. The attendance numbered nearly six thousand, of whom only a fraction could obtain admission within the concert room. The programme was arranged as follows:

Overture, "Meeresstille"	Auber.
Song, "[illegible]"	Haydn.
Aria, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Symphony in [illegible]	Beethoven.
Song, "[illegible]"	Verdi.
Violin Solo, Fantasia on "La Favorita"	[illegible]
Song, [illegible]	[illegible]
Song, "The Bell Ringer"	Wallace.
Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann.

From the above it will be seen that the feature of the performance was Beethoven's symphony performed by the capital band in a manner which justified the reception with which its essentially [illegible] met. Mr Manns again made an appeal to the public on behalf of his favorite composer, with—we are compelled to add—indifferent success. Not all the zeal of conductor and earnest striving of executants could evoke in favor of Schumann any hearty expression from the audience. A cold, unsympathetic hearing was accorded to the "Manfred" overture, though there is little fear that such an chilling reception will cool the ardor of Mr Manns, or unnerve his endeavors to impress on the multitude the merit of unprovable Schumann.

The reappearance of Mme. Schumann at the Monday Popular Concerts was welcomed by a warm and appreciative audience.

Certainly long and general applause greeted the first conclusion of the following programme:—

Quartet in A, for strings	Schumann.
Songs, "[illegible]" and "[illegible]"	Mendelssohn.
Sonata in A major, op. 101, pianoforte	Beethoven.
[illegible]	[illegible]
Trio in C minor, piano, violin and violoncello	Mendelssohn.

The careful execution of Messrs. Straus, Ries, H. Blagrove, and Piatti did all that was possible with the "[illegible]" of the quartet. But the artistic event of the night was Mme. Schumann's rendering of Beethoven's splendid sonata—an intellectual [illegible] of the highest character, and yet not cold, [illegible] merely, but [illegible] to the last degree. Here the applause was legitimate and furious. So, too, with Mendelssohn's trio, a blameless interpretation of which was achieved by the pianist and Messrs. Straus and Piatti.

The first of a series of four subscription concerts given by Mr Joseph Barnby's choir was allotted to Mendelssohn. The first part comprised "Athalie," vocally allotted to Mme. Sherrington, Miss Spiller and Miss Julia Elton as principals, [illegible] by a full orchestra, and recited by Mr Henry Marston, who [illegible] the various "[illegible]" of poor Bartholomew. The performance was highly creditable in all respects, the orchestra being exceptionally strong and the choir showing especially well in the eight part chorus "Lord let us hear Thy voice," and the trio with chorus "Hearts feel." In the second part the "Reformation" symphony was rendered with good effect, the Allegro vivace [illegible] the audience to enthusiasm. A March written to commemorate the visit of the painter Cornelius to Dresden in 1841 is, without being pretentious, pleasing and melodious, particularly in a trio allotted to the strings, and the novelty of this production warmed the hearers to demand an encore. The concert concluded with the finale of "Lorelei," the solo sung by Mme. Sherrington. A large audience thronged St. James's Hall, and showed frequently repeated appreciation of the efforts of Mr. Barnby's well-trained choir.

We could find it in our hearts to be sorry for Mr. George Tolhurst, were not that gentleman [illegible] by so strong a breast-plate of self-esteem as to render him [illegible]. A man who under the [illegible] of [illegible] compares [illegible] to that of Beethoven and of Mozart, as did Mr. Tolhurst in the letter we published last week, is not likely to be [illegible] by the [illegible] things said of his music or any public disaster which can befall it. Otherwise we could feel for any man whose work experienced such a fate as happened to "Ruth," on its production last Wednesday at Exeter Hall. Of the work of this amateur we have already pronounced an opinion which nothing less than the complete endorsement of every theory hitherto known can possibly induce us to alter. At the same time it is due to Mr Tolhurst to admit that the greatest master ever conceived could not have borne up against such conducting as we witnessed on Wednesday. The conductor was utterly and fatally ignorant of his business. His stick was everywhere and nowhere: he got into and lost complicity with the orchestra, and on one unlucky occasion awarded to one of the vocal soloists [illegible] him back into the midst of some grotesque and forgotten symphony which came in with remarkable effect just as the unsound had reached the third bar. Meanwhile the house, regarding the whole performance as a practical joke, [illegible] joyous and prolonged [illegible] whenever they saw an opening. The principal singers—good artists, too, Miss Henderson, Mme. Sauerbrey, Messrs. Cummings, Lewis Thomas, and others—scarcely durst look at each other for fear of laughing outright, and the composer hot, anxious and flurried, [illegible] blood and wiped his face copiously. We feel throughout that awful performance even the fellowship of Beethoven and Mozart did not console the ill-fated man. Was it not rather that the shades of Mozart and Beethoven sent an Avenger in the person of the weird conductor who put the extinguisher on "Ruth?"

The last Crystal Palace concert was a very enjoyable one of its kind. Its chief feature was Mendelssohn's Funeral March, as may be seen by a moment's inspection of the subjoined programme:—

Overture, "[illegible]"	Mozart.
Trio, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Part Song, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Symphony, "The Power of Sound"	Spohr.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Mozart.
Funeral March	Mendelssohn.
Solo and Chorus, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
[illegible] "Paradise and Peri"	Schumann.
Solo, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
The Bugle Song, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Overture, "Leonora, No. 3"	Beethoven.

This pathetic and eloquent composition, a most resembling Tennyson's great commemorative poem, as nearly as grief expressed in music can resemble grief of words, was written on the death of Burgmüller, the young composer and common friend of Mendelssohn and Schumann. This was originally written for a wind band. There is much solemnity about it, but little gloom; rather is the tale in the impression conveyed of the consolation of hope after death. This movement is particularly full of beauty.

The performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" by the Sacred Harmonic Society on Friday had the drawback of Mr. Coste's absence, but Mr. Sainton did good service in his place. The principals were Mme. Sherrington, Mme. Dolby, Miss R. Henderson, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, Lewis Thomas, and Sig. Foli. The occurrence of the celebrated English tenor drew an unusual [illegible] audience that Exeter Hall could hardly contain the numbers. The chief points were taken with customary success. The Hailstone Chorus was vociferously encored, the choruses "I will sing unto the Lord" and "The Depths have covered them" went splendidly, and in "The enemy said," Mr. Reeves made his usual mark and repelled the usual refusal to repeat. Mr. Reeves is a steady opponent of encores. Everybody sent in more or less good voice and both principals and chorus did their work thoroughly, only one little slip—that of the [illegible] who got confused in "He rebuked the Red Sea"—being noticeable.

Again Mme. Schumann has been the chief attraction at the Monday Popular Concerts. This week her matchless talents were employed on the interpretation of the Sonata Appassionata. The sensation created by her realization of Beethoven's wealth of invention and resources was extraordinary. Again, in Beethoven's sonata for pianoforte and violoncello Mme. Schumann, joined by Sig. Piatti, did excellent service, and brought down the plaudits of the delighted hearers. A fifth performance of Schubert's trio was given at this concert, and the crowded audience a well-merited encored for repetition. The whole was admirably done. Miss Julia Elton was the vocalist, and acquitted herself well in the favored song by Mendelssohn (encored) and the "Haidenröslein" by Schubert. The Saturday afternoon concerts continue their attractive character. At last Saturday's Mme. Schumann interpreted one of her husband's works, and Mme. Sainton-Dolby, for once forsaking ballad, sang, distinguishing herself in Schumann and Mendelssohn, and received praise.

WHOLE NO. 703. BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 14, 1868. VOL. XXVII. NO. 26.

The Musical Institutions of Berlin.

The Berlin Opera is now unquestionably one of the best in Europe.

The most notable among the female singers are Frau Lucca and Frau Harriers-Wippern, who have already won a world-wide reputation, the former particularly by the glowing passion she puts into the great single parts like Selika or Valentine, the latter by the consummate mastery with which she represents the greatest roles of the classic repertoire,—a Donna Anna, or Zerline, a Leonora in Fidelio, a Euryanthe, &c. Besides these we may name Fräulein von Edelsberg, Fräulein Grün, Frau Bianchi-Santer as clever and painstaking artists. Among the male singers the most prominent are the two tenors Niemann and Wachtel; the excellent baritone Betz may be counted as good as a foster child of the Berlin Opera; only lately has he splendid organ and his artistic use of it begun to win enthusiastic recognition outside of Berlin.

A veteran pillar of the classical repertoire, too, hard to replace, is the royal opera singer Krause, also distinguished in Oratorio. Of the rest there are Woworsky, Salomon and Fricke, who deserve most honorable mention as industrious artists. Very recently too, Frau Jachmann-Wagner has appeared again in Opera, after successfully devoting herself for several years to the spoken drama.

The Italian Opera also received a temporary support in the so-called Königsstädter Theatre, which was built in 1823–4 on the Alexanderplatz near the Königsbrücke. The contractor Cerf obtained a grant to erect a theatre where comic operas, vaudevilles, farces might be given, as well as such plays as had not been given on the royal stage for two years, or were wholly new. For a long time it had a good comic opera, and names of European reputation like Henriette Sontag, Spitzeder, Jäger, Bader, &c., figure in its history. Yet it was closed in 1849, and from that time there have only been occasional performances of travelling Italian opera troupes upon that stage; the comic opera too is little cultivated by the smaller theatres. There is only Kroll's Theatre which maintains for the most part a good opera company during the summer vacation of the Royal Opera.

As highly important factors in the sound tone of the Royal Opera we must make special mention of the theatre chorus and the royal orchestra (Kapelle). The former is under the immediate direction of chorusmaster Elsler, and now numbers 51 male and 26 female voices. A great improvement in the chorus performances has been observable since the pecuniary condition of the singers has been bettered, if only moderately, through the care of the general Intendant Herr von Hülsen. Leyman male choruses, like those in Fidelio or Euryanthe, could hardly be better rendered as a general thing.

The Royal Orchestra, since the beginning of this century when it consisted of about 60 members, has continually grown. It had been already much increased by being united with the orchestra of the so-called National Theatre when the operas of Spontini and of Meyerbeer made new enlargements necessary, so that the Royal Orchestra may now be called one of the first in Germany. It consists at present of those 95 chamber musicians holding fixed appointments. In grand operas it is strengthened by occasionally drawing from the Theatre-Orchestra Class, connected with the Royal Opera, which is under the direction of Concertmeister Ries. Besides Ries, Leopold and Moritz Ganz, Zimmermann and Stahlknecht are to be mentioned as Concertmeisters. The music on the stage is led by Wieprecht, the director of all the military bands of Prussia.

To the Royal Orchestra belongs the especial merit of establishing the

2. Symphony Soirées in aid of the Pension Fund.

This fund dates from Sept. 1, 1800. Until the year 1842 the Orchestra only arranged occasional concerts for the fund—32 in all—of which the total receipts were 20,511 thalers; 65,236 1-3 thalers accrued to the treasury as share of the profits from 201 concerts in which the Orchestra took part, and some donations further increased the sum. But only when the regular soirées were instituted in 1842 did the fund begin to grow rapidly, so that at the close of the year 1866 the treasury contained 136,156 thalers. The first soirée took place on the 14th Nov. 1842 in Jager's hall, which soon proved too small for the crowd, so that they had to remove to the hall of the Singakademie. Afterwards the soirées were held in the concert hall of the Schauspielhaus. In 1858 it became necessary to transfer them to the concert hall of the Opera house. The number of soirées is now fixed at 9 for each season, and they are devoted exclusively to instrumental music. When Mendelssohn, who had assumed their direction in 1843–4, attempted to arrange them after the manner of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, he met with such an energetic opposition that he gave up not only this plan but also in a short time the direction of the concerts. He conducted in all, 8 concerts; Kapellmeister Henning also 1; Kapellmeister Dorn 1; all the rest, 202, have been conducted by Kapellmeister Taubert. * * *

In conclusion it may be mentioned that the smaller theatres, devoted to comic opera and farce, also maintain permanent orchestras, as well as a chorus. The chorus of the Friedrich Wilhelmstadt Theatre consists of 8 men and 10 women; that of the Wallner Theatre of 6 men and 11 women; the orchestra counts 32 members. The Opera at Kroll's theatre has at its disposal more than 12 in part clever solo artists; the chorus numbers 8 male and 10 female voices, the orchestra consists of 36 permanently engaged musicians.

3. The Sing-Academy.

The Sing-Academie was founded by Carl Friedrich Christian Fasch. In the house of one of his lady pupils, from the year 1789, a number of ladies and gentlemen, fond of singing and of music, used to meet to perform vocal works under Fasch's direction. The growing participation in these exercises made a larger place of meeting necessary; and so in 1791 the society assembled in a room in the more spacious saloons of the Frau Generalchirurgus Voitus, until near the end of 1792 a hall was vacated for its use in the Academy building. Fasch now devoted the last years of his life exclusively to the artistic conduct of the firmly established Institution. The chief end and aim was and still remains the revival and culture of the older church music. Not only Durante, Leo, Jomelli, Benevoli, Allegro, Marcello and Palestrina, whose works best met the artistic views of Fasch, but also John Sebastian Bach, Handel, Graun and Hasse and even Mozart, with some contemporaries, were earnestly studied and performed in the Sing-Akademie. At the time of its founder's death, Aug. 3, 1800, it numbered 148 members. Carl Friedrich Zelter (Goethe's friend and correspondent), devotedly attached to Fasch, whose pupil he was, had often taken his place in conducting the Sing-Academie, and now succeeded him and carried the Institution up to a more flourishing condition than it had ever before dreamed of. He also in 1807 established the "Ripieno School" for the better production of works with instrumental accompaniment.

The founding of the Liedertafel (male part-song singers) in 1809 had a good influence on the Sing-Academie. But what was of the most decided consequence to the institution was at last the acquisition of a building of its own, which was chiefly brought about through Zelter.

The ground was given by King Frederick William III., on an open place near the University, and the building was erected in 1825–6 at the expense of the members, and dedicated on the 8th April, 1827. It is 140 feet long by 60 feet wide. The front is adorned with Corinthian pilasters, which support a flat pediment; an outer staircase leads to the three entrances. On the ground floor is the dwelling of the Director of the Academy for the time being and of the castellan; in the upper story is the great singing hall, used not only for the weekly rehearsals and the concerts of the society, but also by other concert-givers who may hire it. Since 1842 the Society for Scientific Lectures have also given every winter here a course of 11 lectures on the most different branches of science.

The weekly meetings of the Sing-Akademie for the practice of singing occur on Mondays and Tuesdays from 5 to 7 P.M.; on Wednesdays a smaller circle meet for some preparatory exercises.

Latterly the institution has given three public subscription concerts annually. In these Handel's oratorios receive the chief share of attention

But the works of later masters are not excluded. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and "Elijah" have several times been publicly given by the Sing-Academie, and in March, 1841 Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" was performed. We may also mention Eduard Grell's "Jephtha," the "Abraham" of Blumner (sub-Director of the Sing-Academie), Hiller's "Destruction of Jerusalem," Grell's "Sixteen-part Mass," &c., &c. Besides these subscription concerts, the Sing-Academie also arranges pretty regularly public performances for the solemnity in honor of the dead and in Passion Week of every year. For the former, besides the Requiem of Mozart or of Cherubini, Bach's Cantata "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit" has become a thing of regular recurrence. In Passion Week Bach's Passion (according to Matthew) and Graun's "Tod Jesu" are pretty regularly given.

Besides these, numerous performances not public take place in the society. Thus a memorial solemnity in honor of deceased members is held at stated times. In like manner days are observed in honor of members who have deserved particularly well of the institution.

It is known that Mendelssohn was a candidate for the Directorship of the Sing-Academie after Zelter's death (in 1832), but it was given to Rungenhagen, who had been sub-Director from the year 1815. After Rungenhagen's death (1851) Grell, a member of the Sing-Akademie since 1817 and sub-Director since 1832, became Director and he still holds the office. By his side stands M. Blumner as sub-Director (since 1853).

A Standing Committee of 8 gentlemen and 4 ladies manage the business affairs of the Society. The number of singing members amounts at present to about 300,—that of listening members to about 160.

4. Stern's Singing Society.

The "Sternsche Gesangverein," which has become so important a part of the musical life of Berlin, owes its origin almost to an accidental impulse. In October 1847 Julius Stern arranged a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, which was so successful as to excite the wish for regular performances of this sort. Accordingly in November 1847 a number of ladies met at the house of the Frau Präsidentin Jakoby to found a singing society and invited gentlemen to cooperate. The object designated was the practice and performance of choruses and solo pieces with pianoforte accompaniment. On the 3d of December the first meeting for practice was held at the residence of the Director, Julius Stern; 31 ladies took part. In January 1848, there were 72 ladies, and 18 gentlemen joined them as a mixed chorus. From this time the society grew so fast, that the director had to hire a hall containing about 60 persons (Spittelbrücke, No. 2) and on the 3d of February 1848 they were able to give a public performance in honor of Mendelssohn's birthday. The next location being found too small again, the society had its practices in a hall proffered by the wife of Minister von Mühler on the Dönhoffsplatz, and then received permission through the Cultus-Minister von Ladenberg to make use of the great hall of that department. There in November was held for the first time the Mendelssohn Commemoration which has since been repeated every year.

Merely listening members now began to be admitted, before whom and invited guests the smaller performances took place. At the end of the season they came before the public with a concert in the Sing-Academie.

After the removal of the Ministry of Culture, Stern's Society practised in the rooms of the Ministry of Agriculture, and afterwards in the fine hall of the Ministry of the Interior. From the year 1854 it held its meetings for a short time in the Hotel de Russie, and then until 1861 in the Englischen Hause; but now they practice in the great concert hall in Arnim's hotel (unter den Linden) and in the hall of the Conservatory of Music.

In the first years of its progress this society succeeded in winning and keeping the attention of the friends of Art. The best brought out the "Madea" with the young society in the hall of the Opera-house. It was frequently employed also for charitable ends, as for the great Lortzing concert in the Opera-house. Inspired by its success, and striving to maintain the honorable artistic position it had won in Berlin, the society addressed itself to higher tasks than were originally contemplated. It began to bring Oratorio within the sphere of its activity. In November, 1852, at the Mendelssohn Commemoration, it performed the Psalms with the most brilliant success in the hall of the Sing-Academie. Handel's Israel in Egypt followed in 1854, then Beethoven's great Missa Solemnis and Bach's B-minor Mass, in 1855, whereby the society showed itself equal to the solution of the highest problems in a model manner. At the same time it has known how to preserve that many-sidedness which alone leads to truly artistic results of lasting significance for the present and the future. Although it has made classical Oratorio its chief aim since 1852 it does not exclude other tendencies, and above all does justice to more recent times.

Mendelssohn's Oratorios, his Psalms, above all, his Walpurgisnacht could hardly be more perfectly performed than they have been by Stern's Society. The same is true of Haydn's "Seasons," of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," "Samson," "Judas Maccabæus," all of which it has brought out of late years. Also Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" first became appreciated in Berlin through Stern's Society. Nor does he neglect the [illegible] minor productions. Ehlert, Wüerst (her "Water Sprite"), Jensen ("Jephtha's Daughter") but above all Fr. Kiel have found admission for their greater works in the Society. Especially has it been of extraordinary service to Fr. Kiel: his Requiem (1862); still more his Mass (1867) presented difficulties almost insurmountable which the Society however did surmount with truly wonderful perseverance.

With all that it finds time to cultivate the four-part song. For the the annual Singing Festival in the open air since 1851 gives it a special opportunity.

At present the Society numbers 324 singing and 425 listening members, besides 41 belonging to the preparatory class.

The regular exercises take place every Monday from 5 to 8 P.M.; the larger performances of course require special rehearsals for the separate parts.

In the business management the Director is supported by a committee of gentlemen and ladies. Besides the subscription concerts, there is one given annually for the benefit of the Gustavus Adolphus Society.

5. The Bach Society.

The Bach-Verein was founded in the beginning of the year 1854 by Georg Vierling and had the exclusive study of the vocal works of John Sebastian Bach for its object. But in the first years of its existence it was found to see that a society could not gain ground with so one-sided a pursuit. So it soon expanded its programme, directing its attention altogether to the study of older works but little known. When Vierling on account of continued illness, gave up the conductorship of the society, the excellent writer upon music Dr. Landeau undertook it, but only for a short time. It is now held by Rust, the meritorious editor of Bach. Of the Society's performances, which now include also older instrumental works of Bach, Scarlatti, &c., we may mention especially the repetition many times of Bach's "Passion according to St. John," and his Christmas Oratorio."

THE CORRECT INTONATION OF THE TONES OF THE VOICE (PHRASING).

Having stated the first condition of a good tone, [illegible] of the tones, we come now to the second—the right direction of the [illegible]. A correct disposition of the tones of the voice consists in causing the air brought into vibration by the vocal ligaments to rebound from immediately above the upper front teeth, where it must be concentrated as much as possible, subordinating thereto a form in the mouth continuous vibrations. If the air rebounds farther back in the mouth from any part of the roof of the mouth, then the light and beautiful overtones are prevented, and there arise other out of the tubes of those hollow, disagreeable coverings of timbre which are known as hard and nasal tones.

That the tone must be brought forward in the mouth—that is, in the ... required in singing should have the above described direction—is now acknowledged as necessary and insisted on by the best teachers. It is the reason why the tones that sound better are not known. The Germans and the English, in consequence of their accustomed habits of forming sounds in speaking, but, as we shall see hereafter, more rarely than the Italian, a correct disposition of the tones in singing. It is extremely difficult for many persons to accustom themselves to such a direction of the vibrating air-column. But with the proper means the skilled teacher attains a [illegible]. These means are to let the pupil practice those syllables which lie in accordance with our language, are formed wholly in front of the mouth.

FORMATION OF VOWELS AND CONSONANTS.

The sound of the vowels depends, as we have seen, upon whether one or another of the overtones takes precedence in sound. But the conditions by which the formation of the vowels is determined lie in the form of the cavity of the mouth and of the contraction of the same in some one place or another having an opening. These places are different in different languages and dialects. Thus, for instance, the Zong of Germans and French farther back in sounding a in father, farther forward in a as in may, e, i, in the order in which they are here placed, and farther front of the German ü [sic].

The length of the cavity of the mouth is the greatest in sounding oo, the least in e, intermediate in a. In the case, where ee is very, as e of the Germans, the cavity is the narrowest. Hence, to form a tone on this vowel is very difficult. Good tones can be formed on it, however, when a bent sense of the chest register head is used, with it the sound of the German ü pronounced in English nearly like the vowel in feel, and in the higher registers the sound of the a. The cavity of the mouth is thus somewhat broadened and the tone gains more room for its development.

The Swiss form the a and o like the a in father, broadening the back of the mouth, and the e broadening towards the front. For the Italians form an vowel with the masses, and which must be gathered under and designated by the single term [illegible] as [illegible] music, is ranked after them we may tolerate such music like any other popular amusement, entertainment or recreation, and the more if we remember that the sad kind [illegible] music can be perfectly understood and enjoyed only by those who have thoroughly studied the art, for which, in general, the people have neither the time nor the capacity. But here, let us not place the man whose life is devoted to providing amusements for the many, on the same eminence with the man following the dictates of high and true art and laboring, not to please the crowd, but, the few noble [illegible] and most cultivated spirits of their own time and the future. We might as well rank the man of the world, who shapes his actions in conformity with the follies and whims of the multitude, equally high with the man who, animated by the highest principles, takes his course regardless of what mob and rabble, whether clothed in silks or rags, may choose to laud and cry in him.

Has not Rossini written the celebrated Stabat Mater? I hear you impatiently ask. As regards this mixture of sacred music, dear mixture in march, waltz, and opera melodies, the maestro's own confession will make all comments unnecessary. He said to Ferd. Hiller: "I composed the Stabat Mater for my [illegible], I did so merely from a wish to oblige, and should have never thought of making it public. Strictly speaking I [illegible] only [illegible] same aria, and, in the first instance, I got Tadolini to compose three pieces, as I was ill and should not have been ready in time. The great celebrity of the Stabat Mater by Pergolese would have been sufficient to prevent my setting the same text to music for public performance."

But then Rossini has composed "William Tell," for which he may boldly claim to be ranked with Mozart and Beethoven, and his opera with Don Juan and Fidelio.

"I pray you let me be
In your company number three."[*]

Not so fast, gentlemen! I protest. Here are my reasons. During his stay in Germany Rossini had become acquainted with the works of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and other German masters, and it occurred to him that "it is never too late to mend." He resolved on a reform, and the result was "William Tell"—so he says. The work has been justly classed with Masaniello and Les Huguenots, and if you chose to be impartial judges, you must grant the same distinction to Auber and Meyerbeer you so readily concede to Rossini. The verdict, as recorded in the annals of [illegible] is that the bad as much as charming that seems in the choruses are characteristic, besides melodious; that the opera contains some dramatic situations and ensembles; but that, for all that, the style of the work is heavy and insipid, neither fish nor flesh, neither German, French nor Italian. In short—that "William Tell," as the whole is a failure.

The verdict was approved by the masses [illegible] subsequent events have shown. Being [illegible] with these refreshing "Boom, boom, boom!" and feeling his inability of [illegible] the path [illegible] which he was [illegible] by the works of the German masters, he gave up the whole business, dissolved his contract with the Grand Opera at Paris (which pledged him to write several more operas) and retired into private life. He was then only thirty-seven or thirty-nine (the year of his birth is stated differently as 1790 and 1792). Henceforth the "Swan of Pesaro" remained mute. No more warblings were ever heard from his throat.

How can you reconcile this fact with a genius of the very highest order?[†] One would fancy that to such a man his art must be everything, and his devotion to it could cease only with his last breath.

The lives of all great men not only in music prove this. The poetry of Goethe, for instance, was when he approached eighty glows with the fire and enthusiasm of youth. Haydn, Handel and Bach composed some of their best works in their advanced age [illegible] to be mentioned. But, how does it fare with Rossini? What said he, the pursued musician [illegible] he became disgusted with his muse, and resolved never to write more [illegible] such [illegible] he had [illegible] but faithfully carried out!

I need hardly tell you that I have spoken of Rossini, the composer only, who as you stated more than forty years ago [illegible] of Rossini the man, who, [illegible] I can and I can not. You should separate the man from his works. Both genius, manners, [illegible], [illegible] themselves to be influenced by the private character of the man. The man belongs to his family and friends, and [illegible] with whom he personally comes in contact; his works belong to the world, to all generations.

What a pity for a certain class of people that they cannot find out whether Homer [illegible] and clothed the poor, paid his debts promptly, went regularly to the polls, was fond of the society of women, or whether he preferred his cigar and his pot of Lager, and,—how much more they would enjoy the Iliad and the "Iliad"! Of Goethe they are still in doubt, whether he was a great poet or a great rascal, because he thought he had better not marry Friederike, the country parson's daughter.

Rossini, as every one knows, is certainly the most amiable and good-natured in man. A chief trait of his character is his great modesty. He has given [illegible] not only his permission to accept the name with that of Mozart, Beethoven, etc., but feels provoked at your proceedings. Let me close this epistle with an anecdote recorded by Hiller, in fulfilling a Lessons, which [illegible] to be generally known.

In the year 1836 Rossini passed a week at Frankfort on the Main, where, by the way, he made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn, who took great pleasure in playing to him and timely [illegible] a grand dinner was given him by his admirers, at that time [illegible]. A rich banker proposed his toast [illegible] table in these words: "The [illegible] and his first representative here (looking at Rossini, who was [illegible]) long may they flourish!" The maestro expressed his thanks, but in a manner more modest than [illegible]. Immediately after he was asked by one in the guests why he did not compose any more. Thereupon Rossini seized his glass, rose up, and with a loud voice spoke (in French) as follows: "Gentlemen! they wish to know why I compose no longer. It is because I am tired of that everlasting boom boom, boom! And as I [illegible] compose French and [illegible] unable to compose German music—therefore (taking his glass)—to the memory of Beethoven, Mozart, etc.!" [illegible]

Boston, March 1868.

[The above contribution [illegible] such [illegible] that we willingly print it, though we are by no means endorse all of its opinions. We do not think the writer does justice to the musical merits of "The Barber," or of "William Tell," which last work is a [illegible] to all you, perhaps, not exactly [illegible].—Ed.]

* I might have said before, that I consider it a characteristic sign of genius that I [illegible] and not the above.

† What greatly makes the structure, now and then to please his Parisian audience is not worth our notice.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The first night of Herr Joseph Joachim was the gala night of the season. It has been so ever since the Monday Popular Concerts were founded, and is likely to be so as long as he is able and willing to be our periodical visitor. Herr Joachim, [illegible] violinist, is supremacy is recognized without a dissentient voice. He has no rival—none that aspires to be his rival—and is therefore, beyond the reach to envy. Such a position is not phenomenal, but it is quite unprecedented. But it belongs to one who can gracefully and worthily support it. Though the greatest "virtuoso" (the fancy conventional term for executant) in the world, Herr Joachim would disdain the title. He looks out of himself into his art, and whether he is playing Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, or Mendelssohn, he is lost, not in himself, but in the author he is playing. At the end of all performances people begin to reflect on what a glorious unparalleled performance it has been, but in the course of the performance they are simply enjoying the music as the greatest degree that may be possible reading, and [illegible] absolutely nothing short of perfect can enable them. But it is superfluous at this time to dwell in a new disquisition upon merits so universally acknowledged. We might fill a column without adding as much to what our musical readers must already know about the talent of this greatest of living executive artists, who differs in one important essential from the most renowned of his predecessors, Nicolo Paganini, inasmuch as Paganini was simply and exclusively a "virtuoso," while Herr Joachim is the high representative of art in its widest manifestations. He is, in fact, art's most loving and zealous, as least does he most gifted, disciple and, as such, is fully entitled to the position he has won, and to the wholesome esteem in which he is held.

The audience which came to hear him on Monday night in St. James's Hall to welcome Herr Joachim was the most densely crowded of the year. Very many were refused admission at the doors for the want of even standing room. And yet the programme consisted of [illegible] one quartet, a pianoforte sonata, a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and a sonata for pianoforte and violin, with just a couple of songs to separate one instrumental piece from another. True, the instrumental pieces were all by Beethoven; and doubtless the majority in the room were of opinion that there is only one Beethoven and that Joachim is his prophet. For our own part, we are ready to confess that had the programme consisted solely of quartets for stringed instruments, with Herr Joachim as leader and Signor Piatti as violoncello, we should have preferred it. But such an arrangement does not enter into the admirable scheme which Mr. Arthur Chappell has followed from the beginning, to which his concerts are indebted for their prosperity, and which is the cause that they are not only Monday Concerts but "Pops at Concerts" into the bargain. It being the occasion of Herr Joachim's first appearance for the season nevertheless, the conspicuous feature of the programme was the string quartet in which Herr Joachim played first fiddle. And this quartet was happily one of Beethoven's very finest—No. 2 in the set in three inscribed to Prince Rasoumowsky, the quartet which begins and ends in E minor. No worthier piece could have been selected, and no genuine performance have helped to illustrate its manifold beauties to the 2,000 amateurs who listened with eager and breathless attention, by after bar from one end to the other. Herr Joachim, as appealing to the audience, accompanied by Herr L. Ries, Mr. H. Blagrove and Signor Piatti was greeted with enthusiastic plaudits. Every one was on the alert to see him once again, fiddle in hand; and when the applause subsided every one was prepared to listen to a performance intensely sure to be one in rare excellence. How Herr Joachim plays the "Rasoumowsky Quartets"—or, indeed, how he plays the so-called "Posthumous" is any nothing in the first set and Nos. "12" and "13" which are, as it were, the bridge that connects the "Rasoumowsky" set with the last—as someone of quartet-music need be informed. It is everything to certain, that he has never played anything more imperishably well than he played the E minor quartet of Beethoven on Monday night. In the first allegro the color, dignity of his style, the poetical expression devoid in its false sentiment, the living grand tone and faultless intonation were exhibited throughout in as light that could not possibly be more led arrogance. In the adagio—such an adagio as Beethoven alone could have imagined—for a more yet earnest and thoughtful pathos, Herr Joachim's reading was unsurpassable. The scherzo, with its capricious accent, and the trio, in which Beethoven has worked an ingeniously with [illegible] the Russian melody presented to him by Prince Rasoumowsky, were given with the vivacity, true and simplicity to only a phenomenon[?] [illegible] can account for a [illegible] such by no means easy. The finale, antique and impetuous movement, remained to the end [illegible] extinguishing mark, but a character—such character no more as Beethoven could impart—and, while surviving else to render and the crowning triumph for Herr Joachim, and perhaps because it was the last movement of the quartet, seemed to create the most marked sensation. A truly magnificent performance, irreproachably grand and unctious [illegible] [illegible], was then thoroughly achieved and as thoroughly appreciated; and at the end of it the audience must have felt still more strongly confirmed in the opinion that "there is only one Beethoven, and that Joachim is his prophet;" — though with this conviction might have been also associated the idea that, as Mahomet had his Ali, so Joachim had Mr Plaidy, who is just as capable of converting a whole tribe of music lovers at one sight to a faith in Beethoven as Ali is said to have converted the whole tribe of Hamdan in one day to a faith in Mahomet. The second violin and viola, Herr Ries and Mr. H. Blagrove, were as efficient in every respect as is their wont.

The other pieces in which Herr Joachim took part were the tenth trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello (Op. 97, in B flat), dedicated to the Archduke Rudolph, and the sonata for pianoforte and violin in G, No. 3 of the set of three (Op. 30) inscribed to the Russian Emperor Alexander. His companion in the first being M. Hallé and Signor Piatti, his partner in the last M. Hallé. The solo sonata for pianoforte was the very light and easy one in G major (Op. 79) played by M. Hallé (who played the last movement twice) and especially interesting on account of its being the only one of the thirty-two pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven that had not already been heard at the Monday Popular Concerts. The vocal music was limited to two songs—Mozart's "Violet," and Mendelssohn's Frühlingslied or "Spring Song," known in English as "The Chamois," both well sung by Miss Cecilia Westbrook, and accompanied by Mr Benedict in masterly style.—Times

CRYSTAL PALACE.—At last Saturday's Concert, the Reformation Symphony occupied a prominent place in the programme subjoined:

Overture, "[illegible]"	Beethoven.
Reformation Symphony	Mendelssohn.
Aria, "[illegible]" ([illegible])	Mendelssohn.
Miss Sophie Vinta.
Aria, "Della sua Pace," (Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Mr Vernon Rigby.
Concerto for Pianoforte	Schumann.
Mme. Schumann.
Aria, "[illegible]" (William Tell)	Handel.
Miss Sophie Vinta.
Songs, a. "Serenade"	Schubert.
b. "[illegible]"	Schumann.
Mr Vernon Rigby.
Solos for Pianoforte:
a. "Lied ohne Worte" (E major)	Mendelssohn.
b. "Gavotte," (G minor)	J. S. Bach.
Mme. Schumann.
Duet, "[illegible]" ([illegible])	Donizetti.
Miss Sophie Vinta and Mr Vernon Rigby.
Festival March "Coronation"	Meyerbeer.

The attraction was sufficient to fill the room in every part; for the Reformation Symphony promised to let the musical lion of the evening scores, which, in hand by the two Philharmonic Societies and performed elsewhere as opportunity came, is wanted. In its present version was faultless. Mr Manns's band put forth their admirable energies and the Scherzo was warmly redemanded, following the usage which has prevailed at the three subsequent performances of this symphony. Beethoven's superb overture and the Festival March were likewise excellently given. The latter is a novelty at the Palace, the honour of its introduction belongs to Mr Joseph Barnby who brought it forward at his recent concert. Mme. Schumann [illegible] her husband's works with heart and soul, and moved the audience to enthusiasm. In the vocal department a débutante, Miss Sophie Vinta, made a successful appearance, allowing for natural nervousness. Her voice is clear, fresh and pure and she possesses good method.

HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.—The last of a new series, choral and orchestral, was given in St. James's Hall Feb. 6, when the following selection was performed:

The music to Athalie.	Mendelssohn.
Concertstück, Pianoforte	Weber.
Solo and chorus, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Air, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
"Choral Fantasia," Pianoforte, Chor. & Orch.	Beethoven.
Solo and chorus, "[illegible]"	Handel.
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini.

The performance was one of singular excellence. All the choruses were admirably sung and the best effect was given to the quartet for solo voices by Messrs. Cummings, F. Walker, C. Henry and T. Thomas. In fact the reading of Athalie created an impression that will doubtless prevent so noble a work from being again laid aside.

In the Concertstück and Choral Fantasia Herr Pauer played the pianoforte parts with brilliant effect. The [illegible] from Gluck's Ifigenia in Tauride was sung by Miss E. Cheriton, Don Ottavio's air by Mr. Cummings, and the grand scena from Handel's L'Allegro by Mr. L. Thomas (capitally aided by the choir), with such genuine bluntly as to command an encore. —Mus. World

In the second concert of Mr Leslie's series the following programme was presented:

Part-song, "[illegible]"	Hatton.
Madrigal, "[illegible]"	Pearsall.
Canzonet, "My mother bids me bind my hair"	Haydn.
Miss Katharine Poyntz.
Part-song, "Song of the [illegible]"	Leslie.
Rondo in B, for two pianofortes	Mozart.
The Misses Goodban and Fanny Kingdon.
Madrigal, "[illegible]" (A.D. [illegible])	[illegible]
"The Fire" (A.D. 1500)	Morley.
Part-song, male voices, "The merry way"
Song, "The [illegible]"	Mendelssohn.
Miss Katharine Poyntz.
Part-song, male voices, "[illegible]"
Solo, pianoforte, "[illegible]"
Miss Fanny Kingdon.
Part-song, male voices.
Glee, "The Fisherman's good night"	Bishop.
Miss Podmore, Miss Fanny Poyntz, Mr. Vaughan and Mr. George Musgrave.	Gee.
Song, "The Fleece"	Abbott.
Mr. George Perren.
Part-song, "O [illegible]"	Mellon.
Solo, Pianoforte, Rondo, "[illegible]"	Weber.
Miss Kingdon.
Part-song, "[illegible]"	Barnby.
Song, "O [illegible]"	Abbott.
Miss Katharine Poyntz.
Part-song, "The dawn of day"	Reay.
Irish ballad, "[illegible]"	Moore.
Mr. George Perren.
Madrigal, "[illegible]" (A.D. [illegible])	Bennet.

The third concert took place on Thursday night, with the following selection of sacred music:

Magnificat (Vespers of [illegible])	Handel.
Aria, "[illegible]"	Pergolesi.
Sanctus from Mass in B minor.	Bach.
"[illegible]" (St. Paul)	Mendelssohn.
Motet, [illegible]	Croce.
Air and chorus, "[illegible]" (Judas Maccabæus)	Handel.
Kyrie, from Mass in [illegible]	Schubert.
[illegible]	Beethoven.

The pieces by Mozart, Bach, and Schubert were given for the first time in this country. The Vesperæ de Dominica, composed (according to Von Köchel's catalogue) at Salzburg in 1779, is one of the innumerable pieces of Church music which Mozart produced with such marvellous facility in the service of the Archbishop. Some of this music is in a light style, adapted to the taste of the Archbishop. Even in the Vesperæ however genius and the hand of a master are discernible, while a sense of it we find a reflection of the old Italian church writers whom Mozart had diligently studied in his youth. The "Magnificat" was extremely well given by chorus and orchestra. Bach's Mass in B minor for five voices (solo and chorus) and orchestra, is the greatest and most important work of this class produced by him. The first two movements were given to Frederick Augustus II. (of Saxony) in 1733— thirteen years after Handel had commenced his career as a composer of oratorios. Although essentially from the great school of German contrapuntists, Handel acquired many requisites for popularity, chiefly to his cultivation of the Italian vocal melody which Bach wanted. Bach's Mass in B minor is a succession of grandeur and elaboration—the instrumentation, including three trumpets and three oboes, being remarkable for the period. One of the grandest movements is the "Sanctus," which opens with the most impressive sweetness. On a first public performance, it was natural that the chorus should not be somewhat doubtful. The effect, however, was so great that we may hope to hear not only this movement, but other portions of the Mass at a future concert.—Ibid

MR BARNBY'S CHOIR.—Last night (Jan. 29) Mr Barnby gave the first of a series of four concerts with choir and full orchestra—to be of sacred compositions. The programme was as follows:

Athalie. (The illustrative verses read by Mr. [illegible]) Solo vocalists, Miss [illegible], Miss Spiller and Miss Julia Elton). Mendelssohn. March composed in celebration of the visit of the [illegible] to [illegible], in October 1874 — first time of performance in England. Mendelssohn.

Symphony in A, "The Reformation."

Finale to Loreley. Solo, [illegible]. Mme.

The new "Ancient Concerts" were so numerous, on the 15th Feb. with Alexander's Feast, and Beethoven's music to the Ruins of Athens.

Herr Schlösser announces four concerts exclusively devoted to the music of Schumann. Originality in advertisement could hardly be carried further than in the case of that gentleman, who the other day, among other attractions at his "grand evening concerts" announces the exhibition of three letters by "the late Edmund Kean."

LEIPZIG.—The 15th Gewandhaus Concert (in honour of the memory of Herr Hauptmann). First Part—(Compositions by Hauptmann), "Salve Regina" for chorus; overture to the opera of Mathilde; three sacred songs for a mixed chorus. Second Part —Symphony (No. 5) in C minor, Spohr; "Ave Verum," Mozart; "Tenebræ," Bach (scored by Franz); and chorus from Mendelssohn's St. Paul. The works performed at the 16th Gewandhaus Concert were: "Die Najaden," overture, Sterndale Bennett; Concert Air, Spohr (Mme. Peschka-Leutner); Violin Concerto, Beethoven (Herr Lauterbach); Cavatina and air from Die Zauberflöte, Mozart (Mme. Peschka-Leutner); Violin Concerto, A minor, J. S. Bach (Herr Lauterbach); and Symphony in B flat major, Schumann.

Seventeenth Gewandhaus Concert: Symphony in G major (No. 2), J. Haydn; recitative and Aria from Euryanthe, C. M. von Weber (Herr Stockhausen); Pianoforte Concerto, Hiesell (Herr Barth); Overture to Manfred, Schumann; Solo Pieces for Pianoforte; Concerto, No. 1, for Violoncello, Goltermann (Herr Hegar); and Songs, Schubert.—The Abbé Liszt's oratorio of Die Heilige Elisabeth has been performed by Riedel's Association: the part of Elisabeth being sung by Mme. Ilma von Murska.

The new theatre was opened on the 28th ult., with Weber's "Jubelouvertüre" a "Prologue," by Gottschall; Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis and Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris. All the Court and notabilities of the town were present. The orchestra was considerably augmented on the occasion, and, under the conductorship of Herr Schmidt, played the above overtures in a masterly manner. The acoustic qualities of the new edifice are very satisfactory.—18th Gewandhaus Concert: Kathleen Tucker Gade (the solos sung by Mlle. Thoma, Herr, Mme. Bilitzer-Hertel and Herr Hill) and Ver Sacrum Festgesang (the solos sung by Mlle. Hies, Mme. Bilitzer-Hertel, Herren Rebling and Hill).—19th Gewandhaus Concert: Overture to Athalie, Mendelssohn; air from Titus, Handel (Herr Wallenreiter); Symphony Concertante, for Violin and Tenor, Mozart (Herren Röntgen and David); Songs, Schubert; Sonata for Violin and figured bass, Handel (with pianoforte accompaniment, arranged by David); and Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven.—At the second concert of the Euterpe Society (given in commemoration of Moritz Hauptmann) the programme was as follows: Funeral Music for Orchestra (new, and composed for the occasion), E. F. Richter; "Graduale," "Offertorio," Sanctus, and Benedictus, from the Mass, Op. 30, Moritz Hauptmann (the solos sung by Mesdames Schilling, Schmidt, Herren Wiedemann and Richter); and the Fifth Symphony in C minor, Beethoven.

MILAN.—The members of the Società [illegible] lately gave a performance of J. S. Bach's second Weihnachtsoratorium, and Mendelssohn's Walpurgisnacht.

PARIS.—The 7th Conservatoire concert, George Hainl conductor, had for programme: Haydn's Military Symphony (No. 11); Pilgrim's Chorus from Tannhäuser; Dance Air from Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis; Motet (double chorus, without accompaniment) by Bach; 4th Symphony of Beethoven.

In Pasdeloup's Popular Concerts the Religious March from Lohengrin excited great enthusiasm, thanks in part (La Ménestrel suggests) to the pleasure producing the instruments over which it seems form of the strain. Pasdeloup placed the March between a Haydn Symphony in C minor and the Canzonetta from Mendelssohn's Quartet, op. 12, played by all the strings. Beethoven's Egmont music and Weber's Jubel Overture made the rest of the concert.—The 5th programme (Feb. 16) offered Mozart's Don Juan overture; Schumann's Symphony in F flat; a Bourrée by J. S. Bach (1723); Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by Mme. Norman-Neruda, who is professor in the Conservatoire of Stockholm, and whose talent has been much celebrated in advance; Beethoven's Septet (with clarinet, bassoon, horn and all the strings of the orchestra).

A one act Opera by Franz Schubert "La Croisade des Dames," has been brought out with much success at the Fantaisies-Parisiennes. Also "Le Fiorjolet" one of the most fruitful pencil of Adolph Adam (1832), and "L'Élixir de Cornelius" by Emile Durand.

The Grand Opera has been giving its 500th performance of Rossini's William Tell. The Opéra Comique lately announced the 1,000th time of La

Norma Moncha and the title of La Chatte [illegible] At the Italiens, Adelina Patti, after singing Zerlina in Don Giovanni, has taken for the first time the part of Sonnambula; after which she is expected to "create" the principal role in Verdi's "Giovanna d' Arco."

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The subscription series of Eight Symphony Concerts ended nobly with that of Thursday, Feb. 27. This was the programme:

Toccata in F, composed for Organ . . . . . J. S. Bach. Orchestrated by [illegible] H. Esser.
Overture, "The Naiads" . . . . . Bennett.
Triple Concerto, in C, op. 56, for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello, with Orch. . . . . . Beethoven.
B. J. Lang, [illegible] and Wm. Fries.
Overture: Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt. [illegible] . . . . . Mendelssohn.
Symphony in C . . . . . Schubert.

The Bach Toccata already grown familiar to these concerts, made a wholesome, hearty strengthening beginning, putting all in cheerful, earnest humor for good true things to follow. There is no need now to point out the advantages or disadvantages of the orchestral version as compared with the original Organ form of it. It certainly is made clearer to most listeners by the orchestra, and thus more appreciable when they come to hear it played upon the Organ. Moreover, it made a sort of prelude which the entrance of late comers could not fatally disturb; this hardy plant could safely interpose itself between such rude March bluster and the delicate Overture in Sterndale Bennett, which well justified its claim to a place in these concerts. It has the [illegible] enjoyable, when played by the smaller orchestras, but doubly so this time. It wears well. However suggestive of Mendelssohn it was fresh imagination, gentle romance, full of poetic feeling, exquisite in themes and instrumental coloring. Schumann speaks of it as "a charming, rich and fairly executed picture, as fresh, as if it had just been [illegible] in [illegible] of its similarity of matter with Mendelssohn's Melusina, full of the old [illegible] traits which [illegible] have often pointed out in the most musical of all Englishmen. No one with any liveliness of fancy can hear the [illegible] without thinking of lovely [illegible] groups of Naiads sporting and bathing on all sides, while the soft flutes and oboes may suggest surrounding rose bushes and fluttering veils of dawn. To present heads one can at least promise an impression like that which Goethe's immortal [illegible] Fisher [illegible] the [illegible] feeling [illegible] the waves,—an [illegible] and [illegible] does the music spread itself before us. There is a certain monotony to be sure: this may be owing partly to the many parallel passages, repetitions of single periods in higher and lower octaves, &c., a very easy way of [illegible] which [illegible] often becomes commonplace in other composers with him is not so much poverty of invention as it is holding fast to certain darling thoughts and forms of expression."—Both the overtures were admirably rendered.

The novel feature of the programme, Beethoven's Concerto for three instruments, proved singularly interesting in spite of some drawbacks. Full (for him) of tedious bravura passages, at least in the two string concertante parts, and especially in the 'cello, which continually soars above its usual register and rivals like a second violin in florid gambols with the first, it could hardly tell to full advantage in the great Hall, so far as the harmonious strife of the three principals was concerned. Yet it was in the main finely played, the orchestral tutti coming in richly and inspiringly, and the whole bearing the unmistakable stamp of Beethoven. If the first Allegro has the most matter in it and is laid out most broadly, the Polacca at the end is perhaps the happiest movement, joyous, brilliant, full of wild and graceful life. In the short Largo that leads into it one is lost in spiritual, sweet reverie, one of Beethoven's deep and holy moments.—The great Schubert Symphony repeated by quite general desire made a grand finale to these noble feasts of music which from first to last have presented nothing but the best kind of music, in programmes thoughtfully arranged to give each piece its best effect, and listened to with earnest interest by audiences ranging from 1500 to over 2000 persons (as on the last occasion). This is one cheering solid fact, worth hundreds, in our city's musical experience and with it we are safe against the trivial, fame trading efforts one which seem to have invaded the musical world this year more formidably than ever. A summary of what this third season of Symphony Concerts has given us (omitting the Complimentary Concert to the Conductor Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the week) will here be in place.

Symphonies. MOZART: "Jupiter" in C; in D (without Minuet). No. 1.—HAYDN: in G (No. 8 "Surprise"), twice.—BEETHOVEN: No. 2, No. 4 (C minor); No. 6 (Pastoral); No. 7 in A.—MENDELSSOHN: in A minor ("Scotch").—SCHUBERT: C major (twice), unfinished one in B minor.—SCHUMANN: No. 4, in D minor.—GADE: No. 4 in B flat.

Concertos. MOZART: for two pianos (Lang and Parker).—BEETHOVEN: No. 1 in C (Lang); No. 5 E flat (Perabo twice); for piano, violin and 'cello, op. 56 (Lang, Eichberg, Fries).—MENDELSSOHN: piano in D minor (Dresel).—CHOPIN: E minor (Leonhard).

Overtures. BEETHOVEN: "Weihe des Hauses" in C op. 124; Leonore No. 3; Coriolanus.—MENDELSSOHN: Ruy Blas; Melusina; "Meeresstille," &c.; Trumpet Ov. (posthumous).—CHERUBINI: Medea; Anacreon.—GADE: "In the Highlands"; "Recollections of Ossian."—WEBER: Oberon; Euryanthe; Jubilee.—SCHUMANN: Genoveva.—SCHUBERT: Fierabras.—BENNETT: "The Naiads."

Orchestral arrangement. Toccata in F by BACH.

Vocal (with orchestra). MOZART: Tenor Aria, "Costanza" from Die Entführung (G. L. Osgood); "Deh vieni" from Nozze di Figaro (Mrs. Cary); "Non più di fiori," from Tito (Mrs. Kempton).—J. S. BACH: Alto Aria, "Well done," &c., from a Cantata (Mrs. Cary).

With piano (Mr. Dresel). SCHUMANN: Songs, "Suleika," "Le Secret" (Mr. Osgood).—SCHUBERT: "Schöne Fremde" (Do).—R. FRANZ: "Im Herbst" &c. "Wohl auf mir &c. (Mrs. Cary).—SCHUMANN: "Hunting Song" (Mrs. Kempton).—[illegible]: "Al cavaliere" (Do.).—[illegible]: "Come into the garden Maud" (Mrs. Cary).

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The Wednesday Afternoon Concerts came (too early) to a close last week. Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads" made the charming opening of the eighth and last. The two movements from the unfinished Symphony by Schubert as the increasing interest on repetition; full of tenderness, of a deep, fine feeling, with now and then a glimpse of grandeur, something sympathetic in the grandest sense, soon lost,—in forma Imperfect, fitful, fragmentary.

Two young debutantes contributed solo performances. Miss NAVARRE, a young lady of Italian parentage, educated here, sang "Ernani, involami" in a clear, pure, flexible and high soprano, with fair execution; her paleness showed that she was not well. Yet the impression made was favorable and she was obliged to repeat a portion of it, which she did, with pupil-like eagerness. She also sang Eckert's "Swiss echo song," which we did not hear.—Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor was very readily and effectively played by a youth of sixteen, Mr. Geo. W. Sumner, from Worcester, a pupil of Mr. Lang's.

The audience was large, and it seems a pity that these classic concerts should not go on, now that other concerts are so few.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The third Concert (March 3), was one of peculiar interest, consisting of these noble numbers:

1. The Quartet in D major No. 5, of Mozart, a thoroughly genial, delightful work, not striking, though alive in every tone and fibre (for such a creation is a fine organic whole) full of sweet, quiet bliss. Allegro moderato, Andante, Minuet with lovely Trio, Allegretto,—one knows not which to admire most; but the quaint old ballad tone of the Finale in 6-8 is as fascinating as any part. It was beautifully rendered throughout.

2. The great B-flat Trio of Beethoven, op. 97. So successful a reading of the piano-forte part by so young a maiden as Miss ANNA DRESEL was clear proof both of rare native faculty and sure development in so few years in a sound direction. It is clear that she knows the best music well; and commends it worthily. It speaks to be still endowments of her own, and she has acquired such technical facility and certainty that she now has all the treasures of this line[illegible] open to her. With Mr. SCHULTZE's violin and Mr. FRIES's 'cello, and the young pianist, we missed none of the beauty of the noblest of all Trios.

3. But the great feature was the Ottetto of Mendelssohn in E flat, a very early work, op. 20, for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos. We do not remember to have heard it since the Club celebrated the composer's birthday in 1855. In construction it is partly a double quartet, but eight parts grouped in a single system. The ensemble especially in the fiery first movement (Allegro moderato) has the richness and fulness of an orchestra; [illegible] and of course abound in counterpoint, and sometimes at least eight individual parts employed. To have this the small hall was to bathe in a rich buoyant sea of harmony swelled by outwardly-calling currents. The Andante, the Scherzo (the most charming in the music, the most like in its airy race of young Fairy), the swift final, kept up the sweet and well tempered. The extra parts were supplied by Messrs. Meisel and Heindl on violin, by Herr Suck and 'cello by [illegible] and the whole thing went closely and neatly on; and among [illegible] desire that it may soon be heard again.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The performance of Rossini's opera "Moses in Egypt," on the 29th of February may possibly be pardoned as Leap Year folly, and we presume all will be content with this once of its happening, sometimes at least until the next necessity comes round. Of course it showed an elaborate melodious and ornamented phrase when Rossini wrote those parts was born on Leap Year day; and of course Mme. PAREPA-ROSA sang her chief shares wonderfully well, and all the rest acceptably; but the choruses were never meant for a great [illegible] and [illegible] sound just right in English, clumsily as it has been translated. It had its crowd because it had its party,—a crowd of course delighted. Yet the opposition seems not so have been satisfied with the performance, and some of them have allowed themselves to be so carried away by party feeling as to charge it (most unjustly) to willful carelessness in the Conductor. Mr Eichberg [illegible] a fixed [illegible] such childish [illegible] pass in silence. The real secret of the [illegible] of the performance lies, much more probably, in the [illegible] of the undertaking, the [illegible] and Lang [illegible].

[illegible] crowd and both [illegible] and [illegible] the great Concerts [illegible]. The performance, as a whole, was uncommonly good [illegible] Chorus [illegible] for which it was pleasant to see [illegible] take their place among the [illegible] were prompt, sure and effective. The solos were all good, with the exception of the new Contralto, Miss [illegible] from London [illegible] was painfully [illegible]. Miss [illegible], [illegible] of the soprano solos, including the Tenth, sang superbly and [illegible]. Miss [illegible] was limited to [illegible], doing her small part with [illegible]. Never have we heard Mr [illegible] sing more nobly than he did in some of the great solos of the Prophet. Mr [illegible], too, however, and gave the music [illegible] with fine [illegible] and expression only a little too much of the [illegible].

Mr Eichberg's Operetta. "The Two Cadis," given for the first time at Chickering's for the [illegible], last week Thursday evening, delighted a full audience. The music if not always original,—[illegible] as in [illegible], most of which [illegible] seem to spring up [illegible] and [illegible] together, is very bright and pretty and the concerted pieces, Trios and Quartet, very ingenious and effective. The funny thing was capitally sung and acted by Miss Haviland, a young girl of seventeen full of talent, with a bright, clear soprano, reaching high, and great natural facility of execution as yet uncultivated and therefore dangerous (after the first rehearsal the voice came to the concert too fatigued); Mr Allan A. Brown, an amateur with some of warm sweet quality and good power; Mr Warren Davenport baritone, also an amateur who surprised us by his good singing and acting as the elder Cadi; and Mr [illegible], who had full play for all his irresistible [illegible] and rich, sonorous, serviceable bass voice. The accompaniments were limited to the piano carefully played by Mr [illegible] and Mr Eichberg's violin. So successful under these circumstances, it bids to bring on to a theatre, with orchestra.—For a short prelude Mrs. Cary sung charmingly Mozart's "Deh vieni" (kindly taking the place of Mr Osgood who was ill, preceded by the "Italian" Symphony played as four hands by Messrs Dresel, [illegible] and [illegible], who also were hailed by the "Two Cadis" to the tune of [illegible] March.—We have already [illegible], but we beg to assure the Cadis, and the Cadesses, and all who accompanied and so much the [illegible] that we shall not forget them.

In Prospect.—The Music Hall for to-night and to-morrow night is devoted, as it was a week ago, to "monster" concerts of the Gilmore-Guilmette order [illegible] and Sax, Polka and "Sacred" Oratorio, Grande Duchesse and St. Paul, artists like Urso and [illegible] and [illegible], are all bound up in the same huge bouquet. A great rush of course. Beyond the [illegible] a few [illegible] conditions of sincere Art [illegible] for [illegible].

March 18, Wednesday at 3½ P.M., Mr. B. J. Lang is to give a little concert at Chickering Hall, mainly for the purpose of introducing the posthumous [illegible] of "Songs without Words" by Mendelssohn recently played with such success by Mme. Arabella Goddard in London. Four of the six are said, are charming. Wulf Fries will play with the concert-giver Mendelssohn's D major Sonata, Duo. Mr L. will also play a Beethoven Sonata.

March 19. The next afternoon (Thursday) same hour and place, a Complimentary Concert to Mr. Wulf Fries,—who as a man and as an artist has and ever will have the sincere esteem and sympathy of all true music-lovers in this city,—will be given by his pupils on the occasion of his proposed trip to Europe to visit his family and friends in Coventry during the summer. The disposal of tickets and all the arrangements are made privately. But the interest in Wulf Fries is too deep and wide-spread to allow such an occasion to be kept a secret. Of the rest of the concert all we know is, that the Quintette Club will play Mendelssohn's E flat Quintet (which will carry the Club back to a very [illegible]) that Messrs Perabo and Fries will play the A-major Sonata of Beethoven; Mr Kreissmann will sing some of his choice songs and Mr Lang too will take some part. For further particulars an order [illegible] to Mr Lang, Mr A. O. Rogers (Rogers Brothers & Kennedy), or Mr Aug. H. Eisfeldt [illegible] Washington St.

Otto Dresel will give a series of concerts on the four Thursday afternoons in April in Chickering Hall. We believe it is his design to play at least one Beethoven Sonata each time.

April 6. Mr Peck's annual Concert is postponed to that date.

New York. March 5.—Messrs. Mason and Thomas's 3d Soirée occurred at Irving Hall on Saturday evening, Feb. 22. Mr Mills was the pianist and the following was the programme:

Quartet, 2 major	Haydn.
P. F. Trio, B flat, op. 97	Beethoven.
Quartet, A m. [illegible]	Schumann.

In the first Quartet there seemed to be [illegible] of the usual spontaneity of Haydn's works. Its chief attraction is in the simple melodious Andante and the Menuetto. In the latter a quaint effect is produced by the coming in of the viola and 'cello—in imitation—a bar behind the violins.

The glorious Trio did not come to "go" with the desirable unity and vigor. Just where the fault lay it would perhaps be difficult to say. It seemed as if the artists had not rehearsed together. This view may be erroneous, but such was my impression. I once heard this Trio played by Joachim, Hallé and Jacquard in Paris. Their rendering of the divine Adagio is something never to be forgotten. The Schumann Quartet needs to be heard many times before one can fully appreciate it.

The Soirée was attended by the usual small audience of about 150 people. As a neighboring hall, however a "testimonial" concert had some five or six hundred listeners, and—it is needless to say—each opera house was well filled. I hope in time to see the gravitation of taste toward the best music.

The Sunday Evening Concerts in Steinway Hall are very good just now. Theo. Thomas and his orchestra are an established feature, and the soloists are usually the best to be procured. Miss Alida Topp was the especial attraction at the third of the series, which took place on Sunday evening March 1st, with this programme:

Symphony in D dur.	Mozart.
Cavatina, "I Montecchi [illegible]"	Bellini.
Miss Jennie Landsman.
P. F. Solo, "Il [illegible]"	Liszt.
Miss A. [illegible] Topp.
Selection from [illegible]	Meyerbeer.
Overture "[illegible]"	Weber.
Song, "[illegible]"	Schubert.
Allegretto from 8th Symphony	Beethoven.
P. F. Solo, "[illegible]"	Liszt.
Overture, "[illegible]"	Rietz.

The Symphony was of course the one with the famous Minuet which is so universally known, and which has been arranged for piano in so many different ways by so many different people.

Miss Landsman encountered Benedict's "Red Sea Waves" from the oldie on to which it was long ago consigned, and sang it and the [illegible] acceptably to many—at least so it would appear from the fact that she was twice encored, though why it would be difficult to say. The song for her second encore was fresh and common ballad "Comin' thro' the rye."

Miss Topp played finely, but it would be agreeable to hear her in something else besides Liszt's compositions.

March 9.—On Saturday Evening we had the 4th Philharmonic Concert.

Symphony in A minor	Gade.
Scena of [illegible] Oberon	Weber.
Mme. Parepa-Rosa.
Introduction to "Lohengrin"	Wagner.
Aria, "[illegible]" Figaro	Mozart.
Symphony in A major, op. 90	Mendelssohn.

The Mozart Symphony has all the Mozart characteristics: freshness, grace, and unites a certain [illegible] surprising after [illegible] of [illegible] effects in a work, the finest results attained by the simplest means. It is so refreshing to be spared the blare of trombones and the clash of cymbals.

One must either admire intensely or dislike thoroughly the "Introduction to Lohengrin." Inasmuch as many prominent examples of the school to which it belongs are far-fetched, overstrained and full of contortions it is pleasant to be able to say of the "Introduction" that it is eminently enjoyable. The only drawback is the terrible strain upon one's nerves and attention occasioned by the prolonged dwelling of the violins upon those very high notes in the commencement and close of the work. The score is exceedingly uncertain and quivering, and the response is very wonderful; the harmonic changes and modulations are elaborate and exceedingly beautiful.

The Italian Symphony, as it is called, was welcome as it always is and will be. The lovely, playful Scherzo was rendered with marked effect. But why did Mr. Bergmann insist upon such rapid tempos? This seems to be one of the few faults of this able conductor.

Mme. Parepa-Rosa decidedly surpassed herself in the charming "Deh vieni," (the accompaniment to [illegible] as fine as the song itself): her voice, always [illegible] organ was in fine condition and her vocalization faultless. She was warmly greeted by the very large audience.

As an evidence of the high estimation in which these concerts and their rehearsals are held by young females of the "Miss Flog" variety, I overheard one of that ilk saying to a friend, in the interval of [illegible], "I do so dislike these Philharmonics, they are so grinding." Comments are superfluous.

St. Louis. The fourth Philharmonic Concert of the season, Egmont Fröhlich conductor, took place Feb. 13th, and had for programme: Part I. Overture to "Crown Diamonds," Auber; Recit. Air and Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" (called on the bills "Engedi"); Beethoven's Second Symphony.—Part II. Overture "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Ave Maria (soprano solo and chorus), Gounod; Duo for violin and piano on themes from Don Pasquale; March and Chorus from Gounod's Faust.

Aristotelian Anthems.—Mr Chorley does not join the general trumpeting of London critics over the posthumous Symphony. Writing of a Crystal Palace Concert (Athenæum, Feb. 15) he says:

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" was composed. The [illegible] who saw a note of it was [illegible] must resolved that it should has great success will be [illegible] by our saying that, the fervor of [illegible] curiosity and excitement [illegible] it does not merit, and [illegible] respect and claim a place among the works on which the composer was willing to stake his reputation. We [illegible] in our judgment, that the forced production of this posthumous work by a man who knew himself, if ever man of genius did, is injudicious—we will not say irreverent.

A. W. Thayer. The Rev Dr. H. W. Bellows in a letter to the Christian Inquirer dated Trieste, Nov 21, [illegible]:

No American merchants are here. I heard indeed of an American steamer excepting, our accomplished consul, Mr A. W. Thayer, of the Indian [illegible], [illegible], recalled to English [illegible]. Mr Thayer is still engaged upon his life-work, an elaborate biography of Beethoven. The first volume has already appeared in German and has been welcomed with enthusiasm by competent critics in Europe as the first reliable history of this wonderful genius. The two remaining volumes will follow just as fast as Mr Thayer's very short [illegible] will allow him to prepare them, and I fear they will not be ready in less than two or three years. Mr Thayer's numerous friends of the press and musical and literary [illegible] will be glad to hear that his health is improved since a very serious illness of some months ago, and that his [illegible] here, which are not small, are fulfilled to the satisfaction of all his [illegible]. His unusual scholarship, many-sided and delightful, modest and more than his parts [illegible] and his enthusiasm show his old Harvard college friends.

The "Beggar's Opera" is one of the mysterious [illegible] puzzles the chroniclers of the stage. It has been attributed on the joint conception of Swift, Pope and Gay. The original idea probably belonged to Swift, who, in that fondness for grotesque and ridiculous [illegible] of romance which belonged to him in everything, had observed "What a pretty thing a Newgate pastoral would make!" It is scarcely possible to doubt the sharp and worldly hand of Swift in some of the scenes and songs.

Rossini (the composer) was eighty-four years of age on Saturday, Feb. 29. It was his twenty-first birthday.

Wagner has written music to the words of Victor Hugo's description of Waterloo in "Les Misérables." [illegible] who has heard a part of it says that Wagner is a man as full of folly, as a fool full of genius, and [illegible] knows all now will be.

The veteran Auber is [illegible] to a professor, the other evening, who congratulated him upon his remarkable vigor, [illegible] "They never so often told me I was young as since I have grown old."

Auber has in his possession nearly bound, the original of [illegible] compositions. He always stipulates with his publishers that his autograph copy shall be returned to him.

Writers of comic songs have a chance of making their fortunes in France. The author of the "Femme à Barbe," "Bien n'est bon pour un Sapeur" and other [illegible] [illegible] has, one M. Villebichot, announces [illegible] open to all a new chance in Paris which will bear [illegible] and be devoted to productions of the [illegible] of Villebichot order. It is a small one, might be expected, as the Boulevard Lafayette near the V[illegible] [illegible] certain apparatus have a professional ability —Orchestra.

The only child of Moffram by her marriage with De Beriot, now about thirty years of age is a famous pianist. His receptions on Friday evenings are attended by crowds of amateurs and artists. [illegible] [illegible] the Belgian violinist, played last Friday and De Beriot gave some of his own pianoforte solos with great success.

Teresa Carreño, so well known in the musical world as a young pianist is studying vocal [illegible] with Mlle. Sadie of Lost Zealand. Her voice is of unusual compass and quality, and with her talent and figure we may expect a prima donna who will [illegible] new credit to art.—Orch.

We translate from the Musikalisches Journal (New York): "These two musicians here, Messrs. Belmont, Holdheim and Leonard W. Jerome, have combined to undertake the management of the Academy of Music themselves; [illegible] and mean to support the stall [illegible] Max [illegible] as technical [illegible] [illegible] and Mlles. [illegible] and Kellogg, Messrs. Mazzoleni, Susini [illegible] as members of the operatic troupe. These gentlemen speculate in houses, gold and yachts, why not also in operas?"

Gilbert White says: "When I hear fine music I am haunted with passages therefrom, night and day; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] beyond all [illegible] my imagination." The London Athenæum quotes this, and adds: "Many foreign composers, when they find a piece which has no particular name, call an étude: but perhaps as in early [illegible] England, there any long performance, even [illegible] a special name, such as a cantata or a symphony, was often called a lesson. It was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There must be masters five who can [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] when the Pianoforte came [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] lesson. This is [illegible] own recollection, but we never found confirmation of the usage in a standard writer until we came upon the passage in Gilbert White."

Fashionable Impertinence.

The New York Tribune, speaking of one of Mrs. Kemble's readings, makes the following remarks:

Certain persons, who no doubt, would fly about the parterre pass [illegible] we were to say that they are neither gentlemen nor ladies [illegible] [illegible] Mrs. Kemble's second reading, [illegible] [illegible] their natural relationship to [illegible] the assemblage mentioned in Scripture, who on a certain occasion, ran violently down a steep place in the sea and were destroyed. In the advertisements of Mrs. Kemble's Readings, which is published [illegible] in the daily papers and in the printed slip which is handed by the ushers to any person on entering, there is to be found a respectful request that, in order to avoid interruption the [illegible] doors will be sealed before the commencement of the Readings. It is but justice to say that the great body of the audience, after consulting their own comfort and the request, were quietly seated in ample time, but Mrs. Kemble had entered, had, in her usual deliberate way, found the place in her book, had announced the name of the play, had taken her seat, had read the Dramatis Personae, and the Act and Scene, when a bevy of people, males and females, conspicuously [illegible], and [illegible], and [illegible], came sauntering down the alley as if they had been a quarter hour too early, instead of just that much too late, and finding that the entrance to their seats [illegible] [illegible], proceeded to create greater scandal in this performance. In the very middle of the row, was blocked up by a half-dozen peaceful people. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] taking a very [illegible], an [illegible] [illegible] surrounding barbarians were glad of the opportunity to look at majesty. After the women had pushed [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] at the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to their crannies, with adjusting their [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible], one man of the party remained [illegible] [illegible] bowing to the few people who were so unfortunate to be his acquaintances, and so indifferent to [illegible] it, up [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] there all the time in [illegible] of the spectacle he was making of himself as if he were "Bottom" [illegible] [illegible]. He then walked calmly across to the wall-side, [illegible] [illegible] a dozen rows, and seated himself at last as if, on the whole, he had given the audience a treat they had [illegible] looked for. All this time Mrs. Kemble, who behaved like an angel [illegible] [illegible] had arrested her Reading and sat waiting patiently, albeit the angry eyes did glow in Caesar's brow, now and then making futile attempts to begin, and as often stopped until at last these ill-bred [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] people allowed her to proceed. They were not, it is true, the only sinners, but they were the vulgarest and most conspicuous. Mrs. Kemble has two ways at her command, by which she may save herself [illegible] these people [illegible] them, [illegible] think of nothing [illegible] [illegible]. One is to rise from her seat and appeal to the audience by leaving the room until order is secured. Another is, to order the doors peremptorily locked [illegible] against all late-comers and leave [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to them [illegible] the open court. As people of this stamp have [illegible] [illegible] for being late merely to show their [illegible] they would take good care how they ran any risk [illegible] of being deprived of the [illegible] opportunity. We beg Mrs. Kemble to try this plan, in the interest of the majority of her audience.

It is not, perhaps, proper to insist upon Mrs. Kemble's personal claim to courtesy from each [illegible] [illegible] as she entered last night. It is enough that she is a woman. [illegible] to be enough she being a woman of the finest breeding and perfect manners, she takes it for granted that she addresses an audience of equals. Whether [illegible] to be so or not we are unable to say, but [illegible] is more, that, besides being a woman of genius, who is herself associated [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] with many of their happiest and most intellectual hours, she is among the last representatives of a family who, in [illegible] and honors sent by descent have deserved of England's noble name. That the name of Kemble is itself a passport, and has been borne so purely and kindly that [illegible] would be ill exchanged for any Bedford or Stafford of [illegible] peers. One word more and we'll [illegible] [illegible] subject. Mrs. Kemble has always herself been noted for the extreme punctilious [illegible] with which she performs her public duties. Any person [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that those read upon the results of the most painstaking and conscientious study. Her memory is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] work. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Queen of England herself. She never yet kept [illegible] audience waiting one-half second. And lastly she always reads her very best, be she ill or well, be it one or fifty, be her audience small or great. We heard her once read to twenty people, on a howling equinoctial Friday in Stuyvesant Hall as perfectly as if [illegible] [illegible] had been crammed with people. Before she began the thunder [illegible] [illegible] in her sweet way for reading out in such a whirlwind and then read so beautifully that she made us know that she meant her thanks. The moral of all this is, that the man or woman who treats Mrs. Kemble with the [illegible] of [illegible] to him ought to be ashamed of himself.

To this, of course, we all say Amen! If, in place of Mrs. Kemble one were a [illegible] Beethoven, Mozart, Handel, Jenny Lind, the lesson would be equally appropriate. Good behavior surely is not too much to expect of "Fashion." But so very like the manners of Rochefoucauld's Fashion is the homage which vulgarity pays to refinement.

6. THE CÆCILIA SOCIETY, &c.

Although of very recent origin (Oct. 1863) the Cæcilienverein has already acquired a certain importance and a respectable position. Originally a Catholic society exclusively devoted to the Catholic church music, it had scarcely existed a year before it laid aside that tendency; and in a short time it grew to be one of the most considerable societies of Berlin. It now counts over a hundred singing members, for the most part young fresh voices. Its task is equally the cultivation of the larger choral works, secular and sacred, with orchestra and a capella. It arranges every year several grand concerts in the hall of the Sing-academie. Thus far it has performed Psalms of Handel and Mendelssohn, Masses by Lotti, Caldara, and the Coronation Mass of Beethoven; also the music to the "Ruins of Athens," Mendelssohn's Loreley finale, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which last work it purposes to bring out every year. In Rudolf Radecke (formerly a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium) the Cæcilia has a circumspect, as well as skilful, conscientious Director, who will surely raise it to a yet more flourishing condition. The performances under him have been for the most part excellent.

Of numerous other societies of this kind, the more worthy of mention are

THE CONCERT SOCIETY FOR INDEPENDENT ORCHESTRA (Concert-verein zu selbständigen Zwecken) now under the direction of Albert Hellmesberger. Though rather limited in its means, for the Society is small, it has acquired large praise by its praiseworthy performances of works commonly unknown, such as Cherubini's "Requiem for Male voices," Hiller's "Loreley," Haydn's "Orfeo" and others. Every summer too it gives a festival in the open air.

Greater in compass is the Singing Society connected with the NEW ACADEMY OF MUSIC founded only a year ago under Music Director Kruger. It already counts 100 members, but has as yet given no public concert as a society; only some of its members have taken part in choruses and songs in the Orchestral Evenings of Capellmeister Stöhr.

Other singing societies, of less note, are those of SCHNÖPF, of DÜMLACK, and of JAHN;—the last was founded in 1845, but has almost disappeared from public notice.

7. THE ROYAL DOMCHOR (CATHEDRAL CHOIR) &c.

The Dom-Chor was founded at the initiative of the Art-loving King Frederick William IV. in 1843. Until that time the liturgical music in the Dom-Church had been performed by a small choir composed of pupils of the Dom-school and the good singers of the military choruses, or Seminarists, conducted by Grell. Grell also undertook the organization of the new Dom-chor. From the singing classes of the cathedral school were selected 70 or 80 boys with the best voices, part of whom were appointed actual members, with remuneration, and the rest were trained with them as a body in reserve. About 36 men, 18 tenors and 18 basses, belonging to the most various callings, are joined with them; along with teachers in the higher and the common schools and singing teachers, we find in the Dom-chor merchants and painters, only voice and vocal culture being taken into account in the selection.

The principal object of the choir was, as we have said, the execution of the music in the Cathedral service, that composed after the Prussian liturgy by Zelter, Rungenhagen, Grell and others, and at once rehearsed; besides also some single pieces from the old Italian masters. Originally it formed a part of the plan to bring in instrumental music also. In this connection Mendelssohn conducted the first church performance on the 6th August, 1844, for the church festival of the one thousandth year of the German Empire. But that proved only occasional. The Dom-chor soon gave itself exclusively to a capella music. In 1845 Grell resigned the directorship to Neithardt, and he it was who made the choir since so world-famous. To him the Dom-chor owes that brilliant unison and that truly magical accent, light and shade, by which it has achieved its triumphs. Since the year 1850 the choir has made occasional artistic tours, exciting the greatest enthusiasm in London, Hamburg, Bremen, Rostock, Kiel, Cologne, &c.

After Neithardt's death, in 1861, R. von Hertzberg, singing teacher in the Dom-chor since 1847, undertook the charge of director, and Kotzolt, until then solo bassist, was appointed singing teacher and the conductor still continues its old repute though no longer permitted to extend it abroad. The church functions of the choir consist in the singing of a Psalm or a Motet before the beginning of the Sunday service in the Dom and the execution of the liturgical choruses during the same. The Sunday liturgical evening devotions are now performed by a smaller choir; but the whole choir takes part in those which precede a great festival, as on Christmas Eve.

The musical service in the Court chapel is commonly sung by the so-called "little chapel choir," composed of twelve of the more excellent singers from the whole Dom-chor. In the Greek service of the Russian Chapel too, the choruses are entrusted to this smaller choir.

On the occasion of the Coronation ceremonies in Königsberg in 1861 the Dom-chor received a special uniform consisting of a red cloth coat, black knee-breeches, shoes with buckles, and a velvet cap, only worn on like extraordinary occasions.

The choir gives annually three subscription concerts and at least two for charity. In the former only works of deceased masters are performed, all of course a capella, such as Palestrina, Orlando Lasso, Lotti, Jomelli, Caldara, Durante, Vittoria, Leo, Cordans, Schütz, Hammerschmidt, Franck, Eccard, Schröter, the Bachs, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn and others. In the charity concerts—for the benefit of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, &c.,—the Director is the most commendable manner respects the rights of the present, inasmuch as works of living artists only are as a general rule performed. Thus the last of these concerts have brought out psalms, motets and arias by Naumann, Voigt, Reissmann, and others.

The rehearsals of the entire Dom-chor are regularly held on Wednesday and Friday afternoons, from 3 to 4 o'clock, in summer in the barracks of the Guard-Cuirassier regiment, in winter in the hall of the Joachims thaler Gymnasium. Besides which, the boys have special singing exercises under the second director Kotzolt.—The salary of the grown up members of the Dom-chor varies from 150 to 200 thalers each, according to position; the boys, besides a free place in the Dom school, receive as high as 120 thalers.

Some of the members of the Dom-chor, as R. Otto Sabbath, Seiffert and Geyer, have won fame as oratorio singers. Kotzolt, too, was one of the best pillars of the Dom-chor as singer.

KOTZOLT'S SINGING SOCIETY has been in existence from the year 1849, and formerly brought out large compositions, as in 1855 Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," 1856 Handel's "Susanna," until the year 1858; it has devoted itself with unrivalled happy success to the most careful rendering of part-songs. It gives three concerts every year in which secular songs of all centuries are sung. The choir of about 80 members, is admirably trained; most of the singers come out of the singing Conservatory of the Director, which makes it possible to reach a nearly perfect chorus tone. Hence their concerts are among the best of the whole season. Thus far they have brought out of the older time, Madrigals and Songs of Dowland, Morley, Tallis, Dowel, Hassler, Schein, Hassmann, &c.; and of the more recent, songs of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hauptmann, Vierling, Reissmann, Naumann, Wüerst, Radecke, &c.

The society also pays attention to church music, and in several church concerts it has given, besides solo movements, sacred creations by Palestrina, Orlando Lasso, Eccard, Bach, Mendelssohn, Grell, Lowe, Reissmann, and others.

ERK'S SINGING SOCIETY pursues a similar tendency, only in a more limited way, bestowing its exclusive care upon the People's song. In 1845 Erk, the royal music director in the Berlin teachers' seminary, had formed a Männergesangverein; since the year 1852 he has carried on, together with it, a society for choruses of mixed voices, and with what care the people's song is cultivated in both unions, is abundantly shown by the annually recurring concerts.

Sculptures for the Boston Music Hall.

Our distinguished countrywoman, Miss Charlotte Cushman, who has so long lived in Rome, became interested some time since, in a Danish sculptor, a fellow-worker of Thorwaldsen, Wilhelm Matthiä by name, who, though he has created real works of genius, lives there, poor and old, and comparatively unknown. Several years ago he designed and executed for the Grand Turlonia Palace of Rome [illegible] of three great musical composers. Miss Cushman, captivated by the beauty of the work, and wishing to help the artist and to make [illegible] world known, and at the same time pay a graceful compliment to her native city, ordered casts of these works which she has sent as a gift for the adornment of the Music Hall, and which she had consecrated by [illegible] of the Ode written for the inauguration of its Great Organ. The casts have arrived uninjured, and before they are formally presented and displayed, a brief description of the [illegible] may be of interest.

They are busts of three great musical composers, as we have said upheld by brackets ornamented with allegorical figures suggesting the character, genius, style, and place in musical history of each. The busts are modelled a little larger or [illegible] than life size. The brackets are some five feet long by three feet wide. The figures stand out in full alto rilievo.

The first bust is that of Palestrina, a very noble head [illegible] sym[illegible], and broad [illegible] features regular and [illegible] expression [illegible] of character [illegible] intellectually [illegible] dignity and well centred [illegible] beautiful [illegible] strength and delicacy. The [illegible] has been guided by a portrait painted from life, (or [illegible]) made from the painting, [illegible] in the Barberini Gallery in Rome. We venture to say that there could be a more simple and harmonious portrait bust in Rome than the Danish sculptor has here produced.

As Palestrina was the great reformer of church music, the master in whom pure religious vocal music first attained to perfect art, here we see set forth from the centre of the bracket a figure representing "the Genius of Harmony," as it is called by the artist,—or say Saint Cecilia,— holding an open music-book of large wide pages, between two angels, who are placed [illegible] high or in the background, one of them with folded hands and [illegible] downcast [illegible] over her shoulder from the book; the other, pointing to the notes, appears to ask her silence [illegible] same, and the Genius, whose eyes are upturned, indicates that it is given by inspiration from above. The three forms and faces are instinct with a divine beauty; the central figure is one of unconscious dignity and grace, and is the loftiest ideal of pure womanhood. The whole grouping of the figures,—the rich folds of the drapery as well as light and flowing by harmonious arrangement, with the wings and robes of the angels,—is the most free and graceful that can be imagined. Above and behind this group, for the immediate support of the shelf which holds the bust, there is a choir of little cherubs, with sweet faces, nestling closely together and with little arms encircling each other's necks, who are singing [illegible] the [illegible] of Carlin, and a [illegible] is trying the tone [illegible] on the open book below. It needs an organ and to show the figures of the allegory [illegible] speak for itself so strongly as the poetic beauty and consistency of its execution.

The next bust is Mozart's, type of all that is graceful and spontaneous in music and of perpetual youth; the purest type of genius perhaps, that ever yet appeared in any art,—or in literature, I [illegible] except Shakespeare. Not that there has been no other composer so great; but that there has been none whose only inspiration and processes were so purely those of genius. Learned as he became though he was, yet he created music as naturally as he breathed; music was very atmosphere and native language with him. The busts and portraits which we see of Mozart differ widely, almost irreconcilably. This one adheres mainly to the portrait from life by Tischbein, with aid from several sculptures. Of all the busts that we have seen, it seems to us the worthiest to pass for Mozart. It has the genial, beaming, youthful face, with nothing small or weak in any feature,—the full eyes, square eyebrows, broad, large, thoughtful forehead; the full, compact head; the long nose withal. Altogether it is very winning.

Mozart was the complete musician; his genius did not wholly run in one direction; like the other greatest creative masters, he was master in all kinds, in symphony as well as in song. But he became the finest [illegible] the best type of a kind, if we could speak of any one, in the lyric or dramatic union of orchestra and human voices best shown in his operas, but shown also in his sacred compositions, for masses, requiems, oratorios, a full modern [illegible] orchestra, are an important accompaniment and [illegible] than they had never been. Accordingly to symbol most aptly the most graceful and artistic Muse ever had as well as a peculiarly lyrical province the art to give a far a musical support to the bust [illegible] of the German oak about which under the enlargement canopy, circle the three Graces, with flying feet and flowing skirts, hand in hand, a lovely musical guidance,—though in truth the middle one guides [illegible], for agency which shall appear. In these three Graces he has represented the three characters of music,—the joyous, the sacred, and the tragic. The foremost is the dance with full open face and open breast, all sunshine and delight, with the right arm [illegible] up and holding a bunch of grapes over her head in joyous [illegible] sweetest sense; her other hand is gently drawn by her religious sister,—a [illegible] lovely one between [illegible] whose shoulders thrown back and lifted head as [illegible] gently [illegible] beautiful soul is seen [illegible] of dreamy land, save that a [illegible] to her as she [illegible] when she rose a song. Her left arm [illegible] and seems [illegible] forward her drooping sister Tragedy whose head, deeply bent, looks off and downward to the left, and takes the shadow of the picture, while the left arm gracefully thrown up to balance the raised right arm of the joyous one. At their feet the masks of Tragedy and Comedy lean against the tree grouping with the pine-apple of a Cyprus [illegible]. The whole group is [illegible]—so rhythmical, so fluid, free, and cautious in its movement that it becomes [illegible] and music to the eyes,—drapery and all movement in perfect keeping. Around the top of the oak stem is carved the word "Requiem," —the last, unfinished work and emblem of the composer,—below which a wreath of laurel rests upon the oak leaves.

This Mozart seems to us the happiest conception of the three. This one design should be enough to make its author famous.

Beethoven is the subject of the third bust, which also is extremely interesting; and yet to many the [illegible] prove the least satisfactory of the three. Indeed Beethoven is naturally less [illegible] to sculpture art than either of the others. The head has been modelled mainly from a good bust made in Vienna, and from a [illegible] mask, [illegible] doubtless has more truth to actual life of [illegible] stronger head, than Crawford's noble but only [illegible] statue. Who [illegible] of Beethoven as [illegible] lately [illegible] near nearly so good has found its way before to America, unless it be [illegible] Story's little statuette. It is not, perhaps, so agreeable a face as an ideal conception of his muses and of so grand a character could wish; and one side well doubts whether the expression,—the only one at all fair to the real man with a whole way [illegible] to have shone out through the rough exterior,—but ever been caught in bust or portrait.

But how to symbolize the genius of Beethoven?—so many-sided, so profound, struggling with unseen and fate, yet full of moral hope and joy beyond the cloud of gloomiest experience for the human race? one born in [illegible], with the hope of universal liberty and sanctity and brotherhood? It is easy to think of his power, and how he wields the thunderbolts and rules in the climax of his harmonies, and how Jove-like and all-conquering, cloud-compelling, he is. The German musicians call him the "Thunderer," and so our artist has chosen for support of the bust Jupiter Tonans himself sitting throned upon his eagle, which clutches the thunderbolts in its talons, and stars through immensity. Above the god's shoulders appear two winged genii, holding up the bracket. This is one side of Beethoven, no doubt. Still this counterfeit presentment [illegible] Beethoven is no heathen, and [illegible] which he is able [illegible] the type of [illegible] kind of majesty that Old World [illegible] against which Beethoven's whole humanity and genius were a protest. Prometheus, heaven-storming Titan, were a fitter emblem. Still in the foreground is, at great Olympus. There [illegible] truth, too, in the gloriousness [illegible] glorious, in the idea of being borne aloft by Jove's strong eagle. The same image has presented to us while listening transported to one of his symphonies.

But the sweetness, the tenderness, the subtle fancy are quite as characteristic as the strength and kingliness of Beethoven; and our artist has tamed the thunderer [illegible] and from which [illegible] face to [illegible] of a Cupid seated on the eagle's wing who, with upraised looks and [illegible] as a [illegible] to the god of gods,—clearly [illegible] to the humorous passages, the scherzos in Beethoven's music. The thought is a happy one. Nevertheless, the bracket as a whole is far from giving us the whole of Beethoven, as a legacy [illegible] hardly so complete a success—but could it be?—as the two others, though not less a [illegible] art.

These admirable and most suggestive sculptures, works of art of a high order, will soon be placed upon the walls of the Music Hall already the home of artistic adornment to be seen of all. Just how and where to place them is not so easy a question to settle. The two galleries, running round three sides of the hall, leave so light open space until not except at a great height above the upper balcony and ceiling. The stage end is filled by the organ and the Beethoven statue. On its opposite wall, however, each side of the Apollo Belvedere, are places which would hold them if they were but two; the third might come as a pleasant surprise upon one wandering through the corridors. But which then shall go up? Beethoven and Mozart, historically and every way are far more aptly related to each other than either is to Palestrina; and the Palestrina and Mozart as sculptures in design and treatment balance each other more perfectly while the Beethoven is in quite another style, and moreover would hold the double (how and [illegible]) [illegible] But there is a relation, suggested above, between the three which would seem to outweigh all others, and to dictate that all three should be displayed, if possible, together in one view. For they mark (whether the [illegible] thought of this or not) as the artist has treated them the three great stages in the development of music. In Palestrina we have the pure harmony of voices carried up to perfect art. In Mozart we have the dramatic union of vocal and instrumental music. In Beethoven we have the highest expression of pure instrumental music,—music completely emancipated from words, a new self-sufficient form, leaning upon no other art —the genius of the symphony par excellence; for therein all agree on but one, and all others though he be [illegible] a Mass, a Sacred Cantata which is sublime, and an opera with which one other only can dispute the palm.

Palestrina, highest type of vocal harmony complete in itself without instruments; Mozart, type of vocal and instrumental union, Mendelssohn [illegible]; Beethoven, pure instrumental music, what strong beyond [illegible] Succession. It is, perhaps, only another of the same relation in another way to speak of Palestrina as the supreme type of pure Italian art in music; of Mozart as the union of the Italian and the German genius,—he was the Italian graces in danger second the German oak,—of Beethoven as pure German of the Germans.

We trust our citizens will feel such native pride in the possession of these two works of art as shall lead not only to their being put, some day, into marble, but to the enlargement of the group by ordering from the same a poor similar [illegible] of two or three more great representative composers. The noble gift should be a noble impulse to us in the same direction.

Auber's New Opera.

Paris, February 1868.

When a man of eighty-seven lives, he does all that may reasonably be expected of him. It is much more than the majority of men are able to do. If he [illegible] carries this burden, which seems intolerable to men who were under the load of fifty sixty or a sixty [illegible], he is [illegible] applause. If in the winter of life he bring forth flowers and fruit [illegible] [illegible] Miracle! It does seem incredible a man should be able, in a period of life when all of his contemporaries, after playing the part of [illegible] grandfather and great-grandfather have been gathered to their [illegible] generations of ancestors, to [illegible] a man under these circumstances should be able to bring forth a work full of memories, chequered with every variety of emotion, even those one had supposed to be only possible [illegible], melodious and dramatic enough to keep members for [illegible] of [illegible] pleasure. This is [illegible]. Auber has [illegible].

To pretend his opera was to the [illegible] of any elegance, [illegible], grace, with the fame of brilliant thought to be found in the works he composed from 1830 to 1848, would be an impertinence. The aged oak cannot as it is, but [illegible] more on it. Nevertheless the new opera would be remarkable signed by any composer. "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur" is laid in India during the war between the English and French. Gaston de Maillepré (Capoul) is a French officer who has never known what it was to be happy; for a brother [illegible] fortune befell him, it was invariably followed by such ill fortune as to leave him more wretched than ever. For instance a great estate was left to him, but the same mail which brings him this intelligence communicates the loss of the reformation [illegible] many [illegible] brought against him by [illegible]; [illegible] to recover some portion of the estate. Fourteen among them Djelma his [illegible] in Burgeron (Prilleux). Gaston is promoted to the rank of colonel; his more intimate friend de Mailly (Melchissédec) thinks their promotion [illegible] injustice, quarrels with Gaston and forces a duel upon him. Hélène (Mme Marie Cabel), an Englishwoman, whom he met [illegible] years before at London and fell in first sight in love with her, he meets in India and under an engagement, [illegible], to marry her cousin, Sir John (Sainte-Foy). You see every [illegible] of happiness has a very dark shadow accompanying and he is still ignorant of one day of undivided happiness. There has been a truce between the English and French armies and it has terminated; but Sir John and Hélène are [illegible] hostilities have recommenced and have wandered into the French lines. She is sent back to the English camp, escorted by Burgeron and de Mailly. Sir John, being a military man, is [illegible] under arrest. The English camp is gay, the Governor General (Bernard) is about to give a ball. He [illegible] Hélène's guardian. The lovers Burgeron and de Mailly at the ball find another French officer has been made a prisoner during the night she sends him, [illegible] which she would not have dared had she heard [illegible]. He is de Maillepré, whom she [illegible] the looks upon him as the instigator of Sir John's arrest. De Maillepré [illegible] his parole to make no attempt to escape during the ball and receives permission to attend it. The ball is at its height when the Governor General receives a despatch informing him Sir John has been sentenced to death as a spy and is to be shot the following morning. To [illegible] the long hours of imprisonment, Sir John has sketched a plan of the French fortifications, which leads the French to look upon him as a spy. The Governor General instantly orders [illegible] the law of retaliation be the rule of this nation was life must be sacrificed for life. The English have no officer in their power but de Maillepré; Burgeron and de Mailly are protected by the [illegible] ticket are given for his execution the following morning. The intelligence quickly spreads through the ball room and soon no one is ignorant of de Maillepré's fate except the person most concerned—himself. He never was happier for every body treated him with the utmost kindness and tenderness. Don't be looked upon as a dying man! Burgeron tells him he will discover his [illegible]. De Mailly withdraws his challenge and apologizes for wounding him. Hélène can discover [illegible] her heart, feels not bound she feels for de Maillepré is love, and she confesses it to him. At last he is informed of his fate. He loved! I knew this happiness could not last! I never in all my life had one day of happiness! As it is his last night of earth he is to be as gay as possible, dances and sups gaily. At dawn the usual morning preparations for his execution are made, when Sir John appears. He is the bearer of proposals for an exchange of prisoners. If he fails to negotiate the exchange he has given his word of honor he will return to the French army and undergo the sentence of execution delivered on him. De Maillepré refuses to accept the exchange for he knows Sir John is to marry Hélène, and death is preferable to seeing her who loves him so ardently in the arms of Sir John. Sir John loves Hélène, but he loves life more, for there is more than one Hélène in the world while another [illegible] could [illegible] that. Sir John yields Hélène, and de Maillepré consents to be exchanged and at last enjoys "The First Day of Happiness."

There is in the opera a part which has so slight a [illegible] that [illegible] introduce another [illegible] into the analysis. Yet it bears large share in the success of the piece. The best music is in this part, and it is sung by an actress of beauty, grace, [illegible] and youth, Mlle Roze. The [illegible] song in the second act, which is sung by [illegible] (Mlle Roze) is considered the best piece of the opera. The other favorite pieces are de Maillepré's song in the third act, and a duet between Hélène and [illegible] in the same act. The general opinion seems to be the score, very pretty, contains some brilliant pieces, is superior to Mons. Auber's recent works, but is not to be compared to his more celebrated works. The audience clamored for Mons. Auber. He refused to appear. As the throng [illegible] many persons waited at the door to shout the composer. It was cheered with enthusiasm when he appeared, and was followed by the crowd until he disappeared in the Café Anglais, where he gave a supper to the leading performers of his opera. They [illegible] the table at half past two o'clock in the morning! Best lying at these [illegible] were Mons. Auber was not. It would have been [illegible] had his spirits not been [illegible]. The past must have risen before him with its swarm of [illegible], beautiful, fascinating women and brilliant, merry men—all of whom have been [illegible] and the [illegible] [illegible] of everything loved and admired by men must have struck his mind with great force. The [illegible] of men who live to [illegible] great age is buried long before their death, for one lives [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] and when they go they carry away with them portions of some [illegible].

Italian Opera in St. Petersburg and Elsewhere.

Some time ago, says the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, we offered to these pages a few observations upon the condition of Italian Opera generally, and proved that, properly speaking, it no longer existed, that is, that we no more meet with Italian vocal art such as was everywhere predominant not [illegible] [illegible] still [illegible] in the days of Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, Malibran, Catalani, Pasta, Tadolini, Ronconi, [illegible], etc. Since we first anyone [illegible] such operas as Donizetti, Bellini, and Mercadante wrote for the above singers, that the country where Italian music and Italian singers were to be heard has frequently had very often [illegible] [illegible] because the three or four good voices which came from there are immediately secured for St. Petersburg, London, Paris, or Vienna, that, moreover, the prices which have now to be paid for high C's and Scaffle [illegible] are out of proportion as the artistic capabilities properly so called, of the singers, and that, sooner or later, a reaction will inevitably take place.

Something has now occurred, which we unquestionably hope, will, if not at once, at least gradually, effect a healthy change in many things, and not in Italian opera alone. The Emperor of Russia has done away with the Italian Opera in St. Petersburg; that is he has withdrawn the grant he used to make it and thus rendered its further existence impossible.

The reasons which induced the Emperor to take so decided a step are simply that the public of St. Petersburg, unlike the public in other great cities, would not allow themselves to be satisfied by great names, and would no longer pay a high price to see a singer, whose beautiful voice they heard ten years ago.—When the Emperor Nicholas used, for an Italian Opera company in St. Petersburg, the celebrated singers of that period though no longer in the prime of their powers, were still great vocal artists, who sang beautifully. French opera was not then in vogue, and the singing, which now renders Viardot [illegible] as in that day considered beautiful. The artists, who stood perhaps from the sixth climate, returned us at the [illegible] of the coloured [illegible] offered them. They remained for some years in St. Petersburg, and then returned to Paris to repose forever on their laurels. We recollect having heard in Berlin, in April 1843, Tamburini, Persiani, Tamberlik, and Rossi on their way from St. Petersburg—the performance being the last, we [illegible], to the final retirement of those splendid artists from the stage—and, if the risk of being accused of having a belonging to those persons who think the Past alone beautiful we say—It was the last real Italian opera we ever heard.

The successors of the above artists in St. Petersburg [illegible] not much so high in art, but they were much higher in their demands. The grant made to the Theatre by the Emperor Nicholas was raised by the Emperor Alexander and the most celebrated Italian singers hastened to St. Petersburg. They scarcely deigned to honor other cities with a few performances. If they did so, it was only after the season in the capital of the Czars. Tamberlik, Graziani, Madame Borghi, etc., were simply [illegible] elsewhere; in St. Petersburg they were Italian men.

But gradually the brilliancy of these stars paled; the attention of the public decreased more and more, and turned to—the German and the French Theatre, particularly to the former. This was at the efforts made by Imperial Chancellerie and [illegible], as well as by the management, to entice the rich aristocratic [illegible] back again to their once favorite theatre. The receipts became shorter and the losses longer. As Rome says His Majesty the Emperor Alexander who frequently stood at the Italian opera lately was reminded by what he himself saw that [illegible] could not be prevented," and taking a quick and decided resolution, he relieved the Imperial privy purse of an immense and [illegible] fruitless expenditure.

A French paper remarks very justly that the determination adopted by his Majesty, the Emperor Alexander cannot fail to be followed by the most favorable results for Italian opera generally. The gentlemen and ladies connected with it will no longer charge so much for their [illegible] efforts, when they cannot name a request for an [illegible] of price with the threat: "If I do not [illegible] that here, I will go to St. Petersburg, there they will give me even more!" When the system of enormous prices has been abolished we may hope to be something like [illegible], which hitherto was to be expected rather in the second-class companies, than in the performance of so-styled premier sujets. The evening, moreover, of the [illegible] in the first class Italian salaries will most decidedly not be quite without [illegible] effect on the improvement of that received by others.

From the point of view of art, what has happened at St. Petersburg should be joyously welcomed.

Composing for the Voice.

(From "The Voice in Singing," by Emma Seiler.)

[illegible] the only aim as to works as [illegible]. In the compositions of the old masters regard was had only to the sweetness of [illegible], and everything was excluded from them that did not fall [illegible] upon the ear. But in modern music what [illegible] intolerable [illegible] phrases is accepted and we have accustomed ourselves to [illegible] more vigorous and powerful mode of representation, the aim being to excite by sudden contrasts.

In so far as music is to represent the most secret life of the soul, and as in [illegible] everything natural [illegible] and [illegible] contrasted, [illegible], this tendency of art in music has its justification. But here, as in everything [illegible] the principles of beauty are concerned, the [illegible] must not be [illegible]. The old masters composed only in consonances, and [illegible] has shown [illegible] consonances [illegible] independent right [illegible]. Dissonances according to [illegible] are only permissible as transient points for consonants having [illegible] of their own [illegible]. [illegible] the [illegible] dissonances correctly [illegible] by all the [illegible] masters. And greater and nobler effects were [illegible] than are possible to our modern musicians with their accumulation of dissonances and sudden contrasts.

With the two composers in whom [illegible] modern classic epoch reached its zenith begins the gradual decline of the art of singing. Mozart held it necessary to his musical education to study in Italy the vocal compositions of the old masters and to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the qualities of the singing voice. Hence the vocal compositions of Mozart will remain beautiful and to be [illegible] as models for [illegible] for they will unite the sweetest and loveliest melodies with an appreciation of [illegible] [illegible].

The giant genius of Beethoven [illegible] and artistic found the [illegible] developed to perfection by his predecessors, [illegible] overpowering strength [illegible] to [illegible] his [illegible]. His masterworks of composition in the grandeur of their style excel everything that had been produced before him. But he has treated the human voice as [illegible] instrument.

Because all that Beethoven produced was grand and beautiful, he has been blindly imitated, and it has been wholly forgotten that music has [illegible] drawn its best nourishment from song, and only by means of song has it risen to so high [illegible] only that instruments can never reach what is possible to a thoroughly cultivated human voice.

A musician [illegible] to the piano, never [illegible] writing a concert piece for the violin, because he knows that he is not sufficiently acquainted with the peculiarities of that instrument; but every musician imagines himself able to compose for the human voice, although its peculiar qualities are far more numerous and far more difficult to be rightly dealt with.

The strictly classical school are at the present time adverse to Italian music as bad. The [illegible] is, that the music is never adapted to the words, but often expresses something wholly different and sometimes directly opposite to their meaning; and thus it may [illegible] to an [illegible] poetic sentiment, but alone [illegible] with [illegible] only and sections. In regard to modern [illegible] this judgment may be just. These superficial compositions are a product of Italian [illegible] and have [illegible] for themselves a certain popularity [illegible] be their pleasant and easy melodies. Even the old Italian music seems at first sight to pay little or no regard to the sense of the words, especially when the [illegible], according to the classic German method, is [illegible]. Upon closer study, however, we soon perceive that although the [illegible] is treated as the chief thing the meaning of the words is certainly given when the music is rightly performed. Were it not so, our music could hardly ever have been able to form and develop itself upon and through those old vocal compositions.

As the pictures of Titian, Rubens, and other great painters of that time who were masters of form as well as of color, will always be considered as works of art and models, so the compositions of the old Italian singing masters and of those who were from their schools are to be held up as examples for vocal composition. In these works, as in all the works of art of that time, form takes precedence of the spirit, that is, the words and their poetic significance are treated as secondary matters. By all the peculiar properties of the human voice that [illegible] into consideration, everything in variance with these is avoided, and every interval, every vowel, is so [illegible] that the [illegible] the greatest perfection. These unornamented compositions can be sung more easily and with less effort than a simple aria of a Rossini or Verdi.

The first time and the earnest feeling with which in these old vocal compositions [illegible] was observed, those that they are the marks of elegance of the golden age of the art of singing, of artists who with an exact knowledge of the beauties and capabilities of the voice [illegible] in those days were compelled to possess, the short, thorough culture in the theory of music. When we now sing the wonderful and exquisite compositions of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, &c., we must feel the impossibility of giving one or another tone so beautifully as it should be given according to the quality of the voice, and as we are able to give it by itself. It is hard for us to strike this or that tone with perfect purity, or with the requisite force, &c. These songs are not adapted to the voice as the old Italian arias were, but composed without accurate knowledge of the voice, and therefore cannot develop the voice in this [illegible] perfection. Mendelssohn often lays the strongest expression in his soprano songs upon the f sharp: the transition-tone from the falsetto register to the head voice. For the expression of the highest passion, which requires strength, the head voice is not adapted, as lower and more passionate tones. Accordingly it is nearly as difficult to sound this tone with the falsetto register in which it is not natural and is therefore hard to be sung and also becomes sharp and offensive. Schubert again in his songs composes [illegible], as pleases the words that the favorable vowels seldom come upon the right tones. Schumann also very often sets the syllable [illegible] upon the [illegible] tones of the register and can hardly be struck with purity. Thus there are very many hindrances to a fine development of the voice, even in the most beautiful compositions of our [illegible] and [illegible], which many of our composers are more or less chargeable with putting in the way.

It is evident from what has been said that it is by no means a matter of indifference how the words of a song are translated into another language. Composers usually sing [illegible], leave by translation [illegible]. It is generally left entirely to chance whether the appropriate vowels fall upon the right tones. A teacher must take great care, especially in beginning instruction to give his pupils compositions adapted to singing. All the exercises and solfeggi should be expressly arranged for that purpose, and it is of importance that the pupil should be gradually, according [illegible] to encounter, in order that the vocal technique may be fully illustrated. Along with these exercises and solfeggio, arias should be practised, particularly in the beginning. Arias are preferable to songs because they usually require more flexibility of voice, and therefore excite the technique. In arias the music is more prominent than in ballads and the coloratures more marked and consequently more easily apprehended. The passages [illegible] more often repeated, and must of course be sung differently and thus the pupil is brought acquainted at once with the different external [illegible] of a fine execution.

Music Abroad

Berlin.

THE CÆCILIA (Radecke conductor) at its second concert, brought out Schumann's Faust music (scenes of second part) and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. Too much for one evening thinks the correspondent of the Neue Zeitschrift, while he praises the earnest intention and the execution. The soli in both works were sung by Frl. Haupt, Frl. Lorch, and Herren Geyer, Julius Hermes and Huber. Frl. Lehmann (?) distinguished herself in the soprano solo of the Ninth Symphony.

The sixth PHILHARMONIC CONCERT—Scholz conductor—(we translate from the same correspondent), Herr Alexis Hollaender) began with a "Trauermarsch" posthumous by Mendelssohn, a composition which answered well enough suited for a funeral, but too poor in invention, and monotonous for a concert, or for a strictly modern appreciation. Herr Stockhausen sang a scene in the character of Lysiart from Euryanthe, and two songs by Schubert: "Greisengesang" (song of the greybeard) and "Die Sterne" (the Stars). He was in better condition than on his former visit, and in all the softer passages gave great pleasure by the noble and refined quality of his voice. The Weber opera scene hardly bears transportation from the stage to the concert room. For the strong passages both in the highest and the lowest tones, Stockhausen's organ is not particularly well adapted. In the Schubert songs, the [illegible], one could enjoy the singer's art completely, for he expressed the feeling of the song most perfectly. There was only one thing to disturb the soul and taste of having these Schubert songs accompanied by an orchestra; a small one to be sure, but even this was means enough to make disturbance. In very few cases where the piano accompaniment is in a [illegible] of a color, so where certain instruments suggest themselves for characteristic forms of accompaniment, or finally where the manner and form of the composition are thematic. Orchestrate "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel," "At the Grave of Anselmo," if you please—but each willing is not a place for the little song to which a piano accompaniment alone properly belongs. These strains rendered back upon the horn on the first quavers of each measure in the song "Erlkönig" were positively unaesthetic.—In Herr Jean de Graan, a young pupil of Joachim, who played Mendelssohn's violin Concerto and Beethoven's Romanza in F, we recognized a talent worthy of attention. An Overture by Vierling to Kleist's "Hermannsschlacht" was played under the composer's direction and made the impression of an earnest work, only somewhat too much set on characteristic expression, which prevents the free flow of invention until toward the close. The instrumentation is interesting in passages, but suffers on the whole by excessive [illegible] of the brass. The concert closed with Gade's always so pleasing and valuable "Nachklänge von Ossian."

The second soirée of the DOM-CHOR offered a six-part chorus, "Dixit Joseph" by Orlando Lasso, a [illegible] chorus "Gut Nacht" by Calvisius, a double chorus, "Misericordias Domini," by Durante; J. S. Bach's five part Motet "Jesu meine Freude"; a Motet by Haydn "De [illegible]"; a chorus by Hauptmann, "Gott [illegible]" and the second Psalm of Mendelssohn. The new things were the two chorales by Calvisius and Hauptmann. The most important gift of the evening was the Bach Motet: so [illegible] is worship, is withdrawal into one self, a feeling, compared with which all the before named choruses sink to the level of respectable [illegible]. And the Dom-chor understands how to sing this Motet with all fervour and power, in the true spirit of the work. Frl. Ziebelius sang the "Jerusalem" Aria from St. Paul and an air from the Creation.

KOTZOLT'S SINGING SOCIETY has given their second soirée. They sang a Madrigal by Josef Schütz (1612), a [illegible] choral song by Eccard (1600), a Madrigal by the Hungarian Prince Wittich (1337) harmonized by Stade, a chorus song, "The Old Man" by Haydn, a frequent song by Reinthaler besides songs by Schumann, Mendelssohn and Hauser—all a capella with the greatest purity and beauty of light and shade, in tonal and fine acting. The concert was assisted by the comic opera singer Herr Fricke,—a very good [illegible] ballad—who sang two of Loewe's Ballads and the "Lindenbaum" by Schubert, and by Herr Schwantzer who played Handel's Variations in F.

Our Quartet Club, Herren Bachhaus, Espenhahn, Rich and Dr. Bruns opened their second cycle of concerts for this year with three Quartets: Haydn in G major, Mozart in B flat and Beethoven in A, op. 18. These artists think not only of a true and smooth [illegible] of ensemble and of charming effects, but rather make it their chief aim to present the musical sense of the works simply and plainly. And this aim they fulfil in good sterling fashion, both in conception and in execution, the purity of the modulation being particularly fine.

Fräulein von Facius gave a concert for the sufferers in East Prussia, in which she sang songs by Schubert (from the Winterreise), Beethoven (two of the Irish songs with trio accompaniment), Rubinstein, Lassen and Gräfer (?). This lady had already shown her artistic tendency by singing the entire cycle of Schubert's Müller songs. Kapellmeister Reinecke played the B flat Trio of Beethoven, with Herren Grünwald and Dr. Bruns, besides his own Variations on a theme by Bach and smaller pieces by Hiller, Mendelssohn and Chopin.

Here is a list of concerts in Berlin during the last half of February:

Feb. 14th, Second Quartet evening of De Ahna.—A minor Quartet of Schumann, &c.—16th, Church Concert of the Italian [illegible] Academie, conducted by Julius Fuchs, with the [illegible]-Orchestra: Vernes's [illegible] and Organ Passacaglia by Bach; [illegible] with organ, Meyerbeer [illegible] from Handel's "Ste Cecilia," Nicolai's religious Overture, &c.—17th Fourth Quartet Soirée of Hellmich.—18th Second Concert of Stern's Society, with the [illegible] Motets from Leipzig; selections from Gluck, Handel, Bach, Durante (Magnificat), &c.—19th, Third Soirée of the Dom-chor; vocal pieces by Reinthaler, Lasso, Calvisius, Bach, Haydn, &c.—20th, Hollaender's Society (for the East Prussians), with Frl. von Facius and Alexis Hollaender: "Elegischer Gesang," by Beethoven; female choruses by Brahms and Bargiel; chorus ballads by Hollaender; Schumann's Quartet, &c.—22nd, Concert of the Bach Society (for East Prussia): two Cantatas by Bach, Mass by Palestrina and Ave Maria by Rust.—23rd, Second Concert of Bülow's Society, with Frau Harriers-Wippern, Taubert and the Symphony Orchestra: Te Deum by Graun; Ave Maria, by Hollaender; 98th Psalm by Dietrich; Aria with chorus by F. Volger, &c.—24th, Stieber's Eighth Monday Concert, Schubert's Octet; Spohr's Septet; Aria by Gluck; Songs by Schumann, &c.—Same Evening Hellmich's 4th Quartet Evening: Quartet by Lorleberg (MS.)—25th, Concert of the Gustavus Adolphus Society under Al. Dorn, with the singers Gödde, Lorch, Decker, Stockhausen, &c.: Violin Sonata and Ave Pastorum by Dorn; choruses and songs by Schumann, Schubert, &c.—27th, Fourth Beethoven Evening of the Trio [illegible].—28th, Quartet Soirée of Auer, with the brothers Müller.—29th, Eighth Philharmonic concert of R. Scholz, with Auer: Schumann's B-flat Symphony, Bass aria from Schubert's Rosamund, &c.—March 1: Concert of Brahms and Stockhausen: Variations by Brahms; unprinted Symphonic Etudes by Schumann; six songs from Eichendorff's cycles, &c.

London.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT has been restored to the fortnight. Herr Joachim's return to the Monday Popular Concerts having been recorded in the [illegible], it remains only to add that, after a professional visit to the north, where according to invariable custom he took good music with him, he made his second appearance at the concert by performance of Saturday, playing first violin in the Romance of Mozart's string quintets (Romance in B minor) and in the ever popular septet, for string and wind instruments, of Beethoven. The pianist at this concert was Herr Ernst Pauer, who afforded another striking proof of his versatility by an [illegible] performance of Mendelssohn's solo sonata in E major—an early work, full of beauties and extremely difficult to execute, but happily not so was it very recently believed the only sonata for pianoforte which the illustrious [illegible] has

…eft. The singer was Mlle. Anglès, who, among other pieces, gave Mr. Arthur Sullivan's "Will he come," one of the most unaffected and charming songs of the day.

On Tuesday night week "the veterans," Mr. Reichardt, held his annual "English concert," which attracted a numerous audience, and on Wednesday the seventh of Mr. John Boosey's well-managed and therefore deservedly popular "London Ballad Concerts" drew an enormous crowd.

On Thursday Mr. Henry Leslie gave another very interesting concert—the third of his present series. Among the striking features were a "Magnificat" from Mozart's Vesperae de Dominica; the glorious "Sanctus" from Johann Sebastian Bach's elaborate … [illegible] … of Beethoven and also the first movement of Haydn's Mass … [illegible] … Many connoisseurs would have preferred the whole of Bach's mass, or the whole of Beethoven's, to a series of fragments; but this it may be presumed was impracticable. Though the specimens thus offered of the sacred music of three men of genius … [illegible] … The masses of Bach's "Sanctus" … [illegible] … Mr. Leslie and the chorus and orchestra under his direction … [illegible] … Mr. Gounod's Messe Solennelle … [illegible] … the merits of the performance, which were above the ordinary. Of a different character was the selection of "Gloria" from Beethoven's Mass … [illegible] … There was some excellent solo singing, as Mme. … [illegible] … Mme. Patey's delivery of Pergolesi's air "O God, I love thee" … [illegible] … from Mr. Costa's Eli … [illegible] … in the new Hungarian lady in the soprano music of St. Paul at the last concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society … [illegible] … Mr. Nelson Varley … [illegible] … Mozart … [illegible] … considerable vigor. The concert, which was limited to sacred music, ended nobly with Handel's Hallelujah. At the fourth concert Madame Arabella Goddard … [illegible] … Herr Joachim, and as the 13th we are promised the magnificent Reformation Symphony of Mendelssohn.

On Friday week Professor Sterndale Bennett's church cantata, The Woman of Samaria, one of the prominent features at the Birmingham music meeting of 1867, was introduced for the first time to a London audience under the able direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins, who also conducted it at the great Holland Festival. … [illegible] … by the audience in St. James's Hall … [illegible] … ever assembled in a London concert-room. The Woman of Samaria is not merely worthy its composer, but is the work of the day. The May Queen of the same composer … [illegible] … we have nothing new to say. In strict justice, however, it must be recorded that the execution of The May Queen was not nearly so good as that of The Woman of Samaria. Both are announced for repetition on Friday next.

A concert was given in St. James's Hall on Saturday night, on behalf of the sufferers from the famine in Eastern Prussia. All the artists who cooperated … [illegible] … were Germans, and among them was Herr Joachim, who played one of J. S. Bach's … [illegible] … from Beethoven's … [illegible] … Miss Agnes Zimmermann. Bach's concerto for two … [illegible] … of the Crystal Palace … [illegible] … M. Benedict was conductor. The concert was … [illegible] … handed over to the fund.

At the last Monday Popular Concert Herr Joachim led Mendelssohn's quartet in E minor (Op. 44, No. 2), besides playing with Mme. Schumann Beethoven's sonata in C minor, the last of the three, Op. 30, dedicated to the Russian Emperor, Alexander, and, with Mme. Schumann and Signor Piatti, Schumann's trio in D minor—one of the works in which the peculiar tendencies of that much disputed master are most vividly and characteristically exhibited. Mme. Schumann also played two pieces by Scarlatti and a Gavotte (in D minor) by Bach, the last of which was encored.

The grandest performance of the evening, however, was that of Mendelssohn's noble quartet (MM. Joachim, L. Ries, H. Blagrove, and Piatti), the adagio being tumultuously encored, and played (if possible) better the second time than the first. The singer was Mr. Vernon Rigby, who sang … [illegible] … one of the most refined and beautiful compositions of Mr. Benedict.—Mus. World, Feb. 20.

ANOTHER SCHUBERT SYMPHONY. The Athenaeum of March … says:

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert was a memorable one. The production of Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony … [illegible] … Mr. Grove, who, having heard of the existence of a mass of manuscripts from the hand of the author of the "Erlkönig," lying unseen in the coffers of Dr. Schneider of Vienna … [illegible] … the Viennese should … [illegible] … strangers to the Austrian capital and returned … [illegible] … Every courtesy and kindness was shown … [illegible] …

The Symphony thus disinterred by British zeal … was surely well worth the effort. There can be little or no doubt that it is the most important new … [illegible] … Symphonies since Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony was produced. In the first place it is full of fresh, … [illegible] … fancies,—has certain touches of genius. The treatment is throughout of the happiest … [illegible] … the lovely andante being … [illegible] … The orchestral treatment of the themes is excellent, gracious and original. There is abundant … [illegible] … movements. The andante is the one least to our taste, its theme being somewhat rough. The finale … [illegible] … of the four movements of the Symphony … [illegible] … the last subject of the finale … [illegible] … Why should it have been called a "Tragic Symphony"? … [illegible] … There is nothing of … Medea, nothing of Dante, nothing of Werner,—as we were reminded on hearing it, of Beethoven's immortal Overture. … [illegible] … "Tann häuser" Overture. … [illegible] … two … Herr Wagner has found or conceived … of the Spinning Chorus in "The Flying Dutchman" being the other. To our poor judgment, this overture is a wretched piece of patchwork, though, as we have been triumphantly assured, the fall … [illegible] … the last … [illegible] … having been anticipated by Cherubini in his perfect Overture to Lodoiska.

MADRID.—From a statement published by the Journal of the performances at the two Theatres Real … [illegible] … operas … [illegible] … were played. Meyerbeer's Africaine … [illegible] … The favorite were Traviata, Roberto, Faust … [illegible] … Richard Wagner and Fra Diavolo, … [illegible] … The composer whose works were represented most frequently … Meyerbeer … [illegible] … Mozart … [illegible] … Gluck's Armide will … [illegible] … Herr Richard Wagner has been again staying here a short time.

MILAN.—The Quartet Association under Bazzini's … [illegible] … given two concerts, the second of which was even more successful than the first. The programme of the first included: Quartet, Boccherini; Quintet with Clarinet, Weber; Serenata for the Violin, Haydn (admirably played by Bazzini) and Quartet in C, op. 59, Beethoven. The programme of the second comprised: Trio, Rubinstein; "Abendlied," Schumann; and Quartet, Schubert.—Don Carlos is in rehearsal at the Scala, Signor Mario … being engaged to play the Principe … [illegible] … opera. Il Duello, by Farvese, has been produced at the Teatro Re but with only moderate success.—At the Teatro Carcano, Don Juan will be followed by Il Trovatore.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 27, 1869.

Music in Boston.

We must first go back to the NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT given by the Harvard Musical Association, in compliment to their esteemed Conductor, CARL ZERRAHN. A well-compliment it was in every way, the Music Hall being nearly as well filled, and with audience by the same truly appreciative and … that has … listened to all the Symphony Concerts this season; the orchestra, too, being in full force and entering … to do their best, and the programme made up of such sterling matter as the following:

Trumpet Overture, in C, op. 101 …	Mendelssohn.
Unfinished Symphony (in B minor)	Schubert.
… Concerto, in …	Beethoven.
… Symphony, in C minor	Beethoven.

Mr. Zerrahn was very warmly welcomed as he came to the Conductor's stand, and all felt that it would not be his fault if the posthumous Overture did not sound well. We think it proved more enjoyable to many than they had quite dared to anticipate. We could perceive no reason why it should be called a "Trumpet Overture;" the trumpets have no particularly prominent part to play in it, except that they blow a good blast at the opening. Possibly the trumpet-like character of a little phrase given to the instruments and frequently recurring may … have suggested the idea to some publisher but we suspect the title never came from Mendelssohn himself. It is a singular Overture for him, in parts quite characteristic of him, in other parts not so at all. Perhaps it was the consciousness of a certain want of unity of character that made him unwilling to send it out to the world during his lifetime. In listening to the opening portion one would be little apt to think of Mendelssohn. Its style is formal, conventional, and so very unlike Handel; the ideas commonplace but strong and wholesome, so that you are borne along with life and vigor. In the middle portion, on the other hand, it falls into the well known Mendelssohn romantic vein of the Hebrides Overture, the Scotch Symphony, the Melusine, &c. It ends in the style of the beginning but worked up to a … climax. It was well played, and is a valuable addition to our stock of concert Overtures, although much inferior in originality and charm to our author's more familiar overtures, which we feel to be about his very best works.

We were thankful for the chance to hear the Schubert fragments by the larger orchestra. Finely they are … interest, and doubtless there were many in ecstasy with the two movements, ready to declare they never heard so wonderful a Symphony. The charm, we fancy, was not so much symphonic, as in the [illegible] sentimental and dramatic. Sudden [illegible] have hardly listened any much of it; the Andante especially sounds much as the voice of very large modern operatic music on the stage. There are beautiful themes, as we have said before; there are lovely passages, and passages also for the [illegible] great [illegible] to [illegible] the orchestral forces from their lowest depths, as if about to grow and swell into a sublime symphonic whole like the great one in C. But such passages were momentary.

Mr. Perabo's appearance was a graceful [illegible] offering, and most welcome. The "Emperor Concerto," as the English musicians call it, with Perabo to play it, was certainly not the least attractive or stirring feature of the concert. He played it admirably, better even than before, entirely from memory, and the effect was inspiring. He played con amore. Of the Fifth Symphony, which is at least one of the three or four that rank [illegible] as a classic to be considered the most perfect among great Symphonies, there were no need of saying more than that it was played with uncommon spirit, making the deep impression which it never fails to make here when it is fairly rendered. Such a work can never grow old.

Mr. B. J. Lang had "the pleasure" (was contentedly [illegible]) of introducing to the musical public of Boston the Eighth Book of Songs without Words (first brought to light so recently) by his favorite composer. He must have had this pleasure in a high degree, introducing them to an audience so select, so large and so much gratified as that assembled in Chickering Hall on the afternoon of March 18. He played the six little pieces, not in the order in which they appear in print, but with due regard to succession of keys and contrast, as in the programme which here follows:

Grand Sonata, Op. 31, in D flat maj. [illegible] Beethoven.
Allegro con brio, Adagio con [illegible] Allegro.
Eighth Book of Songs without Words. Mendelssohn.
In the following order:
No. 4. In D [illegible]
[illegible] London, [illegible] 1845.
No. 6. In C [illegible] London, July 5th, 1842.
From a manuscript in the possession of [illegible]
No. 3. In [illegible] Leipzig, Dec. 12th, 1845.
No. 2. In [illegible]
From a manuscript in the [illegible]
No. 4. In [illegible]
[illegible] 1842.
No. 3. In C [illegible] 1845.
Sonata, op. 58, in D [illegible] Mendelssohn.
Allegro assai vivace. [illegible] Allegro.

After hearing the new Lieder played twice through by Mr. Lang, and very beautiful and clear [illegible] coming late the [illegible] reading them [illegible] and ever since they have been republished here, we cannot feel that they are equal to the best among those we knew before; and yet they have the real Mendelssohn flavor, there is no mistaking them as his. They are reproductions of several of the old types, so characteristic of him and which some of course cannot appear as original again when they first took form [illegible]. They are less ambitious efforts than many of them, though none the [illegible] genuine and graceful; some little ones [illegible] certainly, and full of feeling. They are at least much better than those of the 7th set, [illegible] And we confess that they all grow upon us.

[illegible] the two brightest took most readily with an audience. The one in A (No. 6) is just such a blithe, exhilarating little "Spring Song" as Fairy several times produced [illegible] and dewy freshness, the harmony crystal clear. The other No. 5, a whirling Tarantella movement, is also very charming. Most beautiful in point of melody and depth of feeling is the Andante cantabile in C minor (No. 4), though it is but another variation of one of Mendelssohn's well known moods. Here also is new [illegible] But it is singularly beautiful, this sweet sad, pleading melody, clothed in loose flowing arpeggio [illegible] accompaniment, but a single voice. More spirited, and more fiery with [illegible] accompaniment, is the other Andante, in E minor [illegible] interesting. Here the spirits in the little [illegible] syncopated phrases of the middle voices, as it were [illegible] voices while the bass [illegible] in full chords.—The Adagio in D in four-part writing is full of sweet, deep, calm religious feeling,—a piece one needs to have fall in love with.—The Andante, No. 3, in C is a regular four-part song, like some in the earlier sets, graceful, smooth, yet familiar.

If asked which are the best of the six songs, we should find it hard to choose between these: the Adagio in D, the Andante in C minor or the "Spring Song." But our musical friends are already [illegible] and choosing for themselves, for with characteristic promptness our publishers, Messrs. Ditson & Co., have already issued a neat reprint of the Eighth Book.

We did not think Mr. Lang quite so happy in his interpretation of the Beethoven Sonata as he is with Mendelssohn; but the Sonata Duo, with Wulf Fries, went splendidly and was worth the whole.

A beautiful, sincere occasion was the little concert complimentary to Mr. Wulf Fries, so quietly organized among his friends and pupils given at Chickering's on Thursday afternoon March 19. The room was filled with the best company, and fragrant with fresh flowers, for the whole stage was embowered with plants, exquisitely arranged by fair hands. The musical selection was equally choice and of [illegible] the effect could not but be [illegible]

1. Sonata, in A major, op. 69, for Pianoforte and Violoncello. Beethoven.
Messrs. PERABO and FRIES.
2. Song, with Violoncello obligato. Esser.
"[illegible]"
Mr. KREISSMANN.
3. Adagio, for Violoncello. Mozart.
Mr. WULF FRIES.
4. Song, "Wenn die [illegible]" R. Franz.
Mr. KREISSMANN.
5. Quintet, in B flat major, op. 87. Mendelssohn.
MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

That Sonata, one of the happiest of Beethoven's inspirations, so original, spontaneous, perfect in every movement, while singularly lacking a slow movement in such was advisably [illegible] by both artists and gave great delight. The tones of Mr. Fries's 'cello never sounded more sweet and rich and nervous, and they had fine chance (which they improved) to tell their feeling in the almost vocal melody of that lovely Adagio by Mozart. Mr. Kreissmann sang most beautifully. And the strong Mendelssohn Quintet so brainy and so rising in the first and last Allegros, was played with a will by the Quintette Club in honor of their tried old comrade, who has been of them from the first.

Our neighbors in Brookline have a Choral Club, who meet [illegible] at one another's houses for the practice of good music under the good direction of Mr. Kreissmann, on whose resilience among them they may be congratulated. Read the choice programme of one of their little social concerts:

Quartet from Fidelio. Beethoven.
[illegible] Mozart.
[illegible] Jomelli.
[illegible] [illegible]
Magnificat. Durante.

Excellent promise this. Quality before quantity the old is the motto for all Art unions. The Club is small, but if it will keep on in this way it may prove the germ of a true Sing-Akademie.

The "Grand Combination Concert," of Mme. Gazzaniga, Leonilde de [illegible], &c., in the Music Hall, March 21, had its points of interest, chief of which was the remarkably fine violin playing of Herr Leitermann. His selections were of the virtuoso order (a part of a Paganini Concerto, and [illegible] strung together and embellished by Vieuxtemps). His tone is slender but sweet, pure, searching; his execution marvellously perfect, and the whole performance at once handy [illegible] and full of feeling and character. Mme. Gazzaniga still sings like a woman of soul and an artist, though her voice has lost much of its freshness. Sig. Abbrugiati proved himself an uncommonly good baritone singer, and Mr. Samuel P. Warren (late Paine, a pupil of Haupt) an excellent organist, though he had small chance in such a concert. But Mme. Masano was more extravagant than ever, never more at home apparently than in the "Grande Duchesse."

Coming Concerts. Doubtless the most tempting to a large circle of classic musical spirits are

Mr. Otto Dresel's Piano-forte "Readings," as he calls them, only way of intimating (we suppose) the informal unpretending nature of the entertainment, the programmes shaping themselves to mood and circumstance, leaving the artist free from all the fetters and the fuss of pledges. And this is an artist who we heartily trusted with that freedom! Indeed in this way we are young [illegible] get the best of one of the truest interpreters of tone [illegible] only. We need only say that the "Readings" begin next Thursday afternoon, at Chickering's, and will be continued on the four following Thursdays of April.

Next Tuesday evening brings the fourth and last chamber concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. The great Quartet in E flat, of the Harmonic[illegible] set, by Beethoven will be the main feature; and Mr. Perabo will play, besides a solo, a Sonata Duo of Beethoven with Wulf Fries.

A Symphony Concert for the Orphans, will be given by the Harvard Musical Association on Monday Afternoon April 20th,—instead of [illegible], and in aid of the Ladies' Fair for the same benevolent object. Among the attractions of the programme will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and the E minor Concerto of Chopin, which Mr. Hugo Leonhard (to the joy of all who heard it before) has kindly consented to play again. Tickets, with reserved seats, at $1.00, are now ready at the Music Hall.

Mr. Peck, of the Music Hall, for his annual benefit has secured the services of Mme. Parepa Rosa and Carl Rosa, and of Miss Adelaide Phillipps, who will help make up an attractive first part before the "Son and Stranger," Mendelssohn's little opera the entire music of which will be given for the first time here with orchestra and good solo artists, Mr. Lang conducting.

Mr. Grover [illegible] tomorrow evening. "[illegible] the [illegible] the 'marvel'" by means of a Grand Italian Opera Troupe, beginning with Mme. La Grange, Brignoli, Mlle. [illegible] (happy [illegible]) &c., [illegible] with [illegible] the others. He is also grown so classical as to announce an Italian "Symphony"—not by Mendelssohn, but by—Bergmann! Perhaps a mere Symphony.

An Evening for the Orphans. Here is the programme of the very successful entertainment given last Monday evening at the Chapel of the [illegible] Church. Mrs. [illegible] Ware Howe was the reader (from her own recent poems and some of others) and Ernst Perabo the pianist:

Reading. Talk to Owls.
Piano. Sonata in A Minor, Op. 143. Schubert.
Reading. [illegible]
Piano. a. [illegible]
b. [illegible] Op. 7. Brahms.
c. Prelude in A [illegible]
Reading. Poetic—"To [illegible]"
Piano. 3 Piano Variations [illegible] Beethoven.

Musical Correspondence.

Brooklyn Philharmonic. We cheerfully give place to the following [illegible]:

"Your Correspondent from Brooklyn has overestimated the number of our Orchestra, saying that the programme was done as well as could be with forty-five in the orchestra. We have had sixty in the orchestra for several seasons. This season the funds are lower than usual [illegible] in these parts being low all around, and our expenses have been reduced to as low a figure as possible, and the band number as follows: [illegible] Violins, [illegible] Violas, [illegible] Celli, [illegible] Contra Basso, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Oboes, [illegible] Fagotts, 4 Corni, [illegible] Trumpets, 3 Trombones, 1 Tuba, 1 Tympani, 1 Cymbals, Triangles, etc. Total 56.

The bills are for never less than fifty-five members. When the subscription warrants the orchestra will be increased to eighty, which number in our acoustically perfect 'Academy' will leave nothing to desire. The last concert was a great success musically and financially, owing to a great measure to the services of Miss Phillipps. [illegible] a [illegible] programme of the 5th concert which [illegible] better than well. The work of keeping up this excellent society and education of good musical taste in our midst, devolves upon a few enthusiasts in good [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and if the latter be not evenly [illegible] the Society will continue to flourish; but we don't want your readers to suppose that we were obliged to fall from sixty in the orchestra to forty-five, and I beg you will print this hasty note from your old friend

George Wm. Warren,
Chairman Music Committee.

New York, March 18. On Saturday we listened to the 4th of Mason and Thomas's Musical Soirées (at Irving Hall). The programme was an interesting one:

Quartet in minor, op. 77	Raff.
F [illegible] [illegible], op. 44	Schumann.
Quintet in op. 59, No. [illegible]	Beethoven.

The Raff Quartet is excellent, well worked up and lasting [illegible] fine ideas. It is a work of great talent. The Adagio [illegible] is charming. Its theme a genuine song [illegible] and the subtle harmonic [illegible] is masterly in their surprises. The second movement [illegible] [illegible] with a most [illegible] up to [illegible], [illegible] at D major and afterwards in B flat major.—Altogether the Quartet made a most favorable impression.

The feature of the Soirée was, [illegible], the Quintet. Strong, vigorous and full of health, it is a worthy example of Schumann's broad and noble genius. To speak of the movements separately would require too much space; suffice it to say, that the second "In modo d'una marcia" is the most [illegible] ing.

The final Quartet, an old favorite, belongs to the genuine, fresh early Beethoven period, and there is in it but [illegible] of the breadth and grandeur peculiar to the later works of the author.

It appears that Signor Brignoli has written a "romantic Symphony," [illegible] "A Pallid Dream," and that it is soon to be performed at the Academy of Music under the composer's personal direction. Ye Gods! [illegible] a [illegible]!

[illegible] in the N. Y. Weekly Review has been [illegible] [illegible] at Mendelssohn, à propos of the Italian Symphony performed at the last Philharmonic concert, and calls him a "petite maître de musique," &c. Alas, poor Mendelssohn, [illegible] he is not able to sink under the weight of this crushing [illegible].

March 20. This has been [illegible] a musical week. On Wednesday evening, Ole Bull's first concert; Thursday evening, the "Elijah"; Friday evening and Saturday morning, an Ole Bull concert and matinée; and on Saturday evening, Mr. Theo. Thomas's fifth Symphony Soirée.

A decade has passed since the Norwegian violinist has played in this city. The enthusiastic greeting which he received on Wednesday from a very large audience—some 2500 or 3000 people—must have convinced him that our musical public has held him in pleasant and appreciative remembrance. Who does not remember what Longfellow says of him in the "Wayside Inn."

> "Excel the most musicians excel
> And ever and anon he bent
> His head upon his instrument,
> And seemed to listen, till he caught
> Confessions of its secret thought."

[illegible] his playing, one must say, that [illegible] of tone and rapidity of execution are the leading characteristics. He was warmly applauded and [illegible] encored—one indeed more so [illegible] artist who assisted him—but his selections were hardly calculated to move one favorably. The "Nightingale Fantasia" and the "Mother's Prayer" (both by himself) are [illegible] [illegible], and in themselves uninteresting, being only relieved from mediocrity by the wonderful sentiment and expression which the artist throws into them. His [illegible] was an exceedingly unique and very beautiful arrangement for violin alone (his concert pieces are [illegible] unaccompanied) of "Lo [illegible]." The first [illegible] accurate management of three parts simultaneously was a piece of consummate skill.

In lieu of orchestra the accompaniments were supplied by G. W. Morgan (organ), Edward Hoffman (piano) and [illegible] (harp); the effect was not a thoroughly good one. Sigs. Ferranti and Pollack, with Mad. Varian, contributed each two solos. The latter acquitted herself fairly, in spite of her extremely [illegible] as [illegible] in Auber's "Laughing Song." Edward Hoffman displayed much facility of fingers. Ferranti, who has an excellent voice, possessed none of his [illegible] [illegible]. Sig. Pollack seemed for the moment to enjoy his solos, and G. W. Morgan hardly did himself justice.

On Thursday evening "Elijah" was given by the N. Y. Harmonic Society with the following leading soloists: Miss Parepa, Mme. Zimmerman [illegible], Thomas and Mrs. Kempton. As a whole [illegible] and thoroughly [illegible] very performance I have [illegible] heard; the chorus force was very unevenly balanced the sopranos being weak and the tenors [illegible] strong. I am compelled to say that the recitatives, not including those of [illegible] and Miss Parepa, were sung in an utterly hard, wooden manner; the bass [illegible] of Mr. Thomas were often very inaccurate and uneven in tempo.

Everything was painfully mechanical and disconnected, excepting always the efforts of Mme. Parepa and Simpson. Had the tenor made some approach to distinctness in his articulation he would have done admirably. The chorale, "Angel Trio" lost its proper and intended effect because the lowest voiced angel thought proper to [illegible] a perpetual tremolando, which was simply and [illegible] absurd.

As a whole the [illegible] left a most favorable impression, and it is certainly no [illegible] most intelligent audience to offer such an [illegible] and apparently, [illegible] performance.

At the Friday evening concert and at the Saturday matinée [illegible] was attended (despite the inclemency of the weather) by about 1000 people. Ole Bull still strengthened the favorable impression created at his first concert. His double-note playing was something wonderful and delightful, resembling [illegible], in a lesser degree of Joachim.

A tremendous snow-storm prevented my attending the Symphony Soirée on Saturday evening and I am therefore unable to give any account of it. I regret this the more as it was the last of the series and the programme, which included the Eroica Symphony, was a good one. P.

Ferdinand Hiller's Tribute to the Memory of Hauptmann.

MORITZ HAUPTMANN, too, has passed away and with him one of those rare representatives of the true dignity of the high Art sphere. In his seventy-sixth year on the 3d of the month, [illegible] expectedly, but gently, he departed.

In devoting a few lines here to the excellent man, I would [illegible] simply in affectionate remembrance. For any close and searching estimate of his achievements I am hardly competent, especially the [illegible] moment. I may be permitted to give only a few biographical data for the information of those within whose horizon the deceased had not stood.

Born in Dresden in the year 1792, he was [illegible] fully destined by his father for his own profession, that of architecture, but the love of music gained the upperhand in him. For a short time he was a pupil of Spohr, who, after an interval which Hauptmann mostly spent in Russia, attracted him to Cassel. There he remained for twenty years a member of the Court Capelle, but he carried so high a name as a composer and a theorist, that in the year 1842 he was called to the place of Cantor at the Thomas Schule in Leipzig. The Conservatorium founded soon afterward by Mendelssohn won him as teacher in the higher departments of musical composition, and found in him one of the main pillars of its fame and influence. In the past year it was vouchsafed to him to enjoy a festival in honor of the five-and-twentieth year of his activity in Leipzig. His health was already failing and he wrote to me on that occasion: "Such jubilees one should anticipate and celebrate them in his younger years; later they are a [illegible] less consumption of the vital energy!" We may hope, in spite of this expression, that the countless signs of sympathy and honor which were offered him on that occasion had more of quickening than of weakening influence upon him.

Since John Sebastian Bach gave an immortal consecration to the office of Cantor in the Thomas Schule, Hauptmann, take him all in all, was certainly the most important of all his successors. During a not very exciting composers, to be sure, and honored men had held that glorious post; but there is hardly to be found among them a person of such comprehensive culture, such ripe intellect, such pure taste, such sharpness and clearness of judgment. Both as a true Hauptmann, as a matter of course, most intimately acquainted with the master-works of our art, he was not less at home in the creations of poetry and of the plastic arts. And such deep studies had he made in the German Philosophy that in his famous work: "Die Natur der Harmonik und der Metrik" he could propose the marriage thereof with the laws of musical science. His not numerous, but most charmingly complete instrumental and vocal compositions are known and loved by the whole musical world of Germany.

But now of the personality, the character and nature of the man!

The Thomasplatz (open place before the Thomas School) does not remind one of Athens, and no Corinthian columns adorn the entrance to the old-time dwelling of Sebastian Bach;—but after one had sat in Hauptmann's study chamber, crammed with books and music, and had chatted with him for an hour, he went away with the moral image of an old Greek sage impressed upon his mind. That cheerful serenity, that all-embracing correctness of comprehension, that mild fairness of judgment yet wanting by no means in Attic salt! And what a friendly interest he took in the work of every one who showed himself in earnest—encouraging, instructing, softening, upholding.

Pushing his own doings, without any affectation, into the background, saying about his own productions only what was wrung from him, as it were, demeaning himself with the most modest simplicity, yet he could not avoid being constantly looked up to as a superior. Often silent but never saying what was insignificant, [illegible] yet full of dignity; quiet, yet after [illegible] [illegible] active! Thinking of him, one finds no end of theme for praise.

Many of the best of several generations of German, English, Scandinavian composers name him with pride as their teacher. More many [illegible] must come may not always have been fit subjects for his depth and acuteness. What might not such a man have done as critic! It may be doubted whether any living person gave it an idea of it. For to the knowledge and the [illegible] [illegible] which he was able to express in perfect form, was added a complete impartiality. But he was of too peaceful a disposition, and his views always reached out too much to the universal and the whole. But in his letters to his friends he has strewn treasures of artistic wisdom. We hope these will not all be lost to the large circle that might be mentally enriched by it.

Might I also speak of the noble family life of the excellent man, without stepping too near to the [illegible] circle [illegible] he is affected with? A mistress [illegible] among artists, literary, she was to him not only the most faithful companion, but at the same time the representative of the two arts which he loved most of all.

Those who are left behind to mourn him may regard these poor lines as a simple wreath, which, as from this distance, cannot actually lay upon the coffin of the deceased. For wreaths of fame he never strove—all the more richly will the wreaths of love and reverence adorn his grave.

Franz Schubert's "Tragische Sinfonie."

(From the Crystal Palace Programme.)

Adagio molto. Allegro.
Andante.
Menuetto. Trio.
Allegro.

This is the fourth of the [illegible] symphonies which, in addition to a host of other compositions, Franz Schubert produced during his too short life of thirty-one years. It was composed in April, 1816, when he was 19 years of age, leading a quiet life in Vienna, the most important events of which were such trifles as the return of the Emperor from a tour in Italy, a fête to Salieri, to see a the Court composer, the production of some new work by Beethoven, an unsuccessful contest for the post of music-master to the normal school at Laybach, with a salary of £45, or more momentous than all, the first which he notes in his diary under June 17: "To-day for the first time I composed for money—a Cantata for the birthday of Professor von Drossen. Price 100 florins." Such was the small matter of which at that time made up the outward life of the young composer who was destined to be so great. But, however quiet its outward course, the [illegible] [illegible] of so sensitive and powerful a nature as Schubert's, cast in such [illegible] circumstances, must have been constantly sharpened and agitated. From the smallest song to the largest symphony, no composition of his but bears witness to this fact. What led him to affix (if indeed he himself affixed it) the title of Tragic Symphony to this composition is not known. It is a little [illegible] might be incongruous almost everything he wrote—for there are few even of his most cheerful works in which a tone of melancholy does not pervade and underlie them; [illegible] that has led the title there is nothing in the symphony to indicate that it was inspired by any specially tragic house or was the result of any [illegible] [illegible] misfortune. Possibly it is the [illegible] [illegible] of some passing love affair, which, though [illegible] tragical enough at the moment, was soon forgotten (as was Schubert's), and may even have [illegible] [illegible] away as the symphony occupied his brain and his fingers in a more glowing poetry. The [illegible] which he wrote [illegible] to his brother [illegible] which he begs for [illegible] a few [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and a few apples," and again "I can't [illegible] [illegible] good hopeful, [illegible] poor brother Franz"—[illegible] of [illegible] which would fly before the few [illegible] at chance [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his way. Having lived on for the term [illegible] at Laybach [illegible] April [illegible] 1816, so that the Symphony may have been composed [illegible] the hopes and fears attending the quest of that post, which, unsuccessful as it was, would have been a loss to Franz Schubert.

But "Tragic" or not the Symphony in C minor is a grand and beautiful work; one which would do credit to any master, in some matured and truly astonishing as the production of a youth not out of his teens. Traces there are throughout of the influence of both Mozart and Beethoven; but such similarities are inevitable in the early works of a youth, and are here amply redeemed by the original attributes and features with which each movement abounds. The sudden transitions and the method of repeating a whole phrase in another key remote to that in which it is first heard, so characteristic of Schubert, are both to be found here; and it is interesting to notice the first token of the sympathy shown for the wind instruments which are so prominent in Schubert's later works, and to which, as in the unfinished Symphony in B minor, the Rosamunde music, and the grand Symphony in C he confides the sweetest and most touching secrets of his soul as no one else has done before or after him. The orchestra, too, has that peculiarly sweet and balanced tone which is so obvious in the great works just named, and which is the more wonderful when we consider how rarely he can have heard his music performed. The two most intensely striking movements in the Symphony are the Andante and the finale. The former is one of the most beautiful and engaging things in all music: a strain of lovely melody touched and set off by every device of art, and yet true sweet and unaffected to the last. In form it is somewhat unusual, [illegible] independent melodies, which are repeated alternately and separately, without being worked together. The returns from the one melody to the other are truly exquisite. The finale is very busy and brilliant throughout, with beautifully melodious subjects and charming treatment of the wind instruments. The [illegible] and minuet are very less interesting than the other [illegible] the [illegible] of Beethoven."

without in any way derogating his fame. It is astonishing that a work so full of spirit and beauty should have been allowed to remain in oblivion for so many years. The first two movements were tried at a concert in Vienna in 1860, but appear to have met with no success, and the score reposed in its dusty retirement in the cupboard of Dr. Schneider, an advocate of Vienna, side by side with the Rosamunde music and many other MS. treasures, till the autumn of last year. That its neglect was due to no opposition on the part of its possessor is evident from the [illegible] readiness with which he allowed the representatives of the Crystal Palace Company to take a copy of it. To Dr. Schneider the thanks of our audiences are due, since it is by his liberality that we are enabled to present to them a work which cannot fail to become a greater favorite the oftener it is heard.—The autograph of the symphony has disappeared; the score at Dr. Schneider's possession being a copy by Ferdinand Schubert with the title, "Tragische Symphonie in C moll von Franz Schubert. Componirt im April 1816."

Franz Peter Schubert was the son of a small schoolmaster of Vienna, and was born at a house at [illegible] bears the sign of "The Red Crab," No. 54 of the Nussdorfer-Strasse in the Himmelpfortgrund [illegible], on the 31st January, 1797. The records of his childhood are very scanty, but they show that his gift for music and his general ability were found [illegible] very early. At eleven years of age he had a lovely voice and was put into the Court Chapel and into a public school called the Convict, where he remained for five years. His first known composition was a fourhand fantasia for pianoforte (1810) and his first song the "Lament of Hagar" (1811). The following are the principal events of his life:—

1813. Symphony in D composed, Op. 18.
1814. Leaves the Convict. Mass in F composed.
1815. [illegible] and [illegible] composed; Songs, Operas and the [illegible]
1816. [illegible] and [illegible] Mass in C. Stabat Mater and [illegible]
1817. Five Pianoforte Sonatas.
1818. [illegible] to the Esterhazy family in Hungary and has a [illegible] for the [illegible]. Symphony No. 6. [illegible]
1819. Visits [illegible] with Vogl. Composes the Pianoforte Op. [illegible]
1820. Composes for the stage, "Die Zwillinge," "Die Zauberharfe," [illegible]
1822. [illegible] Symphony in B minor.
1823. Opera of "Alfonso und Estrella" [illegible] Weber and Beethoven [illegible] Symphony, [illegible]
1825. Composes for the stage, "Rosamunde," "Fierabras," and "Der häusliche Krieg."
1826. Great String Quartet in D. [illegible]
1827. Pianoforte [illegible]
1828. [illegible] String Quartet in D minor and [illegible]
1827. Trio in B flat [illegible]
1828. Symphony No. 9 in C. String Quintet, Mass in E flat, [illegible] "Schwanengesang." Died Nov. 19th.

His works include 3 masses, 15 operas, operettas, &c., 8 symphonies, 10 quartets, [illegible], 15 pianoforte sonatas, 32 pianoforte fourhand sonatas, marches, variations, &c., 36 part songs, 511 songs.

It is to be regretted that there is no portrait of Schubert which can be accepted as giving any adequate idea of his looks. The head which appears at the top of Diabelli's edition of his songs is a caricature. A sketch by Kupelwieser taken July 21, 1821, is engraved as the frontispiece to the life by Kreissle; but it is only necessary to compare the reduced [illegible] of [illegible] with the photograph of the original sketch—to be found in some of the early editions of Kreissle, and itself a poor thing—to show how inadequate they both are. There is an excellent life-sized bust which forms part of the monument to Schubert's tomb in the Währinger Cemetery outside Vienna. This is said by those who knew him to be a good likeness, and I am therefore glad to inform my readers that photographs, both of the tomb and the bust can be purchased in the room at the entrance of the concert room. But even this, probably taken from a posthumous cast, is an unsatisfactory representation of the rare and manifold [illegible] of our dear composer. His face was evidently [illegible] with [illegible] his genial disposition, and with the tenderest [illegible] agitation and soft sweet heart which are present in every bar of his music, he must have had one of the most changeable countenances ever possessed by man. His eyes were usually dull, says a contemporary, but would kindle at the least allusion to music, or to Beethoven, and would light up the whole of his features. Faces like these are notoriously hard to portray; only the best artists can catch their shifting, flying traits of delicate expression. And such artists never came in the way of Schubert. Now, the greatest painters would feel honored by having to paint his portrait; but when he lived his worth was not known, and so the world has lost forever the living image of his face. But, thank God, we have his works.

He was about 5ft. 6in. high, thick-set and of solid make, black hair, and short-sighted, for which he wore glasses.

The best biography of Schubert is by Dr. Kreissle von Hellborn (Vienna, 1865). A translation of this is announced by Messrs. Longmans as to appear early in the spring, in one vol. 8vo. under the title of "The Life of Franz Schubert. Translated from the German of Kreissle von Hellborn by Arthur Duke Coleridge, M.A., late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge."

The Seventh Symphony

BY CHAS. W. [illegible]

It is unnecessary at this late day to enter into any comparative estimate of the place which the nine symphonies [illegible] class in relation to [illegible]. They have long since taken their stand at the head of orchestral compositions as models of [illegible] and they [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] which they [illegible].

The Seventh, Op. 92, though by many to be the greatest of the series, consists of four grand movements, besides a shorter introductory movement, viz.:

I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto, including the assai meno.
IV. Allegro con brio.

These parts, though quite distinct in outline and apparently each such a [illegible] yet have an inner relation, proportion and sequence. Their form together a complete unity and [illegible] a Tone-poem, a Joy [illegible] of unsurpassed magnificence. The opening "poco sostenuto," in two-fold measure, [illegible] with its [illegible] weakened rhythm, beginning preparatory [illegible] for the [illegible] a concert. Bright [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] the curtain as seen. A beautiful figure* only partially worked out, shadows forth the [illegible] things coming and gathering force [illegible] a climax of expectation and [illegible] the [illegible] by the most [illegible] Vivace, a 6-8 movement abounding in vigor and love of joy. The [illegible] or subject, although so free and spontaneous, is treated throughout with the thoroughness and strength [illegible]. It is full of the [illegible] of youth, the freedom and freshness of morning. The unalloyed gladness of the Prelude has been [illegible] [illegible]. Before the end of the [illegible] the Coda [illegible] appears [illegible] a [illegible] harness, a new phrasing of the subject [illegible] of the first [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] of be [illegible]. It is [illegible] as it [illegible] like the ground swell of a [illegible] passing [illegible] a [illegible] extraordinary effect, and to the last part of the work [illegible].

a broader mind. The theme is developed in a culminating point of astonishing force by [illegible] change the [illegible] of joy is ended, and the movement finishes in [illegible] statement and [illegible]

ALLEGRETTO.

From the height of exultation on which most movements, [illegible] we are in another country from the last. The hearer is startled by a feeling and yet [illegible] cry of pain! A [illegible] theme begins from the [illegible] a [illegible] harmony without [illegible] a [illegible] support that sorrowless [illegible] is denied it. At [illegible] it seems to take hold of the very innermost of song. Is it a weary [illegible] whose deliverance has not yet arisen—or the loneliness of a leader whose people will not follow? Bitten at the foot of the [illegible] rocks with a hardly suppressed [illegible] about him? Or a real [illegible] bound in professional fretting, and signified by that sharp cry to move on? [illegible] or let us conclude, a song of love and companion for [illegible] a symphonic picture of performance, matched with the interrupted [illegible]—(subject in A major, the triple version again). [illegible] the gloomy curtain lift [illegible] from Elysium, [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] it is far off, and [illegible] "remembering happier things" [illegible] the "crown of sorrow." We call the Seventh Symphony a joy-song. Yet not the mere [illegible] and [illegible] of youth or [illegible], but the sunshine of a great and healthy nature. [illegible] at which [illegible] be [illegible] to come, can never [illegible] courage. The [illegible] of grief well up with increased [illegible] though in [illegible] [illegible] repeats [illegible] again [illegible] the [illegible] again the same [illegible] ending the movement as it began. This sad and [illegible] picture [illegible] the body of the work [illegible] the [illegible] of feelings both before and after [illegible] of the grave-digger scene in Hamlet, [illegible]. The [illegible] of the scene have shown [illegible] parallel in the [illegible] of [illegible] expression. [illegible] this movement is the [illegible] in "Presto," and "[illegible] [illegible]." [illegible] of [illegible] as an [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] forgotten back and forth like [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible]. Hungry with [illegible] come upon a supply of food [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] together. The [illegible] [illegible] in majesty. Upon the [illegible] of the "Presto" [illegible] ends the [illegible] (Presto) [The Trio to this Scherzo]. The scene [illegible] by the [illegible] one of the [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible] which [illegible] from an Austrian field. It is [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] after the three great movements preceding, [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] was begun. The old is not forgotten but [illegible] the [illegible] cry at the [illegible] and end of the "Allegretto" comes up again but stripped of [illegible] [illegible] in the strong [illegible] one breath of [illegible]. [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] to let them go, the part ends [illegible].

FINALE CON BRIO.

This powerful conquest has rounds and completes the work. It overflows with [illegible] rejoicing. The undercurrent of [illegible] reached in the Finale [illegible] room for development upon a broader basis. They [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] from the Allegretto [illegible] the [illegible] are [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible]

Beethoven's Symphony in A.

[illegible]

[illegible]

Digitized by Google

The third movement—Finale, and assai meno presto—trio marked Scherzo and Trio) contains a passage for the horns, which is as original and impressive as anything else of Beethoven's, if not even more so. The [illegible] return to the theme of the Scherzo, after the passage alluded to, will not fail to be noticed. The [illegible] given to this movement by the repetition of the trio has already been spoken of. Both the Allegretto and the Scherzo partake of the romantic character of the first movement, though from different [illegible].

Nor is the Finale less full of fiery genius and effect than the others, or less characteristic of its author. Though it is wanting in those sudden [illegible] which [illegible] with such [illegible] [illegible] the first movement, it [illegible] the [illegible] force and energy [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the general [illegible] of the [illegible]. "Beethoven," says Spohr, "was often [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphony." It is this side [illegible] [illegible] which appears to me to be reflected by this Finale.

These wonderful works—the nine symphonies of Beethoven—the youngest of which is nearly fifty years old, are as fresh as the day they were [illegible]. Every time they are played they seem to become more youthful, [illegible].

But it is well to remember that these great works were not always so loved and appreciated, but [illegible] had to work their way through misunderstanding and coldness as all great things always will. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Weber [illegible] [illegible] symphony with the following words:—"Thus [illegible] figure—

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] one of the most [illegible] composers in the world [illegible].

Organs in Chicago.

Among the encouraging signs of western improvement in musical appreciation, mention ought to be made of the considerable number of good sized organs erected in Chicago during the past year.

For several years the most complete organ here was one of Erben's in St. Paul's (Universalist) church. It has three manuals and about twenty eight stops.

About a year since, Wm. Johnson, of Westfield erected in the First Baptist church here the largest instrument in the city as well as the largest of his works. It has three Manuals and a Pedal of three keys. There are in all about [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and over three thousand pipes. The number of pipes, however, gives no [illegible] idea of the real power of the instrument for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a large number of imitative and compound stops. In the Great Organ, there are, I think, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] mixtures in the Swell [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Choir [illegible]. Besides there is in the Great a Twelfth and Quint, and a Quint in the Pedale. Moreover the number of reeds is open to exception. There are in the Great three trumpets of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] respectively. In the Choir a Clarinet. In the Swell a Trumpet, Oboe, Musette, and Vox Humana; and in the Pedale a Trombone. Owing to the great amount of "mixture" and reeds the tone of the full organ is unfavorably criticised by connoisseurs. Mr. Dudley Buck, Jr. is reported to have said that he "played this organ with more satisfaction than the one in the Boston Music Hall!" There is no [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible], and "when doctors disagree" how shall we ignorant "outsiders" form an opinion? There was also a grave oversight in this organ, in that the Choir organ does not contain a stop soft enough to accompany a solo in the Swell. The best thing new is the Stopped Diapason, and this has not much body and is not a [illegible] quality of tone. Yet the instrument has many excellencies. The Trilema [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] very successful stop. So also the Violoncello. The outside is also very imposing, about three thousand dollars having been spent on the case.

More recently Mr. Johnson has erected an organ of two Manuals in the Union Park Congregational church. This is well spoken of, but I have not heard it. It contains about thirty stops and cost about four thousand dollars. The Pedale contains three stops and the Great a 16ft. Open Diapason.

Henry Erben has recently erected an organ of smaller [illegible] in Christ Church. It is much liked for its [illegible] and [illegible] of all connoisseurs the best organ we have is one just erected in Dr. [illegible] (Centenary M. E.) church by E. & G. G. Hook who I suppose in New England are not [illegible] known to fame. This magnificent instrument is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and St. James's churches in Boston and the [illegible] one recently erected in the Westminster church at Elizabeth N. J. described in a former number of this Journal. The Centenary organ has three Manuals. The stops are distributed in this wise. Great eleven stops; Swell, eleven stops. Solo, eight stops. Pedale four. Mechanical movements, eleven, two of which are pedals opening stops of Great Organ. The number of pipes in this organ is not large the total being only about 2,300. And this is owing to the fact that the organ contains only [illegible] [illegible] of mixture and one Twelfth. Nor are the reeds numerous. There are Great, one. Swell two. Solo, two [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Pedale, one. As usual in the Hooks organs the tone is delightful. The symmetrical adjustment of the power and quality of tone in the several departments of the instrument is most admirable. The full organ is grand. I [illegible] [illegible] enough yet brilliant and clear. Every one of the solo stops [illegible] [illegible] in its way. The Melodia is well known "specialty" of the Hooks. The Clarinet approaches perfection. The sweet Dulciana in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Swell. And then [illegible] comfortable and agreeable pneumatic action! And the pneumatic [illegible] place the instrument under easy control of the player. With small exertion prepared the player can [illegible] his hands on the keys of the Great organ and control the desired degree of power without removing his hand from the keys to operate the swell pedal! Most of the organists of the city have tried this organ and all [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] its praises. And [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Above the entire front [illegible] the "[illegible]" consists of pipes richly ornamented [illegible] bright colors and gilt. In the back-ground arises [illegible] great swell box. The symmetrical arrangement of the pipes, the beautiful curves presented on the [illegible], and the happy contrast of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] beautiful. The organ stands in a recess behind the pulpit, and [illegible] feet above the main floor of the room. The [illegible] gallery [illegible] [illegible] a continuation of the gallery which surrounds the other three sides of the church. The gallery front makes a sweep upwards at the pulpit end of the [illegible], so that the whole [illegible] is [illegible].

The church itself has every [illegible] of the social element to render it a fit subject of comment in a journal like this. The auditorium is on the second floor, and will comfortably seat twelve hundred. On the first floor is the beautiful lecture audience room in which the Sabbath School is held. Here may be comfortably seated over eight hundred people. The average attendance at the Sabbath School is about seven hundred. Below this room in the basement which contains a completely furnished kitchen and a dining room, with table accommodations for one hundred and fifty at once. This is for "festivals," etc. Great is the West!

Auber at Eighty-Six.

(By [illegible] to the Evening Gazette.)

Here is a pen-and-ink sketch of Mons. Auber (who, by the way, is at work upon a new opera [illegible] to be performed next winter), which is interesting:—Mons. Auber is a singular character. Nobody will [illegible] [illegible] anything about him. Nobody may [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] thoroughly [illegible] that composer. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that happy [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has proved [illegible], although [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. He [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] society [illegible]. He [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. He still [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Parisian [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] Mons. Auber [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mousseux, [illegible] Mons. Auber has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Grand Opera, and in the Bois [illegible] Boulogne. For fifty years Mons. Auber has daily appeared to every eye [illegible] Auber replied to a young tenor who, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur," asked for a part in the composer's new opera. "[illegible] [illegible], I will send you my [illegible] from the graveyard." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Amoureux [illegible] the Emperor and his pose of high priest of Orpheus. His first flow of happiness has become all his life. He has not known winter; his head does not bend. His white hair is not powdered with snow, but with almond tree flowers. Everything is forgiven him, everything is [illegible] to him. There is no doubt the sphere in which he lives is the very condition of the existence of his talents. An old man of his age cannot be transplanted, and the atmosphere of Bohemian objects is, perhaps, the only air he can breathe. Nothing could surprise us more and make a deeper impression on us than this nature [illegible], like some tree ever [illegible] [illegible] all the year round. The last melody which has fallen from the [illegible] of this composer of 71 seems a night [illegible] song coming from a nest hidden in some [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] by the [illegible] [illegible] having [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible].

Music Abroad.

Leipzig

The new opera house said to be one of the most perfect and beautiful in Europe, after being dedicated in January with a performance of Goethe's Iphigenie, [illegible] was opened for opera early in February, Fidelio leading off. Special pains were bestowed on the performance to make it more excellent than usual, and the Leonora of Fräulein Lowe, the Florestan of Herr Gross, the Rocco of Herr Rebling are highly praised. Next followed a number of Italian operas, in which Mlle. Aglaia Orgeni, for prima donna, who was educated in the school of Viardot, and here [illegible] to be a coloratura singer of the first rank. Lucia, La Sonnambula, the Barber of Seville, Traviata, and Rossini's Otello were given all in German, the other singers being chiefly German. On the 22d Feb. Mlle. Orgeni was to close her engagement with the part of Agathe in Der Freyschütz.

The 18th Gewandhaus Concert (March 5) fell on the 125th anniversary of the foundation of these concerts, which was celebrated accordingly by a programme made up wholly from the compositions of the directors during the last 25 years, namely the Concert Overture by Julius Rietz (1848–54, and 1856–60); Aria from Elijah and Violin Concerto by Mendelssohn (1835–43 and 1845–47); "Frühlings-Fantasie" by Gade (1844–48); A major Symphony by Reinecke (since 1860); Andante and Scherzo capriccioso for violin by David (1847–8, and 1856–58); Lorelei for soprano and male chorus by Ferd. Hiller (1843–44).—Here is a summary of other concerts since our last:

17th Gewandhaus Concert: Suite No. 4 Lachner (conducted by the composer); Violin Concerto, A minor No. 1 Molique (Herr Verhulst and Laub); Aria from Don Juan, Mozart, Mme. Jenny Kuhl; Four Pieces for the Violin Laub, and songs with piano, Mme. Jenny Kuhl. — Concert of the [illegible] [illegible] Orchestral Association: [illegible] D major, [illegible]; March from Ein Wintermärchen [illegible] Mendelssohn; "Die Tageszeiten" Robert Volkmann, arranged for piano by [illegible], [illegible] of the Euterpe Association: Symphony in G major, Haydn; Violin Concerto in A minor, No. 3, [illegible] [illegible] (Herr Auer); Chorus for female voices from Blanche de Provence, Cherubini; Suites for Violin, Spohr and Auer; and overture to Leonore, No. 3, Beethoven.

Concert of Chamber Music given by Riedel's Association: [illegible] Trio for Stringed Instruments, Op. 8, No. [illegible] Beethoven; "Volks- und [illegible] Gesänge", for [illegible] voice Rubinstein; D major Trio, Op. 70 No. 1 Beethoven; Songs, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 47, Schumann.—Eighth concert of the Euterpe Association: Prelude to Lohengrin, R. Wagner; Air from Chaste Water [illegible] [illegible]; Concerto (F minor) [illegible] Chopin [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] (Fragment), Symphony in D minor [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]; Tannhäuser, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] Songs, Nordman and Schubert.—Concert of the Paulinus Vocal Association: [illegible] [illegible] No. 33 Mendelssohn; "Der Morgen" for chorus and orchestra, Rubinstein; Air from Joseph, Méhul (Herr [illegible]); Quartets, Reinthaler, Volkmann, and Schumann; Scotch Melodies arranged by Hauff; "Märchen" for solo, chorus and orchestra, H. Götz; "Das Grab im Busento" for chorus and orchestra Nessler; "Der Junge Heinrich," Reinecke; Nocturne, Chopin; Ballad, Op. 20 Reinecke; "Volkslieder," Herbeck and Silcher; and "Der Landsknecht" for male chorus and orchestra, Herbeck.

Eighteenth Gewandhaus Concert: Symphony in A major, Mendelssohn; Air with obbligato Pianoforte Accompaniment, Mozart (Mlle. Reiter from Basle, and Herr von Jasna); Concerto for Violoncello, No. 1, A minor, Goltermann (Herr Hegar); and music to Egmont, Beethoven, with connecting verses by Mosengeil, the songs sung by Mlle. Reiter.

Concert for the Orchestral Fund: Overture to Henry Bluebeard, Reinecke; Violin Concerto, Hauptmann [illegible] performed by the composer; Tarantella, Scotch [illegible]; Berceuse Etude and Polonaise, Chopin; Fantasia on Don Juan, Liszt (Herr Tausig); Solos for Violoncello (Herr Davidoff); and "Scotch Symphony," Berlioz.

Paris

The correspondent of the Orchestra (March 1/3) writes:

M. Ambroise Thomas has written an opera of "Hamlet" and I am not failing [illegible], he deserves [illegible]. His "Hamlet" is a classical composition of [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "classic [illegible]" [illegible] bones or sword of the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] of genius which [illegible] as on the whole. I admit [illegible] you that Faure was Hamlet. This so charming an artist may [illegible] at the part so well, that we were tempted to wish he had a good deal more [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] at all and we [illegible] that Angel [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mlle. Nilsson was Ophelia. [illegible] [illegible] the Queen. M. Belval [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the poor Claudius [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The orchestra was [illegible] perfect. The scenery was very pretty, especially [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the dead Lucia and [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and Gertrude [illegible] [illegible]. He is melancholy and [illegible] [illegible], "[illegible] que [illegible]," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]; which [illegible] Nilsson and Faure [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible] settled in its place, and thought it was in for a good time. Mlle. Nilsson then sang a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Colin [illegible], not [illegible] good [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] the Ghost was invoked [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] came on, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the second and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] are devoted to the heavy scene between Hamlet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—with a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the Orfeo Arlesienne. "The spirit of my [illegible]" [illegible] very [illegible]. While Mlle. Nilsson was on the stage we [illegible] all right and [illegible] [illegible]—

was a great effort. The scene of the players was [illegible]. The "play" was the thing, but it was a [illegible] [illegible]; in fact, the opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], with the scene pantomime and music. The [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], I suppose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] "To be, or not to be" [illegible] [illegible] and "Go to a nunnery" [illegible] [illegible]. Indeed I have never [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], but there is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The Queen is rather a grand [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Hamlet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]," and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Then [illegible]—a ballet in Hamlet [illegible] [illegible] a ballet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] I may say that I was grateful for the scenery and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Grand Opera of Paris in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] good days. After [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Carlotta and [illegible] [illegible] years ago, in the "Lac des Fées." Ophelia came in and sang

> [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

At [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and change my tune. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the opera had been dull—decidedly dull, and when Nilsson [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] I believe the house rather [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that Nilsson was clever and [illegible] [illegible], and charming to look upon, that she could act and could sing; but I do not think the best judge in Paris could have predicted that she could have been the Ophelia of the fourth act. "Pour moi, je suis en vrac," she murmured sadly, and then, radiant with smiles, broke out into Swedish mirth. They were dancing round her, and she paused in her grief to listen to the waltz, and then sang it joyously. A moment later she said—

> And will he not come again?
> And will he not come again?
> No, no, he is dead!

and then the [illegible], radiant face again changed to an [illegible], and Ophelia scattered flowers and smiles for the memory of her love. The [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Then she threw Hamlet off and Ophelia was left alone—alone before the lake whose depths were so soon about to surround her. Then [illegible] [illegible] a chorus [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and Ophelia [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It seems to me [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] of feeling. The [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]." [illegible] Nilsson was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and the whole house [illegible] [illegible] her grand artistic conception. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Ophelia of [illegible] Nilsson will go down to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the memory of Jenny Lind in "Roberto" and Pasta in "Sonnambula."

With the death of Ophelia [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "The Lily Maid of the Astolat," the interest in the opera ceases. There is a [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. I think "Hamlet" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Ophelia is enough to provide a second and third visit, and to induce all your friends to go too.

AMSTERDAM.—The eighth Felix Meritis concert brought us the following programme: 1. Symphony, No. 2, op. 36 (Beethoven); 2. Air from Marschner's opera Hans Heiling; 3. Concerto for [illegible] [illegible]; 4. Overture "Rosamunde" (Schubert); 5. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] (Beethoven); 6. Adagio and Rondo for Violin (Vieuxtemps); 7. [illegible] "An Mignon," poem of [illegible] [illegible], music by F. Schubert; 8. "An Mignon," poem by Goethe, music by Beethoven; 9. Overture "Die Weihe des Hauses" op. 124 (Beethoven). At [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from Wiesbaden [illegible] [illegible] Mme. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from Stockholm. This talented artist is a member of the very [illegible] family from [illegible] ([illegible]) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ([illegible] and [illegible]), and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] years ago made [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] married Herr L. Norman, born in Stockholm (1831), a pupil of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in Sweden. Herr Norman has been [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm since 1857 and royal Kapellmeister [illegible] [illegible] 1861. As [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a first-rate artist. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] one would easily find so remarkable and talented a violinist of the fair sex, [illegible], perhaps [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at large. Mme. Norman [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] feeling of [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Adagio and Rondo by Vieuxtemps. She was each time frantically cheered and thrice recalled at the end.—Grb.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—At the fourth Subscription Concert, Herr Joachim played with great success a Violin Concerto by Max Bruch in addition to [illegible] by Beethoven. Among the other pieces performed were Symphony in B major, [illegible]; Gesang der Geister über den Wassern, Ferdinand Hiller; and Overture to Olympia, Spontini.

FLORENCE.—The programme of the [illegible] Subscription Concert contained scenes from Herr R. Wagner's Fliegende Holländer and Schumann's Genoveva.

HANOVER.—Shakespeare's Tempest with Herr Taubert's music has been very favorably received.

Konzertmeister.—On the 21st March, 1868, Herr Born, who has been Court Concertmeister in Berlin since 1819, [illegible] his public career by conducting Le Mozart [illegible], his native town. This year, therefore, he will have fulfilled the duties of a [illegible] forty years. Next to Herr Krebs, of Dresden, he has wielded the baton longer than any German musician living, the oldest of all, Herr Lachner, of Munich, having been lately pensioned. During this long period, Herr Born has officiated in Königsberg, Danzig, Leipzic, Hamburgh, Riga, Cologne and Berlin.

Music in Boston.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club. On Tuesday evening, March 31, with the fourth concert, the nocturnal season came to an end. The Chickering Hall was crowded, and the programme of peculiar interest, the three great masters of classical chamber music only being represented; Beethoven having very properly the lion's share.

Sonata for Piano and Violin, in A, op. 47. . . . Beethoven.
Allegro. Scherzo. Adagio and Finale, Allegro Vivace.
Messrs. Perabo and Schultze.
Quartet in B flat, No. 69 . . . . . Haydn.
Allegro. Adagio. Minuetto, and Finale Allegro.
Sonata for Piano . . . . . Mozart.
1. Allegro maestoso. 2. Andante cantabile. 3. Finale Presto.
Ernst Perabo.
Seventh Quartet in F, op. 59 . . . . . Beethoven.
Allegro. Allegretto Scherzando. Adagio molto e mesto to Russian Allegro. Thème Russe.

Neither of Beethoven's two predecessors were greedy, though they were characteristically represented. The Haydn Quartet, smoothly, charmingly [illegible] his serene, cheerful, child-like spirit, complete and elegant in form and style, was very beautiful, but perhaps a little tame after the marked individuality and happy inspiration of that Beethoven Sonata. In the execution it was good, clear even quartet playing as we have heard for a long while.—It was good to hear for once one of Mozart's piano Sonatas, and Perabo had selected one of the best, one of the strongest, the most full of matter (Inhalt) and of power, with all that spontaneity and grace with which his genial creations always charm. It was the one in A minor, No. 1 in [illegible] edition. He played the first Allegro with great fire and measured force, bringing out the contrasts of fortissimo and piano [illegible] those bold organ-point passages, where the repeat where the angry figure forces its way along through chords or [illegible] of the cloth, with a striking effect. The Andante and the Presto movements are also of marked character, especially the last, and were made to tell with great point and beauty in the rendering—though perhaps at times with some excess of force.

The two Beethoven works are noble ones. We have here only had occasion to speak of that singularly happy Sonata in A, for piano and 'cello, which has no slow movement except the brief introduction to the Finale. It was admirably played again by Fries and Perabo, and caused great delight.—The Quartet in F is the well known No. 1 of the three dedicated to Prince Rasoumoffsky. What a stride had the gigantic genius made from the six quartets of op. 18 to these! Though doubtless happier in the rendering this time, it recalled the impression which it made upon us some fifteen years ago when the Club first introduced it. Now as then we may [illegible] [illegible]

It is hard to believe that the opus number, 59, can mark the true date of this composition. Its strange individuality of thought and manner, its remoteness from all common forms, its utter newness of invention and of exploration as it were in wondrous, untried spheres, is second, in advance of the symphonies of the same date, indeed of all the symphonies except the ninth. These are all clearer and more readily appreciable to the common ear than are these quartets of his middle period. Does it not show, that in quartet writing the composer invites you to communion with his most interior esoteric life—that in this form of Art he sets down the most advanced posts in his spiritual and artistic progress? The ideas are novel, bold, unique, pregnant; and the rhythmical forms unfolded into the most intricate and subtle, yet symmetrical and expressive [illegible] of divisions.

Mr. Otto Dresel's first "Reading" of pianoforte music on Thursday afternoon of last week, though it came on Fast Day, and a bleak, blustering were like [illegible] with the first April shower (following preview of "a loveable soldier"?) drew together a large and highly appreciative company at Chickering's. There is no need of assuring those who had not the good fortune to be present, that it was a feast of exquisite music exquisitely interpreted. These were the choice selections, all from the more modern romantic school of tone-poets.

Caprice	Ferd. Hiller.
Adagio	Rob. Volkmann.
Fantasia	Chopin.
Rondo	Chopin.
Three Mazourkas	Chopin.
Two Fantasiestücke	Ernst Franz.
Lied ohne Worte	[illegible]
Slumber Song	Rob. Schumann.
Introduction and Rondo	Chopin.

Ferdinand Hiller has written many good things,—even so good as to make one wonder that such a mass of works in all forms from his prolific pen, all respectable musician-like, vastly superior to the common run, bear really no more enduring mark. Take him all in all, he is perhaps the first musician living now in Germany, though Robert Franz shows in the last ambitious sphere to which he confines himself more of original creative power, besides having so deeply "lived himself into" the polyphonic art of Bach. This Caprice full of fire, fresh fancy and felicitous expression, shows what Hiller can do, and made a very interesting introduction to the other readings. Of the larger Chopin pieces, the Fantasia (in F minor, op. 49) and the bright Rondo (in E flat op. 16) with stately Introduction in C minor like a Concerto, the former is the less familiar and a work of more power and beauty, rich in surprise and contrast. Schumann appeared once in the bolder, more fantastic, and once in the gentler sentimental phase; and both were of the finest inspiration. The two "fancy pieces" of Franz, the pupil of Franz, whose few published piano pieces have given such decided promise, but who seems to have so sadly withdrawn of late years from a field for which he has shown so clear a calling, still assert their marked originality. Mr Dresel's own little Intermezzo and "Slumber Song" which he added at the end, were plainly very welcome and wore well.

Of this week's "Reading" we must speak next time. Three more light up the musical prospect and will come along on the remaining Thursdays of the month.

"The Son & Stranger."—The charming little parlor Operetta with which the young Mendelssohn of twenty (1829), on his return home from travels abroad surprised his parents on the anniversary of their "silver wedding," was performed the first time in this country, last Wednesday night, at the annual benefit concert of Mr. Ashton P. [illegible], the efficient superintendent of the Music Hall. "Heimkehr aus der Fremde" (Return from Abroad), is the real title, changed as above in England. It was done all in the family, with aid of friends and neighbors, and afterwards kept in sacred privacy, until three or four years after the composer's death, when it was publicly performed in Leipzig. The hero of the little plot, the young soldier, returned to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] himself. The libretto, originally written by his friend Klingemann, who lived for years since in England (and it is Englische?) being by the side of the sweet old gentleman, in Exeter Hall, according to Mme. Goldschmidt in English, has since been rearranged and translated, partly by Mr. Chorley for the London edition. The argument is simply this:

In a village of Swabia, one day, Ursula the mayor's wife, is sitting in front of her house spinning and mildly thinking of her absent son Hermann, who had left home some years previous, and from whom they had for somewhat heard nothing, although the mayor had patiently spent out all the news in the papers all of this in those stirring days, and [illegible] a [illegible] around in the village, that the face of matters might have seemed changed in the world since [illegible] printing. Lisbeth ward to the burgomaster comes and enters to cheer up the good Ursula who is constantly at the dual idea of things. She succeeds partially and then proceeds to make preparation for the morrow's jubilee which is to be the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the mayor's [illegible] of her guardian. Kauz a pedlar now enters, [illegible] purporting that some kind of merry-making is in [illegible] question Lisbeth, and is now to receive a rich pedlar and who he pleases [illegible] he may recall a [illegible] the coming festival. He is overwhelmed by Hermann, the long lost son who has arrived in disguise as a musician and who, after a while makes himself known to his much to the discomfiture of the [illegible] pedlar.

Soon after the pompous but good-hearted mayor enters, and is somewhat puzzled by the appearance of Lisbeth who finds it difficult to give him an [illegible] explanation. Kauz enters and the mayor mistakes him for an expected military officer. Kauz gives an account of the tender meeting of Hermann with the young lady representing Hermann to be a vagabond and villain. The mayor won't believe anything against Lisbeth but Martin the night watch [illegible] of the village ordering him to be watched as [illegible] a vagabond.

Next follows a comical serenade scene, in which Hermann as serenader is interrupted by Kauz in the Ständchen and now, who makes uneasily to be that he has been to hoax the pretty guitar-man! Hermann revenges himself by borrowing the cloak and lantern of the Spey Martin and terrifying Kauz almost he frightens well.

The morning dawns, and the pretty Lisbeth is seen adorning the house-front with flowers: after which she disappears, to a bracer again with a procession of villagers, who come to congratulate the mayor on the arrival of [illegible] his anniversary. Kauz, having [illegible] a shabby military coat, now tries to pass himself off as the son of the mayor but is speedily [illegible] by the advance of the real Hermann who [illegible] a real military officer [illegible] to take him as a servant. He is only too glad, to renounce his true role of pedlar.

The spoken dialogue, which forms the larger part, is very natural and clever and with the music it would make a regular thing for private theatricals. On this occasion it was omitted and the entire music given with a good orchestra of thirty, under the conductorship of Mr. B. J. Lang. The charming Overture, where the best thing is it so fresh and genial and in the vein of the opening of the Italian Symphony, was already familiar here. The characteristic overture is [illegible] by the sweet and Romance of Ursula, uttering her absent son a touching cantabile mezzo song with good style and feeling by Miss Addie Ryan. Then a duet of the [illegible] sung by the bright soprano of Lisbeth (Mrs. H. W. Smith) seeking to win her thoughts to the gay festival preparing. Then Lisbeth, left alone, yields to her own sad mood, and sings of the absent lover. All this is natural and pleasing music, though it becomes a little monotonous and tame.

Then begins the comic part of the scene, which is the best: the Podfar's [illegible] song: "I am a rover bold and gay," which was dashed off with capital spirit as sung by Mr. [illegible] accompanied with every bright and [illegible] orchestral accompaniment. Hermann's song about the [illegible] both sweet and tender, but a little too long, was beautifully sung by Mr. JAMES WHITNEY, in a best style and voice (tenor) which is pure and believe, and told with more power than usual. The Tenor who [illegible] has devoted himself to Lisbeth, to which the Podfar [illegible] him from his [illegible] charmingly humorous. Still more so the Trio between the old couple and the Podfar, with his [illegible] tale against the lovers,—and at the [illegible] that the old Mayor's part ... a version wholly in one note of which ... Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, with his round bass, acquitted himself honorably though at the end he had to drop it ... for a shadow of variety!

The best of the whole, however, is the Serenade scene, Hermann's mysterious scene: "'Tis now the hour when spirits stray," with the interruption of the ... [illegible] ... The work ends with a couple of nice choruses, which were sung as quartets, and sounded very much like some of Mendelssohn's part-songs. The whole thing was a success and we hope we may hear it again and with the ... elegance and action.

For the last part of his concert Mr. Peck had brought together a rare ... But the length ... by the [illegible] ... there is a long string of songs promised, was shortened on the other hand by the omission of the longest and by far the most important piece, the Violin Concerto of Mendelssohn. To the sincere regret of all, Mr. CAMILLA URSO was disabled by an accident to one of her hands ... "faced the music" bravely though, in one sense, by frankly coming on the stage and pleading her own excuse in the most simple and convincing way. An orchestral piece would have done well in its place, and made the whole fat shorter by breaking so such a succession of vocal solos. The only orchestral piece was the delightful Preciosa Overture of Weber, which it was a treat to hear again.

Madame PAREPA ROSA was in remarkably good voice, as ever ... and sang Mozart's "Warning" full of brilliant ... and a ... which took ... the audience ... and ... in her ... and most triumphant manner. His large tones, even the deepest, told with great power and musically in the air "Il lacerato spirito" from [illegible] Marino Faliero.

The Music Hall was crowded, and Mr. Peck must be congratulated upon such response to his announcement.

MISS CUSHMAN'S GIFT TO THE MUSIC HALL.—Half the interest we had intended for this paper is unexpectedly crowded out, but we hasten to advise our readers to go to Child's Art Gallery and see the busts of BEETHOVEN, MOZART and HAYDN, the noble heads, with their expressive ... supports, by the Danish sculptor ... They were ... of their high honors and beauty is already expressed in the article which we transferred last week from the Atlantic Monthly. They can be seen and studied now, so well are they arranged, to far better advantage than will be possible when they are placed at a great height on the ... of the Music Hall. Every time we take a look at them we are confirmed in our conviction that in ... beauty and in ... subject they are unrivalled by any designs of modern plastic art yet seen in the city.

Good Things Coming.

I. THE CONCERT FOR THE CRETANS, to be given by the Harvard Musical Association on Monday Afternoon, April 20, at three o'clock—and half-past as before announced—must prove as interesting to all good music-lovers as any of the nine "Symphony Concerts" which they have followed up so eagerly. The orchestra is to be full force, of course with Mr. ZERRAHN as Conductor and the programme of the usual character yet appropriate to the occasion: Part I: Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," by Gluck, which has a Greek suggestion; Seventh Symphony in A, by Beethoven. Part II: Chopin's Piano Concerto in E minor, which Mr. HUGO LEONHARD, who gave such delight with it in the seventh Symphony Concert, has kindly consented to play again; and, for a patriotic mounting popular ... Rossini's splendid Overture to "William Tell,"—the first time for ... years ... Death ... does not suffice, what heart with any human feeling can resist the burning appeal of the Christians in behalf of the Ladies' Fair to which this concert will be tributary?

The Christian patriots of Crete,—struggling ... fearful odds ... their Turkish oppressors, who have devastated their ... burned down their villages, desecrated their churches, ... outraged every sentiment and right which civilized warriors hold sacred—who have ... the standard of the Cross ... with ... in this ... long ... of the ... of ... Europe—after defying ... every army and ... them ... still determined to ... or die in the cause of their religious and national independence.

They ask no aid for themselves—not ... money nor munitions of war, but they do appeal to us, to the recognized champions of civil liberty, for which they ... to succor their ... the ... their ... mothers of their families. They starve ... to ... and ... in ... [illegible] ... and ... all ... Christendom ... America ... has done more for ... than any other Christian land, already, so ... and ... the ... Greek ... a duty ... and ... a ... true and ... friend of such ... in this their hour of need.

But we need to do more. Those ... starving ... from day to day, and Greece is ... to feed them ... The ... from European nations ... utterly inadequate ... Indeed ... are altogether too small to materially affect the vast amount of destitution to be relieved.

Shall we continue to give the Cretans our sympathy, our prayers, and our help? Our sympathy has sustained the faltering hearts of women and ... the strong arms of the fighting men, and our help has kept thousands of mothers and children from cold and nakedness by garments made by the hands of American women.

The Ladies of several cities and towns will hold a Fair in Boston on Easter week for the benefit of the Cretans.

Let contributions pour in for this beneficent cause—the cause of Liberty against Despotism, of nationality against foreign subjugation, of civilization against barbarism—of the Cross against the Crescent!

II. The TRIENNIAL FESTIVAL of the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY beginning on Tuesday, May 5, and closing on the following Sunday evening, bids fair to surpass the glory of the preceding festivals. The guaranty fund was rapidly filled up, and now exceeds the required sum of $20,000. The chorus will number more than 600 singers, most select and best drilled ... and the grand orchestra, reinforced by the best strength of the New York ... Society, will exceed one hundred in numbers. The solo singing will be by the very best talent available including of course Mme. PAREPA ROSA, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, in all probability the great German baritone, ... STOCKHAUSEN, to whom an invitation has been sent and other distinguished artists, besides those ... who have repeatedly done such good ... service in our Oratorios. For the opening on Tuesday morning will be given Mendelssohn's ... (Lobgesang) and "Hymn of Praise," preceded by Nicolai's Overture and Choral "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The ... selected for the following evenings are the Messiah, "Creation," "Samson" and "St. Paul."

There will be four Afternoon Concerts of instrumental and vocal music, with noble programmes. Each will include a Symphony, among which are named the great one in C by Schubert, ... favorite in G by Haydn, and finally the sublime "Choral Symphony" of Beethoven, which with such an orchestra and chorus ... Mme. ROSA in the trying soprano solo, bids fair to prove even more impressive than it did at the ... Symphony Concerts last year. CARL ROSA is engaged to play a Violin Concerto, and for one, at least of the concerts the services of Fräulein ALIDE TOPP, the young lady pianist who has created such a sensation in New York, and who came to this country with the ... endorsement of her teacher Von Bülow and of Liszt, have been secured. She will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor and the Concerto in E flat (never before heard here) by Liszt. Von Bülow, in a letter to the Steinways, writes: "Miss Alide Topp comes ... to the ... of ... where I am proud to call my pupil, though not yet world renowned, will soon become so ... debut in every place where she has thus far appeared has ... produced great sensation. Excellent female pianists as we have in the musical world (Schumann, Clauss, Mehlig, ...), Miss Topp beats them all. The ... which ... makes us regard her as a male, rather than a female, pianist. The delicate, ... is ... such ... to enter the lists with a ... as Tausig. ... ... you will ... as soon as you have heard and admired the lady herself."—This may be partial praise, ... it comes from very high authority ... though it is like bringing coals to Newcastle to bring another fine pianist to Boston, there will be great interest to hear this lady and she will no doubt be warmly welcomed.

Among the Overtures for the Festival concerts we hear named Beethoven's Leonora, No. 3; Mendelssohn's "Becalmed at Sea," &c. Wagner's Tannhäuser (not so Improbable), &c., &c.

Mr F. L. Ritter continues the good work among his pupils. Here is the programme of the second Soirée given under his direction, by the teachers of Vassar College: Overture to Egmont (8 hands); Polonaise, [illegible], Chopin; Aria from Freyschütz; [illegible] and [illegible], C minor, Mozart; Septet (8 hands), Beethoven; Andante and Variations for two pianos, Schumann; Song without Words, Mendelssohn; "Wanderersnacht," F. Hiller; Songs, "[illegible]," Schubert, and "Ich wandre nicht," Schumann; Capriccio, E minor, Mendelssohn; Organ Toccata, [illegible] minor, Bach.

At another, also under Mr Ritter's direction, given at Miss [illegible]'s Young Ladies' School (New York) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Cantata [illegible] was given entire, with the original string quartet accompaniment. The "Ladies' Vocal Society" connected with the school furnished the vocal part, and Messrs. Matzka, [illegible] Schumann and Bergner the instrumental. The Cantata was preceded by Beethoven's E flat Trio, op. 1, and followed by Liszt's Eroica Ferenczi, played by Mr Mills.

WORCESTER, MASS.—At this late day I forward you the programme of a musical entertainment recently given here (invited guests) of so rare and unusual a character not only for this, but for a more pretentious locality, that I think some notice of the [illegible] should appear in your columns. The members of the [illegible] of the Conservatory [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their music, vocal and instrumental performers, prominent among whom are the [illegible] named upon the enclosed programme, who are always listened to with delight.

NEW YORK, APRIL 1.—On Wednesday evening a miscellaneous concert was given at Steinway Hall. The only interesting features were the [illegible] of S. B. Mills and Camilla Urso. Mr M. [illegible] in his usual [illegible] style, but his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Miss Urso was superb; the clearness, purity and unerring accuracy of her tone are beyond praise, and her bowing is delightfully easy and smooth. She was [illegible] encored, and gave as a fine rendering of Ernst's Elegie. The accompaniments were "done" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the copious [illegible] of "Cavaliere Paolo Giorza."

There were three Hall concerts last week. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] performance of such pieces as the Carnival of Venice and Witches' Dance is accounted [illegible] [illegible] the popular mind, on the other hand his [illegible] [illegible], the wonderful three and four-part playing—is appreciated only by the few. We [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] condemned to play—[illegible] [illegible] Saturday evening—as I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the "[illegible] [illegible]" and we would suggest to Sig. Ferranti the propriety of leaving the [illegible] [illegible]. Oh! in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] day!

On Saturday evening occurred the 5th of the Chamber Music Soirées with this programme:

Octet in [illegible] op. [illegible]	Spohr
[illegible] Solo "[illegible]"	Schumann.
"[illegible]"
Quartet, B flat, op. 130.	Beethoven.

The Spohr Octet attracted a larger audience than is usually present at these soirées; a fine work, carefully instrumented and well elaborated. The Menuetto is very nice; the 3d movement—an adaptation of the "Harmonious Blacksmith"—has a very pleasing effect; the Finale, an airy, sprightly Allegretto in E major, sets out with a melody which at first appears trivial, but suddenly surprises one by the fine changes of key and the artistic working up of the theme. Altogether, the Octet was very enjoyable.

Mr. Mason played the Schumann piece in his habitually careful, accurate, and, I grieve to say, phlegmatic manner; firmness and precision were there, but delicacy and feeling were somewhat lacking.

The Beethoven Quartet, [illegible] [illegible] a large, broad work, is an admirable example of what has been termed the author's "third period." The 5th movement, "Cavatina: Adagio molto espressivo," is more clear and less involved than are most of the other movements (there are six in all) and is therefore better calculated to please upon a first hearing.

At the [illegible] Sunday Evening concert (Steinway Hall) there were the following pieces:—

[illegible] from [illegible] Symphony	[illegible]
Violin Solo, Adagio and Rondo (3d Concerto)	[illegible]
[illegible]
Fuge for [illegible]	Jerome Hopkins

The Fuge by Hopkins is really a composition of merit, in which there is some [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]) and much that is suggestive of Schumann and Wagner. It was admirably played by the composer. In the [illegible] of 2d Mr Liszt [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the general brilliancy of his execution and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of his [illegible] passages. He [illegible] [illegible], however, rather [illegible]. [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Mr Dehlmeyer and his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the audience after the usual fashion. S.

APRIL 6.—On Thursday evening April 2nd, Mr Fr. Bergner gave his 4th Annual Concert in Irving Hall. He was assisted by Messrs S. B. Mills, Theo. Thomas, Mosenthal, G. Matzka, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] F. Letsch and Miss Marie Brainerd. The interesting feature of the programme were two movements from one of Mendelssohn's early quartets [Op. 12 [illegible] 1829] and the Andante with variations from the Beethoven quartet op. [illegible], No. 5.

Mr Bergner in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] displayed the same [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible], together with the fine pure tone, which have always been the most noteworthy characteristics of his artistic excellence. The best effect was his performance [illegible] encore) of Gounod's Meditation upon Bach's Prelude in C. [illegible] [illegible] Mr Mills gave as the [illegible] Liszt Fantasia upon Lucrezia Borgia and a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. The audience numbered some five hundred.

On Saturday evening the [illegible] [illegible] last Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert was given before a very large audience. The orchestra pieces were the following:

Symphony No 1 [illegible] "[illegible]"	[illegible]
[illegible] from [illegible] [illegible]	[illegible]
Overture, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner

Mr Arbuckle gave two solos upon the cornet [illegible] [illegible] in a very neat, clean, and acceptable style. He was honored with hearty encores. Mme Parepa-Rosa sang the "Ah perfido" (Beethoven) and Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim." The latter was a great success, a repetition was demanded and graciously accorded by the [illegible] cantatrice. Miss Toedt, who had not appeared in public for some time, played a [illegible] composition by Prume, in very good style. Her bowing is not very strong and her tone is less sympathetic than might be wished; yet she is young, there is [illegible] time, and there are many violinists of greater age who would give much to play as well as she.

We trust that the season has been sufficiently prosperous to warrant the directors in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] season of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. I had almost forgotten to say—and I hasten to make good the omission [illegible] [illegible] accuracy seems to be essential—that the orchestra numbered nearly fifty-five. P.

Beethoven's Sonata in A Flat, Op. 26

BY [illegible]

Among the thirty-two sonatas of Beethoven there is hardly one more universally loved than opus 26, in A flat major. The noble, pensive character of the work so well expressed, justly set the stamp on the [illegible]. A vein of sadness, of lazy longing runs through it, touching even the more lively movements, produced partly by the solemn key of A flat, partly the low position in which the melodies frequently move, but most especially by something that evades description, as proceeding directly from the genius of the tone-poet. Who has a soul at the close of a fine day in September gazing on the setting sun, as the last rays illumine hill and valley, and not experienced that nameless longing which [illegible] the bosom heave, and moves us to wish for wings that we might fly on and on to those golden fields, where the sun is just going, where all is so much more beautiful, so much better, purer, and where everything once so dear to us, but now lost, is to be found again? Involuntarily we think of those words from Schubert's "Wanderer":

"Wo bist du, mein geliebtes Land,
Gesucht, geahnt und nie gekannt!"

Yes, where art thou, my beloved land, looked for, dreamed of, and yet never known? The land so green with hope, where my roses are blooming, my friends are walking,—oh, land, where art thou?

"This sonata," says an eminent critic, "is a model in the treatment of the movement, thoughtful, many-sided and truly poetic." Let us glance at each of the four movements in succession. The opening one is an Andante con variazioni instead of the usual Allegro. In the beginning of the present century and later, a [illegible] of variations stood in high favor with the musical public, so much so that third-rate composers found it a profitable business to devote themselves almost entirely to the manufacture of variations, which were devoured by the dilettanti as fast as they were turned out. The consequence was that the form itself fell into disgrace; but majestic Beethoven has cultivated this field most zealously and clearly shown what can be made of it: not only as part of his larger works, but as independent piano pieces complete in themselves. For most of the latter he took the themes from operas, or selected national airs and other melodies that were popular at his time. The theme which supplies the material for the first movement of our sonata, however, is an original one, and belongs to the finest and most characteristic periods that have flowed from his pen. It is not more distinguished for beautiful melody than for beautiful harmony and modulation, all closely interwoven, forming one inseparable whole. To the most sonorous octave of the instrument the composer has assigned the task of singing this exquisite melody. The same tone, expressive of deep longing, that pervades the Andante as had more fully developed in the variations. The former a garden, the latter the full-blown flowers; or, if you will, call the theme a tree and the variations the blossoms.

As with a flower each leaf forms a little whole by itself so here. In the first variation every measure forms one; only occasionally do we find them grown in clusters of two or four. More technically speaking, the motive in this variation consists of a short melodic phrase of one measure's length, originating in the depth, and responded to now on the height, again in the depth in short all around,—always with the same pleading expression, a seeking for something that can never be found.

In the second variation the longing element assumes a character more restless, even to impetuosity, everything is astir. It is the imprisoned spirit struggling for liberty. The bass promotes the theme in a most energetic manner, the treble bravely supporting it.

Number three, in A flat minor, offers a striking contrast to the energy developed in the preceding variation. A cloud is hanging over it. In a weary melancholy mood the melody rises gradually but indolently and hesitatingly from the deep E flat upward in syncopated notes, continually pushed onward by the decided step of its grave companion, the bass.

In number four we have the silent flying to the cloud before. It is not well to dwell long in dark moods, so the spirit of Minor is broken. Major restored: there is room for innocent sport, so far as the pensive nature of the parent tree permits.

Number five forms the true crown to this lovely series. In dress and outfit it appears quite brilliant, and accommodates itself admirably to the nature of the instrument. In spirit and expression it is full of hope and serenity, even the theme which was at first a mournful shape seems to smile positively through the sparkling accompaniment above and below it. The glow as it reaches this variation however, begins to pale at the ends. How sympathetically in the last eight measures the bass answers to the short melodic motive in the treble, until it gently returns, as if to say: now all is ended.

The Scherzo—Allegro molto—as far as it concerns its style, charge and character of the form agrees well with the general mood of the sonata. In many sonatas, symphonies and the like, it seems to be appointed to play the roll of the king's fool, whose office it is to make sport of the tears that may have been produced by the Adagio generally preceding it. Its place, therefore, as one of the leading movements has frequently been questioned; and it cannot be denied that greater unity is attainable in sonatas where the scherzo is not admitted. But who could wish that Beethoven had acted on this theory? Some of his scherzos belong to the most wonderful creations from his great genius. We would not even miss the one, small as it is. It sparkles with life and humor, with occasional outbreaks of a melancholy temper, while in the Trio it appears sedate, earnest, even solemn. Interesting is the second part (of the Scherzo). The treble three times and with much violence attempts a rush upward through empty air, however, but the bad has the attempt fails, so that twice a final start is taken but with no better result. It returns only to the middle and there resides, moving indifferently about, apparently at a loss what to do next. The bass takes advantage of this indecision and suddenly seizes the principal subject (at the end of the 28th measure) compelling the treble to run along with it as best it can, or as we would say in technical parlance, to form the counterpoint. The roles are thus changed: the treble assuming its respectory role, leaving the bass triumphantly and with a firm hand until the close.

We come next to the Marcia funebre sulla morte d'un eroe (Funeral march on the death of a hero). Perhaps no single movement of any of Beethoven's sonatas has become so famous among the more cultivated portion of the musical world as the funeral march. It has been arranged for orchestra and published as such; it has been arranged for reed bands, for brass bands and all sorts of bands. The march, it is said, was composed by Beethoven to show that by his profession genius he could outreval a certain funeral march from the opera Achilles, by the Italian composer Paer, at that time a great favorite with the public. In other words, if a marcia funebre was designed to kill or cause the death of another marcia funebre. We may say then, we have here a funeral march on the death of a funeral march, since events have proved that Beethoven completely succeeded in the undertaking. The authority for the above statement is probably Anton Schindler, the biographer, or "ami de Beethoven," as he used to call himself on his card. Let it be so. We find the march as a part of our sonata and care not how it has come there.

The march, as the composer has indicated, is destined to solemnize the funeral of a hero. Here the mourners are not men and women who follow the corpse with weeping and lamentations, but bearded warriors with swords, muskets and drums; men of steel and iron to whom a severity is law; men not used to display their emotions or ponder much on a happiness beyond the grave. There is, accordingly, in this composition a total absence of anything that passes under the name of a sweet, pleasing melody. Even the Trio (in A flat major) which commonly is made the occasion for those soothing melodies intended or rather pretended to convey comfort and consolation to the bereaved mourners, Beethoven's march resounds with the roll of drums, with the blasts of trumpets and salvos and with the manifold echo of the volleys fired over the grave of the hero. All is stern, solemn, even to coldness. Only once or twice do we meet with an expression of grief—but what a grief!—beginning faintly and asserting itself with more vehemence from measure to measure (11th measure from the commencement, etc.), while beneath it are heard the quiet, solemn steps of the procession. But soon the stern voice of command stops this indulgence; soldiers must not be affected with such weakness, and—forward!—with muffled drum the procession moves on. Once more we find a very mournful phrase in the closing portion of the march (beginning in the 6th measure from the end). A world of grief and tears is reflected from these notes; but all will finally be dissolved into joy ; so we are promised,—and so the last chord in its change from the gloomy Minor to the serene Major with the longing fifth above, clearly indicates.

The Finale (Allegro) contrasts strongly with the serious, solemn part of the funeral march. It rushes along, as if on wings, over passing in its rapid flight. If the preceding movement suggests death, this Allegro surely proclaims life. After all it forms the proper finale to the sonata. In its dimensions, lucidity and concentration it harmonizes excellently with the first movements, nor is it wanting in those motives [illegible] that mark the variations. It is a pleasure to observe how spontaneously the whole unfolds itself, how naturally one thing follows another. At the same time it offers a most grateful task to the executant,—a piece that any pianist must delight to perform so well do the motives, phrases and passages agree with the formation of the instrument. The germs of the whole of this movement may be reduced to three. First the four sixteenth notes (semi-quavers) at the commencement. This motive follows a downward course, all alone, until met by the bass. Here in the upper part, another motive is introduced, a short, melodic phrase beginning with D-flat and [illegible] like a [illegible] downward, thereby impelling the former to a course upward. Each of these two motives in its turn serves both as treble and as bass, supporting and accompaniment, so we may say bass and treble continually change parts. As a third motive may be mentioned the chord in the [illegible] measure performed successively by bass and treble anchoring the passage (solo) of the former into E-flat, two measures later into B-flat, the bass striking on the accentuated part of the measure. From this chord, subsequently thrown out, as it were, arises the following [illegible] motive, sparkling [illegible] melody moving irresolutely up and down, appearing first in the treble then in the bass [illegible] for the whole time of its duration in that loose transparent, a [illegible] [illegible] called the chord of the seventh, and when finally firm ground is reached on [illegible] [illegible] a resolution takes place, three brilliant runs down the scale, beginning every time a third higher, finish the pleasant sport in a becoming manner. After this episode in C-minor, all that happens again, but in A-flat instead of E-flat, and in connection with the principal part of the movement, as observed at the commencement. A beautiful organ point on pedal bass, constitutes the closing part or coda of the work. The tone that [illegible] through the whole sonata once more finds proper expression here. Twice we meet with a sharp dissonance (at the close of the 15th and 11th measures from the end) like the bitter recollection of hopes deferred long ago [illegible] while the rising figure with undiminished speed [illegible] its way steadily [illegible] [illegible] lower and lower, softer and softer until it has reached that place where all tones [illegible] with a kind of [illegible] in their natural course they all [illegible] the deepest depth, where it expires.

The Voice in Singing.

BY J. S. DWIGHT.

(From the North American Review.)

The Voice in Singing. Translated from the German of EMMA SEILER, by a Member of the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868. 16mo. pp. 186.

This little book is worthy of the most thorough criticism, which is already saying much for it. It is an attempt to bring into harmony things which have always been treated separately,—the science and the art of singing. [illegible] attempt begun in the right spirit [illegible], and prosecuted in the [illegible] love of beauty and of truth and carried through in quiet earnestness. And here is the simple story of results in which much that is new is reported without opinions, and more [illegible] is shown than the new knowledge may [illegible] be measured [illegible] It was [illegible] for [illegible]. It is not a manual of singing and does not profess to teach the art. It is a summary rather, of results of scientific observation [illegible] and [illegible] practical sense, abounding for the reader in pregnant hints of what has been lost in the [illegible] noble art of song and how it may be won back and what good singing is. Beyond that, too, it [illegible] another charm [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with such simple words that all may learn, so to [illegible] [illegible] It is a beauty as [illegible] as a literary production. The unpretending [illegible] book [illegible] in [illegible] way a work of art, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to find a [illegible] in the accomplished "Member of the American Philosophical Society" who has done so excellent a service in introducing it to the American reader.

Madame Seiler is a German lady who is a musical character as such, as we have seen in her [illegible]. After studying with the best masters, German and Italian, and singing with favor in concerts, she thought herself qualified to teach; but, more conscientious than most teachers, she was seeking to ground [illegible] the special natural individual voices in the [illegible]. Seeking light in schools, she found contradiction and confusion; [illegible] [illegible] each had a system of his own, with plenty of lack of reasons and two such teams alike; [illegible] the [illegible] about registers, &c., all was but bewildering [illegible] as a very one who goes from method to method, from master to master, seeking to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to lose. Losing her voice [illegible] (under an eminent teacher) she turned her attention to the piano, but without ceasing to pursue the knowledge of the human voice, as the sequel showed by choosing for her [illegible] with Wieck of Dresden, Clara Schumann's father, who is at the same time one of the most [illegible] masters of the day. There, too, she learned what she could by hearing Jenny Lind, in whom almost alone the great tradition lived. In Italy the land of song, and in the schools of France, she also turned only to find, [illegible] [illegible] knowledge." Finally the scientific instinct of a new way, and she sought the counsel of Professor Helmholtz, at Heidelberg, the great explorer of the natural laws of musical sound, from whom Tyndall has so much which he has popularized in his delightful "Lectures upon Sound." Under his guidance she devoted herself to a long and patient observation, by means of the laryngoscope, of the physiological processes that go on in the larynx in the production of musical tones. "My special thanks are due to him," she says, "that now with a more thorough knowledge of the human voice, I can give the teacher [illegible] without the fear of doing any injury." In 1861 she published in Germany a part of her investigations, now incorporated with other matter in the work before us. Coming to this country with the fullest indorsement by Helmholtz, who speaks of having been assisted by her in his two "essays upon the formation of the vowel tones and the registers of the female voice," she has taken up her abode in Philadelphia, where she has won the esteem of the most able and persons, and where her labors as a teacher of singing are already said to be bearing fruits worthy of her zeal in seeking a scientific basis on which to restore the natural method.

Opening with the common complaint, too well founded, that fine singers are becoming more and more rare, the book is full of regretful allusions to "that rich summer time of song, not yet lying very far behind us, in the last half of the last century," when we read of such a multitude of noble voices, so full and sweet in tone, so wonderfully preserved, when measured by the short career of singers now-a-days. Catalani, Malibran, Rubini, Mara, were among the last of them. The first chapter [illegible] tracing the [illegible] decay [illegible] and decline of vocal music as a science [illegible] interesting manner, and showing how [illegible] study of expression in the dramatic [illegible] [illegible] the true culture of his art, [illegible] brought [illegible] the neglect of [illegible], of the [illegible] of the vocal instrument until it began to be thought only necessary to be musical, or at the most a singer, to be qualified for a teacher of singing. And so the tradition of true song was lost. True as the old Italian school was, it was not empirical; it had found Nature's way by instinct, increasing up lessons of experience. It "builded better than it knew." Its pupils "learned by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] can learn their mother tongue." The tradition once lost cannot by empiricism be restored; only by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] verification of principles. Most men have [illegible] adulterated [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the vocal art [illegible] feeling is no longer [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] the true without the help of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]." It will not do to trust to Italian teachers just because they are Italian, and because (as Jenny Lind once said to us) the one only school of song is the Italian; but that even in Italy [illegible] [illegible] days, exists no longer. Italian-born Italian opera-singers, with pupils [illegible] in other small countries, do the fashionable [illegible]. They have not known enough to save their own voices through a short summer's day, but they do know enough to spoil the voices of one old [illegible].

This by way of introduction. In the second chapter [illegible] to the core of the matter, the "physiological view" of the voice, showing how sounds are formed in the larynx. The history of such [illegible] [illegible] briefly sketched, beginning with the experiments of Müller, who succeeded in producing all the tones of the human voice from the dissected larynx, and ending with Manuel Garcia's observations with the laryngoscope, he having been the first to apply this instrument to the larynx in the act of singing. Garcia's results are stated in full in his own words, and a brief anatomical description of the vocal organ for the aid of the unscientific reader is found in an Appendix. "The most eminent of [illegible] masters [illegible] [illegible]" Jenny Lind's master, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the interest of vocal [illegible] watched the [illegible] of the vocal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] concurrent play of the other portions of the larynx with patient, eventual accuracy, and his Mémoire was favorably reported on in the French Academy of Sciences. He did a great service, if only in establishing [illegible] microscopic section of [illegible]. But his results are after all incomplete and vague, especially as [illegible] as great an interest [illegible], the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] the head tones, he [illegible] [illegible] nothing of them.

Madame Seiler [illegible] one of the laryngoscope has been [illegible] solely to the discovery of the natural [illegible] of the [illegible] registers of the voice. Slowly and patiently gaining such control of the [illegible], [illegible] which covers the glottis that she could at will lay bare to sight the whole length of the vocal chords, (Garcia tells us that one third of the glottis was always hidden from him by the epiglottis,) and learning to produce tones freely and naturally under such constraint she [illegible] [illegible] that she has absolutely and precisely found the limits, not only of the three registers commonly though vaguely recognized,—the chest, the falsetto and the head,—but also of an upper and a lower series of tones in the chest and in the falsetto register; thus making in reality five series of tones or registers, due to five different actions of the vocal organ, which are thus distinguished:—

"1. The first series of tones of the chest register, in which the whole glottis is moved by large loose vibrations, and the arytenoid cartilages with the vocal ligaments are in action.

"2. The second series of the chest register, where the vocal ligaments alone act, and are vibrating moved by large, loose vibrations.

"3. The first series of the falsetto register where again the whole glottis, consisting of the arytenoid cartilages and vocal ligaments, is in action,—the very fine interior edges of the ligaments, however, being alone in vibrating motion.

"4. The second series of the falsetto register the tones of which are generated by the vibrations of the edges alone of the vocal ligaments.

"5. The head register, in the same manner, and by the same vibrations, and with a partial closing of the vocal ligaments."—p. 45.

The falsetto register covers the same tones in the male and in the female voice, that is, the same octave in the general scale of tones. To the popular notion with which most of us grew up, this is at first bewildering. By falsetto we were wont to understand that sort of feigned or false voice with which a man would try to sing like a woman. Now all the singing teachers, Madame Seiler with them, being too much engaged with things to mind about names, borrow from the supposed false male tones a name for the same range of real tones in the female voice, where they are principal and normal! They are real likewise, and legitimate in the male voice, only not characteristically masculine [illegible] but [illegible] of the average female voice its falsetto is its best part, the most womanly and musical and beautiful. Our author marks the transition from the [illegible] to the falsetto [illegible] a precision to which we [illegible] not been accustomed [illegible]. It falls alike in all voices on [illegible] same tone f, f♯, while the other [illegible] one differ by a note or two, because the male larynx is a third larger than the female. This is important. —On the other hand it [illegible] strong [illegible] any head tones in the male voice.

Whether these results are final is more than a mere literary reviewer may undertake to assert; that question must be left to the more thorough [illegible] of [illegible] saying and a book doctrine. It is [illegible] superior [illegible] familiar with the use of the laryngoscope, and with the art of singing, (and we have such among us) to settle the account. But it is a strong presumption in favor of Madame Seiler's [illegible] that as the prudent [illegible] and [illegible] of her investigations there is the fact that they have been reported by men of science in Germany and [illegible] acknowledged correct, and in the [illegible] of men like Helmholtz and Du Bois Reymond; then, in the practical wisdom which [illegible] up every page, [illegible] [illegible] the application of these principles [illegible] [illegible] of the voice [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the whole spirit of the book, so [illegible] of [illegible] as well as [illegible] [illegible] as the physical conditions of good singing are [illegible] and important and [illegible] a zeal for truth, burning quietly and deeply shining without that [illegible] blurred by no sentimentality. It is, at all events, a work [illegible] of the right sort of character for the [illegible] of [illegible].

But whether the [illegible] of the physiology be absolutely proved or not, there can be no doubt of the value of the applications here made to the culture of the singing voice. The rules deduced are excellent. Thus, first of all, the registers may not be forced up beyond their limits without "a straining of the organ which may be laid more and [illegible] and an organ will bear unnatural over-straining." This is the chief cause of the decay of voices. Tenors, emulous of some Duprez's do di petto, try to force the action of the chest passage into the regions that belong to the falsetto; the registers become confused by habit, [illegible] begin the natural limits are lost sight of, and the voice is gradually weakened or destroyed. Again, it is shown how the falsetto tones, without ceasing to be such, may be educated to a strength and fullness hardly to be distinguished from the chest tones. How much better this than "the forced-up chest tones of our tenorists, sung with swollen-out throats and bloodred faces"! Again, how we are misled by the terms chest, throat, head tones,—a distinction purely imaginary, a matter of the nerves, physical sensations being confounded with the seat of actual processes, which for all tones is in the throat, the larynx! And yet how rightly may the singer know which kind of tones he is producing by these same sensations! Passing a multitude of good [illegible] about the training of the soprano and the other voices, (noting by the way that Madame Seiler, contrary to the common notions, finds mezzo soprano and baritone voices by no means so common as the four chief kinds,) we only mention further the important advice, that the male voice should be trained by men, and the female voice by women; for this lady is not the slave of science to believe that singing can be learned by scientific explanations, when it must be done by imitation of examples, as the child learns to talk.

To the physiological succeeds the physical view, which [illegible] here [illegible] the [illegible] we have examined. This third [illegible] of the work is full of sound suggestions. The [illegible] of tones are briefly recited after Helmholtz and Tyndall and particularly the timbre of tones, and its dependence upon what are called the overtones (harmonics) which mingle with the fundamental tone, are built on. Upon these [illegible] [illegible] founded excellent instructions, [illegible] among [illegible] are those related to the control and the [illegible] of the breath; the importance of [illegible] up a too great pressure of the breath [illegible] "the force of the waves of sound must be [illegible] to a good tone" [illegible] [illegible] the danger of the too common exhortation [illegible] to sing with the [illegible] as strong as possible in the first instance, instead of acquiring greatly growing strength by slow and sure degrees, is [illegible] the right. [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] bearing of [illegible] forward in the mouth [illegible] the great matter of the voice, and the [illegible] of certain vowels in certain tones, so much neglected in the setting of words to music and in which the old Italian vocal music offers the most classical and [illegible] model. And here the German author, with all her enthusiasm for the great song-composers of her country shows her candor in confessing that these have not [illegible] learned that same,—nor another equally important. Schubert placing the words so that the favorable vowels should come upon the [illegible] tones. [illegible] [illegible] intervals [illegible] come upon the boundary tones of the registers, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the same in his soprano songs upon the fa [illegible] the transition from the falsetto to the head voice. What an importance this gives to the question in which the words of a song are translated into another language! But we are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] comes before a good share of attention, and so are we to the end are [illegible] [illegible] at an early stage. Florid passages, [illegible] other ornaments, [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] for the [illegible] of flexibility [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] graceful part of [illegible] education of the voice. The large, sustained delivery of longer tones [illegible] simple [illegible] with all the light and shade and [illegible] of expression being noted [illegible] last and crowning beauty of the singer's art. Purity of tone, too, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] treated. But what [illegible] to them are so many tempting topics [illegible] we can only name?

We have left ourselves no room to speak of the last chapter in which the aesthetic view of the art of singing is presented very briefly but with [illegible] sound common-sense and [illegible] perception, and so beautifully and simply that we would fain quote the whole. Of many good sayings take these specimens:—

"An artist must, therefore, be esteemed according as his works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the hearers or behold, are without their [illegible] [illegible] and it stands all the higher the simpler and the more naturally [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] this [illegible] [illegible]."

"Beauty and [illegible] as all [illegible] knowledge is united in [illegible] with a soul, yet no product of art aesthetically beautiful is possible without a perfect technique."

"Unhappily, our whole music is visited by this sickly sentimentalism, the perfect horror of every person of cultivated taste. In these later years the powerful exertion of German aesthetics has had favorable results in regard to instrumental music; but in the execution of vocal music this unhealthy fashion of singing still always commands great applause. This sickly sentimental style has also, unhappily, in singing a great deal, unfortunately very prevalent, the [illegible] of the tones. When, in rare cases, the greatest passion is to be expressed, to endeavor to depict the expression by a trembling of the tones is all very well, and fully to be justified; but in songs and arias in which quiet and elevated sentiments are to be expressed, to tremble as if the whole soul were in an uproar, and not at all in a condition for quiet singing, is unnatural and offensive."

"Under this head the subjects of rhythm, correct understanding of the tempo, composition, the delivery of the sentiment of a work, and the [illegible] a fine [illegible] are treated with good taste and judgment. And finally, the time for beginning instruction is discussed, with strong recommendation of an early age, but with caution against the dangers to the young voice of singing in schools [illegible] [illegible] where the teacher is satisfied, if the tones are only pure and the time is kept, but pays no regard to the formation of the tones.

The book is admirably translated and on the whole we must regard it as the best essay upon the voice in singing that has yet appeared.

Two Sisters.

A CHAPTER FROM ONE'S "NOVANT."*

At the foot of which we enter the fine city of Heidelberg round which the Rhine and Neckar are [illegible] the projecting arms [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] toward the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] imposing [illegible] surmounted by an elegant [illegible] and called the [illegible] gate. On the keystone of the arch is cut the coat of arms of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Karl Philip, and beneath the [illegible] of the words

BONO PRINCIPE [illegible]

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

PRESENT [illegible]

" I quod [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] propped [illegible]"

Close by this [illegible] gate of Heidelberg stood, in the year 1711 a small, unpretending house, which made no display of size or expensiveness, [illegible] was [illegible] and home-like, and showed at the first glance that its inhabitants believed in order and neatness. Two [illegible] bay windows, [illegible] [illegible] projected on the sides of the house, as if there their eyes within [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] out and [illegible] the [illegible] windows [illegible] these eyes could enjoy a splendid view across the Rhine.

The owner of this dwelling was an open-hearted honorable man, named Weber. His position was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] high one, [illegible] he had an office under the [illegible] which he had filled well [illegible] for many years. His salary [illegible] amounted to two hundred florins a year, which was [illegible] enough [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] family and a [illegible]. But now the household [illegible] [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible], as a reward for his long faithfulness in the service of the [illegible] his salary had been raised to four hundred florins. Fortunately [illegible] [illegible] the pretty house of which we [illegible] and had a little [illegible] [illegible] two of [illegible] chambers, which were rented to an old friend of the family.

But small though his house and his salary were, the contentment and happiness of the Weber household were great. There was not one of the family who was not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] health, cheerfulness, daily food, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] affection for each other. And in truth, [illegible] was no [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the father and mother feel the deepest [illegible] the children bloomed like fresh roses, and [illegible] bodies were sound and minds were [illegible] of course cheerfulness and [illegible] was not wanting, while the [illegible] [illegible] made all down [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Herr Weber was as dry and [illegible] as a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] lawyers of that day were; on the contrary [illegible] art and science, and though his [illegible] had [illegible] the purchase of books or the [illegible]

[illegible]

"You heard and saw only a beginner," replied Aloysia, with sincere modesty.

"Saw—yes!" returned Mozart, with his own peculiar frankness; "but I heard a cultivated singer. Your style is excellent, and when your acting is a little better, you can go where you please as a prima-donna."

Possibly this judgment, expressed by any other young stranger, might have seemed arrogant to the family, and been somewhat resented; but the honest [illegible] which the words were said, full as it was of the same hearty frankness and straightforwardness which shone in the young man's face, allowed of no mistake as to his good meaning. [illegible] genius a certain something which [illegible] parents. [illegible] feel as if in the presence of a mightier [illegible] bow them and [illegible] before they [illegible]

So [illegible] Weber [illegible] chapter [illegible] adapted for [illegible] frankness [illegible]

It was no wonder therefore, that Mozart had already before half an hour had expired, [illegible] he had grown [illegible] with the family. At Wendling's request he had brought with him several songs of [illegible] Aloysia now sang, while he accompanied her on the piano.

Mme. [illegible] good [illegible] about father Weber blowing [illegible] his pipe [illegible] the orchestra-conductor expressed nothing, but beaming [illegible] from head to foot [illegible] eyes were [illegible]

When at last Aloysia [illegible] a terribly hard passage, which Mozart [illegible] with extraordinary [illegible] carried away with delight and [illegible] he sprang up from the piano [illegible] and cried "Wonderful! I must give the [illegible] he carried out his words without [illegible] hesitation.

Every one laughed aloud, and little Hermann, clapping his hands and springing round like a top, cried—

"Now Aloysia will have a bonnet! She has for herself a bonnet!"

Aloysia herself was the most confused, and so half-[illegible] her mother's side like a [illegible] the latter [illegible] the [illegible] laughing

"A kiss of [illegible] Better never a [illegible]."

Then to give things another turn and relieve her daughter's embarrassment, the [illegible] the [illegible] had disappeared—[illegible] the table, the [illegible] to give [illegible] Mannheim the [illegible] talked about music, [illegible] to speak of a man who was [illegible] in Mannheim and afterward famous throughout the musical world—Abt Vogler.

Weber praised him, but Wendling held fast to his [illegible] Abt Vogler was [illegible] in [illegible] of the [illegible] sang [illegible] Amadeus, he [illegible]

"You deserve what sort of a man and composer [illegible] his [illegible] work at [illegible] A Bon-[illegible]—The [illegible] Halls of [illegible]—[illegible] Two in All [illegible]"

Now a merry peal of laughter from Mozart interrupted the reading. "What [illegible] I should say he was a fool at [illegible]"

"[illegible] Wendling in triumph. "When a man [illegible] Abt Vogler did [illegible] can make a composer [illegible] works and [illegible] in six months, [illegible] the biggest swindler and windbag [illegible]"

"W[illegible]" said Amadeus quietly "It was curious to see [illegible] thing [illegible] There are people who [illegible] originality in the [illegible] of Leonardo."

"[illegible] their quackery under [illegible]" said Wendling.

After [illegible]—the "Wendling bread" [illegible] over and the [illegible] removed. [illegible] of the evening was passed [illegible]. Mozart was never in better spirits, and entertained the whole company with wit and odd tales and an inexhaustible stream of droll verses. The last thing before they said good night, he sat down to the clavier, and improvised for a long time, till the whole witchery of his presence seemed to be translated into music and sink into their hearts.

But wherefore sat Aloysia so long without [illegible] at the window of their sleeping chamber, gazing out through the [illegible] into that rainy midnight? She hardly knew wherefore, herself. Her mood was one she had never experienced before; joyful—almost happy; and yet so oppressive, that her heart trembled and palpitated.

"Why don't you come to bed?" asked Constanze, now for the third time, and [illegible].

"Because I am so excited," answered Aloysia and her sister turned over and softly slept.

Herr Richard Wagner

Few living composers have so wide a renown for themselves as Richard Wagner. He has his partisans also now and his equally passionate detractors, which is the case only with men of unusual [illegible] afford [illegible] of any sort. Herr Wagner [illegible] strong opinions, [illegible] them. He [illegible] with great warmth, [illegible] a [illegible]"—[illegible] masterpieces [illegible] Yet, it is only just to add Herr Wagner [illegible] with that absurd and [illegible] attributed to him. He has no wish to [illegible] the opera; on the contrary he desires to make [illegible] greater, to elevate it to something beyond what it has ever been—[illegible] sing solely for the sake of singing [illegible] to be [illegible] to [illegible] of a [illegible] but is [illegible] always in concert instruments. There is nothing revolutionary in [illegible]. It is a principle carried very high, and Herr Wagner's defect is that he exaggerates it. He [illegible] up the [illegible] Gluck held [illegible] and which the [illegible] contended for against the Piccinists.

No other art [illegible] such an action over the soul, [illegible] the very [illegible] of the spirit, as music, and Gluck's desire was that this power should never be lost sight of. He wished that vain and superfluous [illegible] should be put aside—that [illegible] should never be written expressly for stage [illegible] that [illegible] should [illegible] the highest and grandest [illegible] of the human [illegible]

But Herr Wagner's [illegible] the [illegible] believes it [illegible] always had [illegible] highest aim of music [illegible] Let [illegible] a single example [illegible] a [illegible] in all its parts—one that can never be equalled. The [illegible] is [illegible] with the [illegible] I should have observed, but each part musically speaking [illegible] a step, a [illegible] Shakespeare in his [illegible] Truth will never be better realized in art. The French art-critics, [illegible] Herr Wagner, however, wishes to go further. He advocates that by an alliance of the diverse arts of the poem, of the mise-en-scène, of the singer, of the orchestra, of the machinist, a [illegible] effect should be produced, and he predicts that [illegible] This is what he calls the art of the future, and when his adversaries have very [illegible] of the music of the future.

Whether the ideal of this [illegible] composer be realized or not, it is noble, and it is [illegible] that it has been so [illegible] that the author is held up to ridicule. Herr Wagner is an iconoclast, as his detractors [illegible] he is a man who aspires to the grand and [illegible] with passion, and, perhaps with [illegible] Let him [illegible] his goal, [illegible] high aspirations, unfortunately, are not contagious in these days. Whatever may be his defects, he is in earnest in his aspirations, [illegible] high ideas [illegible] respect.

He was born at Leipzig on the [illegible] of May, 1813, and studied at Dresden as well as at the university of his native town. He manifested at a very early age a strong love for that art [illegible] his life. He was [illegible] of the theatres of Königsberg, Dresden and Riga, and in that he [illegible] Those among London on his way. He crossed the Channel in a storm, and this episode furnished him with fresh musical inspirations. [illegible] arrived at Paris, surrounded by privations and troubles of all sorts, he finished "Rienzi," his first opera, and wrote a second, "The Phantom Ship."

On his return to Riga, two years afterwards, he wrote an overture for Goethe's "Faust," as well as "The Apostles' Feast." The remaining operas are "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," and the "Nibelungen." Besides being a musician, Herr Wagner is also a poet and critic. He has written his own librettos, and has defended his theories by his pen on several occasions. The celebrated Liszt has published, under the title of "Lohengrin et Tannhäuser de M. Richard Wagner," his own [illegible] of the [illegible] political [illegible] Wagner [illegible] forced [illegible] 1849, when he [illegible] Saxony and take refuge in Zurich, where [illegible] received [illegible] and [illegible] offered the post of director of the orchestra, of the theatre, as well as conductor of the musical society of that city. He lived here several years, but after [illegible] in Munich. The [illegible] King of Bavaria, [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] In 1855 Herr Wagner accepted the [illegible] of the London Philharmonic Society as conductor; the [illegible] concerts [illegible] and many [illegible] remember the proof he gave of the [illegible] with which he is gifted. He led Beethoven's, Mozart's and Haydn's symphonies without a score before him without a note to refer to.

Opera.—The attempt at forming a union of the two Operas having failed, Mr. Mapleson has secured Drury Lane [illegible] open [illegible] the 19th of March. In a style of much less verbiage than usual he announces his prospectus.

The company consists of Mlles. Titjens, Christine Nilsson, Clara Louisa Kellogg, Sinico, [illegible] Corsi and Bauermeister, a young lady who has passed the [illegible] of the conservatoire and is now an opera [illegible] The principal new [illegible] Mme. Trebelli-Bettini and Mme. Demeric-Lablache. The tenors are Signors Mongini, Fraschini, Bettini, Corsi, Agretti, Mr. Lyall, and Mr. Tom Hohler. The baritones and basses, Signors Gassier, Santley, Foli, Bossi, Castelli, and Foli, Mr. Santley and Herr Rokitansky.

The list of the operas to be presented is nearly as [illegible] In fact only one novelty is promised—Wagner's "Lohengrin." The chief [illegible] of the season will be the [illegible] It was produced at the same house between twenty and thirty years ago and received [illegible] acclamation. The [illegible] parts [illegible] by Mlle. Louisa Kellogg, Mlle. Tietjens, Signor Bettini, Mr. Santley, and Herr Rokitansky.

The list of old favorites is long and satisfactory, including among others Mozart's "Flauto Magico," Cherubini's "Medea," Beethoven's "Fidelio," Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauride," Weber's "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon."

Covent Garden.—Mr. Gye's prospectus is thus mentioned:

The list of works which the manager of the Italian Opera proposes to set before his patrons includes three novelties. The first is Rossini's "Armida di Corsaro," which was originally destined for the Italian stage, but which, rearranged by [illegible], was first brought out at the Grand Opera in 1826. A work by the author of "Guillaume Tell" and "Il Barbiere," with which the English public are [illegible] acquainted, will doubtless be welcome with [illegible]. The original of "L'Assedio di Corinto" was "Maometto Secondo," which was represented [illegible] at San Carlos of Naples, during the Carnival season of 1820. The principal artists were Mme. Colbrand (afterwards Rossini's wife), Mlle. Chaumel [illegible] married at Bologna), Signor Mozart [illegible], Benedetti and [illegible] years after, on the 9th of October, 1826, Le Siège de Corinthe, [illegible] altered and amplified from "Maometto Secondo," was produced for the first time at the Grand Opera of Paris, with Mlle. Nourrit, [illegible] Adolphe Nourrit [illegible] Mme. Cinti-Damoreau [illegible] About the year 1850 or 1851 "L'Assedio di Corinto" was performed for the first time in this country at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Grisi, Tadolini, and Tamburini in the principal characters. Some years later an English version of "The Siege of Corinth" was produced at Drury Lane Theatre, Mr. Balfe playing Tamburini's part, which is written in Rossini's most florid style. The principal characters in "L'Assedio di Corinto" at the Royal Italian Opera will be sustained by Mlle. Adelina Patti, Mlle. Lavrofska, Signore Mario, Naudin, and Cotogni. The second feature of interest is Verdi's "Giovanna d'Arco," an early production of that composer brought out in Milan in 1845. The third is the warming-over of "Le Domino Noir," which Auber—indefatigable at eighty—is going to take up again; with more orange, we think, than prudence. We would with some anxiety the result of Auber inspired by himself; the "Domino Noir" is, as it is, perfect. A new finale has been, it is said, been made expressly for Covent Garden by M. Lucien Laroche. The "Domino Noir" will be produced soon after the arrival of Mlle. Pauline Lucca, who will be assisted in the principal characters by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Signori Mario, Cotogni, Ciampi, Tagliafico, and M. Petit. Of "Giovanna d'Arco" we are happy to announce that this opera and one of Signor Verdi will be produced towards the end of June, and will be performed for the first time in this country, the part of Giovanna by Mlle. Adelina Patti her first appearance in the character in England. The rest of the repertory will be filled with last year's novelties—"Romeo" and "Don Carlos"—and with old favorites, such as "L'Elisir d'Amore," "Robert le Diable," "La Figlia," "I Puritani," and "L'Africaine."

In the artists engaged we meet with the well-known names, as constant which is to recall old successes. Among the sopranos are Mmes. Adelina Patti, Pauline Lucca, Anastasia Fricci, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Marietta; the tenors, Signors Mario, Fancelli, Naudin, and Neri-Baraldi; and in the baritone and basso, Signori Graziani, Cotogni, Ciampi, Bagagiolo, Tagliafico, Polonini, Capponi, and M. Petit. To the latter are added Mme. Vilda, the brilliant débutante, who made so favorable an impression four years ago; Mlle. Vanzini, from the Scala at Milan—who makes her first appearance in England; Mlle. Lavrofska, from the Opera St. Petersburg—her first appearance in England. To Mlle. Vanzini is given the part of Gilda in "Rigoletto," we should like to see her equal to the importance of the part, although her antecedents are not such as to tell. Mlle. Lavrofska is with appear to be a mezzo-soprano, but Mlle. Lavrofska's qualification is not given. Signor Cotogni, among the basso, will have his part greatly well occupied for Manuel Estrand and the baritone of "L'Assedio" and his important trusts among them. Mr. Petit is again the star of the company of Mr. Gye, who, by the way, is a basso some considerable time in public concert having loaded, itself more of late with certain appearances on the stage" and is not to come yet public while Mr. Gye and therefore it believes the public to enjoy her while her public career lasts. Mlle. Patti is announced in all her principal characters in "L'Assedio di Corinto" with Giovanna d'Arco. She will also appear for the first time in England as Elvira in "I Puritani," and she will resume her impersonation of Ninette in "La Gazza Ladra," "Dinorah," and La Figlia del Reggimento," which she has abandoned for several years. Mlle. Lucca comes to us with St. Petersburg laurels only, and in the course of the season repeat her favorite characters of Marguerite in "Faust," Leonora in "La Favorita," Valentine in "Les Huguenots," Cherubino in "Le Nozze di Figaro," and some known for Angela in "Le Domino Noir." The list is defect as to the lower element—but the tenors of Fabor and Rosanasi are absent—two gap largest very hard to replace. En revanche, Signor Mario is said to have found improvement in during a Russian campaign, and to have taken out a new vocal lease. We trust to find so much in fine in voce, and to believe.

The programme has appeared of the preliminary arrangements for the forthcoming triennial Handel Festival to be held, as before, at the Crystal Palace, London in the month of June—the days fixed being Monday, the 15th Wednesday the 17th and Friday the 19th, the great general rehearsal being appointed for the grand by Friday the 12th. The bisection judicious adhesion to the former practice of giving the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt" on the first and third days—these works being, substantially, the grandest of all Handel's oratorios and most commonly representative of his powers. The second day, as on former occasions, will consist of a miscellaneous selection. The vast resources of the Sacred Harmonic Society and other London choirs and associations, with the large additions from provincial sources, the personal superintendence and the account of rehearsals and performance by Mr. Costa, and the ample arrangement of business details by the Crystal Palace authorities, offer every guarantee for success in this great undertaking. With the beginning of the month of June is to appear, by subscription, a fac-simile in photolithography, of Handel's manuscript score of the "Messiah," taken from the original in the Royal library. The profits of the publication are to be shared between the Benevolent Fund of the Sacred Harmonic Society and the Royal Society of Musicians.

Music in Boston.

OTTO DRESEL gave the fourth of his four weekly "Readings of Piano-forte Music" last Thursday afternoon,—too late for notice in today's paper. The two preceding Readings were extremely interesting and, although one occurred on the eve of Good Friday and the other in a pouring rain, the Chickering Hall presented an imposing show of the best sort of audience.

Mr Dresel's second selection opened with a very satisfactory arrangement which he had made of the Andante of a well known Symphony in D by Haydn, full of piquant elegance: the crisp staccato, the light and shade, the pointed accent of the rendering were all that could be desired. Then came a Sonata of Beethoven (Op. 31, No. 3, in E flat),—just the finely passionate, intense, nervous one which Mr. Dresel at once may play better than almost anybody. The Scherzo in D flat (Allegro vivace), with its fitful explosions of passion, followed by quick staccato phrases in undertone; and the sweeping Presto of the Finale in 6-8, were brought out with most vivid force and sharpness of outline like scenes revealed at night by lightning.—A singularly beautiful Introduction (we know not whence he took it) and three Mazurkas of Chopin, well contrasted, closed the first part.

Part second comprised an Allegretto (crisp little movement in Canon form) by Schumann; a Scherzo by Mendelssohn; a Song or two of Robert Franz, transcribed by Liszt; an Etude by Thalberg one of the few really original, poetic works of the father of the modern virtuoso school; a charming little "Albumblatt" fugitive piece of fond date, by the concert-giver himself; and a very spirited Presto Scherzando in E minor, by Mendelssohn—all chosen no matter as to the manner of their presentation.

Here is the programme of the third "Reading," April 18.

Allegro from op. 26	Schumann.
Minuetto and Gavotte	Bach.
Allegro from op. 32	Schumann.
Sarabande, Bourée and Gavotte	Bach.
Sonata, op. 53	Beethoven.
Mazurkas	Chopin.
Evening, from the Phantasiestücke	Schumann.
Phantasiestück	Otto Dresel.
Scherzo from Sonata	Chopin.
Nocturne	Chopin.
Waltz	Chopin.

The first four numbers were grouped into one kaleidoscopic series, passing from one to another without pause, and making an ingenious and charming whole of a variety of single pictures. The alternation of little things of Bach with little things of Schumann was a felicitous idea. The Minuets, Gavottes, Sarabands, &c. from Bach's English Suites and Partitas, though of a more antique formal cut, are as fresh as if they had sprung up in these very April showers and have a poetry of their own quite as fascinating as those flowers of modern romance with the healthiest, finest things of Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn they go well together. Their apparently thin harmony, mostly in only two or three parts, implies a harmony as full as Schumann's. They look like very simple things to play; you may get through them, glibly enough, scores of times with your own fingers, and yet not suspect a tithe of their beauty and their point until you hear them played by an artist like Dresel, whose reverence for Bach is not pedantry, but live communion with the spirit.

The Beethoven Sonata in C, op. 53,—one of the most familiar in point of difficulty, yet most deeply poetic and bravoura,—transporting you indeed into a strange, romantic element,—we have heard interpreted by not a few famous pianists, both here and in Europe, but never before have we felt the power and beauty of the work so fully as that afternoon. In the last two movements, Rondo and Prestissimo, you are whirled away through Fairyland, and a very exciting glimpse you have of it; in this light it is worthy as graphic and original as Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream music. But, first, that short, mysterious, wonderful Adagio that precedes it with a broken march-like rhythm! You are as it were led blindfolded, full of wondrous expectations, all deep chords, till you strangely silenting into the midst of all those splendors and there suddenly restored to sight.

The most new and striking pieces in the second part of the concert were the "Evening" by Schumann, and the Scherzo from Chopin's almost impossible Sonata, op. 35 in B-flat minor (he has but three). The Scherzo has a marvellous fire and vigor in it, and must be extremely difficult to play with such strange weight of harmony and such relentless speed. The Trio is a softer mood has an exquisitely lovely melody. It is this Scherzo that precedes the Marche funèbre so familiar in concert room and parlor.

Next Thursday offers the only chance of hearing Mr. Dresel in this way for a year to come.

FOR THE CENTURY.—The Symphony Concert, given by the Harvard Musical Association in aid of the Ladies' Fair for the Century, was not we regret to say as successful for that object as it was meant to be. For the first time the prestige of the Harvard concerts failed to fill the Music Hall. It barely paid expenses. The indifference of the many who have always answered to the call was something unaccountable, and, when we think of the splendid result of the concert for the same purpose, under the same auspices last year, rather mortifying. Only some seven hundred people came. Neither the irritable charm of the one long repeated notice, nor the heavy tongues of the Fair itself, of which it was to be the closing scene and festival, could overcome the lethargy. Even the newspapers to whom those significant musical announcements usually are wont to be sleeping on their ears, in anticipation perhaps of the long pull of a whole week's Festival in May, and had no word to urge on vague opinions in announcing, after a concert equal to the best Orchestra and "Great Dinner" never catch them napping; but Gluck, Beethoven, Chopin—do not need them! Probably however the mistake was in the timing of the concert. It should have followed up the regular Symphony series in quick continuity, before the current of interest could shift to other objects. It was looked upon as an affair that people dropped it from their thoughts and did not pick it up again; the Fair itself instead of helping the sale of tickets, stood rather in its way; and now just ahead there loomed the Great Festival to overshadow it. Finally the weather was as bad as possible and just twin minutes to people weary with excitement.

But the Concert was a good deal and these present [illegible] in it delight and [illegible]. Could it be otherwise with such an orchestra, and this programme?

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"	Gluck.
Seventh Symphony, No. 8	Beethoven.
Piano Concerto in F minor, No. [illegible]	Chopin.
Hugo Leonhard
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini.

The "Iphigenia" Overture still holds its place among the most beautiful and noble of orchestral preludes, and its pure charm soon made the dark and dreary day forgotten. A few strains of the Seventh Symphony, and the supremacy of the ideal world was [illegible] complete. Mr. Leonhard played the Chopin Concerto once better, if that were possible, than before; indeed wonderfully well, exciting rapturous applause. The "Tell" Overture, manifold [illegible] of contrasting pieces making up pictures of mountaineer life in the beginning, and closing in such a rousing peal of patriotic triumph, hence and [illegible] with the Cretan struggle was played with remarkable spirit and precision, the tempo of the finale being taken almost too fast.—So everybody went away the better happy, in spite of the disappointment of not adding another thousand dollars to Boston's noble contribution for the homeless Cretans.

The [illegible] however, without this intended aid was a signal and rare success for approaching to the rare end and the highest goal [illegible] in its most sanguine hopes of its projectors. Dr. and Mrs. Howe, and Mr. Rodocanachi, the Greek Consul, who has given heart and soul and strength to it, must feel very happy in it; and Boston may feel proud,—"one fifth of your great bill" as Wendell Phillips said, "stand the redemption of the [illegible] honor Of Boston against the world" made nearly $50,000 to the Cretans as a single gift! This Tableaux, was so agreeable in every way, so beautiful as to deserve mention in the score of Art, and in our record of aesthetic progress. The scene in the Music Hall was enchanting. Mr. Roeth had surpassed himself in his tasteful decorations, in which the Greek flag and white predominated, and classical emblems met the eye on all sides. All was in perfect harmony; a sight the eye could feast upon and [illegible] ever weary. Then the tables, heaped with beautiful things tastefully disposed; the grace and beauty and refinement, the faces shining with intelligence and goodness and sweetness, the prevailing courtesy and grace of manner, the happy choice of so happy a life, absence of all coarse [illegible] of the [illegible] visitors, the sweetest [illegible], the rare costly buttons of [illegible] (in paintings, albums, [illegible] bonnet), the fresh flowers, and the charming [illegible] the [illegible] and finally the elegance of [illegible],—all conspired to make up an ideal yet most human, [illegible] and substantial, we felt the time being. It almost convinced us to [illegible] life it was good to live and move for one week amid so many good and noble people, where goodness lent to every face a certain beauty, where nothing but good will and kindness were continually developed, so that the atmosphere of the place was instinct with blessing and encouragement to all good impulses.

We must speak particularly of the music, although music of course cannot claim pure [illegible] as Art under such circumstances, and music in a Bazaar must be principal, a [illegible] the whole interest, and a mere accompaniment to another [illegible] the [illegible] to be enjoyable at all. Dancing and [illegible] voices from a band; any [illegible] in such crowds without suspending talk or trade. To those meetings the music [illegible] imparted [illegible] life and charm. It was supplied on the opening night, Monday April [illegible], by Mr. J. K. Paine and Mr. Eugene Thayer in light and brilliant performances on the Great Organ; on two evenings by the Band from the Navy Yard and Boyd's Cornet Band, both excellent and happy in their selections, and on three evenings by the Band of the Perkins Institution for the Blind, composed of some 25 of the blind pupils, under Mr. Campbell, the musical director of the Institution, himself blind, a man of wonderful energy and patience, great [illegible] power, thorough devotion to his work, who has made himself one of our most accomplished musicians, and has worked wonders in teaching music to the blind. Naturally the presence of this blind band was a touching feature of the Fair; nor did their music suffer by comparison with any. Indeed their greater number, and the greater variety of tints in their instruments (they have any [illegible] clarinets, including a few choirs, as we heard it so before) and the [illegible] of some pieces of a softer character and the evident feeling with which they played it well as good ensemble, good intonation, light and shade, &c., made their heavy marches more acceptable. Particularly [illegible] and added to so refined an occasion were those Mendelssohn [illegible] which they were [illegible] upon four brass instruments while the Wedding March, the popular waltz marches, waltzes, &c., by the whole band were rich and vigorous without often running into noise.

Mr. Parker's Club.—A concert by this vocal club of amateurs is too important an event to be passed [illegible] without some space. Reduced to almost nothing we must postpone the pleasant task of chronicling that of last week (given twice over), in which two large works wholly new here and of rare interest (parts of Schumann's Mass and the whole of Gade's Cantata "The Crusaders") were so [illegible] rendered, the singing of Mrs. H [illegible], in the latter by its perfection of voice and style, dramatic expression and inspiration, being something which we must count among the best moments of our life in listening to great singing.

The great Musical Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society will have begun before another issue of our paper. The preparations are progressing well, and the demand for season tickets has been eager. Besides the Oratorios and other works announced already, the programme will include (for the last afternoon concert) an interesting novelty, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," a copy of the score having at last come to hand.

Mendelssohn's Fairy, chief with so much [illegible] upon one side of the great Piano controversy of the Paris Exposition, is the knowing one who, in 1832, wrote this "heathenish" criticism on the Midsummer Night's Dream Overture:

"The best impression made by Monsieur Mendelssohn's overture is not addressing. I do not speak of the conventional harmony and the contempt for the art of composing which was manifested in the work Monsieur Mendelssohn is of a school which is still very severe on these points."

Mr. Abraham T. Thorp, well-known in Boston some years since, and much esteemed as a musician and a man, died suddenly last Sunday in New Bedford. We have the sad news from the Mercury of Monday:

Sudden Death.—Our whole community was startled and shocked, yesterday morning, by the intelligence that Mr. Abraham T. Thorp, one of our most respectable and esteemed citizens, had terminated his life, by a pistol, in a moment of temporary insanity.

The deceased was by birth a Dane, and came to this country in 1831. Shortly afterwards he was invited from New York to officiate as organist at the First Congregational Church in this city, a position he had occupied ever since, with the exception of a few years while a resident in Boston, where he was organist at Rev. Doctor Gannett's church. There as here, his generous disposition and [illegible] the purity of character made friends of all who knew him. He leaves a wife and one son who [illegible] mourn the irreparable loss of one so devoted and faithful to them. And in this community, where in all the relations of life, he had for so many years held the esteem of his fellow citizens, a wide circle of acquaintances sympathize with those who grieve most, that disease in its most cruel form has brought him to an untimely grave. Mr. Thorp's age was 61 years.

Musical Correspondence.

New York, April 12.—The 13th soiree of Mason and Thomas's Chamber Music Soirées closed with the 6th of the series at Irving Hall, on Saturday evening, April 11th. The programme:

Quartet, D minor	Mozart
Sonata, [illegible] and 'Cello in [illegible], op. 5, No. 2	Beethoven
[illegible]	Schumann.
Octet in E flat, op. 20	Mendelssohn

These fine compositions were admirably played by the skilful and conscientious artists to whose unflagging and [illegible] efforts a growing taste for this class of music is mainly due in this metropolis. Any detailed analysis of the works performed is of course unnecessary. [illegible] it will suffice to say that the successes of the evening were the Mendelssohn Octet and Mr. S. B. Mills's superb performance of the exceedingly intricate Schumann Sonata.

"The finest sub [illegible] to recognize all the author's charming and [illegible] traits finely than one finds as in [illegible] works. In consider, however many corporate passages, and when we recollect that it was written in 1825 when Felix was a mere boy of 16, we cannot be surprised that the unanimous judgment of the musical world has placed Mendelssohn among the 'bright immortals.'"

Mr. Mills, as we have foretold, achieved a notable success in the solo Sonata. The composition is not altogether in the general taste of hearers; one has to search too deeply after the intention of the author and one's nerves are too intensely [illegible] by the music. Mr. M., however, brought out most admirably the themes which lie hidden beneath the [illegible] of notes, and his skilful handling of the most [illegible] difficulties which crowd the Sonata, won from the audience a very enthusiastic and well-deserved encore.

These Soirées have been most enjoyable during the winter and the audiences—although disgracefully small—have mainly been composed of the earnest lovers of true Art. The deficiency in numbers has been more than compensated for by the presence of thorough and intelligent appreciation. One enjoyment has been more marred by the talking [illegible] during the performance of some fine passage, of persons with diabolically crackling [illegible], and—an even greater annoyance—by the crackling and rustling of newspapers in the hands of prosaic boors. These little performances are extremely annoying to those who earnestly desire to listen, still who attend these concerts with no other purpose. If such "disturbers of the peace"—viz. the aforesaid boors—could be summarily kicked from the hall, your correspondent would be happy. Doubtless there are many others who would experience a similar feeling of satisfaction.

The regular Saturday Evening concerts terminated with the 20th of the series on April 3rd; but a supplementary "Farewell Concert" was given last evening. Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Mr. G. W. Colby, Miss Natalie Testa, Miss Topp, Mr. Ferranti, Carl Rosa and J. R. Thomas were the artists upon this occasion. The first section of the programme was devoted to sacred music while the second contained several glees, ballads and madrigals.

Mme. Parepa at [illegible] delighted [illegible] added one to-night, almost with that sweet and [illegible] world [illegible] short of her usual excellence as that one night [illegible] was [illegible] from the sw phrases of admiration. Miss Topp played one of Liszt's rhapsodies in such fine style and with so [illegible] as to win an encore, for which she responded with a [illegible] and [illegible] in fine Bach style. Miss Testa sang "I rest in the Lord" and another solo in a simply shocking manner

I close this letter with two items of news. Mr. G. W. Morgan, so long the organist at Grace Church in this city, has resigned that post, and the position is to be taken—so runs the rumor—by Mr. S. P. Warren. Herr [illegible] Mr. Leopold DeMeyer sailed for Europe in the Hansa on Thursday last. I.

APRIL 30.—Mr. G. W. Morgan, the well known and efficient organist at Grace Church, had his annual concert at Irving Hall on Thursday evening, April 25. He was assisted by Miss Adelaide Phillips, S. B. Mills, Theo. Thomas and others.

Messrs. Mills and Morgan played a fantasia for two pianos upon "Don Juan" and did it in fine style. Mr. Mills also played his "Recollections of Home," and, being encored, his charming "El Tarantelle." Mr. Thomas played most admirably a quaint Handel [illegible], which depended for its effect upon a pure and well sustained tone. Miss Phillips sang three times, her first solo being the Handel aria which she sang so effectively at the 4th Brooklyn Philharmonic. She was in each instance warmly encored and received two superb baskets of flowers.

On Saturday evening at the Academy of Music we had the 5th and last Philharmonic. These were the orchestral selections:

Symphony No. 1 [illegible] op. 38.	Schumann
Violin Concerto, op. 61	Beethoven
Theo. Thomas.
Midsummer Night's Dream music.	Mendelssohn
Overture, "Der Freischütz"	Weber

The programme also included three vocal selections by Mr. Anna Bosboy [illegible].

The Symphony is one of those indisputably great works which have made an enduring fame for Robert Schumann. Rather upon a much less broad canvas than that of his masterpiece (No. [illegible] in C major), it is yet most vigorous and fresh by [illegible] graceful and charming. The Larghetto is impassioned and delicious poetry. In its completeness this is one of the great Symphonies.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music is so well known that it needs no description. The Overture, an amazingly precocious work for a boy of 17, and the stupendous Wedding March are established favorites with the general public. The Scherzo is the gem of the work and was played wonderfully well by the splendid orchestra of 100 members.

Mr. Thomas scarcely did justice to himself or to the Concerto. Admitting, as we gladly do, his precocious ability [illegible] to say that his performance was less smooth and easy than might have been desired. It seemed too labored. It is but justice to Mr. Thomas to say that the difficult tutti of the composition were however [illegible] for the movement.

The Arion Society sang with good effect two songs without accompaniment and one called "A Roman Triumph" in which the orchestra assisted. The "Farewell" which was really well done and with great finesse was warmly encored and [illegible] to the [illegible] of the Society's [illegible] conducted by Herr Bergmann.

The Academy was crowded from parquette to ceiling. Indeed the attendance during the entire season has been unprecedentedly large both at the rehearsals and concerts. This evident hearty appreciation of the purposes of the Society must be, and doubtless is, extremely gratifying to those earnest and steadfast pioneers of Art who, twenty-one years ago, founded the N. Y. Philharmonic Society. I.

The Encore Thief.

Mr. Sims Reeves, a a [illegible] tenor [illegible] with him. [illegible] to sing twice [illegible] which is [illegible] to [illegible] on Monday night.—Bristol Times and Mirror.

As there sat here yesterday morning, Mr. Punch the worthy Magistrate took his seat on the bench.

The [illegible] charges having been disposed of, Mongoose Fellowman, [illegible] was placed at the dock charged with a determined attempt at theft.

Mr. Sims Reeves, the eminent vocalist stated that he had been engaged at Exeter Hall [illegible] the previous night to sing in Handel's oratorio, "Jephtha." He had sung to the best of his ability.—

The Magistrate.—That you must have sung very finely.

Mr. Reeves bowed, and continued. He had given the great and very trying air, "Deeper and Deeper still" and the audience had been good enough to signify their warmest approbation. He sat down, when the prisoner, with violent shouts, demanded that he should be given over again. Many of the audience [illegible] against the [illegible] but he persisted in his [illegible] at last given successfully. Mr. Reeves added that he [illegible] the attempt at robbery had been directed against himself personally. He appeared on public grounds, and had no vindictive feeling against the prisoner, who he thought, was stupid rather than wicked and perhaps might be [illegible].

The prisoner said, that he would not be called stupid. He had made, and chose to have as much of him as he could get. He [illegible] the [illegible] an Englishman and stood on Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights.

The Magistrate.—The Society of Friends might [illegible] [illegible] But don't talk such nonsense, [illegible]. Who are you?

Prisoner.—A [illegible].

The Magistrate.—Is anything known of him?

Policeman [illegible].—I believe he is a respectable man, your Worship, but he is in the habit of acting in the way he done to-night.

The Magistrate.—Did it [illegible], you mean. That [illegible] does not tally well with your statement of his respectability. Have you anything to say, prisoner?

Prisoner.—I should say I had. What am I [illegible] here for? I pay I like music and I'll have as much as I can get. Why shouldn't Mr. Reeves sing it twice when I tell him?

The Magistrate.—Dear me, this is very [illegible] [illegible] I have any this person is [illegible] with a [illegible] to me, prisoner. You sell good cheese, I dare say?

Prisoner.—Very good, your Worship. I should be happy of your custom.

The Magistrate.—Send me in a Gruyère Stilton.

Prisoner.—It shall be at your Worship's house before dinner time.

The Magistrate.—It shall be paid for on delivery. If I like it, I will tell you to send me another and that shall not be paid for at all. I like cheese and I will have as much of it as I can get.

Prisoner.—If I was not speaking to a Magistrate I should call that stealing.

The Magistrate.—Of course. It is stealing. You could like your [illegible] to take a second song from Mr. Reeves for nothing.

Prisoner.—O bother! A [illegible] costs me money. I pay the farmer and I pay the carriage, and I pay my shopman and I pay the [illegible] as I could say [illegible].

The Magistrate.—A song costs Mr. Reeves money. He paid for instruction, he paid for years of study. He [illegible] for the [illegible] on which his [illegible] [illegible] the carriage that brought him to the Hall [illegible] the article. He undertook to sell it to you and he did and then you wanted another for nothing. The production of the article [illegible] and [illegible] machinery and great skill with [illegible] [illegible] of physical powers. You are [illegible] course.

Prisoner.—I don't see it in that light.

The Magistrate.—Then you shall see it in the light of a prison-cell. I shall deal with you as I should with any other rogue who, laying [illegible] of you, [illegible] You will go to the House of Correction for a month.

Mr. Sims Reeves interceded for the prisoner.

The Magistrate.—Well, Mr. Reeves, I am bound to say that you are a great temptation to his way, but he must learn to resist temptation. An example is necessary.

The prisoner was then removed to the cell, but before the arrival of the van he begged to be allowed to express his deep regret for what he had done. He supposed that it was stupid, but as [illegible] to him [illegible] [illegible] him greedy. He would never offend again.

The Magistrate kindly ordered his discharge, but intimated that he hoped any similar offender would be taken less amiably, and brought before him for punishment, which he should certainly receive.—Punch.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sonata, opus 27 No. 2. Beethoven.

I promised you last night, if you would play for me the Sonata which you will call the "Moonlight" although every accent from your flexible fingers gives the lie to the name, that I would tell you a story of music out of myself. You made a very pretty little speech about all I must have known and heard in my life, but I know very well what you really wish. You think that somewhere in my past, music and love are bound together, for you have said that they come only as ghosts to haunt me. And you are piqued because I will not tell you why I am now lingerly play on my violin. But, my lady, those fingers of yours so skilful on the piano keys would make sad work with the same violin, and I fear me its owner like it, yields only to a Master. But you like such letters, you say, and I can make you one "quasi una fantasia" on this same story and on the music you played. I will own to you that it recalls to me always my countess, not that she played it or loved it,—but it also brings back to me a certain night some years ago.

I had been for many days travelling and had at last reached a little village that seemed popped down from the mainland to the river edge. I was not alone,—that was my trouble. All day I had been fretting because I was cooped up in a stage-coach with others, and yet until that day they had been very pleasant companions, but suddenly they had grown terrible to me. I had, however, held in my discontent, and I doubt if any of them guessed my fierce desire to be alone. It was no great grief that had suddenly made a charming journey hateful, and good friends tiresome. It was a pair of vivid eyes that did it all. A girl sitting sewing at a window as we passed through a village in the morning looked up at us. That was all. But they reminded me of eyes best forgotten and stirred up in me a tumult that I longed to still. I thought that I had conquered all that idle passion; but at the first alarm, Love, like Samson, came strong from his sleep and cast all my poor ropes behind as if they were threads.

But when night came I was freed and I left them all, and in the darkness followed the river as it flowed downward to the sea, and to her. How long I walked I know not, but at length, wearied out, I sat down on a log by the river side. It was a lonely, desolate place, the tide was coming up, the stars shone dimly, the trees moaned as a light wind passed through them, the wind itself sighed like the ghost of some dead dream. Back a little distance stood a house; I could just make out its blurred outline although it was not far off. I sat there a long time; I had many memories to visit me, many dreams to mock me, but I sat quietly and had a full content of all the luxury of pain, when suddenly I heard a piano lightly touched and then out of various modulations stole this Sonata. I cannot tell you who played it, nor analyze for you what my mood and the witchery of this sad dreary place had to do with my interpretation, but certainly from it the very goddess of pain spoke and her message came to me. Hereafter that is a picture to me, and the scene part of the music. But it was not music to me, it was an inarticulate cry. Unsympathizing, suffering from passionate pain, rebelling, yet crushed by Fate watching the river I rather felt than heard the cry of a heart, that no man should attempt to criticise nor record.

And I cannot see how when you breathe you can fancy any "Moonlight" in it. I can see the lonely lake, the rocky shore, the tossing boat, but where is the more than Sabbath calm that the moon gives even to the streets of a city?

Ah no, Luna is a peaceful happy goddess. Long since the name of Endymion ceased to be more than a passion memory to her. She glides and soothes the across the clouds on. No shame does she unveil, but to the meanest objects lends a romance and beauty. In smile we may sing of her in the full golden key of D flat, but not in the nervous one of C sharp minor. And if the even uniform movement of this Adagio speaks of moonlight to any one, I think it brings them a false message.

But as I have said, I never before understood it. The dark, mysterious river creeping up to me, the dim and shadowy trees, the few stars, the sliced wind, this marvellous music are now part of one picture to me. And as over the dark, lush water weeds, over the sands, rising, receding yet steadily creeping on, came the river, so also to me comes this Sonata. There is the rush of water in it, the dullest ear must hear that,—the soft rippling opening among its triplets, the true musical figure of the curve and beat of the wave seems to steal out of the silence without breaking it.

Steadily, steadily, steadily, full of pain and longing, it hardly mars the pause third in the bar passes into harmony to intensify it. It never sets near unquiet harmonies, goes into the dominant seventh, and then as we listen and catch the retreat like the tonic as it climbs up, we are reminded of a voice that sings above the wave yet with it. It is so a harmonious as much a part of it, that every wave may have carried it up. But our dull ear has before only caught the wash of the waves below. As it passes through the sensitive chords lying near, each catches the stifled cry and repeats it, until in E minor the sigh becomes a sob. Every water-plant, every stone and fallen tree, every dead hope and every sad despair, hard changing color as the tide comes on. It intensifies the cry in F sharp minor, it floats up hardly a tangible thing into high tones, it sinks deep into the bass, it repeats its monotonous song in different octaves. There is no sound out of which it can create a cry of complaint that escapes it. It tolls slowly down deep among the bass tones, then climbs up to its first form, where we hear the same solemn cry of sorrow again.

The bass repeats the treble as a note it goes far beyond the power of analysis. We can only lie still and feel,—we can bear no more when the key of D flat breaks in full upon us and deep, high tide rests upon the river. The breeze blows more freshly the stars shine brighter the wreck on the shore uncovered by the water here we might fancy a moon, a narrow crescent of pale light clasping a dark orb, struggling through heavy clouds; the accents are strong; there is life in it, when lingering, alternating the two more fast, the tones cling closely and send fierce vibrations through it; it would strangle all hope if it could, and when the Allegretto comes back trying to bring some little peace, it but reveals its own unrest, when suddenly it is caught by a fierce wind. The tones of C sharp minor come rolling back, a tempest across the waves, great sweeps of sound run swiftly up and culminate in heavy chords; the invisible shouts out to us, we need not tremble nor flinch as it flashes up to the clouded skies in triumph and wan despair.

You wonder as you read why I hear this so differently from you. Ah, my child, we cannot interpret for each other. The Sibyl of music speaks, but to each of us there comes a different message.

> "Two friends who wander by the shore,
> Look out upon the self same sea,
> Hearing two voices at the roar,
> Born out of different memories.
> For him whose life has no lost dream'd,
> It rouses the music of the waves;
> For him whose life with love is crowned,
> It breathes upon the beach its song."

But you may be right. I speak only for myself.

Mendelssohn's Letters to Baermann.*

I.

To Heinrich Baermann, Zurich.

Rome, Feb. 14, 1831.

Dear Baermann,

Long have I delayed fulfilling my promise to write to you and indeed you have reason to be rather angry with me on that account; but when daily assailed by novel impressions, and the objects around perpetually changing, the superabundance of material renders it quite as difficult to write a proper sensible letter as a dearth of subjects, while remaining in undisturbed quiet in one's old circumstances and neighborhood.

* From Nohl's collection of "Letters of Distinguished Musicians: Gluck, Haydn, C. P. Bach, Weber, Mendelssohn." Translated by Lady Wallace. London, 1867.

and as I now break silence, pray be good-natured also, and let me hear from you again: for indeed this letter chiefly originates in my wish to hear all about you, and to know how you are, and the tenor of your life and doings. But to describe what I have seen and experienced since we met, a letter is much too short, and in fact it is not easy to do so at all in writing; we might talk it over better at some future day, and who can tell how soon that may be? For it is a settled and favorite plan of mine to return to Munich for a few weeks this year, and, if all turns out as I hope, perhaps I may pay you a visit again this autumn, make my appearance unexpectedly at the Carlsstrasse, eat dumplings, play the A flat major sonata, and then you will say, He drives me distracted! I should much like at this moment to have a few words from you, to let me know whether you are to remain at Munich during the summer and autumn, or have any journey in prospect; for I passed the time we lived together there far too much not to wish once more to enjoy it. They were the fullest days I ever passed, and I have you specially to thank for this, as you well know, and you may imagine how grateful I have to feel. Life here is on a splendid scale, richer and more exciting than we can find elsewhere; but a man like myself, who is after all essentially a musician, longs for music of some kind, and none such is to be heard here. There are indeed other things to stand, that bring beautiful music with them; the most lovely young lovers, a warm bright sky, a very shore of fine pictures and an ancient relics of past ages, more bright and abundant than the imagination can conceive. But just now even one while writing to you, I feel that a musical man, as I am, would find it hard both wanting and I would give a good deal if we could talk together as once were even for half an hour.

Since I have been in Italy my own music is all I care for; orchestras and singers are really too miserable. People whom I knew in London as quite second-rate performers, sing the first parts in Venice and in Florence. Mlle Carl, of the Berlin theatre, was engaged at Rome as prima donna (she however was a great failure, so that the contract was annulled) and such persons as Pasta, Malibran, and David are utterly out of the question, being either in London or in Paris.

It is therefore quite natural that the people themselves take no longer much pleasure here in music and I might safely declare that nowhere in Rome have I felt so tormented as at the opera. You must figure to yourself an orchestra like that of the most obscure [illegible] village. To describe it by words is not easy. Among others, there is a first clarionet in the Teatro di Apollo here. Old Baermann, you really ought to hear him. I believe the case of Germains, "the mighty pillars of our house,"* would topple over, and roll on the ground with laughing. The fellow always starts off with an appoggiatura, when the third note stands fast, and he winds up by a shake produced only by the elbow, and the rest tone is such that at the first moment I thought I was a very bad oboe, but then the oboe itself followed in a solo, when I saw it all clearly. The bassoons are exactly like so many cracks, and no instrument is in tune except the big drum; every mortal sense of sharps plays out of tune and all of a sudden the big flourishes burst forth vigorously into the midst of a tender solo, when the first violin at calls at all and brings them together again. The double-bass is a formidable fellow who has run a quarter out in the orchestra, and there unmistakably lies on the watch for the notes, and strikes in whenever by good luck he can descry a good-natured one. Thus all goes on much too and precisely" as our critics say.

No symphony has ever been played at Rome. But these people so that some years ago Haydn's "Creation" was given here; and they declare that the orchestra managed to get through the affair very tolerably; for that such frightfully difficult scores could be really well executed must be impossible even in Germany, where the learned style is understood. I then you on a face like that of St. Nepomuk, reminding myself that I am in the fatherland of music, where everything is to be found except musicians; so I take refuge as much as possible with the young ladies, who talk very little about art, and are all the prettier for it. I must not forget to mention that the trumpeters, one and all, blow away at those infernal keyed trumpets, which always seemed to me like a pretty woman with a beard: they are also without the chromatic tones, and sound shrill and unnatural. But variations are executed on them here. Now pray don't show this page to Stuntz, or he will kill me as dead as a rat when I go back to Munich; besides, I am only speaking of Rome; elsewhere it may be different. When I, however, tell you that in spite of all this I lead a famous life here, and that the winter I have passed seems to have flown like moments, and that I enjoy the gayest and happiest time, you will possibly think that I have become a renegade to good music. We pass our time thus:— Every morning early I compose in my own room and work hard, that I may be able to show you something new when I return; so this is a great pleasure, and refreshes me. Then I go out at twelve o'clock to look at Rome: some gallery, or ruins, or scenery, which is again a great pleasure. In the evening I always go into society— in fact, more than ever, and have seen a mass of people of different nations and kinds, a gay assemblage and not to be despised; in which I may add the mild air of spring, that makes one totally forget winter and this at evening, as it all; and now I no longer shut up rooms but sit at the open window. The almond-trees are all in full bloom, the shrubs are coming out fast, and already one seek the shade, which on the month of February is pleasant enough. A few days ago the mad Carnival commenced, when every one runs about all day long on the Corso. The most grotesque masks swarm on every side. The Italian ladies are on all their splendor, the crowd bombarding each other with sugarplums the most. The child is sport to every where extravagantly carried on, and it is impossible to resist joining in it. The ladies have nosegays, roses and violets thrown into their carriages, and a pattern shower down bonbons and sugarplums. You have ambush watch as [illegible] the streets, the men so covered with white dust that they look like millers, while strangers and staff are in full swing. Unluckily, we were cheated of the three last days when the extravagance is at its height; for yesterday, on reaching the Corso, laden with sugar-plums, the place was black with crowds of men—no ladies, no masks to be seen; and at last I discovered on a corner an edict from the Pope, setting forth that the Carnival was at an end, owing to certain painful occurrences. It was pretended that a revolution had been discovered, and soldiers were posted at every street with loaded muskets, and in the evening some shots were heard, a few people arrested and one severely wounded. Thus the merry game was changed into sad earnest, and though Lent does not begin until the day after tomorrow, the strictest quiet, and just as usual. But now, basta. Heaven knows you must be previously tired of this letter. If it only induces you to give me an answer, my object will be accomplished, and you promised faithfully to reply to me at once—pray pass then do so. One more request. I wrote a few lines from Venice to Count Poccі,* in answer to a letter from him. As, however, scarcely any letter that I put in the post myself there seems to have reached its destination, I being deemed a dangerous spy writing in cipher on account of my unpaid stamps, I should like to know whether he received my letter; therefore I beg of ask does not give me much trouble, that you will once remind him, and we write me about it. And how is Herr Vespermann* [the singer]? I beg you will give him my kind regards. Let me hear of all my acquaintances and friends, and whether everything looks about the same as when I left Munich. You know how every trifle there interests me; but above all, tell me of you and yours; whether Carl and Heinrich [the sons] make satisfactory progress, and sometimes remember me. Give my heartfelt good wishes to all your family, particularly to your charming wife, and that I commend myself to your own friendly remembrance is a matter of course.

Farewell! may you all continue well and happy.

Milan, July 6, 1831.

Dear Baermann,

This is no letter, but a lecture that I mean, not to write, but to read to you. Most faithless of men! not one line in answer to my charming letter of eight pages (exaggeration?). I had firmly resolved never to write to you again in the course of my life, as a punishment; but this evening it somehow all of a sudden struck me that I punish you far more by writing; hence I do so at once. But it is really the last letter I mean to write unless you answer me forthwith; and then you may rest be able to do so, I take care not to send you my address. Your sins are very great: to an Englishman in an overrated smooth... some of Our order is an unpunctual sort, and does not reply to the race of Mendelssohn when they write, unless resolve to put an end to this! It is bad, it is base, it is overwhelming!

I have the honor to announce to you by these presents, not my marriage by any means, nor yet the happening of my prospect son, nor forsaking; but I am here to carry on the tenor and the house of my innocent wife under the same firm, but what makes me happier than all these put together, is only that I will say, I shall soon be in Munich again, in the course of six or seven weeks. I beg that your charming wife will buy up all the pianos in Bavaria for these people, to be cooked for me, and then you shall see whether I have not learned something in Italy. But seriously, I hope to be there in the Carlsstrasse the beginning of September and until the middle of it. I am so longing for, as I rejoice already at the thought of it, but that you will be so kind and so free. My heart, as on a former occasion, I feel much assured of—I know Heinrich Baermann. I came to Munich prompted by the wish before plunging into the mad whirl of life of Paris, once more to be with people whom I love; and wish there I can pass a few happy weeks, and to hear I long once more to have a downright good practice, and to hear music once more, which I have not done since I have been in Italy, for a person so nervous about it, that is all, and I should like again to be myself by smoking in sound and self. I mean to play to you as long and as much of Weber as I can; do you choose; but you must also bring out your clarinet, that we may play something or hear together; and then I must again hear you play, all but major and the F minor concertos [Weber]; and even at this moment I am so happy as I did in thinking of it. I am my life I never did hear more wonderful ones than yours, old friend! I do not forget that afternoon at Bernhuber's, when you played the concerto. I have never since been able to have such music—and that is why I come to you as an come so kindly.

I am going to remain here for a short time to finish a [illegible] composition which I began at Rome, and one day I intend to play and sing it to you (are you dismayed?). In the course of ten or twelve days, I set off for the lakes, to Como and to the Borromean Islands, then by the Simplon to Geneva, whence I go across Switzerland as a straight as, and you as ever to Munich till I arrive there. Who the deuce can tell how. So then I seek you out both pretty well known, and if you don't know you will find at just one day. But it is only vexatious to see one's heart too long beforehand on anything; there are far too many troubles afloat in the world, raging and threatening, and who can tell whether in the course of a few months I may not be changed and overthrown? God forbid! I trust the world will last yet awhile, and if war and pestilence do not break in at the close quarters, I shall be with you in September. Be sure you have Croll's piano thoroughly tuned. How is he? and what of the Ernst here? and how about Ulrich's painting? But it is stupid in me to ask them questions, for I intend to come myself for the answers, which is far better. Otherwise there are many persons whom I should have liked to ask for — the fat Moralt and Mme. Vespermann, Mangott and the Mellers, Von der Mark and Delphine von Schauroth, Staudacher and Fraulein Keiss. Anyhow, all the orchestra and the [illegible] family. All this I shall be told when we meet. The sketch I took of you sits before me; it is now lying before me, your name written on one of the leaves of your [illegible] in a wonderfully like, my master-hand's scribble on it, you look particularly sweet. Do not take it amiss that I am writing you nothing worth hearing, for I reserve everything till we meet, and indeed I have absolutely nothing to relate. Give my best regards to your dear wife and sons, and to Mme. Vespermann, if she is again in Munich, and has not allowed herself to be detained in Paris. Remember me also to the handsome Miller (the dark one mind, for the prettiest), and to Marie and her wife, to Hector and the Staudachers. Then my homage at Frankfort, and greet Mangott from me; in short, remember me to all at Munich, and one besides. My compliments also to your Bäumlein, an excellent creature and one that I highly respect. All the clarinet players I heard in Italy must have been born with a wooden leg, one always feels inclined to throw them something into the orchestra, it all sounds so feeble and miserable. But for Heaven's sake don't say that to a soul in Munich or they might stone me. Germans do play a vast deal better but I won't do to tell the Germans so, for they would take it amiss. May we soon meet, dear Bärmann! Think of me kindly.

By the bye I quite forgot to tell you a most amusing and interesting story. One day when [illegible] my name for some time [illegible] [Words off see No. 3.]

Perhaps you may no longer remember my name?

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony."

(From the Crystal Palace Programme, Nov. 30th.)

The symphony which is to-day performed for the first time in England is one of the Crystal Palace concert devices [illegible] name of "Reformation Symphony" from its connection with the tercentenary festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession which was celebrated in Germany on June 25th, 1830. In the catalogue of the unpublished works of the composer, by Herr Julius Rietz, of Dresden, [illegible], appended to the second volume of Letters, the work is described as Sinfonie zur Feier der Reformationsfeier, D moll [illegible] London and Berlin [illegible] planned for the tercentenary of the Reformation Festival 1830. Performed in London, not Berlin." In the latter part of this statement there would appear to be an inaccuracy, at least the writer has not succeeded in finding any record of a performance in London. That it was composed with a view to the Reformation Festival there need be no doubt. It is proved by Herr Rietz's statement, by the allusion in a letter of the composer himself, quoted below, and by the use of the Lutheran Choral in the concluding movement. Whether the work was a composition, or not, it was completed more than a month before the time for which it was intended and before Mendelssohn started on the journey to Italy which forms the subject of the delightful first volume of his Letters. On May 13th, 1830, just after his arrival at Goethe's house at Weimar, he wrote to his sister Fanny: "I will soon send you my Symphony. I am having it copied here and will forward it to Leipsic — where it may perhaps be performed — with strict injunctions to those to give it into your hands as quickly as possible. Find out with what to call it for the best [illegible] — Reformation Symphony, Confession Symphony, Symphony for a Church Festival, Juvenile Symphony, or anything you like." The MS. was therefore duly despatched, but no performance took place. The revolutionary troubles had broken out in Germany; conflicts had taken place between Protestants and Catholics, and Mendelssohn's prolonged to postpone his work till its success should be under-good by no political or [illegible] difference. The accounts of the proceedings of the 25th June, 1830, in the Allgemeine Zeitung, and other papers of the day, show that they were almost entirely restricted to Church services and to more official acts. No mention is made of any musical performance on the occasion. But, when Mendelssohn arrived in Paris in the early part of 1832, an opportunity seemed to offer for the production of his Symphony, and we find it constantly mentioned in his letters. He had the score with him, and fully intended to have it published: "if he could get any publisher to print it and pay for it" [January 21, 1832]. A few lines further on, [illegible] he hopes to have it performed at the third concert of the Conservatoire, and that twelve to eight rehearsals were talked of, which would be very welcome. On the 15th February he again looks forward to the D minor Symphony, after [illegible] "and which may be, it never dreamt that I should hear for the first time in Paris." The Symphony was not destined to be heard, however, one by Onslow having taken its place; but a week or two later we find it was rehearsed again in rehearsal — that the band had voted on rejecting the slow movement, and that Habeneck (the conductor) had "made them a fine speech, politeness and that there was one air fine in the end, all it may never be kind enough to wait for." He is anticipating his journey to London on the 4th of March, but still the "prevalent thought is that he should hear his Symphony in the Conservatoire." The pleasure, however, he was destined not to enjoy. The performance never came to be; the absolute cause is not known, and Mendelssohn was taken ill and had to keep the house, and Paris was quitted, and he went to London without having enjoyed the triumph of bringing his work before the public.

At length, however, Mendelssohn reached home after his long absence, and then the Symphony which had so often approached and so often retreated actually arrived. The occasion was a series of concerts which he gave in Berlin, in November, 1832, for the benefit of the Orchestral Widows' Fund. At the first of these, three of his compositions were played, all apparently new to the Berlin audience: one was the Reformation Symphony, the others were the G minor Pianoforte Concerto, and the Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. This, then, was the first and apparently the only time that the Symphony has been performed in public. Why a work so perfect in form and so deeply esteemed by its composer should have been laid aside, shall it be hard to conjecture. Shortly after this Meyerbeer's grand The Huguenots, in which a prominent feature is made of Luther's chorale, "Ein' feste Burg," which forms the subject of the last movement of Mendelssohn's Symphony. Nothing was so likely to arouse Mendelssohn's fastidiousness as this, and it is said that one main reason to the suppressing the Symphony was the idea of its appearing in comparison with Meyerbeer. Another reason, equally strong, was probably his feeling that the work had been composed for a particular occasion and with particular feelings. These had passed, and he was away, the pressing and sweeping he would put by the work till an opportunity occurred of [illegible] more perfect and having brought his more advanced ease and skill. We know that this was the case with the Italian Symphony, and that he delayed the publication of that charming work because in his more and fastidious later years [illegible] some developments were still wanting in the last movement. Honor to the man who thus respects his fame!

> He more the people of his land,
> His fame the [illegible]

This may well be applied the words of the Poet laureate on the Palace Concert:—

> "We [illegible] had him, be it said;
> We [illegible] [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> And to what [illegible] and how tenderly."

As long as such a man lives, he is, of course, the rule arbiter of the fate of his works. But when he is removed from the world and takes his seat among the immortals, the case is surely changed. It becomes then a duty to discover, to cherish, and to make everything that he has left behind him. Every step, the tenderest feeling, so that pleasure of fame, for which he took his final upward flight, due its special reverence and its peculiar honour. The letters which distinguished men have left behind them may contain general [illegible] or judgments which may make it desirable either entirely to suppress them, or at once to delay their publication. But such considerations cannot apply to artistic works, and the only danger possible is to the reputation of Mendelssohn's name this need not be feared. The publication of his earlier or immature compositions, especially if accompanied by dates, and, where possible, by such information as to the causes of their suppression, as many of his friends could furnish, would never detract from his fame. It would rather enable his humbler brethren to comprehend the secrets of that sublime fancy, that perfect knowledge, that unwearied labor, that conscientious zeal, and that exquisite sense which have enriched the world with the Hebrides Overture, the Scotch Symphony, the C minor Trio, and the Oratorio of Elijah.

The score from which the Symphony is played to-day is made [illegible] the latest corrections and emendations of its author, which are dated 1830, and were made doubtless with the view to the intended performance in Paris. For this score the Company is indebted to Messrs. Novello & Co., whose property it is.

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy was born on the 3d February, 1809, and died on the 4th November, 1847, at the age of 38. When he lived and [illegible]

he had published seventy-two works of all descriptions. But he left behind him a still larger number in manuscript. Some of these have been published since, and are among the most delightful and popular of his compositions. The music to Athalie, Œdipus, the Lauda Sion, the Ruth to Lorely, the Son and Stranger, the Italian Symphony, the F minor quartet, the B flat quintet, and the overture to Ruy Blas, are all among the compositions which he never came or [illegible] he had refused to make public. The last three which have been brought forth from his recesses are the Trumpet Overture, the Reformation Symphony and the eighth book of "Songs without Words."

There remains however a mass of compositions of all descriptions and all dimensions, among which there must be much to interest. If you [illegible] The list of these [illegible] already mentioned numbers them in groups as follows: There are 72 pieces of Sacred Music — Cantatas, Psalms, Motets, Te Deums, and the like composed for the Academy, or the Cathedral Choir at Berlin; 3 Secular Cantatas; 5 Operas and Operettas; 4 Symphonies, with several Overtures for full orchestra; more than a dozen pieces for stringed instruments only, including a Concerto for the Violin; a large number of compositions for the piano, with and without accompaniments, including Concertos for one and two Pianos; a grand Sextet for Piano and Strings, a Sonata for Piano and Violin, and a Sonata for Piano Solo.

Crystal Palace Concerts.

(From the "Saturday Review," March 14.)

Just now you cannot catch the seasonable announcement again. Before it is done to bring forward unknown or comparatively unknown works in succession; and many things of indisputable value have recently one after another in quick succession come to light. As usual the musical authorities of the Crystal Palace have been indefatigable in this direction, and it is hardly too much to say that the series of "Saturday Concerts" for 1867–8, of which the twenty first took place last week, and which will include twenty-eight concerts in all, promises to be remembered as the most brilliant on record.

The first half of the season was brought to a close, in the crowning manner, by a remarkably fine performance of Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony placed last in the programme, and wisely too, inasmuch as to listen to anything after it would, under the circumstances, have been hardly possible. We have already found it our agreeable duty to speak in high terms of the orchestra of the Crystal Palace for their almost irreproachable performance of the three purely instrumental movements of this sublime of symphonies — and, indeed, of all that devolves upon them. In the last part as well, but on the present occasion the praise we have to give to the players in general, and to Herr Manns, the presiding conductor in particular, whom no difficulties daunt and who has made the Saturday performances in the Crystal Palace concerts the subject of so intelligent interest, is absolutely unqualified. The "Ninth," however, was not the only symphony of Beethoven performed in the course of the past twenty concerts. We had also Nos. 4, 5, and 8 (in B flat, C minor, and F); all the same composer; Haydn's so-called "Oxford" symphony (in G), Mozart's incomparable G minor, Schubert's great symphony in C, with the two movements of his unfinished work in B minor and Schumann's symphony in B flat (the first of the four). But of still higher interest, for evident reasons, than any of them was the "Reformation Symphony" of Mendelssohn, a work which though, as the composer's [illegible] letters inform us, it bears date as far back as 1830, was never, except on one occasion, played in public until Herr Manns introduced it at the Crystal Palace—that one occasion being some obscure and forgotten concert at Berlin, two years after the symphony was composed. "The Reformation Symphony" is a masterpiece, as the most capable judges unanimously admit, and the only difficulty is to understand how those on whom care were entrusted the MS. compositions of its author should not [illegible] more than twenty years after his time have screwed up courage to produce it. It is certain that two performances at the Crystal Palace were listened to with delight, and that elsewhere it has heard on such advantage—for has orchestral performances under Herr Manns are the finest now to be heard in England, perhaps, indeed, in Europe—it has at least met with equally flattering a token of approval.

Besides the symphonies we have named, no less than twenty overtures were played during the first half of the season. Among these are some not, we apprehend, very likely to be heard again at the Crystal Palace—such for example, as the Prometheus of Herr Bargiel, which is as empty as it is pretentious, and the Hamlet of Herr Niels Gade, who has hardly succeeded in accomplishing what the too generous Mendelssohn predicted of him. This last work is nothing of the day. Far better was the concert overture, Marmion, by Mr. A. S. Sullivan, who, young as he is, promises so well that a considerable hope may be entertained of his becoming one day a composer of whom the country may feel proud. Of course we had an overture by Schumann, and of all the overtures by he mostly [illegible] one as the overture to his opera, Genoveva [illegible] an opera by Schumann [illegible] is probably the best overture [illegible] has been some laborious striving after an ideal something which the author never once succeeds in positively attaining.* About the other overtures we need say nothing, saving that they were by Mozart, Cherubini, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Schubert, interspersed with some brilliant dramatic preludes of the French and Italian schools by Auber and Rossini. At the same time we would mention, as among the most interesting, the "Trumpet Overture" in C, a recent revival from Mendelssohn's family, which the others [illegible] is heard the more [illegible] and the overture to Alfonso and Estrella, one of Schubert's brightest, but not one of his strongest orchestral pieces. A military march in E [illegible] Schubert, and a very pure entr'acte from his Rosamunde a very poor opera, La Colombe [illegible] Handel's Acis and Galatea, Mendelssohn's Wedding March [illegible], and music of A Midsummer Night's Dream, together with concertos for various instruments, from various composers, played by Mme. Arabella Goddard, Signor Piatti, Mr. Henry Holmes, &c., were also included in the series of concerts which formed the first half of the season 1867-8.

The last seven concerts of the second half of the series 1867 have been uniformly interesting, as their first in predecessors. It is enough to state that Beethoven's glorious symphonies in A (No. 7), Spohr's (No. 4) Die Weihe der Töne ("The Consecration of Sound"), Mendelssohn's "Reformation" (for the second time), Mozart's immortal "Jupiter" (so called not by Mozart), and Schumann's No. 4 in D major, in one [illegible] effect, which however magnificently played—and the execution by the Crystal Palace orchestra, under Herr Manns, is at moments [illegible] might almost [illegible] a ceased to a striking share of magnificence—by no means going with those from having [illegible] have all been performed. Two very interesting novelties, however, demand a word apart. The first of these was a hitherto unknown symphony by Haydn in the very rarely employed key of B major, written for a small orchestra (that it is say without flutes, clarionets, trumpets, timbales, or drums), which we cannot think worth the [illegible] writer of the [illegible] (not answerable for the [illegible] signed [illegible]) is a very early production, aiming since [illegible] in its treatment—certainly though, contains the strongest evidence of maturity. In any case such an addition to the recognised [illegible] symphonies of the great old master is right welcome. It shows him at his best, and, if among his least elaborate, is by no means among his least finished works. The other interesting novelty (if only, because one of those in need of one of 119, is a symphony in C minor by Franz Schubert, which bears the title of "Tragische Sinfonie" ("Tragic Symphony"), wherefore no one can tell, inasmuch as it has scarcely a vestige of the "tragic" element from beginning to end. For this addition to our symphony repertory of orchestral music we are indebted to Mr. George Grove, Secretary of the Crystal Palace, well known as an accomplished and cultivated connoisseur. This gentleman, hearing of various MSS. by Schubert in the possession of a certain Dr. Schneider, Advocate in Vienna, was adventurous enough to travel to the Austrian capital and seek them out. M. Grove, who had already procured [illegible] the charming entr'acte music from the drama of Rosamunde, was severally beyond his hopes and came back furnished with two symphonies (Nos. [illegible] and 6) and a variety of other much coveted pieces. The "Tragic Symphony" is the fourth of nine which Schubert wrote, seven of which were completed, one (No. 7 in E) merely sketched, and one (in B minor, No. 8, for which we are indebted to M. Grove of the Crystal Palace) abandoned after the first two movements. As a work of art, it [illegible] workmanship goes for anything, the symphony in C minor of Schubert is not to be compared with the symphony in B major of Haydn, being the production of a boy [illegible] and a boy, however his genius, by no means such a master of his resources as, for instance, Mendelssohn, who composed his Octet and other wonderful things when less years younger. But notwithstanding this, Schubert has a fund of [illegible] is every movement—except the andante, which is absolutely perfect—note that the first [illegible] faults, [illegible] might be taken one from [illegible] part of it [illegible] being named for Schubert [illegible] never so adapt as here the symphony, a C minor, less full of melody, so harmonic, and so overflowing [illegible] from one end to the other that to [illegible] appear a show an exhibition of pedantry. At the same time it should appear by forgetting that though a "heaven-born genius," Schubert was not a great master, and in not making the [illegible] of his compositions we should remember how some by means of [illegible] have been able to effect what a man so richly endowed as Schubert might at least come quite naturally. The symphony was marvellously well played under the direction of Herr Manns—and was received by the audience with quite as much enthusiasm as the "Reformation Symphony" of Mendelssohn. No doubt the majority thought it quite as good as the "Italy" [illegible] Symphony [illegible] no better. Time, however, will put each work in its proper place, and no matter how their relative merits may be appreciated, the series of concerts at which both were produced, for the first time most of ways be looked back on as one that selected the highest credit on those who direct the musical affairs at the Crystal Palace.

Among the overtures brought forward during the last seven concerts have been many recognised masterpieces (such as Egmont (Beethoven), Der Freischütz (Weber), Die Hebriden (Mendelssohn), &c.—besides Beethoven's ballet overture, Prometheus, Mozart's Impresario (only second to the Figaro), Meyerbeer's laboured though highly dramatic Struensee, &c., but the most notable were unquestionably the first and second of the four overtures composed by Beethoven for his opera, Leonore (Fidelio), in which may be seen the germs of the third overture in the same key, the great one in C, at once [illegible] among overtures as Fidelio among operas. Schumann's long-known overture to Manfred has also been given; but it passed with [illegible] effect, while Auber's Il [illegible] and Rossini's Guillaume Tell have been welcomed with enthusiasm. And yet Schumann's overture was played to perfection. Add to the foregoing, an excellent march by Mendelssohn—a Funeral March for the young composer Norbert Burgmüller and a Festival March to celebrate a visit of the famous painter Cornelius to Dresden—both though [illegible] expressed, being calculated to increase our respect and admiration for that composer; and we have finished the whole catalogue of orchestral pieces produced at the Crystal Palace in the annual concerts now approaching their termination.

In the way of solos, with orchestral accompaniment, we have had Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor, played by Madame Schumann as no one else can now ever did or ever [illegible] to play her late husband's music. Mendelssohn's No. [illegible] in D minor, and, [illegible] all to the gifted lady and Beethoven's in E flat, the chief of all concertos, no matter what the former mentioned many [illegible], finished performance of which then that by Madame Arabella Goddard can hardly be imagined.

The vocal music in these concerts is of little account, nor has there been any [illegible] of sufficient consequence to call for particular notice.

* Mendelssohn long entertained the idea of filling up this sketch.

Monday Popular Concerts in London.

(From the Saturday Review.)

In reviewing the Monday Popular Concerts it is of more importance to take into consideration the works performed than the manner of their performance. The seven concerts that preceded Christmas, and the none that began the present year, did not enjoy the [illegible] advantage of Herr Joachim's aid as leader [illegible] but they were full of good as interest. Herr Ludwig Straus and M. Sainton are both excellent players, and Signor Piatti, who is engaged from one end of the season to the other, knows no rival as a violoncellist, so that, with Herr L. Ries, second violin from the commencement, and Mr. Henry Blagrove, who holds the post of principal tenor left vacant by the death of Mr. H. Webb, the quartets were invariably well executed. Herr Joachim made his first appearance in the middle of February, and has taken part in every concert since. The pianists most frequently heard have been Mr. Charles Hallé, who began the season in November, and Madame Schumann, who appeared at the end of January. Herr Pauer has played at more than three or four concerts, and Madame Arabella Goddard at some two or three.

Beethoven, according to established custom, has occupied the prominent position which in such entertainments belongs by right to the greatest and, considering the immense value of his artwork, most prolific of instrumental composers. His quartets, quintets, trios, piano sonatas, &c., have been repeatedly brought forward, and in no single instance has any composition of his failed to evoke sympathy. Excepting the G major and D minor, op. 29, a little, the [illegible] trios, do not count, all the pianoforte sonatas but two had already been introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts. These two were No. 1, op. 14 (in E) and the so-named "sonatina" op. 9 (in G), both of which Mr. Charles Hallé, who had played them with his own "Beethoven Recitals," has now made familiar to a very different, a much more numerous, and it can hardly be said a less appreciative audience at St. James's Hall. Another [illegible] [illegible] in the summer, when he possesses of all his manner in a select and admiring circle. Last year M. Hallé produced the last sonata of op. 2 in F [illegible] in which the young Beethoven is seen [illegible] his himself a worthy rival of Mozart; and Madame Arabella Goddard [illegible] up an arrangement by herself, a [illegible] with the enormously difficult [illegible] B flat op. 106, the colossal proportions of which have gained it the title of "the Ninth Symphony for the Piano." So that not one of the 32 solo sonatas of Beethoven remains to be heard by Mr. Chappell's habitual and appreciative audience. A chance might now be awarded to his lesser works for the pianoforte—rondos, variations, &c.—which are all more or less genial and engaging. Another [illegible] [illegible] by Mr. Hallé during the early part of the season was the introduction for the first time, of the lovely Mozart-like quintet in E flat, op. 16, for pianoforte and wind instruments, which delighted every hearer. Madame Arabella Goddard, ever [illegible] beside a less good music a concerned has completed the series of sonatas for pianoforte and violin, by performing with Herr Straus the tenth of the ten—the one in G, last of all and the best ascribed [illegible] which he left. Mozart's [illegible] of [illegible] in Beethoven [illegible] which [illegible] the more effect [illegible] has been [illegible] any such [illegible] Franz Schubert had upon Schubert [illegible] lesson to repeat being too much for the [illegible]. These additions to the repertory of Beethoven, all of whose quartets, quintets, &c., and a ready have [illegible], would almost suffice to mark the season. But there were other novelties which count among [illegible], whose [illegible] wealth of resources and [illegible] those [illegible], has been allowed to remain [illegible] in language unfamiliar to the frequenters of St. James's Hall. The melodious and beautiful trio in E major of that master was played for the first time by Mr. Hallé, in conjunction with Herr Straus and Signor Piatti, and caused a general feeling of surprise that it should so long have been neglected. This trio, the sixth of eight written by Mozart for piano, violin, and violoncello, was composed in 1788, the year in which the three famous orchestral symphonies—in E flat, G minor, and C (the "Jupiter")—were composed. Again Madame Arabella Goddard as zealous for Mozart as for Beethoven, made the public acquainted with the charming sonata in E flat, the third of six sonatas for pianoforte composed in 1777, to which Mozart refers in several letters, he having himself performed them at Augsburg, Munich, and elsewhere.

Among the welcome revivals must also be mentioned the quartet in C (fugue) and a quintet in F minor by Haydn. The first (one of six quartets written by [illegible] brought forward by Herr Strauss, the last by M. Sainton. Each of these is remarkable, more particularly the quartet in F minor, which contains a finale in the fugued style, showing Haydn as a contrapuntal writer at his very best. Mr.

Chappell has now concluded to [illegible] of the [illegible] quartets by the father of instrumental music; and we shall look to him from time to time for further specimens. He must not leave all to the "Good fiddler," whoever the "head fiddler" at the period may happen to be, but must select occasionally for himself. No doubt a good many of the best of Haydn's quartets have been heard; but others not less worthy consideration remain [illegible].

Even Handel has been ransacked for new contributions to the Monday Popular Concerts. All that was known of him before by the St. James's Hall public, except an organ concerto or two, introduced by Mr. Best and Mr. E. J. Hopkins in 1866, consisted of some fugues and other selections from his "Suites de Pièces," and especially the Fugue in E minor, and the variations on the air of "The Harmonious Blacksmith" (so often played by Madame Goddard). [illegible] Herr Joachim has fished [illegible] of the waters of oblivion a sonata in A major, one of six violin solos composed by Handel for a certain Prince of Wales, and introduced it, with a somewhat guessed-at pianoforte accompaniment from the pen of Herr Ferdinand David—violinist of old [illegible] at Leipsic [illegible]. [illegible] This sonata is not of remarkable value. Nevertheless, it [illegible] Herr Joachim [illegible] proper [illegible]; and, because Herr Joachim played [illegible] the melodious largo, [illegible] it is delightful, and [illegible] the last movement. To the best of our belief, however, Handel himself [illegible] from a public performance of this, or, indeed, any sonata of the series. Not so with Handel's contemporary, J. S. Bach, to all [illegible] have [illegible] to hear under similar circumstances the prelude [illegible], [illegible] in his own six violin solo [illegible], incomparably as they were executed by Signor Piatti. These pieces of Bach, in fact, [illegible] intended as [illegible] exercises.

Hummel's not very lively quintet in E flat minor, for pianoforte and string instruments, introduced by Mr. Hallé, probably to exhibit the extreme [illegible] of his fingers, was [illegible]. Two of all the pieces of this [illegible] composer. His celebrated septet in D minor for piano, wind, and strings, [illegible] pianoforte trio [illegible] F minor, [illegible] and his longest, most elaborate and most difficult, in D major, [illegible] (the E minor introduced by Herr Pauer, the D major by Madame Goddard) had always made a genuine [illegible]. The "Military Septet," and the pianoforte trios op. 12, 65, and 93, [illegible] and also, as [illegible] the quintet in E flat minor—choose such [illegible] of [illegible] anything [illegible] of its kind. Some [illegible] Weber, by Mr. [illegible], also introduced into a recent programme by Mr. Hallé, ought never to have found a hearing at the Monday Popular Concerts, nor were they heard, as the saying is, "with rapture." Weber has written much better things than these, which Mr. Hallé, who is well aware of the fact, might have borne in mind. [illegible] were [illegible] acceptable, indeed, in the [illegible] the solo sonata in A minor of Schubert, op. 42, one of the most original, [illegible] and [illegible] of works [illegible] great genius, who achieved so much during his brief [illegible] has dedicated to the [illegible]. For this Mr. Hallé, who has played [illegible] concerts, [illegible] gratitude had he given the trio of the scherzo in its proper movement—that [illegible] a little slower ("[illegible]"), than [illegible] instead of [illegible] is [illegible] a kind of sentimental after-dinner song.

New and most interesting among the [illegible] on [illegible] of note all made known through the Monday Popular Concerts, must be named an eighth book of Lieder ohne Worte, a solo pianoforte [illegible] in B flat and a sonata in D, for pianoforte and string [illegible], by Mendelssohn.

That the [illegible] season of the season of Herr Joachim is of especial importance no one can doubt. This greatest of all [illegible] has never played more superbly than now. In Beethoven's "Razumoffsky" quartet, No. 3, [illegible] on the night of his first appearance, in [illegible] Mozart's [illegible] in G minor quintet, the E [illegible] quartet of Mendelssohn, No. 2, op. 44, Mozart's No. 6, [illegible] C, the second of Beethoven's quintets (C major) and [illegible] of all the great quartets in A minor of the same [illegible] the [illegible] of the so-called "Posthumous," Herr Joachim more [illegible] than ever has shown that [illegible] the very highest position that can possibly [illegible] by an executive artist, [illegible] of England [illegible] of Europe generally [illegible] to Herr Joachim. At the same time Herr Joachim [illegible] that nowhere else in Europe can he meet [illegible] so [illegible] an associate on another instrument in every way so worthy to be associated with him as Signor Piatti.

It is something for "unmusical England" to boast of, that when this unparalleled German comes among us we can furnish him with an Italian violoncellist like Signor Piatti for his quartets, and an English pianist like Madame Goddard for his duets and trios.

Of the vocal music which at these entertainments is usually of subordinate interest, it is enough to say that it has been generally well selected, for the most part well sung, and—Mr. Benedict wielding the pencil as he has held from the beginning—invariably well accompanied.

At the concert last year for the "benefit" of the director—in accordance with custom, the final concert of the series—Bach's concerto in D minor for three pianofortes was performed by [illegible] pianists who had stood among them the chief honors of their department (Mme. Schumann, Miss. Goddard, and Mr. Hallé) [illegible] the principal musicians and created the lively sensation which might have been anticipated. There were an "ancores," and the old master's design was followed reverentially. [illegible] original [illegible] being given. Instead of the first allegro of the concerto in C major which, [illegible] (D for the purpose) [illegible] has been frequently preferred in consequence of the increased [illegible] and the superior strength of the [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] of the concert [illegible] have been [illegible]. In this performance [illegible] a possible [illegible] another performance of the greatest [illegible] of the [illegible] Hall, by the [illegible] the [illegible] concerto in C major [illegible] to be played, as the [illegible], "ab [illegible]" and accompanied, as was the composer by MM. Joachim, L. Ries, H. Blagrove, and Piatti (string quartet).

On Thursday, owing to the illness of Mlle. Tietjens and Signor Frapolli, the Barbiere was substituted for Lucrezia, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini (Rosina), Signor Bettini (Almaviva), Signor Gassier (Figaro), Signor Zoboli (Bartolo), Signor Foli (Basilio), and Mlle. Corsi (Berta). In the "Lesson scene" Mme. Trebelli introduced a waltz by Signor Alary.

On Saturday Il Trovatore—for the benefit of Mlle. Clara Louisa Kellogg.

On Tuesday Il Trovatore—with Mlle. Sinico (Leonora), Mme. Trebelli-Bettini (Azucena), Sig. Fraschini (Manrico), Mr. Santley (Conte di Luna), and Sig. Foli (Ferrando).

On Thursday Linda di Chamouni—with Mlle. Kellogg (Linda), Mme. Trebelli-Bettini (Pierotto), Sig. Bettini (Carlo), Mr. Santley (Antonio), Sig. Foli (the Prefect), and Sig. Zoboli (the Marquis).

Mozart's Don Giovanni on Saturday, with Mlles. Tietjens, [illegible] and Sinico, Signori Bossi and Gassier Zoboli. [illegible] Don Giovanni [illegible] week in the season before. [illegible] Mlle. Tietjens has been [illegible] and her reappearance as Donna Anna [illegible] the [illegible] of her old strength and powers. There is no Real Donna Anna on the stage than hers, and never was one finer. The grand [illegible] of dramatic [illegible] the [illegible], the Batti, batti [illegible] the [illegible] Protegga il giusto ciel [illegible] with [illegible] and [illegible], and electrified the audience. Mlle. Kellogg's Zerlina [illegible] full of [illegible] feelings shall [illegible] by the [illegible] of her voice and [illegible] by the purity and simplicity of the conception, [illegible] variety of the [illegible] beauty [illegible] charming points. Mlle. Sinico played the [illegible] part of Elvira [illegible], and sang [illegible] well. [illegible] were the Ottavio of Sig. Bettini, the [illegible] Gassier, the Leporello of Sig. Zoboli, and the Commendatore of Sig. Foli.

On Tuesday "Faust e Margherita" was given, and on Thursday Le Nozze di Figaro, with the following cast,—Almaviva Mr. Santley; Figaro Sig. Gassier; Basilio, Sig. Zoboli; Bartolo, Mr. Lyall; Don Curzio, Sig. Rinaldi; Antonio, Sig. Casaboni; Cherubino, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini; Marcellina, Mlle. Corsi; Susanna, Mlle. Sinico; and La Contessa, Mlle. Tietjens.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The Theatre opened on Tuesday, March 31, with Norma.

On Thursday Verdi's Don Carlos was performed with Mlle. Fioretti (Elisabetta—in place of Mlle. Lucca), Sig. Naudin (Carlos), Sig. Graziani (Rodrigo), Sig. Bagagiolo (Grand Inquisitor), M. Petit (Philip II.), Sig. Rossi (Herald), and Sig. Fallar (Friar).

Saturday Rigoletto, for the début of two new singers, Mlle. Vanzini and Meyer and the first appearance of Sig. Mario.

The début on Thursday of Mlle. Vanzini at Covent Garden, as Oscar in the "Ballo in Maschera," was awaited with much pleasant interest. She is a graceful and a [illegible] actress [illegible] a [illegible] and singing [illegible] sweetness and compass. [illegible] capitally [illegible] the rôle of the page, who is [illegible] in the hands of [illegible]. In the [illegible] scene [illegible] in an [illegible] encore. As the [illegible] Mlle. Mang was overweighted: [illegible] merely sufficient for such a part [illegible] passion and vocal power. Amelia was played by Mme. Fricci and Renato by Sig. Graziani. Mario was in very good voice.

On Saturday Mlle. Vanzini appeared as Elvira of the "Puritani," given for the first time this season, while Sig. Mario was Arturo. Many years have passed since this opera, written specially for the wonderful quartet, Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache has been performed at Covent Garden; its return was therefore singularly welcome. Mlle. Vanzini's excellent voice, its sweet and clear in the upper register and her wonderful vocalization, would be no substitute for that quality which Mlle. Vanzini lacks—the subtle quality which we may call inspiration. Her singing [illegible] admiration, but her dramatic skill [illegible] deficient. But [illegible] supplied the place of dramatic charm, and compelled an encore in the "Vergin vezzosa." Sig. Mario's [illegible] of much feeling and passion, and interpreted the "A te o Cara" with [illegible] pathos and tenderness, such as almost hid the deficiency of a [illegible] voice.—Orchestra.

The Athenæum says of the London season that it is Signor Verdi rules the hour at the time being. We have had his oppressive "Don Carlo," his pretentious "La Traviata," his repulsive "Rigoletto," all within the compass of a very few days. There is no need to re-state the judgment already passed between the theory and [illegible], in which the art is [illegible] to such extravagance of effect as to lose [illegible] the semblance of Art, and to smack [illegible] theatricality. The composer, in his later works, has lost that spontaneity of melody which carried his audiences at first, and has affected [illegible] upon a most slender basis of construction, [illegible] to support his fancies and embroideries. Yet his works are drawn, while the superb "Semiramide" of Signor Rossini—[illegible] the grand [illegible] of Mlle. Tietjens, and the real vocal grace of Mme. Trebelli (the most accomplished contralto we know at the present)—are received with indifference. There is some hope, as the first act of her opera [illegible] brought to it, a [illegible] of the Nowman's [illegible] in his management of his [illegible] that Sig. Verdi's [illegible] [illegible] together [illegible] "La Traviata," Mlle. Kellogg (who has [illegible] made her mark and won a place on our public) [illegible] year's season. In "Rigoletto" the vocal honors [illegible] of Mme. Fioretti carried off the obvious discrepancy between the person and the part.

BOSTON, MAY 9, 1868.

First Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society.

Musical interest has its center for this week at least in Boston. Five great Oratorios in one week grandly given by a well balanced and trained force of 750 voices, with an orchestra of more than a hundred instruments, the best solo singers of the country and one of the grandest organs in the world as well as the noblest Music Hall in the whole country—besides four Symphony Concerts, with splendid programmes and by such an orchestra,—this may indeed be called a Festival. Now there might be more of smoke than fire in all this; the American people often err in the ambition to do things on a bigger scale than others, to compel cheap wonder by display of quantity, with too small regard to quality. So the great Festival might have been a mainly [illegible] satisfactory self-glorifying enterprise, a piling of Ossa upon Pelion of imposing "monster" concerts of doubtful influence on musical taste and culture, compared with the usual more quiet influences. But both the spirit and the matter and the manner of it forbid that supposition. The musical matter chosen was all of the highest, almost worth, deserving large interpretation, and to be rendered with care and scale sympathy by a general sympathy; the means of execution are adequate in every sense; the labor of arrangement, organization and rehearsal has been earnest and continuing and all prompted by an artistic desire to make all these means cooperate with ease and certainty in a performance as nearly perfect as possible in this busy and distracting world, and in an Indian-summer season particularly trying to singers' throats and, to the whole musical and moral tempo of any but an utterly unsensitive "harp of a thousand strings."

Our old Handel and Haydn Society made a brave first experiment of musical festivals in May, 1857. In spite of bad weather, of the amount of public scepticism or indifference then to be overcome, and of the comparatively small means then at their command (although unprecedented in this country for that time), the measure of success was, to say the least, convincing; the plan was deemed it resumed, after a few more trials, with more means and experience, and growing more in the community to meet the institutions half way. A prime condition of that effect was our possession of a worthy Music Hall. Three years ago, May, 1865, the Society chose the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary for another and more matured attempt, and on a larger scale. By that time the Great Organ stood in the Hall, a proud hope realized. The love of chorus practice had spread more among our people; not a few of the most cultivated classes contributing a share at last to the vocal ranks, and the Society under zealous and judicious management was in better condition than ever before. Public interest, too, in great music of all kinds had grown more and more encouraging, and a bolder, higher aim (this time instead of a three days' Festival as in '57 it was for a whole week), the chorus at its fullest numbered 600 voices, and the orchestra of 85 had been raised to 100), yet cautious as it was held, secured a signal success. Though it cost more than $11,000 not only were the guarantors not taxed as before, but there was left a balance of $4,000 to be divided between the two great War charities and the Society's own fund for further musical undertakings.

This week the Society inaugurates the custom of a great Triennial Musical Festival. It has felt the musical temper of the community and the musical means of the country clearly and long enough, and now feels its own strength and tendency and temper well enough to be able to resolve that the thing now, on the third trial, done with something like completeness and with the assurance of success at through every stage of its preparation, is not for once, but from this time forward shall become the custom, a great feast of music to come round as regularly as that in Birmingham every third year in Boston.

The present Festival goes as far beyond that of 1865, as that went beyond the one of 1857. The foundations have been laid broad and deep, and all the preparation made with judgment, energy and skill. The guaranty fund subscribed by 200 individuals and firms amounts to nearly $30,000; but there is not the slightest fear that any one will be called upon to pay a dollar; the sale of tickets for the season and for each day's Oratorio and Concert soon made the thing financially sure. The chorus of the Society never sang in so well before; at rehearsal, in quality of tone, or in the right sort of musical spirit, has been kept in rehearsal nearly all winter in the execution, and loads of the hard parts of the Ninth Symphony and M. Zerrahn's drill has been more careful and searching, as well as more inspiring, even than before. The parts are uncommonly well covered. According to the printed list, contained in the handsomely printed and convenient Book Programme of the Festival, the Soprano singers number 230, the Alto 171, the Tenor 137, and the Bass 204, making a total of 71[illegible] voices. For several weeks past there have been four rehearsals in a week and so nearly filled have been the whole half circle of the lower (Bumstead) Hall with actual singers, that there has been small room for listeners. For solo singers, although the hopes which for some time rested upon one or two of the famous English singers and upon the great German baritone Stockhausen were disappointed, the government have been able to present a goodly list, headed by Mme. PAREPA-ROSA, and Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, such a host in herself, and reinforcing with such names of good soundness as Miss J. E. HOUSTON, Mrs. CARY, Mr. GEORGE SIMPSON, of New York (who sang also in our first Festival), and Messrs.

James Whitney, J. F. Winch, M. White, J. F. Rudolphsen and M. W. Whitney. Two distinguished instrumental soloists were engaged, not for the afternoon concerts,—Miss Alide Topp the young German Pianist, pupil of von Bülow, and Mr. Carl Rosa the violinist. The grand orchestra is larger than that of three years ago, and numbers [illegible] musicians. To the sixty odd of our own who have been knit together and consolidated and refined during the last three years by the good auspices afforded by the Harvard Symphony Concerts, are added about [illegible] of the best members of the New York Philharmonic Society and several from Philadelphia,—among them many welcome faces of the old "Germania." The proportions are excellent,—[illegible] first violins, headed by our own William Schultze with Julius Eichberg as Lieutenant; [illegible] second violins; [illegible] violas, [illegible] violoncellos, [illegible] double basses; [illegible] flutes, besides piccolo; 4 oboes; 4 clarionets; [illegible] bassoons; [illegible] horns; [illegible] trumpets; [illegible] trombones; 2 [illegible]; 1 harp; [illegible] sorts of percussion. But our record will be more interesting if we give the names,—

[illegible]

The New York and Philadelphia quota of the orchestra [illegible] arrived Sunday (May 3) and [illegible] in rehearsals,—in the morning of the grand orchestral symphonies and overtures, and of the Schumann Concerto with the delightful Alide Topp;—in the evening, of the opening concert of the Festival for Tuesday evening. The last was a public rehearsal, each of the nearly 600 singers being allowed to bring a friend, while all the remaining space of the great Hall was given to [illegible] of [illegible] a dollar for admission. For the first time the [illegible] there [illegible] of instrumental [illegible] brought together where [illegible] difficulty there was not much of a good [illegible]. [illegible] on the one side, and the Conductor on the other [illegible] upon the platform, the [illegible] tiers upon [illegible] other steps, [illegible] upon [illegible] side [illegible] where [illegible] Tenors and Basses [illegible]. They [illegible] themselves [illegible] the organ, [illegible] and [illegible] away up in the second balcony above, and still more remained outside [illegible] the hall and [illegible] no place or "coigne of vantage" whence to join their voices with their brethren, while the great choir and orchestra and organ rolled out their mighty floods of harmony. [illegible] was an [illegible] formidable [illegible] across the [illegible] side, and [illegible] many [illegible] than [illegible] natural shrinkage has to be allowed for. [illegible] of Handel and Haydn Society experience that to make sure of 600 singers, at least 800 [illegible] be invited. What, should they all accept! [illegible]—on Tuesday morning, showed Opening of the Festival.

Tuesday, May 5, was in all respects a bright, auspicious day. Even the weather of this so far bleak and a lazy Spring for [illegible] much of a delightful. By the appointed hour of eleven, the large and eager audience were in their places, [illegible] the pile of orchestra and singers—the latter reduced to a [illegible] 600—flooded all the stage space and only the adjoining lower balconies; and at that moment the Music Hall indeed presented a beautiful and brilliant aspect, yet with [illegible] for extra ornament. What then followed may as well be told in the language of the Advertiser:

In the lull that ensued after the principals and the conductor had been welcomed to their places, Dr. Upham, President of the Society, stepped forward and spoke as follows:

"I will detain you, ladies and gentlemen, only for a single moment. Three years ago about this time, the Handel and Haydn Society celebrated here the fiftieth anniversary of their existence as an incorporated body.

"To-day they inaugurate what [illegible] of musical performances which they hope may prove to be [illegible] of a long and unbroken [illegible] of triennial festivals [illegible] and on a scale somewhat [illegible] with those great musical gatherings which for more than half a century have been [illegible] at Birmingham, and [illegible] in [illegible] at Liverpool or Worcester, at [illegible] York, and [illegible] in Great Britain, and more recently in the larger cities along the valley of the Rhine in Germany. What shall be the success of this undertaking remains to be seen.

"It becomes my duty, as it is also my [illegible] and [illegible] privilege, to welcome you to the feast, and, on behalf of the [illegible] government and of the members of the society over which I have the honor to preside, to thank you sincerely and most cordially for the evidence you have given by your presence here this morning of your sympathy and cooperation in the purpose [illegible] before us.

"I will only add that it has seemed [illegible] of the Music Hall [illegible] an appropriate occasion on which to place [illegible] the rare and beautiful sculptures which have recently been presented to the [illegible] by Miss Charlotte Cushman, and which are now for the first time to be publicly seen.

"These are the busts of Beethoven, of Palestrina, and of Mozart,—designed by W. Rohe. [illegible], a Danish sculptor [illegible] at Rome, who was a companion and co-worker with Thorwaldsen, and whose works, I [illegible] to say, now share fellowship and equality with those of the great masters [illegible] named, [illegible] of Canova and of Dannecker.

"It is a beautiful custom, in the cities of the Old World, to connect the first exhibition of a work of art with imposing pageants and ceremony.

> 'As of yore the sweet Egyptians met the sea with choral song,
> With their golden rafts [illegible] the [illegible] along;
> As along the streets of Florence [illegible] procession went > Cimabue's famed Madonna [illegible] by voice and instrument.'

"So, as I have said, it has seemed most appropriate [illegible] and [illegible] here to associate the unveiling of these creations of a kindred art—the almost [illegible] portraitures of the great masters of Tonal [illegible],—with their own solemn revelations in symphony and in song."

As Dr. Upham ended his brief and judicious preface the curtain [illegible] and [illegible] hanging against the rear wall of the Music Hall was let fall and there were disclosed the busts of Palestrina and of Mozart, poised upon their symbolical brackets, one on the right and the other on the left of the Apollo Belvidere. Many of the audience rose eagerly in their places, the ladies waved their handkerchiefs, and [illegible] gift was acknowledged with many a token of appreciation and pleasure. For the rest, [illegible] and bracket—the Beethoven—were placed [illegible] decided upon, and they are temporarily set up in the lesser vestibule.

Then Zerrahn waved the baton, and at the voices and the instruments and the great Organ [illegible] which [illegible] Mr. B. J. Lang [illegible] at once upon the [illegible], in all their might and splendor, in the Choral, "Ein feste Burg," with which Nicolai begins his Festive Overture. We [illegible] in saying that the whole concert was a magnificent success, and that the three works, the Choral Overture, the 98th Psalm and the "Hymn of Praise" by Mendelssohn were indeed admirably rendered, Mme. Rosa and Miss [illegible] being [illegible] and Mr. Simpson [illegible] in the tenor solos. Indeed, we think we never heard so [illegible] performance on the whole so perfect, so electrifying, as that of the "Hymn of Praise" on Tuesday [illegible] the opening symphonic movements and the vocal part which follows,—"Sleepers" went almost equally well in the evening; and glorious was the Symphony Concert of Wednesday afternoon, of which the [illegible] was the wonderful piano performance (Beethoven's Concerto and one of Liszt's Rhapsodies Hongroises) by Miss Alide Topp.—But, we must reserve these tempting topics and complete the story of the Festival next time.

Musical Correspondence.

Washington, May 3.—Walt. Whitman writes somewhere in his prose poetry [illegible] music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments." You can easily imagine then what [illegible] awoke in me and a [illegible] last week I was reminded of by the instruments of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club; what pleasant memories coming back now [illegible] upon a score of years (for this is their [illegible] season) [illegible] of all that is sweetest and best in music and in friendship, memories of such and so many pleasant evenings in many pleasant places, chief among them, as [illegible] and many friends remember those rooms where Ary Scheffer's Dante and Beatrice, and Crawford's Beethoven looked down [illegible] among other gems of all beautiful art [illegible] the delightful [illegible]. You can [illegible] the [illegible] indeed pleasure to see the [illegible] of the Club here and the [illegible] friendly countenance of Mr. J. C. D. Parker who came with them. They gave two concerts in [illegible] Hall, a place not congenial for that sort of music. It is too long and [illegible], and at these [illegible] nevertheless on both evenings was well filled with the very [illegible] of the musical people of this city where you see people from all the corners of the earth. For example, on those evenings sat not far apart the official representatives of Abdul Medjid (if that is the right name of the present Sultan), of Her Majesty Victoria and of Kamehameha,—King of the Sandwich Islands! If [illegible] had not been a concert of classical [illegible] His Excellency would have been present [illegible] from the [illegible] the Rocky Mountains. He [illegible] I [illegible] here [illegible] and appreciative of the very excellent programme which was given.

This is all that I can tell you and it is needless to say how they played what you often heard so often, unless it is to say that to all the audience it was a [illegible] of good things in a place where good things are rare indeed. The solos by Messrs. Parker [illegible] and [illegible] of course received their due share of commendation. The Mendelssohn Club have many friends here, and will always be sure of a hearty welcome.

About the same time the "Philharmonic Society" gave very acceptably (in some respects very well, though it is a miniature one), The Messiah. The chorus numbers some hundred and fifty remarkably good voices and remarkably well drilled by their conductor, Mr. J. P. Caulfield, whose brother Mr. W. W. Caulfield, leader of an orchestra (which alas, cannot be had here) played admirable accompaniment, while Mrs. J. P. Caulfield, sang the pianoforte. With such intelligent professional aid from this family, a good deal of real life has been infused into the Society. Mrs. Mozart (well known in Boston), Mr. Simpson, of New York, and Mr. F. C. Chase of this city gave the solo songs as well as we hear them anywhere, save in rare exceptions, so that the performance was one to be greatly enjoyed, in spite of a limited scale. Best of all though, is the good influence exerted in that way to be carried, in such a place as this in favor of good music, by such a body of cultivated amateurs.

Then came three nights of German opera, the same good company we have often heard in Boston; but Faust I have never heard so badly done as they sang it. The orchestra was abominable, the chorus only less bad, so that even the most charming Fred[illegible] and Himmer, with Johannsen and Hermanns lost all their charm in such surroundings. The second night they gave Fra Diavolo and the third night Martha, more within the grasp of an orchestra apparently improvised, and therefore better done; the last night being by far the best of the three, Johannsen and Frederici singing in it, the latter's one of the most charming Nancys I ever heard, as you can easily imagine, so fresh and sweet in voice, face and action that she, acts so well suited to the part.

Next week we are to have La Grande Duchesse and La Belle Hélène and then I suppose for all music must fall back upon the Marine Band. The public grounds of the Capitol and the White House are green as June, fragrant as can be with violets and hyacinths and all spring blossoms; the ladies are ready with their finery from the latter "opening" and it is indeed time for the band to play.

FLORENCE (Italy). MARCH 30. My dear Journal: I have the pleasure of sending you the programme* of an agreeable little musical entertainment given last week by the "Cherubini Society." We have about forty members of nearly every nation under the sun, but meet on the common ground of music and English. Like Mr. Parker's club in Boston, we have weekly rehearsals for the study of good music, and occasionally give our friends the benefit of our labors. I think it is the only society of the kind in Florence, and opportunities of hearing other than Italian Opera music and that not of the best, are rare. On this occasion, we had present Mme. Rosellini, the daughter of Cherubini, a most charming looking old lady who by chance was passing through Florence. After the performance of the Cherubini Motet, a superb bouquet was given to her by the Society as a slight tribute to the genius and memory of her honored parent.

We are now hard at work on the "St. Elisabeth" of Liszt, and hope to get ready for our third and last concert the end of April, before all the world is busy with the Feste for the Royal Wedding which are to take place the first two days of May. Will, behold the very great violinist, is to play for us, and it is whispered the Abbé himself is coming to conduct one performance. He is the master and friend of our accomplished conductor, and takes much interest in the efforts for the culture of good art in the [illegible]. It is an odd idea in this land of music and fine arts not so much as a trace of Chorus could be found! We wished one very much to decorate our platform for the concert. We have suggested to our [illegible] that a Florentine lent some Chorus, that it would be well to make a companion to his Lind bust. Of course you have heard how delightful Liszt is with his Chickering Piano. He had to taken to the top of the Hochgifted Palace for a musical party at which he was to play and accompany one of our best young lady amateurs; one of Boston. A compliment to America all round, was it not?

OUT OF THE CITIES.

HARTFORD, CONN.—On Good Friday Haydn's Passion Music and "Creation" were performed by the Beethoven Society with the aid of Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Mr. Geo. Simpson of New York, and Mr. M. W. Whitney of Boston, and an efficient orchestra selected from the New York Philharmonic Society,—and most successfully, if we may trust the newspapers and an anonymous correspondent. The conductor was that zealous and intelligent musician J. G. Barnett, on whom Yale College recently conferred the honor of the Musical Doctorate. The Hartford people seem to be unqualified in their admiration of Mme. Rosa, especially one enthusiastic printer who, in compliment to "the magnificent Queen of Song," prepared a programme and a little book of words which is indeed a gem of exquisite typography with illuminated borders, and all in perfect taste. This display of printer's art seems to have quite upset our anonymous correspondent's notions of the relations of things, when he says that the Hartford Society, "in being indirectly the means of so[illegible] such a compliment" to "the great artist" "may now claim a position second to none of the world where she has appeared!"

The same correspondent speaks, furthermore, of the last performance of a Fairy Opera, "The Triumph of Spring," the words and music both by Mr. Hewes. It proved very pleasing, well adapted for stage effect, the words piquant, brilliant, with a spice of fun.

PHILADELPHIA. The Handel and Haydn Society performed Judas Maccabæus in their third and last concert April 17. Carl Sentz conducted. The leading parts were well sustained, being entrusted to Mrs. Sophie Mozart, of New York, soprano; Mr. Theo. Jones and Mr. Gilchrist and Mr. Barnhurst, basses. With the exception of Mrs. Mozart therefore, the singers taking the principal parts are all Philadelphians, and acquitted themselves with great credit.

The Mendelssohn Society, a young and prosperous organization, gave the last of its concerts, at the Academy of Music in compliment to their leader, Mr. Jean Louis. The entertainment commenced by the performance of the overture to the Magic Flute of Mozart by the superior orchestra of Carl Sentz, consisting of forty performers. The very best effort of the day made up this fine force of instrumentalists, and they acquitted themselves with that degree of credit which might have been expected.

The splendid Choral Fantasia of Beethoven, in which the Society have on their previous concerts distinguished themselves, was given with elegant taste and finish. Mr. Carl Wolfsohn performed the piano solo with that consummate grace and brilliancy for which he stands preeminent in the rendition of the classic music of Beethoven, in Philadelphia, and the chorus was given with abandon by the Society. The Rondo Brillante of Mendelssohn, a piano solo of much beauty was to have been performed by Mr. Henry G. Thunder, but was necessarily postponed in consequence of his sudden indisposition of that gentleman.

The Duet Tobie by Mozart was sung, with spirit and expression by Miss Gulie A. Cunnington and Miss Josephine Schimpf both of whose merits are well and favorably known in that city. Miss Cunnington is the daughter of Dr. Cunnington, our Philadelphia maestro, possessing a well-formed soprano of superior culture.

Hiller's Lorlea was the next piece in the programme the solos being given with splendid effect by Mrs. Behrens and Mr. Habelmann. A singular drawback to that part of the performance, however was, that Mrs. Behrens sang in English and Mr. Habelmann in German. The concert closed with Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night.

The Ninth Beethoven Matinée was given by Mr. Carl Wolfsohn on Friday afternoon at the Foyer of the Academy of Music, Miss Rosa Frenckel singing songs by Schubert and Mendelssohn, and much of Beethoven's piano works performed by Mr. Wolfsohn. Amongst these were the Grand Sonata in B flat, No. 1 in the Sonata Opus 22, No. 1, in E flat major and the last Sonata of Beethoven, his "Sonata Termasse."

Whole No. 708 | BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1866 | Vol. XXVIII No. 5.

Darwin's "Development" Theory applied to Music.

From the Leipzig Signale, of April 17, we translate the following notice of a curious book which has recently appeared in Germany:

"Musikalische Studien" (Musical Studies), by Wilhelm Tappert. Published by Guttentag, Berlin.

The book contains six essays: "Wandernde Melodien" (Wandering Melodies); "Ein Umbildungsprocess" (A Transformation Process); "Der übermässige Dreiklang" (The Superfluous Triad); "Die alterirten Accorde" (The Altered Accords); "Ein Dogma" (A Dogma); "Tonplastik in Tönen" (Modeling of Sounds in Tones). In general, in these essays, the author places himself among the believers in the recent [illegible] development of the musical art, and, by closely examining and tracing this development, makes it raise his faith to clear conviction. This is all very well in itself, for only the most narrow intellect can maintain that there is any such thing in Art (or anywhere else) as an instantaneous arbitrary fiat from above, and, consequently, that hundredth [illegible] and experiences may be known as single phases of development, where, on the contrary, one thing stands upon the shoulders of another. But now Herr Tappert brings the Darwin theory of transformation and progression into the field and seeks to carry it over into music, by an attempt to show that all tone-forms are derived from a few organisms, developing themselves in the long run by a natural process. That too, apparently, is not so bad; only in our opinion there is but little gained toward the knowledge of our Art and of its development upon the whole, when the author, in support of his Darwinian view, takes a bit of melody out of some old Protestant Choral or Hymn book, popular Song, or what not, and then proceeds to hunt and point out again the same bit of melody in the same form, or somewhat modified ("transformed," as Herr Tappert likes to have it), in the most different compositions of succeeding times. This he does in the first two essays, where, for example, at the very beginning of the first he searches a phrase out of a Tragus Protestantis of the 16th century, and accompanies it upon its "wanderings" through the ages, faithfully reporting how and where it has settled down for some length of time, what traces of it still appear in Germany, France, Italy, &c. and how it is found made use of—to cite only one or two examples—in the beginning of Haydn's "God save the Emperor Francis," and not less at the beginning of the Coronation March in Meyerbeer's Prophète, (here, to be sure, considerably "transformed," or in other words, bearing only a remote resemblance).

In the second essay Herr Tappert goes still further; he takes the Tetrachord succession e, h, a, g and shows first in many examples its recurrence in itself, then what manifold "transformations" it has undergone (by additions, expansions, &c.) and how in this "transformed" way it meets one at every step, in ancient and modern, in church and theatre, in the street, the parlor, everywhere. The resemblances we get, in this transformation process, in its new forms, often lie very far apart both as to time and purpose, are no doubt often striking and also amusing; but how it is to be proved whether the transformation (conscious or unconscious it is all the same) has really revealed of itself, or whether we have not to do with Herr Tappert's own clever combination games? We might almost suppose the latter case; but then we have nothing further before us but a hunt for reminiscences pushed to a great scale (or rather to the smallest) which only does her sane entire the name of the Darwin theory we hunt needing to reconstruct the theory at all, if the point be merely to prove that "nothing new under the sun," or that "everything has been already once before." The author's industry in searching out and bringing together material, as well as his acuteness in conjecture and in combination, should be held in honor; but he may not hope that the world will take his arguments as entirely as he perhaps thinks them himself, or that the Darwin theory will be deemed of as much importance for the art of Music as it is for natural science. Indeed we must think the application of this theory to music—in spite of Herr Tappert—practicable only in the most vague and general outlines. A final decision, however, is reserved for one who is equally well versed in music and in the natural sciences,—a qualification to which the writer of these lines at least makes no claims.

In the third and fourth essays, as we have said, Herr Tappert occupies himself with the "Superfluous Triad" and with the "Altered Chords," chiefly with regard to their nature and their applicability. He soundly rates the theorists who in his opinion have not paid these chords due honor, and prognosticates for them a great future yet (the way in which he sees already paved in the productions of the "music of the Future," of whom he announces himself to be a zealous follower). The musical theorist and more especially the harmonist, by profession, will find much to interest him in these chapters of Herr Tappert's book, but also much to make him shake his head, much riding of hobbies with assumed principles.

The essay entitled "A Dogma" has for its subject various doctrines and prescriptions, laid down by the earlier theory as unalterable, but which nevertheless gradually have been cancelled; as, for example, "that the final chord of a piece of music must contain no Third; that the step of the tritone (f to b for instance) was never to be taken; that no piece of music might begin with any other than the tonic fundamental harmony and must close with the same," &c. &c. The examples he has adduced of both the former and the present usage are interesting and testify to the great reading of the author.

Very amusing is the concluding essay entitled "Tonplastik in Tönen." It brings together and compares the various attempts to represent musically a smile, and, as might be expected, Haydn's "Creation" affords a particularly rich crop of examples; but between the noted "animal imitations," out of other, especially older and newer musical works and the whole, in its mocking attitude towards tone-painting altogether has made so much sport.

Finally in respect of style and manner of presentation, Herr Tappert's book is fresh and often attractive through witty points and brilliant strokes of light. If one cannot approve all that the author thinks and would have us think, yet his "Musical Studies" must leave in every unprejudiced mind the impression of intellectual cleverness and of an honest will. Mendelssohn's Letters to Baermann.*

Paris.

And now to tell you the story at full length. The clarionet players here are in a miserable confusion; so I call in the orchestra of the Conservatoire, which is a most respectable truly admirable; there are no clarionets, so few of them fit to that poor sort of tone, miserable mode of playing, and not any farmer will go for anything in the world. The last one recently on the concert of the Pastoral Symphony commenced his solo a bar too soon, but went on puffing away as merrily as possible, never observing that it sounded quite infamous, and that some of the audience, and among others the undersigned, were sitting dreadfully very fierce; and that the director had got stomach rather the horn ought there to have done so, but took fright, and did not come in on which the violins took fright also and played softer and softer, on which the thing every moment became more like a Dutch concert, for they were all out, and only a movement or 3-4 time being slipped in hand, saved them from the disgrace of stopping there, and beginning all over again. So, as I was going home, I swore but an oath that I should think over the affair and [illegible] to myself "This is beyond bearing," and instantly resolved to write to you, as I let you all about it, and ask if you can look on quietly while the Parisian Clarionet world is going on in such a shabby fashion. For the fellow is a professor at the Conservatoire, and I understand the best here. The others are worse. Seriously, however, do you really feel no inclination to found a clarionet nursery here? I think it would be a very good plan, and sure to succeed; besides you had already a project to go to Paris, so I most strongly advise you to do so, for they have not the most remote idea of your instrument, and therefore would doubly appreciate it; it would also be a capital thing, in my opinion, if you were to bring one of your pupils with you, for instance your son Carl, for I am convinced that he would easily find a good and respectable livelihood here. This is, of course, merely a suggestion, but I wish you would reflect on it. Besides, you talk me to look round, and write to you if I could hear anything, for Carl, and I do so now as the season is at a good opportunity. I heard something of the kind last autumn in Leipzig, and said you wished to get an engagement for your son; he seemed much taken with his playing, and praised him highly; but I don't know whether anything resulted from it, as the orchestra appeared to be already complete. I saw a good deal of Lindpaintner during these few days, and feel a great liking for him. You are right in what you say of him; he is certainly very devoted to you, and if you had only accompanied me on that journey, it would indeed have been famous. At all events, I hope to return thither once more to enjoy with might and main music, flirting, and merry pranks, but then we must go there together. And now I will begin my letter.

Pesth, April 10, 1863.

Dear old [illegible] and Friend,

The above is the [illegible] of the story I began in Rome [see No. [illegible]], and Dohrn, who came in at the moment wishing to put in something of his own, wrote the postscript. How long it is since I heard from you! But I must first of all apologise for not having written to you for such a time. Do not take it amiss, my dear fellow, for it was impossible. I was as [illegible] as a porpoise and felt as miserable during the whole winter as a fish on dry land. There was always something amiss with me, and at length I became positively ill, and was obliged to stay in bed and submit to have my stomach rubbed by an old woman, to have warm cloths applied, to perspire a great deal, eat nothing, and undergo a great many [illegible] and [illegible] compresses, [illegible] every [illegible] at the devil, swallow my peppermint pills, and [illegible] to death. At last, by dint of constant perspirations, my bad humour and my stomach-ache were driven away, and likewise the dreaded cholera. Now that I have done with perspirations, I feel for the first time for many months light and cheerful, and so I write to you forthwith. [illegible] At times (for instance now) I would give the whole of Pesth to be able to hear once for a minute that sweet world of magic tones of every gradation [illegible] from your wooden instrument, so light and bright, so mellow and [illegible], flowing and glowing, clear and dear [illegible] and sure, [illegible]. But without any compliment [illegible] truth is that I am as glad as a Spitz at the thought of seeing you again. I have passed a very [illegible] winter [illegible] and the [illegible] of the cholera here. Dreadful! [illegible] as regards myself [illegible]. I composed many new pieces and am now publishing a whole pile of new music in Leipzig, destined to make a great man of me. Probably you will never hear any of it, and my fame will remain incognito. I have heard none of my things performed in Pesth here and played myself several times. The Parisians applauded and excited me, and some of the music [illegible] very savage at me when it was over, so I have certainly [illegible]. For some [illegible] past [illegible] the cholera has been raging fearfully here and the people no longer think of a concert but of cholera. Whoever could get away went away, and the rest do not now go out in the evening, and if I had not been forced to stay and have my stomach rubbed by an old woman, I would have been off long ago myself. I hope to get away in a few days to London. There the cholera is quite gone. * * * *

To [illegible].

My adored Heinrich,*

I can no longer guard my secret. Indeed you must long ago have guessed it by my eyes, by the [illegible] the moment you enter the room by my whole demeanour. Away then [illegible] and [illegible] ah! I love you but too dearly. My father would be furious were he to know, for he intends the Crown Prince of [illegible] to be my husband! But what can love a Crown Prince to a heart touched by love? I am ever hearing the dulcet tones proceeding from your mouth (I mean when you play the clarinet); since then I say I think of you alone. I must speak to you and secretly too, [illegible] then to-morrow at two o'clock at the [illegible] Coffee-house where your Isabella is to dine. There we shall be private, and [illegible], and that will be very charming.

* [illegible] is written "To Herr Heinrich [illegible], first clarinet [illegible]." The third letter is written in the [illegible] of a lady.

The [illegible] led me to act to make my passion for you, and then to elude the vigilance of my governess; so the chief master of ceremonies and head cook, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, has written the enclosed pages for you.

Ah! how my heart palpitates! Forgive so many blots; they are tears that have dropped on the paper while writing.

Eternally I am and ever shall be your affectionately devoted

ISABELLA, PRINCESS OF TREBIZOND.

P.S.—I wear a [illegible] bandeau at present [illegible] for love of you.

* [illegible] in the [illegible]

Three Pianists.

(From the London "Sunday Times," April 27.)

The last Monday Popular Concert of the season was in more than one respect [illegible]. [illegible] programme and performers contributed to the result. The first [illegible] a power of compression [illegible] beyond any past [illegible] presence within the walls of St. James's Hall. We were told that a hundred persons more than ever had succeeded before managed to effect an entrance. In proportion to the [illegible] occupied by that hundred was the [illegible] of the whole. But there was compensation in the [illegible] and also in the very fact of making part of such an audience. One likes to be attached to a [illegible]. Then the programme was remarkable for its length and comprehensiveness. Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Meyerbeer and Molique are included in [illegible] of all eras [illegible] of all styles. Lastly the performers were remarkable [illegible] combination of [illegible] brought together. [illegible] Piatti, prince of [illegible], and with these three [illegible] by general [illegible] the very first [illegible] of these performers. It is with these last that we have now to do.

We can imagine circumstances under which three pianists at one concert would be a [illegible] infliction. If all [illegible] were bad, for example, or if all [illegible] equally good, [illegible] in some respects, we should have reason to dread them, in the one case out of regard for nerves, in the other out of [illegible] monotony. Happily the latter can rarely come about. In culture, taste and [illegible] may be on a level, but their individuality asserts itself in performance and no two, however equal, can give the same reading of the same thing. Hence there was no monotony at St. James's Hall when Mme. Schumann, Miss Goddard, and Mr. Charles Hallé appeared together; rather was there an interesting diversity which deserves attention after the event has passed.

Mme. Schumann is already at the head of the special class of pianists to which she belongs—a class we may for distinction's sake call the inspired. The inspired pianist, being a popular individual, is not a rare phenomenon. The [illegible] and nature of his inspiration, however, are sometimes of [illegible] genuineness, because the value of the artist's being great [illegible] upon the [illegible]. The trick [illegible] succeeds, even the [illegible] are unsound and the [illegible] and visible signs of inspiration are coolly assumed. He grafts the piano [illegible] and [illegible] as the apparatus [illegible] brought from [illegible]. Just as [illegible] needed only a sling and a stone [illegible] requires only [illegible] and gesticulation. By help of a mirror [illegible] can be acquired and the [illegible] may be made [illegible] expression. The latter [illegible] easier to work up. Let those [illegible] sufficient [illegible] wrestling with the instrument after the fashion of a [illegible] Samson Agonistes, and a [illegible] upon the keys, and the thing is done. Then the public cry "What expression! what intellect! what execution!"—although, it may be, the [illegible] about the performer is [illegible] with dropped notes. Of the school to which this [illegible] artist attaches himself Mme. Schumann is chief, [illegible] from choice, as in his case, but because she cannot help it, which is both a distinction and a material difference. She is a real artist, and a great one, but with an [illegible] constitution. Her sympathy with the work to be done is intense; it is also overstrained. Hence that hurrying style, that want of repose and the impression she makes of always working at the top of her power. It is not [illegible] sympathy that [illegible] by which to control [illegible]. The result is to impress the undiscerning public [illegible]. One cannot always admire the rush and roar of a cyclone [illegible] while the [illegible] centre of gyration becomes a [illegible]. Mme. Schumann's more salient peculiarities, therefore, [illegible] advantage. In point of fact, it is a formidable disqualification for certain work. The fact that she plays best the music of her late husband may [illegible] from other causes than a natural devotion to his memory. The predominant style of that music suits her genius, as do, to a [illegible], the more passionate and dramatic compositions of other masters, by the interpretation of which she has gained renown. But she cannot [illegible] moods. Engaged upon a quiet and reposeful movement, Mme. Schumann engenders uncomfortableness such as would arise from seeing Pegasus in harness, or the safety valve of a high pressure engine [illegible]. In some respects her powers [illegible] work [illegible]. It is opposed to [illegible] and [illegible] which comprehends all a composer's ideas. But, on the other hand, give her a congenial work and how [illegible] magnificent is Mme. Schumann's [illegible]. Her performance of the [illegible] movement [illegible] in Beethoven's Sonata quasi una Fantasia in E flat (Op. 27) has all the grandeur and a good deal of the [illegible] of an avalanche.

Our countrywoman, Miss Goddard, [illegible] marked contrast to Mme. Schumann as regards manner. There is [illegible] consciousness of [illegible] inspiration in her case. She sets to work calm and equable, with an apparently perfect self-possession. There is no [illegible] of [illegible] nor does there [illegible] any lack of [illegible] as in her playing [illegible] permanent and [illegible] power [illegible]. In fact Miss Goddard at the piano is [illegible] personation of great strength. Either nature or art or both [illegible] have enabled her to regulate the motion of her feeling with the greatest nicety. [illegible] a [illegible] which can crack a nut without injuring the kernel, [illegible]. [illegible] give her [illegible] some delicate Lied of Mendelssohn, [illegible] graduated tones, the feathery touch and the easy [illegible] with which the work is done [illegible] to recognise the artist who, preserving the same [illegible] in Mendelssohn's [illegible] Fugue [illegible] of style. She [illegible] the [illegible] hand [illegible] glove. Her [illegible] gentle [illegible]. [illegible] balanced temperament and [illegible] regulated [illegible] our countrywoman [illegible]. [illegible] ability is many-sided and enables her to be equally at home with whatever she has to do. From a showy fantasia up to Beethoven's [illegible] (Op. 106)—this is to say [illegible] she walks with assured tread. There is a grace [illegible] and [illegible] in the [illegible] Miss Goddard [illegible] it is easy to foresee. Who presents [illegible] with the [illegible] thoughtfulness and [illegible] and [illegible] preservation [illegible] none the worse for her adherence.

A critic once said that if Mme. Schumann is likened to the rural [illegible], Mr. Charles Hallé must be compared with the Grecian. There is truth in the remark. The latter never stirs the emotions, making the pulse beat quicker with excitement; never feels enthusiasm and, therefore, never communicates any. He simply challenges admiration, of which he must fairly be awarded a good deal. His mechanical precision is like that of a musical box; and the neatness and delicacy of his execution are unsurpassed [illegible]. He is an artist of independent thought, and does nothing in that [illegible] which satisfies himself. But he cannot [illegible] checks the great results which such qualities might produce. He has the air of an [illegible] who cuts up the "[illegible]" [illegible] by the nature of his "subject." He always seems to be engaged upon details, mindful of the [illegible] whole, while not unfrequently he appears to see no more of his work than a man does what comes within the field of a microscope. Hence his habit of minute elaboration of bringing into undue prominence features which strike his fancy and the consequent [illegible] of the general parts of his work. Yet with all this Mr. Hallé is not an artist the musical public can spare. Under him they can study with coolness and self-possession the master he plays, feeling sure that not a noble sound nor a passage is [illegible].

The competitions of these three artists at St. James's Hall was one of rare interest, not only because it suggested such [illegible] in the foreground, but because the [illegible] companions were [illegible] in the representatives of "[illegible] England."

The Musical Festival.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1868.

Yorke Harmonie Palladium.

The old Handel and Haydn Society has reason to be proud of its third triennial Festival. Proud of the executive ability which and an uncommonly fine and carry out arrangements which have led to results so satisfactory, proud of the labors, not only of singers, [illegible], but of [illegible] proud of [illegible] [illegible] of a [illegible]. As we [illegible] the crowded [illegible] audiences and [illegible] that the majority of these who came for the music as for the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] popular interest, [illegible] could not conceive the great [illegible] at the wealth of [illegible] spread before them. In these four years music has grown to be a necessity for the million, [illegible] and when an [illegible] "Rock [illegible] Lift the [illegible]"

The opening day, Tuesday, 5th inst., brought a fine May morning. The audience was large and [illegible]. [illegible] a [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] which were raised in [illegible] from to the upper [illegible]. The scene was remarkable. The bright faces of the sopranos and altos [illegible] against the rich green [illegible] background of their [illegible], afforded a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] the eye rested with [illegible] Ein' feste Burg, "Our God is a sure defence" as sung by the chorus, with Nicolai's arrangement for orchestra and organ, was a most impressive introduction to the festival. [illegible] [illegible] sympathy [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] many as [illegible] life. Then the chorus [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] of angels and [illegible] [illegible] was to the performance of the "Hymn of Praise" of Mendelssohn [illegible] "Praise thou the Lord" [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible] rejoicing." The "Night" was well [illegible] for the [illegible]. So, too, Mendelssohn's Hymn [illegible] which is [illegible] by [illegible] beauty and splendor as that [illegible] by that matchless [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] a number and [illegible] fine, firm, and [illegible]. It [illegible] the first two movements a [illegible] [illegible] around which play [illegible] [illegible] and brilliant, leading [illegible] to the adagio, which is deeply religious [illegible] chorus, full of sacred fervor and sublimity. The [illegible] is resumed at the opening of the [illegible], and when the chorus took it up the effect was electrical. It was a perfect Jubilee. [illegible] "Praise thou the Lord" was in her [illegible], and the duet, with Miss Phillipps, worthy the occasion. Mr. Simpson sang well the air, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" with its [illegible]; and the soprano reply, "The night is departing," was like a burst of light. The choral was very effective, as indeed was every choral which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] congregational singing. The final fugue of the Hymn [illegible] a [illegible] mass of harmony [illegible]. The opening of the Festival proved wholly satisfactory.

The second performance was that of the oratorio of "Samson" on Tuesday evening. Although there are strong and telling points in the work, as a whole it is not one that appeals to the public, unless the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] rendering. Very [illegible] performance of some of the choruses of "Samson." It is [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] "Then round about the starry throne" [illegible] full of majesty and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Miss Houston [illegible] and Wilde [illegible] this [illegible] the evening was, of course, Parepa's singing of Let the bright seraphim [illegible] trumpet obbligato. It was [illegible] in this. The chorus "Let the celestial concerts all unite" was brilliant in the extreme.

[illegible] followed the orchestral and vocal concerts of Wednesday and Thursday afternoons. At the former [illegible] "[illegible]" was the [illegible] appearance in Boston of the [illegible] Miss Alide Topp, a pupil of Von Bülow, who took her audience by storm, and in the most quiet, [illegible] manner. She [illegible] all the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] by her simple, [illegible] and [illegible] and delighted every one, even the most critical, by her wonderful performance of Schumann's Concerto in A minor. At her fingers [illegible] the keys [illegible] difficulties without seeming effort, playing, as is her practice, without [illegible]. Her graceful bended figure, and her rapt face—sometimes upturned for a moment, tender [illegible] long to be remembered. Around her were [illegible] the orchestra, their earnest artistic faces watching her intently; some listening in wonder at her marvellous [illegible] with eyes aglow with delight, some pressing forward [illegible] as if reading the [illegible], others gazing back to [illegible] visions of [illegible] and Fatherland. The [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible]. After the piano was closed and a [illegible] prepared [illegible] [illegible] the applause of the audience [illegible] bounded that Miss Topp [illegible] to the piano was [illegible] and the player gave another selection of Modern German character and sufficiently classical for her [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] from Linda, "[illegible]," was [illegible] sung by Miss Phillipps whose [illegible] singing is [illegible] the [illegible] pleasure. Her [illegible] have been some of [illegible] [illegible]. The overtures on Wednesday afternoon were Weber's to Euryanthe and Beethoven's Leonore No. 3. The former was most [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] from an orchestra so well balanced as Boston [illegible] always [illegible] into the spirit of the work with [illegible] devotion. The playing of the "Leonore" was one of the [illegible] [illegible] of the work. The overture was [illegible] of the perfection of its magnificence and beauty. The symphony was Mozart's in G Minor. The first movement is characterized by charming delicacy and sweetness, blended with a [illegible] influence. The andante of rare beauty and tender sentiment, the menuetto, graceful and sparkling, and the exceedingly [illegible] finale were [illegible] pleasures to be pleasantly cherished in memory.

On Thursday afternoon there was the Rosamunde overture, well as "Tannhäuser" [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]", [illegible] "Ah, Perfido," [illegible] [illegible] by Parepa. Beethoven's Violin Concerto in G major was ably played by Carl Rosa. Its calm dreamy beauty seemed to hold the audience spellbound, and there was scarcely a rustle of fan or programme as [illegible] the closing [illegible]. The Symphony was Beethoven's C minor, the one [illegible] second [illegible] [illegible] at one of the first concerts of the Harvard Musical Association. To many so [illegible] by this great [illegible], [illegible] a new revelation of the genius of the young man [illegible] whom Beethoven [illegible] great [illegible] among musical composers. In scene [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] of great power, which is wrought out with [illegible], and culminating in a forte passage of [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. The theme of the andante is a miracle of such poetic beauty, the whole brilliant with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—a fitting [illegible] for a work of such grandeur. Towards the close it returns to the original theme, to which it gives a [illegible], [illegible] accompaniment. Around it the delicate [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. We [illegible] the final [illegible] [illegible] sweet and charming, and then the [illegible] [illegible] of the audience—[illegible] beyond [illegible] the work and [illegible] [illegible].

On Thursday evening, "St. Paul" was given, with fine success. The choruses [illegible] well sung, some of them being [illegible] [illegible] power and good gradation of light and shade. [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible], awake!" The [illegible] were [illegible] [illegible]. The soloists were Mme. Parepa, Miss Cary and Messrs. Simpson and Whitney. Each were [illegible] and [illegible] were well received. Miss Houston's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] when [illegible] [illegible] of singers of [illegible]. Miss Cary's singing of "The Lord is mindful" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] while Mr. [illegible]'s singing of "Be thou faithful" was [illegible].

The Friday afternoon concert opened with the Tannhäuser overture, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in this country. [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] developed. Parepa's singing of the [illegible] [illegible] from Oberon, [illegible] was one of her triumphs. [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] all the [illegible] freshness of Gade's [illegible]. Two movements of an unfinished symphony by Schubert, (B minor) were given. The allegro is [illegible], and [illegible] the andante placid and calm, with [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] embodying much of Schubert's genius. And then came the great event of the week, the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, for which all [illegible] a [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] the great chorus and the grand orchestra, and call the [illegible] Festival. Could the occasion have been better? Scarcely. And the sense of joy beyond [illegible]! That immortal work tells the story as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] poet, [illegible] of the conflict between the human soul and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of that ever [illegible] [illegible] happiness, that [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] beyond that makes life's struggle and [illegible]. How perfectly the [illegible] of the symphony [illegible] all [illegible]. How at times the clouds [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. How [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]! Then, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] to take possession of the soul, a [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] upon [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The instrumental portion of the symphony [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the words from Schiller's "Hymn to Joy" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the effect of this [illegible] of joy which [illegible] the [illegible] of "[illegible] [illegible]"—Love to God and man!" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. People looked at each other in [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "There was a [illegible] [illegible], as if [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] in words, for they [illegible]. In all the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible] with [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

After the Choral Symphony there seemed but one other work that could be [illegible]—Handel's Messiah announced for Sunday evening. Still an [illegible] and a concert with [illegible] [illegible] programme, and these, upon Saturday proved very popular and drew a large audience. At the concert were performed Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony, the overtures, the Tell and Freyschütz [illegible] Miss Phillipps sang with fine [illegible] [illegible] her excellent voice, [illegible] "[illegible]." Miss Topp carried another [illegible] with her playing of [illegible]'s [illegible] Concerto (E flat major), and the whole [illegible] [illegible] the thing for the Saturday afternoon audience which was added to the regular subscribers upon the Festival, even to overflowing into the aisles.

On the evening of Saturday Handel's Creation received splendid performance from the great musical host. The choruses with their splendid accompaniments of orchestra and organ were highly effective; light and graceful in the softer passages, they came out with grandeur in the great expressions of gratitude and praise. "The heavens are telling" was electrifying; [illegible] encored, it was repeated with even more [illegible]. It was a great triumph. The solos were sustained by Parepa, Mrs. Cary, Mr. James Whitney, Mr. Rudolphsen, and Mr. M. W. Whitney, all [illegible] in their respective parts [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible]. Parepa was wonderful; the voice so well suited to the [illegible] a new interpreter. With verdure clad and "On mighty pens" were [illegible]. The performance was a noble one, [illegible] of the most interesting occasions of the week.

On Sunday evening came the last performance, and a glorious one it was. Here the old Messiah great in majesty and splendor at the hands of such [illegible]! Perhaps the chorus was not always [illegible] to the [illegible] possibly Parepa cannot sing the Messiah as well as she sings almost everything else, but what of that? [illegible] [illegible] and everybody left that [illegible] to be there. There were great and [illegible] orchestral and chorus, but why [illegible]? They came just where they were expected — where Handel meant they should come. The [illegible] [illegible] were particularly well sung by Mrs. Phillipps and Mr. Whitney and Mr. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and entered into the spirit of the [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] of the performance. All [illegible], it was a grand finale of this true Triennial Festival of the worthy old Handel and Haydn Society.

Schubert's Music to "Rosamunde."

(From the Crystal Palace Programme.)

Overture. [illegible]

1. Entr'acte [illegible] 1st and 2nd Acts [illegible].
2. Entr'acte [illegible] and Air de Ballet [illegible]
3. Entr'acte between [illegible] and 3rd Acts [illegible]
4. [illegible] for Soprano, "Der Vollmond strahlt" [illegible]
5. Chorus of [illegible]
6. Entr'acte between the 3rd and 4th Acts [illegible]
7. Shepherd [illegible]
8. Chorus of Shepherds.
9. [illegible] Chorus.
10. [illegible] Ballet [illegible]

The above is a complete list of the music employed in the drama of Rosamunde on the two occasions of its representation at Vienna in 1823 and discovered, after a lapse of [illegible] years, [illegible] the [illegible] of the last autumn among the [illegible] part books in possession of Dr. Schneider, a well known amateur of Vienna. The pieces are [illegible] in the order in which they come in the part books, but as these [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] portions of the drama, it was thought better at the recent performance at the Crystal Palace to alter the order in one or two cases — as follows:—

Overture.

1. [illegible] Allegro moderato.
2. [illegible] Andantino.
3. [illegible] Andante.
4. [illegible] Allegretto.
5. [illegible] Andante [illegible].
6. [illegible] Andantino.
7. Chorus [illegible] Adagio.
8. [illegible] and [illegible] Ballet [illegible].
9. [illegible] Chorus [illegible] Allegro moderato.

Schubert [illegible] compose an overture specially for this work. That which was played at the Crystal Palace, and which the part books show to have been originally performed, was written by Schubert a few months previously to the opera of Alfonso und Estrella, [illegible] published as Rosamunde (Op. 26), and [illegible] the [illegible] of the Crystal Palace, belongs to the Zauberharfe, an opera which he had composed in 1820, three years before the date of Rosamunde.

The numbers performed on the occasion referred to [illegible] English [illegible] were 4, 6, [illegible] No. 8 was omitted. The overture was played at the concert of November [illegible] 1866 and Nos. [illegible] and [illegible] on the 10th November, 1866, and 9th March, 1867. The [illegible] No. [illegible] were also performed [illegible] both those occasions, but with an accompaniment scored by Mr. Manns from the pianoforte copy.

The following is the outline of the drama of Rosamunde the production of Mme. Wilhelmine Chezy —translated from the abstract published in The Life of Schubert by Kreissle von Hellborn. Every effort was made by the writer (when at Vienna) to discover a copy of the full libretto, but without success; it probably was never printed. The abstract, however, is enough for our present purpose. It shows conclusively how independent Schubert's genius was of the materials which served to set it in motion; and it is impossible to discover anything in this most empty story to have inspired the lofty and tragic strains of much of the music which illustrates it.

By a cunning of her father's, the Princess Rosamunde of Cyprus has been brought up from the [illegible] as a shepherdess [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the completion of her eighteenth year has come [illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] to be [illegible]. In the meantime the Prince of Candia has [illegible] to Rosamunde in her exile, has received a [illegible] letter which has [illegible] him to Cyprus. On the road thither the vessel is wrecked and he [illegible] of all the crew reaches the land alive. During the sixteen years of Rosamunde's disappearance the government of the island has been in the hands of Fulgentius, and he now learns the news of her existence [illegible] [illegible] dissatisfaction. Rosamunde and the Prince meet, and although both are [illegible] [illegible] the other. The Prince [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] partly because he is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his companions, returns his [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the Governor, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] robbers, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In [illegible] state of affairs [illegible] [illegible] by a violent passion for [illegible] [illegible] which, when rejected [illegible] [illegible] violent hatred; he accuses her of being the [illegible] of his daughter's misfortunes, and at length throws her into prison. Here he will [illegible] her and [illegible] [illegible] her by a letter impregnated with a deadly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], to be presented to her by the Prince who is still disguised. Rosamunde [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to conquer her [illegible] [illegible], where she [illegible]. How the Prince [illegible] [illegible] the wicked schemes of Fulgentius. Unfortunately Fulgentius [illegible] from [illegible] [illegible], and he would be [illegible] if the Prince had [illegible] in perceiving the [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] that is to offer him [illegible] to take away the name of Rosamunde — a [illegible] which she [illegible] [illegible] by her [illegible]. Fulgentius, [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] of Rosamunde to the Prince, and all [illegible] [illegible]. At this [illegible] [illegible] a letter from Albanus — the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] the Prince — who [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at the [illegible] [illegible] of Fulgentius. [illegible] [illegible] the Prince to the act of reading [illegible] [illegible] that he shall give [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] the Prince [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] late [illegible] and [illegible]. Instead of Albanus' letter, he [illegible] to give Fulgentius his own [illegible] [illegible] one. [illegible] lost its power. The Governor [illegible] it, [illegible] [illegible] eagerly reads it, and he [illegible] [illegible].

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—The last concert of the season 1867-8, on Saturday afternoon, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] performances. The first piece in the programme was the overture [illegible] by Auber for the [illegible] [illegible] of 1862.

The overture was followed after the customary and judiciously adopted "interval of five minutes" by the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. The Ninth Symphony was the [illegible] at the last of the [illegible] concerts preceding [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a half of [illegible]. Means were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] series of twenty-eight concerts. Such a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This was the [illegible] of the Ninth Symphony in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] on the present occasion. The [illegible] orchestral [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] performance as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. From the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as well as the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] with an accuracy [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the principal theme of which — Herr [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] appearance of light in a dark chamber, which caused the surrounding objects, like the lights themselves, to dance before his eyes, was taken [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] before, by which [illegible], [illegible], both of [illegible] and [illegible], was obtained. A more wonderful performance we cannot remember. The instruments, as Schumann observes in describing the scherzo of Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony in A minor (which, by the way, he curiously confounds with the Italian Symphony in A major), seemed to be "talking to each other." The playing of the "wind"—flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns—in the most [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], was [illegible] [illegible]. Excellently [illegible] too, was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The scherzo being in D [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. One of the most important points is of course the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] by which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Equally to be praised [illegible]. In the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] again, the most melodious and beautiful [illegible] of Beethoven's slow movements — where after a prelude of two bars, [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The admirably [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the wind instruments, [illegible]. If the finale, [illegible] [illegible] Schiller's Ode to Joy, was [illegible], without exaggeration, that on the whole, a [illegible] performance of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the symphony has rarely if ever been heard in England. The solo quartet was represented by Mlle. [illegible] (soprano), Miss Julia Elton (contralto), Mr. W. H. Cummings (tenor), and Herr Wallenreiter (bass); the chorus by the Crystal Palace Choir, which is making such rapid progress that hopes are reasonably entertained of its becoming [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a worthy companion to the already renowned Crystal Palace Orchestra. The vast audience followed "quiet as a mouse" from one end of the symphony to the other, only breaking out, at the intervals between the several movements, into loud applause, which, at the end of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] enthusiastic. It would seem that the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the "[illegible] [illegible]" of Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], was becoming [illegible] [illegible].

In comparison with such a performance of such a work the rest of the concert [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It might almost be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Ninth Symphony [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Herr F. C. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a concerto (with orchestral [illegible] [illegible]) of his own, well calculated to exhibit the [illegible] [illegible] of the latter, [illegible] [illegible] to display to advantage his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that Mr. Arthur Sullivan's very charming song of the year of [illegible], "O [illegible] [illegible], my baby" (Guy Mannering) [illegible] part-song [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] well [illegible] by the Crystal Palace Choir [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But there were yet other [illegible] [illegible]. Herr Wallenreiter [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Court Opera of [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] Handel's dramatic [illegible] [illegible], "[illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] (from the Rosamunda) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Messiah seems to point out the way for Gluck. But even a [illegible] [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] of Gluck to [illegible]?

The programme for the new season is just out. As the Palace was opened in June, 1854, the present will be the fifteenth season; and no greater sign of its vitality can be given than the liberality of the arrangements which the directors are enabled to offer to season ticket holders. The policy which has been pursued for the last three years receives further exemplification this year by the amount [illegible] being made

* The [illegible] Chorus has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in London [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the symphony being [illegible].

[illegible] during the four days of the Handel Festival. For the rest of the season, May, June, and July, upwards of twenty special fête days have been appointed, admission to which on these, as on the other fête days throughout the year, would alone cost a season ticket holder considerably more than ten times the price of a season ticket. If the ordinary days be added it will be seen that a season ticket, if used every day, would return to its owner considerably more than twenty times its cost. The admission to so great a musical celebration as the Handel Festival is of itself sufficient to stamp the value of the season ticket, and warrant its familiar designation as the 'cheapest guinea's worth in the world.'"

The first event of the season is the grand opening performance this day of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," till recently unheard in England; to be played by the Crystal Palace orchestra, conducted by Mr. Manns. The music by the same composer to Œdipus at Colonus will be given, with a chorus of 1,000 male voices, besides a miscellaneous selection by some of the chief artists of Her Majesty's Opera.

There will be eight opera concerts on Saturdays, commencing on the 16th May, and supported by the principal artists from Her Majesty's Opera, the other two by the principal artists from the Royal Italian Opera.

The choral demonstrations by school children, conducted by Mr. Martin, Mr. [illegible] and Mr. [illegible], the popular ballad concerts and the classical Saturday Concerts, will be continued.

THE OPERAS. A few sentences from the Orchestra, of April 25 and May 2, will show what has been going on:

Nothing could have been better than the cast of "Dinorah" on Saturday at Her Majesty's, or than the acting and singing of Mlle. Kellogg as Gilda, the heroine. Indeed the excellence [illegible] signed a prominent place in operatic records. It was more than a success: it was a triumph. [illegible] the American prima donna has borne the reputation of a careful and conscientious artist, rather than a performer [illegible], as the Germans might say, the genie [illegible]. But the study of Gilda was so perfect, her real [illegible] passion with the prevailing [illegible], the performance was a fine one, we pass [illegible] Mlle. Kellogg with something more than [illegible] or clockwork proficiency [illegible] which is only now her crown for genius.

"Faust," given at Covent Garden on Saturday for the first time this season, introduced the new (American) prima donna, Mlle. Vanzini [Van Zandt] as a dark-haired Margherita. The other characters were thus apportioned: Faust, Signor Mario; Mephistopheles, M. Petit; Valentine, Signor Cotogni; Wagner, Signor Tagliafico; Siebel, Mlle. Locatelli; and Martha, Mlle. Anese. Scarcely the best suggestion [illegible] in the part of Margherita is Mlle. Vanzini's hands. Her powers are of a gentle order: she is mild and naïve, with a light, pure voice and a [illegible] which the strong qualities are absent. [illegible] the flexibility of her voice, and her graceful and lithe figure, she is in our opinion the least satisfactory representative of the character we have yet seen on the Italian stage.

On Monday a new basso profundo was introduced in the person of Sig. Cedoli, who took the part of Bertram in Meyerbeer's Roberto il Diavolo. Of the new-comer we may say that a correct school of singing, good phrasing, a tall, powerful figure, and an [illegible] knowledge of stage-business recommended him to the audience, while in the performance went on and the fiendish purpose of Bertram was more developed he showed so good an appreciation of the dramatic situation as to call down hearty applause, and the opinion that Sig. Cedoli possessed histrionic talent such as [illegible] voice is powerful. His voice is not very full, but is sufficient to make up for the deficiencies of resonance. On the whole the management is to be congratulated on the acquisition of this young and classic artist, the more so in proportion to the rarity of good [illegible] profundi. Mme. Fricci was now heard as Alice, and was well acclimated to the [illegible] opera, "Vanne disse" and "[illegible]." A first appearance in Isabella proved Mme. Sherrington's fitness to undertake the brilliant and florid class of parts.

A want of adherence of Beethoven was afforded on Saturday at Drury Lane, when "Fidelio" was performed, with Mlle. Tietjens as Leonora, Mlle. [illegible] as Marcellina, M. Santley as Pizarro, and Signor Gassier as the Minister. The alterations from last year were Signor Bettini for Signor Gardoni in the part of Florestan, and Signor Foli for Herr Rokitansky in the part of Rocco. No part in all Mlle. Tietjens' large repertory can be found more suitable to her capacities than this role of Leonora. Its splendid voice, in the full enjoyment of her physical powers, as well a grasp of passion and pathos rarer in any time in her career surpassed. She combined the dimensional of grandeur and energy and tragedy in one character.

At the other house, after a repetition of "Faust" on Monday with the cast we have already noticed, "Un Ballo in Maschera" was given on Tuesday for the first time this season, the Renato being sustained by Mlle. Vanzini, and the part of Amelia affording occasion for the début of a Mlle. Lafresne. Neither [illegible] persuasion calls for special welcome. The great barrier to the frequent performance of Rossini's intelligence—the want of a capable tenor for the part which Tamberlik illustrated with that wonderful high C in the "Suivez-moi," and which Tamberlik dared (unsuccessfully) properly be recovered by M. Lefranc.

COLOGNE.—The Rhenish Musical Festival will be held this year in Cologne at Whitsuntide, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller. As the first festival was held at Düsseldorf in 1818, this will be the 50th anniversary. On the first day the programme will include Handel's Messiah, with Mmes. Wippern and Joachim, Drs. Gunz and Schmidt as solo singers. Herr Joachim, also, will play a solo. Among the pieces set down for the second day are: Overture, "Gale breakwater," by the composer; "Whitsuntide Cantata," Bach (arranged by Robert Franz); Eighth Psalm, Nos. 1 to Mendelssohn; and Ninth Symphony, Beethoven. On the third day there will be an Overture, Ferdinand Hiller; a Symphony, Schumann; a Violin Concerto played by Herr Joachim; and various vocal pieces by the solo singers.

On Palm Sunday the usual performance of J. S. Bach's Passion-music took place in the Gürzenich room. The solos on the occasion were intrusted to Frl. H. Rabenstein (soprano), Frau H. Müller-Berkas from Geneva (contralto), Herr Schild from Dresden (tenor), Herr Hill from Frankfort (baritone), and M. De Vries, an amateur (bass). The chorus was divided into two bodies, the first chorus, of the singers, by the pupils of the Conservatory. The boys' chorus, by the pupils of the Gymnasium, and the double chorus, by the Sing-Akademie and the Männer-Gesang Verein. The band numbering in all, there were nearly 600 performers. Herr Hiller's [illegible] F. Weber presided at the organ on the former occasion.

AMSTERDAM.—Concert of the Cæcilia Society. Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini; Symphony Variations; Second Symphony, Beethoven, etc.—Concert of the "Felix Meritis" Society: Pastoral Symphony, Beethoven; Concertstück for Violoncello, Servais; Two movements from the Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; Overture to Genoveva, Schumann.

BREMEN.—A highly satisfactory performance of Herr Liszt's oratorio, Johann Hess, was lately given under the direction of Herr M. Kruch, on which occasion the same composer's overture to Sir Walter Scott's Kenilworth was also comprised in the programme.

MUNICH.—At the second Subscription Concert of the Musical Academy were performed: Overture to the Lorelei, Spohr; Symphony C major, Haydn; Concertstück for two Violins and Orchestra; Vocal [illegible] by the Abbé Liszt; Schubert; and Third Symphony E flat major, Schumann.

HAMBURG.—J. S. Bach's Matthäus-Passion was performed in Passion week in St. Michael's church, under the direction of Herr von Bernuth; the solo vocalists being Mme. Nissen, Stockhausen, Herren Wolters and Stockhausen.

FLORENCE.—The programme of the last concert given by the Società del Quartetto consisted exclusively of instrumental pieces by Schumann. Mlle. Cutting was to have sung two of his vocal pieces, greatly to the regret of the regular subscribers, who contended that the introduction of vocal music into the programme was a departure from the rule which always had governed, and a warm [illegible] of the Society. Their unsuccessful [illegible] spared the anticipated shock, however, by the fact that Mlle. Cutting was taken ill, and could not appear.—The Pergola is always empty when M. Gounod's Romeo e Giulietta is given. The next opera to be produced is Marta, with Signa. Lotti in the principal part.

The Triennial Festival.

To resume our uncompleted record (for which and for short-comings in what remains Errata must be in part responsible) let us first go back to

THE OPENING PERFORMANCE.

Tuesday Morning, May 5. We had only room to mention its imposing grandeur and complete success. Of the three works chosen we could best have spared the Festival Overture on "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" by Nicolai. If the object simply were to exhibit all the resources of the Festival, the 700 voices, the orchestra of 113 instruments, and the great Organ massed together in colossal power and grandeur, that end was accomplished, and the effect on a miscellaneous audience was one of wonder and delight. But this work had been performed here twice before on similar occasions: at the choral dedication of the Organ in November 1863 and at the Festival three years ago. It hardly bears much repetition. The Choral itself is of course grand and in its plain original form or harmonized by Bach we should have been content with it. The contrapuntal working of the theme and fragmentary phrases, with the fugues that follow in the orchestra, is quaint and learned to be sure, but dry and uninspired. And then the second, lively theme so suddenly introduced and worked up with the Choral is of a very common secular and homely sort. It bears too strong a likeness to "Mein Gebrauch," and gives a grotesque incongruity to the whole. With such a theme, and especially with such a searching, unmercy flow of 10 or more enlarged instruments, it is so far as outward sense effects, a proclamation full of pomp and splendor giving assurance of great things to come. Yet we should have much preferred one of the Cantatas of Bach (a purpose we of the directors did for a time entertain). Best of all would have been Bach's Cantata on this very Choral; and nothing short of that, perhaps, would have redeemed the Choral from the commonness into which it has been dragged by Meyerbeer's too popular perversion of it in his overture to the Huguenots. Otherwise, one or two fine familiar chorals, of the best which Bach has harmonized, sung in parts by voices unaccompanied or with alternate stanzas sung in unison and with full accompaniment, would have opened such a week with dignity and beauty.

Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, "Come let us sing," was the one new thing (vocal) of the Festival; we do not remember that it was ever sung here except once by Mr. Parker's Club some years ago. It is short and sweet and full of fervor, masterly in style, nor does it lack variety or powerful contrasts. It begins with a Tenor Solo: "O come, let us worship," a warm, melodious, cheerful invitation, sung in good voice and style by Mr. Simpson; who as precentor ushers in the chorus with the same strain, enriched each time by harmony, and a few bars of solo again also moves them before the final chords. It is a lovely chorus, and was beautifully sung. Then in the composed peaceful rhythm succeeds the animated one of the more stirring jubilant tumultu-truly beautiful chorus: "Come, let us sing to the Lord with gladness," taking pattern from a half-sentence of bright soprano solo (Mme. PAREPA-ROSA) soaring to a sustained high G and dropping an octave,—very animating in her large, clear tones. This splendid, overwhelming chorus, which is in C major, ends in a Canon in the minor; beginning with tenors and basses in unison, strong and stern: "For the Lord is a mighty God, and a mighty ruler over all false idols," in [illegible] ... ment is declared in the right Old Testament Hebrew [illegible] ... the final chord is major—"a mighty God"—and triumphantly held out.

No. 2 is one of Mendelssohn's most characteristic and best tiled Duets, for two Sopranos, with a lovely undulating figure in the accompaniment: "In His hands are all the corners of the earth," very finely sung by Mme. ROSA and Miss PHILLIPPS. From the gentle and beguiling stream of the Duet we are summoned by the half fugued chorus "For His is the sea," to a more religious sense of what is grand in Nature. In the vigorous, emphatic phrasing of its theme, first given by the basses, and [illegible] by its upward leap of a flat seventh bringing in a [illegible] flash of lightning accent upon the word "sea," it is the most eloquent chorus in the Psalm; and in the rich and lively orchestration becomes almost graphic. It ends, however, in a gentler and familiar strain, a return of the opening theme: "O come, let us worship." We felt the full significance and grandeur of this chorus brought out in the rendering. It is in E flat, but the orchestra goes on, diminuendo, gradually modulating into a glove on the half-chord of [illegible] major preparatory to the fifth and final piece in G minor, which opens with a sweet and pleading strain (Andante, 3-8), for the Tenor Solo: "Henceforth when ye hear His voice entreating, harden not your ears," &c. This touching strain is one of the most characteristic and individual ones of Mendelssohn: akin to that of "Hear ye Israel!" in Elijah, but more deeply shaded. The rhythmical flow is ruffled at the thought of Israel's rebellious hearts, and the instruments whisper with short breath growing more and more excited and swelling to a sharp [illegible] of the vocal tale of the Lord's wrath; but the tones mean it more in sorrow than in anger. Then the pleading theme is [illegible] taken up in chorus by the female voices only, with intermittent tenor solo, till finally it takes possession of the whole chorus, and is worked up with increasing power and volume and more and more florid and highly colored instrumentation, until it reaches a pitch of agonizing entreaty, almost unendurable, in that inverted diminished seventh chord "Turn not deaf ears!" but instantly out of this storm such a strain as at a rare & sweet spring of tears, a lovely [illegible] figure leading us back to the meadows, and rippling around the sustained tone of the chorus, which is in the tenderest strain of the beginning, and thus brings the composition to a close, only with a whispered but reminder loving and gentle, (yet again with diminished accents, this time pianissimo): "Turn not deaf ears and hard hearts!"

But the great feature of that morning's programme, and, as we have before said, also of the most magnificent performance of the Oratorio kind that we remember in this country, was the "Hymn of Praise." That Symphony-Cantata seemed to us that day, if never before, to be Mendelssohn's greatest sacred work,—at any rate the most felicitous and thoroughly interesting; in its originality of form so naturally and spontaneously developed, such an organic whole quickened by one vital thought and feeling. The three introductory Symphonic movements, the first so grand, and all so beautiful, were rendered to a charm by that great orchestra. There one felt the fine and searching quality of that large body of first violins, the good, substantial tone in the middle strings, so rich and elegantly responsive to the violoncellos especially and the broad and satisfying double-bass foundations. But also, clarinet, bassoons &c., also sang their melodic passages expressively, and all the wind instruments supplied their shades of color in due degree of delicacy and power. All went with precision, clearness, with light and shade. It was very nearly perfect. Then the whole multitude of voices burst forth in that first theme: "All men, all things," as it lay on its note of ensemble security, as if [illegible] had all the while been potentially [illegible], and that [illegible] to the long Symphony. The effect was a great one, a glorious sun burst of light and life and praise. Amazing and bending all. And so on through the [illegible] tempo when they take up the theme so strongly at the beginning and the end of the first symphonic movement: "All that hath life and breath, sing to the Lord."

The Lobgesang has become quite familiar here, and we have so often spoken of its merits that we need not discuss further on it while so many topics still await their turn. Suffice it to say that with the exception perhaps of some passages of the larger or two or three choruses in a bit to no general character the whole was as well done as voices and things to be had. The seeking chorus "The night is departing," especially the large part: "Let us gird on the armor of light," is so rapid so complex, so taxing to voice and breath, that one doubts whether it ever can be [illegible] executed. On the other hand the [illegible] ... beginning with the tenor recitative: "Will the night soon pass?" then the clear high tones of the soprano voice (Parepa) in heavenly assurance; then the chorus,—is so wonderfully dramatic, that it is certain to be split in it cannot be lost in a rendering so good as that was. The solo parts were all good. Mme. Parepa-Rosa's voice seemed never more bright and bearing, soaring with perfect ease. The Duet with Miss Phillipps: "We waited for the Lord," with chorus rising full and tranquil in a cool of peace, interwoven harmony, was admirably sung, and the inevitable encore was pressed on with more than usual fervor. Mr. Simpson sang the well-known recitative and other solo parts in good voice with taste and judgment, only not much expression.

TUESDAY EVENING. "SAMSON."

We have less faith this time to place than any of Handel's Oratorios. And for the reason that it is not an Oratorio in the distinctive sense, of which the "Messiah" and "Israel in Egypt," Bach's Passions, and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" are the best examples, although a state of the dramatic origin of Oratorio before it was developed into an independent thing of its own. "Samson" is a semi-opera, merely historic and personal, crowded with characters, who have great lengths of recitative almost always given without life or point, and with solos, characteristic and sometimes beautiful, very various, more qualify florid like those of Dalila, now serious and noble like "Return, O God of hosts," some of this introductory new this, but before [illegible] it to every & side and personalities, that all seem longer than it is, and point with the exception of much of part of the work, as on this occasion, one must patience to sit through it all. Scattered among these are splendid choruses, whose refreshment ever comes most timely; they sink into the mind like rain into the thirsty desert: "O first created beam," "Then round about the starry throne," "Fixed in his everlasting seat," &c.,—so splendid pieces and superbly were they sung.

We do not say that there is not in nearly all these solos something to reward study, but, smothered into one work, they are so confusing and with so heavily upon the spirits (so visible through the choruses) as a piecemeal miscellaneous concert. Generally they fell to good interpreters,—excellent, in Mme. ROSA and Miss PHILLIPPS. The former sang it several characters: warbling "the merry merry pipe" of the [illegible] ... Micah's part, singing Dalila's "[illegible] ... with thorough comprehension and ... [illegible] of all the piquancy, accents and quality, ... [illegible] ... all phrases and [illegible] so rough which Handel makes this character so unsustainable. We were too tamed to stay through the last part, and lost the splendor of her "Let the bright Seraphim." Miss Phillipps produced a deep impression on the ... [illegible] ... "Return" and her whole part of Micah was ... [illegible] admirable. Mr. W[illegible] in the part of Manoah showed it small possess: [illegible] a ... [illegible] and ... voice, which he used manfully with fair ... and expression. Mr. Whitney had the ... part of Harapha, and did it ... [illegible] ... We wonder that such musical ... [illegible] ... as the air "Honor and arms," by whomsoever sung ... [illegible] ... It is so uninteresting as on ... [illegible] ... would be ... [illegible] ... for Samson but Mr. [illegible]'s voice hardly suggests the strong man. He sang the greater portion ... of all "Total Eclipse," &c. ... which has a certain beauty of its own, but which ... [illegible] ... as prologue to the sublime chorus: "O first created beam."

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.—CONCERT.

Overture, Euryanthe	Weber.
Song, Aria [illegible]	Handel.
Miss Adelaide Phillipps.
Symphony: Jupiter	Mozart.
Concerto for the Pianoforte, in A minor	Schumann.
Miss Anna Topp, (first appearance in Boston).
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3	Beethoven.

The feast of Symphony and Overture played by that complete and splendid orchestra, were not the least interesting events of the week. The three Overtures and Symphony were just those with which the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association had made their mark three years ago. They have been often heard in Boston, but never before with such a rich quality and large force of instruments. The band already worked together admirably under Mr. ZERRAHN's very firm and firm conductorship. In some points it be seen, that model Symphony of Mozart, so subtly interwoven are its parts throughout, might have gained by more rehearsal opportunities but which are few in such a week. Still it went so well, showed of what good musicians, old hands experienced in classical music that orchestra was composed. The home [illegible] has had become so much better associated and blended by these years of weekly rehearsal concerts, that when the orchestra players from New York and Philadelphia came to supplement them, they played all together as if they had always been accustomed to it.

Miss PHILLIPPS sang that very simple but very noble and pathetic air from one of Handel's operas, and her fine warm and [illegible]. She is evidently partial to the song, and indeed it suits her well. A [illegible] was inevitable.

And now we come to a pleasant topic, the Boston début of the young German pianist, a pupil of Liszt's and Hans Von Bülow, Miss ANNA TOPP. The first sight of her was the signal for spontaneous and hearty greeting, youth and grace and beauty, the glow of artistic enthusiasm blended with the blush of modesty, won quick sympathy. Her performance of Schumann's extremely difficult as well as fine, poetic and original Concerto was truly wonderful. The touch was perfectly crisp and clear, the full chords tung out Beethovenians in all their breadth and fulness, the distinction of accent, the phrasing, the light and shade, were all that could be desired; there was delicacy where that was needed, there was force to a wonderful degree for those slender arms, force which the strongest passages could not exhaust. There was the charm of abandon, too, losing herself completely in her music. The way in which she watched the conductor, watched the orchestra, feeling the composition as a whole, then throwing her head freely back, and swaying slightly back and forward, appeared to give herself to the full stream of tone and motion, showed how her heart was in her work; any suspicion of affectation was disarmed at the outset. All the best qualities of the modern technique were there in a degree we have hardly seen surpassed. The interpretation of the work, too, was intelligent and highly satisfactory. There might perhaps be some question about the somewhat [illegible] tempo, whether the movement was not somewhat too fast; but on the whole the characteristic power and beauty of the Schumann Concerto was brought clearly home to every listener. The last movement, especially the finale [illegible], was given with amazing power and brilliancy and unflagging gradual crescendo to the end.

We have heard it said that her interpretation lacked the charm of soft tones. We did not miss them, and it [illegible] something to our enjoyment of any work. But we have [illegible] comparison,—an afternoon too far [illegible]. Her rendering of the Schumann Concerto lacked as yet the [illegible] which such an artist as Mme. Schumann [illegible]. We felt there to [illegible] Miss Mehlig, we think as we [illegible] Mme. Topp. It is hardly safe to undertake to gauge the poetry and feeling of a player almost perfect. In all else, and you have heard him more than once and know how [illegible] this one. Youth and [illegible] of education and example, are [illegible] considered. One thing is certain: [illegible] Concerto (in our experience) was not emptied of its soul and poetry that afternoon.

The audience were charmed. After no end of [illegible] applause she [illegible] from "[illegible]" [illegible] three. Such [illegible] occasions we have not witnessed for a long time; persistently recalled, the young artist appeared at the side door repeatedly in [illegible] acknowledgment, but there was no help for it: play again she must. Ere [illegible] were already entering "the Chickering" with warm enthusiasm to build a [illegible] when the height [illegible] among them and it had to come to life again and give out music. She played the first of Liszt's "Rhapsodies Hongroises," a strangely bold [illegible] and fantastical affair, beginning with the Chopin-like grandiose, deeper mood, but shifting through all phases of moods and fancies, and [illegible] [illegible] Hungarian rhythms. This, as well as the Concerto, she played entirely from memory in a [illegible], among the most perfect instances of that [illegible] we have known; no [illegible] [illegible] the same thing [illegible] and [illegible] that he [illegible] been witnessed here. We [illegible] her disposition to [illegible] as Von Bülow has done, and Mme. Schumann, Clauss, and [illegible] of the [illegible]. [illegible] for [illegible] full grown musical character must yet come to one so young. Her young imagination now [illegible] with [illegible] of the new school of [illegible] of which the Abbé is the head. So among these we [illegible], and, whatever we may think of [illegible] tendency, must have found [illegible] to [illegible] Brahms, to which the sentiments of [illegible] for the [illegible]. But it is a hopeful sign of her artistic future that she appreciates and makes her own so [illegible] classical a work as Schumann's Concerto, while, we are told, she is equally ready to play from memory all the Beethoven Concertos, and those by Mendelssohn and others. The Liszt [illegible] can do no harm, rather much good, if at the same time her heart continue open to these others.

THURSDAY.—TENTH AFTERNOON CONCERT.

Overture: "Hebrides" [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Song, "Ah, Perfido"	Beethoven.
Mme. Parepa Rosa.
Concerto for the Violin, [illegible]	Spohr.
Carl Rosa.
Symphony, C major	Schubert.

Mendelssohn's graphic Overture, one of the happiest of "[illegible]" in the true subjective and suggestive sense, and Schubert's gloriously great Symphony (of the "heavenly length," [illegible] and [illegible] which has come [illegible] heard,—have both been performed repeatedly and well, in the Harvard concerts. Of course to hear them through the medium of this grander orchestra was [illegible] introduction, like to that of [illegible] out a [illegible] for all [illegible] or one [illegible] through a [illegible]. The Symphony was [illegible] felt [illegible] how warmly such [illegible], [illegible] heard [illegible] in the Audience; how the double basses thundered in the rush and whirl of the Finale!

Beethoven's highly dramatic [illegible] for his Italian Scena was a good selection for Mme. Rosa: the best [illegible] of her voice and art were brought in play to advantage and made a great impression. Mr. Carl Rosa's violin playing was of the best we have heard from him. The tone, [illegible] large, was big [illegible] [illegible] and even and [illegible], than the one which too much [illegible] concerts. We had for a time [illegible]. Indeed the tone and sentiment of the whole performance seemed to be [illegible], more free within and [illegible] by [illegible], than before. The lovely Adagio was played with deep feeling and without exaggeration. He held his audience in close attention and was heartily applauded.

It yet remains to chronicle the grand performance of "St. Paul," another of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony," those which are [illegible] heartily [illegible] from the general report that it was the very climax and high noon of the Festival, the first complete successful rendering of the Ninth Symphony in this country; a fourth Orchestral Concert including the [illegible] of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," and finally the two popular old Oratorios, from which the Handel and Haydn Society derived their own, the "Creation" and "Messiah." Were ever [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so [illegible] more [illegible] than before.

MR. DRESEL'S PIANO READINGS. Thus far we have found no room to conclude our record of these choice hours with so many great composers. With such as [illegible], they talked not in a foreign, yet [illegible] tongue to us. The last two Readings (6th and 7th) occurred on the last Thursdays of April. Here is the programme of April 23.

Prelude and Fugue	Bach.
Sonata	Beethoven.
Nocturne	Chopin.
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]	Schubert.
Three [illegible] after Valses by Schubert	Liszt.
[illegible]	Schumann.
[illegible]

The Sonata was the romantic one in D minor, op. 31, which is a work of Beethoven's that associated with Shakespeare's "Tempest," and when you read this it makes the [illegible] breathing the same atmosphere and Prospero's [illegible] to you. It was [illegible] rendered, especially the [illegible] Allegretto, which is so light and free in detail.—For the last concert Mr. Dresel had for the [illegible] a [illegible] black or stormy, and the [illegible] was fine.

"[illegible]"	Schumann.
Sonata, E flat, op. [illegible]	Beethoven.
[illegible]	Mozart.
[illegible]	Chopin.
Scherzo from the "Reformation Symphony"	Mendelssohn.

[illegible]	Chopin.
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

These [illegible] fancy pieces by Schumann are as poetical, imaginative and charming as any piano-forte things produced since Schumann, and it was a real pleasure to hear them again. The Beethoven Sonata (of the last period), with all its changeful moods and [illegible], [illegible] of feeling intensely human, its [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] passages of [illegible] material, and finally its flying fugue [illegible] into the end, [illegible] was indeed a revelation from the inner life. The Mozart Andante was arranged and very faithfully from the [illegible] Symphony. The [illegible] Scherzo [illegible] Symphony, the happiest thing in it, was a happy [illegible] to Mr. Dresel to [illegible] his and give up [illegible] a [illegible].—But we must end, sorry to have to deal so briefly with a series of the choicest musical occasions of the past season.

During the present week there have occurred two most interesting concerts of the pupils of the Perkins Institution for the Blind and the [illegible] Musical [illegible] of the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] the pupils of the great [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] are too important to be dispatched in a few lines, and therefore we reserve them.

By the next number too, we may hope to have gathered some report of Mr. Harrison's Great Musical Festival, now in progress in New York, for which a very [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible].

WASHINGTON. MAY 4.—In the [illegible] House of Representatives [illegible] an exhibition of the medals and diplomas awarded to American Contributors at the Paris Exposition of 1867. The diplomas, handsomely framed and displayed [illegible] [illegible] that more than line the walls of that [illegible] hall, while the medals, of gold, silver and bronze, are arranged in show cases in the centre. Conspicuous among these hundreds of [illegible] medals are four little decorations, of [illegible] intrinsic value in themselves considered, looking [illegible] like the army corps badges worn so proudly by our heroes of last war, but of great price in the eyes of a Frenchman, from the inspiring memories of the great Napoleon, the founder of the Legion of Honor. The official certificate accompanying these announces that they are [illegible] by the decree of the Emperor to the persons named. One of the four bears the name of "C. F. Chickering of Boston," and this would seem to settle the vexed question of the pianos. The gold medals are [illegible] to the smallest detail [illegible] of the recipient. Mr. Chickering, we all know, is a gentleman of [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible], but it was not for that that the Emperor decorated him, but because his piano-fortes [illegible] the best of them all, and in these cases he [illegible] him [illegible] above all competitors. The greater honor conferred on these [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] superiority and the distinction awarded cannot be doubted or denied.

WASHINGTON. MAY 11.—The German opera troupe has been followed here by Mr. [illegible]'s French company, which by the completeness of all its appointments and perfection of all its performances, gives an example to be heeded by the German and Italian companies. As an opera company for many years has no [illegible] on the stage so carefully and completely [illegible] as this French troupe. The orchestra is excellent, the chorus composed of fresh, young voices, [illegible] [illegible] personal attractions, and all of them possessing [illegible] [illegible] required by their role. The costumes [illegible] picturesque, the scenery appropriate, and every [illegible] [illegible] of stage [illegible] is carefully attended to, as we have not seen it done since the memorable days of the old Havana Company. I speak now in reference to the performance of La Belle Hélène, which I did [illegible] La Grande Duchesse [illegible] in [illegible] the former not yet sung in Boston. [illegible] superior to the Duchesse [illegible] work. Indeed anything more sparkling [illegible] [illegible] I have seldom heard. [illegible] of the joyous works of Mozart, and [illegible] was constantly [illegible] to me as the [illegible] [illegible] the general [illegible] that I heard it. I confess to having been [illegible] [illegible] against the Duchesse by the [illegible] of the management, which called upon the world to admire [illegible] eight weeks.

while I was at home felt no doubt having heard it read a word about it. The story is a most delicious burlesque of the old story of Helen and Paris, Agamemnon, Orestes, the two Ajaxes, Achilles, Calchas, and the poor king Menelaus, again stood amazingly upon the scene. The anachronisms are exceedingly amusing and go just to the verge of absurdity without going too far, just hinting at a thing without the broad coarseness which characterizes most burlesques. The music is delightful from beginning to end. The orchestration is rich in harmony, with many novel and charming combinations of instruments in some of the accompaniments. The melodies are very striking and fascinating, having less of the dance music character than those of the Duchesse, and one or two of the most sedate passages more beautiful. Mlle. Tostée seems to have made the part of La Belle Hélène her own, and it is difficult to imagine a truer representation of the character floating alike between two defects, the fault, parents singularly adapted to represent the Greek Queen. Her remarkable grace and abandon added by the most picturesque and beautiful costume, enabled her to give a most charming representation and she has been a success and with applause, double and triple encores, rightly rewarding her inimitable singing of the song "Un mari sage," which no singer that I remember could give with such charming irresistible abandon without passing the line of good taste which she never transcends. It is funny beyond description, and every hand present in the piece is that this sparkling little thing is sparkling. Frau of the Duchesse becomes the Paris of this play and Prince Paul becomes the unfortunate Menelaus. Every part is most capitally delineated, and it is hard to say which of them all is the best rendered.

In that respect this opera is more completely represented than any that I have ever seen, and there is none I ever performed in this country of late years that is not entirely familiar to me, so that I say this seriously and in good faith, meaning what I say. I am sure that this consciencious and intense fidelity to the smaller details of the performance will ensure the unqualified approval of famous and tenor, while all listen with delight to the charming music of this opera. It would be added a favorite here some of the really great operas at given but so yet the perfection of performance of this company has not been approached by any German or Italian company that ever sang in this country without exception.

From here we I understand Mr. Bateman's Company goes to Baltimore and Philadelphia, and thence to Boston where I am confident that this new opera will draw admiring crowds for weeks. ■

[Note by the Editor.—We almost suspect our friend of quizzing in the above. Such wholesale admiration of Offenbach's mere smartness, commonplace and heartless music with blending of his systematic prostitution of Art in the fine frolic emphasis of Mozart's his lighter mood with delight. It is so easy to create such a reply without reference; as Mlle. Tostée and such power of singing as better than one may have seen in the open air Cafés Chantans of the Champs Elysées,—as the part of one with whom we for the most part cordially sympathise,—may be ironical on the correspondent's bit, especially as he is fond hitherto in most heroic places, that great Offenbach can comfort him. Of course we can give the Bateman troupe credit for good acting, good ensemble, &c. worthy of a better cause; but that Boston is to be congratulated in actually receiving its from this importation from the lowest theatres of Paris (and is now threatened to through two channels, the French troupe from New Orleans as well as Bateman's) is something which we cannot be expected to admit after our first abundant of impressions from the Duchesse several months ago. Yet to show at least that there are two sides to the question, after printing the letter from Washington we will reflect with an article on the same subject from the Philadelphia Bulletin.]

Philadelphia, May 15.—Offenbach's comic opera La Belle Hélène, after much preliminary puffing was produced last night at the Academy of Music by Bateman's French Opera Company. So far as brilliant audience, elegant stage effects, fine scenery and a moderate display of ballet dancers contributed to success the performance was successful. So far as good music, artistic singing, genuine humor and a proper regard for decency constitute success, it was a wretched failure.

The text of the Grand Duchess is fresh, original, witty and amusing. La Belle Hélène does not contain a witty passage, and has neither originality nor an excellent use of current materials. Travesties of Grecian mythology are as old as the hills in Britain, and not an age has passed since the rules of that ancient faith in which some humorist has not made the jolly old gods and goddesses of Greece and Rome the subject of humor and parody. Messrs. Meilhac and Halévy, bound to write something funny upon which Offenbach could exercise his talent. Their selection of a purely classical subject does not argue anything for the inventive talent. It simply proves that they were attracted upon the chord which enables all writers who fear to follow wisdom, and they only sang through a shell that has for ages been set for the same tune.

There is something intrinsically absurd in the conception of the mighty Agamemnon with a sugar in his mouth, of King Menelaus coming in upon the scene with his boots and umbrella; of Ajax grumbling a conundrum; of Orestes carrying reserved seats for the sacrifice; of Achilles buckling his greaves entrance in the garb of a watchman making a collection of stamps for his efforts. This is funny, because it contains that essential element of all humor, the incongruous. But when it we have come so far for with utterly incongruous things that they lose the peculiar distinction and consequently their humor? All this has been done before the assimilation of very modern men and women with modern ideas, in ancient times, it robbed of everything all its humor by and exciting characterization by the frequency with which it is attempted. The same gravity has lost its savor. We could not be induced to laugh now at the spectacle of Julius Caesar in a high hat, or of Hercules engaging in a prize fight with bottle and sponge. And this second-hand humor is the only kind that is contained in the libretto of La Belle Hélène. The text is a burlesque upon the story of the flight of Helen with Paris in consequence of the award of Venus giving him the most beautiful woman in the world. Mlle. Tostée is that latter character personified the most conspicuous place, in the whole entertainment.

The acting was very good, but it was not in any degree better than that which can be seen in any first rate minstrel entertainment; and it was precisely the same in kind. The Ajax First of last night would make a successful "end man," and Agamemnon would rise to eminence as a "conversationalist." The musical composition produces scenes of burlesque, poorly, that are more original and infinitely more amusing than this one is; and the music is better. La Belle Hélène does not contain as much as a chorus or a concerted piece of any kind that is as sweet or as beautiful as the vast multitude of songs that negro minstrelsy has given to the world. Not one of the ten selections last night was worthy of an encore. Indeed but one hearty encore was given and that was awarded to Mlle. Tostée, who was compelled to sing a little song in the second act three times over. And what was it that moved the enthusiasm of a Philadelphia audience to such a degree that the actress was vehemently applauded, that masses of flowers were showered upon her, and that she was required to repeat? It was not the music, for that is beneath contempt. It was that Mlle. Tostée, dressed as the Belle Hélène would have blushed to have been at last, indulged in a queer trick of lifting her gaiters from the stage and twisting in which, over her left leg. It was not funny, it was vulgar and suggestive, and a simple Juba, air about it, which, with a peculiar movement of her body—something between a shake and a shrug—seemed to afford intense amusement to the staid portion of the audience. The fault is directed talking than to the person who exhibited the movement and to those who applauded it.

Mlle. Tostée succeeds in this country simply because she does various things in a rakish way, to which happily we are not accustomed. It is not her talent that wins a popularity for her; it is the boldness with which the woman and the tricks of the Concert hall and the stage of the Academies. This was the only really objectionable thing in the whole performance, if we except the occasional double entendres in the text of the opera. But the translator has a careful man, and he has purified the English version so that it does not in any great measure offend Anglo-Saxon taste.

WHOLE NO. 700. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1868. VOL. XXVIII. NO. 6.

Longfellow.

[Longfellow sails to-morrow from New York in the steamer "Russia" for Europe. The following tribute was read a few evenings ago at a private farewell dinner to the Poet, and we have obtained from its author permission to give it publicity, feeling that the sentiment it embodies is shared by our whole country.—Daily Advertiser, May 26.]

Our Poet, who has taught the Western breeze
To waft his songs before him o'er the seas,
Will find them wheresoe'er his wanderings reach
Borne on the spreading tide of English speech,
Twin with the rhythmic waves that kiss the farthest beach.

Where shall the singing bird a stranger be
That finds a nest for him in every tree?
How shall he travel who can never go
Where his own voice the echoes do not know,
Where his own garden flowers no longer learn to grow?

Ah! gentlest soul! how gracious, how benign
Breathes through our troubled life that voice of thine,
Filled with a sweetness born of happier spheres,
That wins and warms, that kindles, softens, cheers,
That calms the wildest woe and stays the bitterest tears!

Forgive the simple words that sound like praise;
The mist before me dims my gilded phrase;
Our speech at best is half alive and cold,
And save that tenderer moments make us bold
Our whitening lips would close, their truest truth untold.

We who behold our autumn sun below
The Scorpion's sign, against the Archer's bow,
Know well what parting means of friend from friend;
After the snows no freshening dews descend,
And what the frost has marred, the sunshine will not mend.

So we all count the months, the weeks, the days,
That keep thee from us in unwonted ways,
Grudging to alien hearths our widowed time;
And one has shaped a breath in artless rhyme
To track thee, following still through each remotest clime.

What wishes, longings, blessings, prayers shall be
The more than golden freight that floats with thee!
And know, wherever welcome thou shalt find,— Thou who hast won the hearts of half mankind,—
The proudest, fondest love thou leavest still behind!

Bach's Passion Music at the Pantheon in Paris.

[At last, for the first time, Bach's "Passions-musik" (or, the first part of it) has found a hearing and has worthily awakened enthusiasm in Paris. We translate from Le Ménestrel of May 17.]

There surely is a contagion in all noble enterprises, which does honor to all who have borne part either in the project, or the permission, or the execution.

The Clergy of Sainte Geneviève (the Panthéon), in allowing the sanctuary erected by Soufflot to be used for the performance of masterworks of religious art, add to its precious titles a renown no less beautiful than that which was given to it by the Constituent Assembly in 1791 and by the government of July, when they decreed that the Christian temple should be closed, to become a burial place for great men.

The Panthéon is reopened, but no longer as a cold sepulchre, pompously certifying to the emptiness of human grandeur; it becomes once more a sanctuary where the great men, who have deposited there genius as thus we lie in the Creator, and commune with their fellow beings by the power of Art which they have not snatched from heaven, like the Titans of the fable, but which they hold as a rare gift set forth from the munificence of the Creator.

We are not of those who will condemn this hospitality accorded by Religion to Art.

What more suitable than to sing the divine masterpieces in the very place where they are inspired? Why should not the house of God serve for the works of artists who have placed their genius in the service of the faith, and for the enthusiasts who consecrate their talent to the interpretation of those works?

This good will of the clergy has rendered possible the foundation of the Société des Concerts Spirituels, by placing at its disposal a vast locale, which, if it does not possess all acoustic qualities, has at least the merit of lending itself by its form to the requirements of great choral performances. We welcome it the more, because this new institution, as we hope, will fill a most strange void in so eclectic a country as France. What? we profess admiration for the masterpieces of genius, and we have been living in complete ignorance of the works of Bach and Handel! In England, in Germany, in America, they perform their Oratorios every day, while in France, the most civilized nation of Europe, in Paris, the metropolis where all the glories of all countries come to put their sanction, we have had to admire the great choral works on trust and take the word of others as to their immortal worth!

Thanks to the new Oratorio Society, the important work of popularizing Art, begun by M. Pasdeloup (in his classical Orchestral Concerts) at the Cirque-Napoléon, is about to receive an indispensable complement. And here we must do justice to M. Pasdeloup. One is sure of meeting him wherever there is a work of musical reform to be accomplished; never does his courage recoil before the difficulties of an enterprise. He is always ready to raise the torch of progress in the midst of the darkness spread around by routine and by apathy. This time, again, in attacking at the outset the Passion of Bach, he has taken the bull resolutely by the horns. In placing on his first programme the name of the immortal John Sebastian, he brought the public in contact with the two giants of Oratorio.

It was not without a lively emotion that on penetrating into the Panthéon on Thursday evening we saw (imposing spectacle!) a gigantic platform built up at the farther end of the church, adorned with 400 performers who were about to interpret the first part of the Passion according to St. Matthew of Sebastian Bach, and Handel's Ode to St. Cecilia.

Never had such a sight struck our eyes before; and we could have believed we were assisting at one of those performances across the Channel or the Rhine, of which French musicians cannot speak without blushing for our relative inferiority. The middle of the platform was occupied by a numerous orchestra, placed between the two choirs which, in the work of Bach, hold continual dialogue with one another. At the top of the platform, opposite the door of entrance, a great organ had been set up for the occasion. Below, on the right and on the left, two choirs of children, unfortunately too few in number, had been placed, partly to reinforce the sopranos and contraltos, partly to play a part independent of the two choral masses as they did in the grand introductory chorus.

What can we say after a single hearing of Bach's Passion music, the work of a giant, which by a language that is unaccustomed, even rude, by its herculean structure, by its gigantic proportions, quite confounds our musical taste as flattered by the Italian sololists, the caressing coquetries, and the voluptuous refinements of modern art!

Here are no petty means, none of those far-fetched effects of poverty, those contrasts of shade and color destined to keep awake the attention of the hearer by the coup de surprise of sensation. The whole effect depends on the force of musical invention properly speaking, in the correctness of expression, and in that power of conception above all, the all powerful science of managing, as J. S. Bach alone knew how, the complicated interlocking of several choral masses, often independent of each other and of an orchestra which accompanies them but without saying the same thing that they do.

The first chorus, in E minor, colossal portico of a colossal work, confounds one by the unparalleled grandeur and the masculine simplicity of style, at the same time that it startles by the power of combination which Bach there displays. In fact, while the second chorus sought these voices of those of the first uttering sorrowful exclamations, a third choir of children intone in unison a Choral, which stands out in relief against the different changes made by the orchestra and voices.

Unfortunately the weakness of the choir of children and a certain confusion in the enormous masses, injured the effect of this piece, to which no pendant could be found in the work of any musician.

This immense page, of an austerity of expression never surpassed, stands majestic and calm, like a mighty river flowing in a deep bed, without the noise of dashing waves, without tumultuous eddies.

The grandeur exists because it feels no effort, these simple processes of her same station [illegible] found are not habituated to the [illegible] of modern instrumentation and perverted by the abuse of the picturesque style. But is there nothing beautiful in nature but at times its freaks and violent contrasts? The livid tint of the walls of a crater, the sombre physiognomy of a stormy sky, the aspect of [illegible] clouds fringed by the rays of the moon, are poetic things, no doubt; but the full light, the open country, the full life, in their harmony, their peace, their every-day normal aspect, have not these their beauty likewise?

It is well known how Bach's Passion is conceived. The scene as has followed step by step the text of the evangelist. The role of the narrator is taken by a tenor; that of Jesus by a baritone, that of Judas by a bass. Whenever in the recital, the people or a collection of individuals take up the word, the couple in the double chorus intervenes. The text is frequently interrupted by pieces (choruses or airs) intended to express the sentiments which the recital of the Passion inspires in the Christian heart: outbursts of love and faith, and reflections on ourselves in presence of the supreme sacrifice consummated by the infinite mercy;—such is the ordinary subject of these pieces, in which the musician reserves to himself the greatest liberty. Another musical element which traverses the recital, and which, while lending variety to the work, causes the religious impression to predominate, is the Choral,—severe form which consists of a vocal harmony in four parts, accompanied by the organ.

We remarked on Thursday that the organ was too prominent in the attack of these [illegible] and had at first to rally the somewhat hesitating voices. But when these had recovered their aplomb, and the organ, fading into the background, no longer encumbered their range, the result was an incomparably grand effect.

In the midst of so great a number of pieces, all marked by the Bach stamp, it would be difficult on a first hearing, especially in the case of a work which cuts her you away from all your habits and for which your time [illegible] to be made [illegible] not to let many between pass by [illegible]. Among the passages which struck us most, we [illegible] the introductory chorus, most of the recitatives of Jesus, stamped with a force of expression and a nobility quite mhidue-[illegible]; the recitative of the Alto with the accompaniment of two flutes, of which the final cadence is one of those get [illegible] only possible with Bach; the Choral C'est la Roche [illegible], in which the melody so touching and so natural easily impresses itself upon the memory; and finally the emphasis of [illegible] so praised by the author in the chorus: And will not heaven's lightning smite thee?

The principal solo were well filled by Mme. Vandenheuvel Duprez, and Messrs. Faure and Bollaert. Mme. Duprez executed this so [illegible] music of Bach with that profound knowledge of the art of singing and that consummate style which allows her to essay all kinds of success with [illegible]. On his part M. Faure sang the recitatives of Jesus with all the grandeur and [illegible] with the exquisite art which he is known to possess. M. Bollaert acquitted himself most honorably in the often ungrateful part of the narrator. This part, written in tones which some times exceeding the ordinary range of the tenor voice, was rendered by M. Bollaert with the [illegible] of a consummate musician. We may add that the only characteristic timbre of his voice has a remarkable result; throughout the vast [illegible] of the nave the sound reaches the hearer clear and pure, the faithful messenger of the word, which, with him, is never lost.

As to the other soloists, we praise the good will with which they associated themselves with an enterprise so worthy of an artist's sympathy.

M. Pasdeloup has shown a great authority in conducting this array of executants so numerous for the first time on a field so difficult. If the choruses had not that perfect unity of attack, that precision of [illegible] boasted by our German neighbors, need we wonder? In truth the German mothers transmit to their children the knowledge of the works of Bach, at the age when French mothers teach their sons to recite the Pater Noster.

(Correspondence of London Musical World.)

You are aware that M. Pasdeloup, conductor of the "Popular Concerts" here, has founded a society called La Société des Oratorios. The [illegible] is determined to use his new institution to good purpose was proved on the [illegible] inst., when Bach's Passion (according to St. Matthew) was given in the Panthéon. The band and chorus numbered 400 and among the principals was M. Faure, who contributed in no small degree to the success of a performance which must be [illegible] as an [illegible]. The effect of the music was all that could have been wished by those who are most anxious for the advance of true art. Some of the critics, but more especially [illegible] of l'Art Musicale, have written [illegible]. Here are [illegible] of [illegible]: "What [illegible] as all this colossal [illegible]! What astonishing development in the [illegible], not to speak of the magnificent [illegible]! What [illegible]! What [illegible] in the simple modulation, [illegible] of the orchestra!" Finally Bach is pronounced the great musician [illegible] all time. Clearly the world [illegible] when [illegible] Sebastian, after being tried by his most elaborate work, is so spoken of in a French journal. That it moves [illegible] this special development is not credit of M. Pasdeloup's earnest labors. Baron Haussmann could be of no less in the arms of his [illegible] street.

Mendelssohn's Letters to Baermann.[*]

V.

Berlin, Sept. 4, 1832.

Good evening, old Bärmann!

Were you to ask me where I have been for so long and I ought to tell you that I have been so long away I can not because I was obliged to go to London, and then to come on here, "and so on, [illegible] on." But properly I should first have thanked you for your pleasant letter. I received the letter. It contained quite true [illegible] and had quite the flavor of some of our former [illegible]. Pray don't take me as my [illegible] at [illegible]. I really had no [illegible] whatever [illegible] and indeed I have been at the moment [illegible] my old [illegible] where I have been [illegible] up and down feeling rather [illegible] jolly [illegible] I must write to you [illegible] how you are getting on and beg you to send me a few lines. If you have the [illegible] it would give me, you would do so at once. Dear [illegible], old fellow, let me hear from you, for I do long to know whether you [illegible] the whole of your [illegible]. [illegible] I were only there once more! then our happy days should be renewed. At present things look somewhat gloomy around me; and I have had rather a dismal, disagreeable time of it! You already know that I had an attack of cholera in Paris that very much weakened me. Since then I continue to suffer from my stomach and nerves, and not one day do I feel quite well or cheerful; moreover I have lost a great many of my nearest relations and friends. I heard of the last death only a fortnight ago, and all this has made me feel much depressed. A few gay and cheering words from you, therefore, would be highly welcome, as you will write, I feel sure, knowing how I long to hear from you. You [illegible] you ever was so here so tranquilly and comfortably as when I was with you. You write that there was a great deal of money at the [illegible], but this is of course all at an end now. Little thought, when I saw the old gentleman in Paris, that he would so soon be taken from us. It is a terrible loss to his family. I really believe he had the best disposition of them all; but I fancy, with one exception, there is no other [illegible] of my acquaintance. Is your wife's [illegible] quite gone? You do [illegible] not her [illegible]. I rejoice much [illegible] that your son Carl is now so stout, though as a rather Chamber [illegible], no doubt he will get on well in this world—"like father, like son." The father, however, plays on the clarionet in [illegible]. Here I see a great many [illegible] that might have made you, as well as your son, very conceited and [illegible], whereas in your case such ought to be inflated but your cheeks in a forte.

I could not get your article into the French papers, not being acquainted with any of the editors, and I am at daggers drawn with their chief authority. Fétis [illegible] hate each other heartily. Now as he edits the only musical paper in Paris and the others do not accept articles of [illegible], I have translated it into English and sent it on [illegible] to London, where I know pretty well (Mr. Ayrton of the "Harmonicon") and hope it may be [illegible] the result you wish. But I fear that [illegible] and the proposal will not meet with the success [illegible] you expect, for here, as you are aware, they cling very much to things as they are, and [illegible] of any novelty; and for the reason these [illegible] player [illegible] is all in all to them. Do you not think it would be wise to [illegible] the papers here? Although I do not myself know the people, I could at all events manage to have it put in [illegible] with a few words of commendation. They are themselves so [illegible] to [illegible] Berlin every [illegible] of the clarionet knows you, so I think far greater success might be looked for here. Write to me, then, whether I am to take any steps in the matter, and should you wish me to do so, send me a copy of your article, as I have left the former one in England. Tell me, too, a great deal about my pretty Munich girls. Indisposed and out of sorts as I am to-day, the mere idea of all the terrible cross looks [illegible] on my paper. I become somewhat more cheerful by even thinking of them. I should have liked much to see Therese in the black dress; her graceful figure must have looked charming in it. Remember me to her, give her many greetings from me, and if you don't see her go on purpose to see her, and take them to her; you must pass her house very [illegible] whether or no. It would have been a pleasure to hear Delphine [von Schauroth] play. But no doubt the whole family are highly offended with me, for I have not been able to send a single letter. I began to write to her in Paris, finished the letter in London, and put it in the post after two days afterwards, when it returned to me because the postage was not properly paid. Since then I have made no further attempt. No doubt they will be very angry; but I have been all along in the worst possible humor for writing, as you will observe by the [illegible] all this is good for nothing; but if it brings an answer from you, it will be good enough. I am as angry as an old tom-cat. I should like the whole world to be hanged. But in spite of my [illegible], give my best [illegible] if you know where I [illegible] to Margarite Staudacher, Stuntz, Poissl (Senior and Junior), Aacher, Schleinitz, Hauser, &c.; also to all dear friends and worthy men, among whom I include Mme. Vesperman, the Demoiselles Müller, Mme. Hardin, Delphine, and Therese. Remember me to Leporel, and the whole Hauser family; don't on any account remember me to Cäcilard, but to your dear wife and sons instead, twice as often at least as they care to hear it. And now forgive this stupid letter, but answer it; so adieu! may you be well and happy, and wish for me that my news would ever go far far away! I do wish I were in Munich, but I cannot get off from here during the summer. Then, however, comes spring and I in your I hope. Farewell!!

Yours,
FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

Dear Hermann,

I herewith send you the duet you bespoke. "None but a rogue will pretend to give more than he has." The title is for it might just as well be by any other different composer. At all events, do [illegible] at your [illegible]. If you cannot make use of it, [illegible] send your [illegible] and put on [illegible] please and make some [illegible] good out of [illegible] which changes I [illegible]. The following are my intentions [illegible] you [illegible] forms the subject [illegible] you tell [illegible] after you had seen all but [illegible] and he had flown into a passion (you will [illegible] complements) in the adagio. I wished to give you a retrospect of [illegible] Heinrich Baer's, where I was obliged to compose it. The [illegible] to my [illegible] while the [illegible] of the Bauer [illegible] the grumbling of my stomach. The last movement is purposely kept cold, because you are going to Russia, where the temperature is supposed to be like this. Mme. Bauman [illegible] the place for your [illegible] for several reasons, the first being that it is not yet begun, and therefore [illegible] but I will [illegible] as a [illegible]. I beg you will write me a few words from [illegible] to let me know your traveling route and your address, that I [illegible] may [illegible] forward the piece to you; for even if it were now ready I should have to [illegible] by the [illegible], as it must be arranged with orchestral parts, which would cost heavy postage besides, it would not reach you now. So write me everything minutely. At all events I will do [illegible] as quickly as I can. Since I wrote to you nothing new has occurred here in the political [illegible] since we have an [illegible] Hellmann Brot has sent me a large [illegible] cake, and when I eat a piece of it I always think of you [illegible] good that I should like you to taste it. How does Königsberg look? Kingly and lofty! Poor who did you [illegible] conceal from us that you have such a pretty place? If I [illegible] going to take leave of you I should not know it now. I was yesterday [illegible] with [illegible], who asked so much about you and had so much to say about your amiability that I could have wished you in the land where pepper grows, were you not [illegible] bound for the land where [illegible] grows. God forgive this miserable attempt at wit. But I really don't know what more to write to fill up the page.

I enclose a letter for my Russian pianist [Kohlreif] who is a capital [illegible]. Ask David in Dorpat where he lives, for I don't know. And now a kind [illegible] may I [illegible] blessing on your cold journey and may I hear of [illegible] good fortune. We shall I hope meet in March next at least, at the time of the October festival and other [illegible] doings. Yours,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

* From the autograph in the Royal Public Library in Munich. Date 1833.

Berlin, Jan. 17, 1833.

Dear Kohlreif,

A favorable opportunity offers to recall myself to your recollection, and to convey to you my good wishes. I beg to make you acquainted with a very dear friend of mine, the celebrated clarinet-player Bärmann, of Munich, and I hope that you will receive him with all possible kindness. He is one of the best musicians I know; one of the few who carry everyone along with them, and who feel the true life and fire of music; and to whom music has become speech. And as I feel quite certain that his playing will enchant you as much as it enchants me, and that it will be also a pleasure to you to become acquainted with a man I am amiable and [illegible], I give him this letter to you, though I don't know how to address it. I hope it may reach you, and that you will make a great deal of music together [illegible] you play much and often.

The Wonders of Musical Criticism.—New Lights on the Festival.

The Providence Journal sent a critic to Boston to report of the Triennial Festival, and a friend, kindly thought the [illegible], has saved up and sent to us the whole budget of his letters. We propose to share the fun with our readers. The whole collection would be curious and pleasant reading, but we can here ourselves to choice selections beginning, by way of descriptive Overture, with the following bold sketch of

[illegible]

You [illegible] I was able of [illegible] matters, and [illegible] Music Hall I will not undertake a description. I will say only that when you have seated yourself in the first balcony opposite the stage, the impression you get is [illegible]. What can you see as a [illegible] before [illegible] no doubt, are the red [illegible] of the [illegible] that are before you [illegible] some [illegible] square inch [illegible] and [illegible] will there. You [illegible] the [illegible] it [illegible] full a [illegible] of all the [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] ment to be found within hundreds of miles of this one great [illegible] metropolis of music.

Turning from the background of the stage that the Great [illegible] Organ so colossal in its [illegible] that it seems quite close to you if you sit in the gallery at the upside and, so close that you feel you can almost stretch out your hand and touch it. Its outer edge, [illegible] of huge and [illegible] silvery metal [illegible] of [illegible] pipes [illegible] up into the clouds from some [illegible] Beneath [illegible] resemblance was [illegible] by a [illegible] flanking the organ on either side, and covered with female singers [illegible] of [illegible] all [illegible] [illegible] dress [illegible]. On the right as you face the stage the Contralto [illegible] a [illegible] of Basses, while on the left [illegible] Tenors covered the slope of the [illegible]. The centre of the stage at the foot of the Great Organ was covered with an orchestra of 112 musicians [illegible] proper [illegible] for the vocal orchestra above them of 747 singers.

This concerto, piano and orchestral parts, is [illegible] a very fine piece of music, and it is, therefore, with the [illegible] that [illegible] can't appreciate a concerto at all [illegible]. The great object of a concerto is not, [illegible], a [illegible] or a [illegible] musical story [illegible] the [illegible] of the principal performer [illegible] Topp's [illegible] Chickering grand, the [illegible] orchestra as [illegible] and [illegible] a few [illegible] in support [illegible] the [illegible] passages [illegible] between the piano [illegible] they are too short to allow of the development of any [illegible].

But I had better stop this style of talking, for it is decidedly [illegible], though I will add that [illegible] Topp's execution, I am [illegible] dance before [illegible]. One thing struck me as quite curious—Miss Topp carries her Chickering grand about with her in a brown bag! You may hesitate to believe it, but I saw it with my own eyes! Just before she made her appearance, a space was cleared on the stage, when enter four men, each carrying a piece bag. Encore.

Then enter five men, carrying Miss Topp's Chickering Grand, (the body of it,) shut up in a bag. The bag is opened, and out comes the piano, which is forthwith set upon its legs. This done, a tall young lady emerges from behind the curtain, skirting the face of the stage, mounts the steps leading to the platform and seats herself at the piano; [illegible] and begins to play. As to the playing itself I have said [illegible]. My remarks about her toilet [illegible] also very general. She was dressed in white, [illegible] through a [illegible] of blue. On her hand was something of a pink color, whether a flower [illegible] not informed. Neither could I [illegible] a pretty [illegible] her [illegible] I [illegible] Music Hall [illegible] of the Great Organ. Her notes were [illegible] and [illegible]. This [illegible] the piano were not [illegible] which I was very glad [illegible] long! I [illegible] Chickering, I [illegible] piano [illegible] grand.

The performance concluded, the artist [illegible] in reply to the applause and [illegible] to the [illegible] of [illegible]. [illegible] good deal of applause (not vociferous, but [illegible]) [illegible] her [illegible] at the [illegible] of the [illegible] which, after a [illegible] that I was [illegible] she disappeared again. But the audience [illegible] her to the [illegible] at which she sat down and played a solo, which I liked better than the Concerto, for it had some [illegible] and coherence.

[[illegible] Rhapsody and some [illegible] Concerto! That's [illegible]]

The concert ended with Beethoven's celebrated Overture to Leonora, of which, hearing it for the first time I [illegible] anything [illegible] or [illegible], [illegible] this was evidently very splendid music. It [illegible] this "refreshes" particularly reminded [illegible] able to understand and explain to some future time.

[The last remark is modest and commendable, for a critic. Observe it is a good "L," which we suppose stands for Lionel Leon.]

[illegible] OVERTURE

The afternoon concert began with Mendelssohn's descriptive overture, headed in the programme, "[illegible] voyage coming [illegible] port." [illegible] tried very hard but could find [illegible] either of any of those images [illegible] degree [illegible] as far as the [illegible] listened to the [illegible] long stretch of [illegible] music. This music, being by Mendelssohn, was, of course, very [illegible] and finely [illegible], but if [illegible] have any [illegible] they are not discoverable at a first hearing.

CONCERTO AND [illegible]

As for the concerto for the violin by Spohr, the object of which was to exhibit in Carl Rosa's great powers I [illegible] I stand by what I wrote you yesterday [illegible] concertos in general, and hereby declare, instead of [illegible] ally to listen to [illegible] I shall not [illegible] accept the [illegible] of one good judge who is also a reliable person, as the effect the [illegible] produces [illegible]. But concertos are very [illegible] in the art of music, and absolutely indispensable in [illegible]. They [illegible] only afford [illegible] for the [illegible] of [illegible] and without them the great work and [illegible] not expect [illegible] the many years of constant study and [illegible] for the attainment of [illegible] in this [illegible] special instrument, [illegible] this perfection the [illegible] as a [illegible] Music Hall would be [illegible] and the great works of the great [illegible] never be properly performed. The [illegible] of an orchestra depends on the [illegible] number of [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] concertos [illegible] necessary to the keeping up the supply of good [illegible].

Concert this afternoon. Wagner's overture of Tannhäuser had, of course, full justice done to it by the great orchestra. It is, no doubt, a grand composition, full of science and of splendid instrumentation; but its melodies, such as it has, are of no severe [?] a style as render it very repulsive to those who, like myself, have not heard much German music.

I was disappointed in the Scena from Von Weber's Oberon, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," sung by Formes. I could perceive nothing striking either in the song, or in the accompaniment. Perhaps this is an erroneous impression, which a number of hearings would remove. I should judge that Von Weber's genius was not very [illegible] in that class [illegible] of music [illegible] to be met in other departments. But the lack of melodies of a kind to reach the popular heart, is the weak side of German music.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY.

In these letters I give you my honest impressions, whether right or wrong; and as nothing you can put in the Boston Journal can have the good deed [illegible] you know the feelings (as not your pencil is no more read) [illegible] in the other and [illegible] to yours; [illegible] I [illegible] long about the celebrated Choral Symphony of Beethoven; when very likely I shall be heartily ashamed of when I have progressed to a higher and [illegible] stand point.

Some of the movements in the orchestral parts however [illegible] that may show the skill [illegible] have any [illegible] beauties in them whatever. The Scherzo [illegible] is light and sparkling [illegible] a rather pronounced [illegible] but it is so long drawn out, and contains such [illegible] a variety of treatment, that [illegible] best [illegible] becomes very monotonous and you are glad when it stops. In fact, the whole orchestral part I found, on the whole, very heavy indeed. Several times I had great difficulty in keeping [illegible].

It was a great relief when the vocal part was entered on, of which I had great expectations. It opens with eight bars of [illegible] common-place theme very much like Yankee Doodle, given out, andante by the [illegible] double basses in unison, then repeated by the [illegible] then by the [illegible] and finally by the whole orchestra [illegible] full harmony. Up to this point, the morceau struck [illegible] instrumentation [illegible] made [illegible] agreeable enough; but then [illegible] the voices and [illegible] of it [illegible] after that all trace of it was lost through the [illegible] as shown, of [illegible] was very long. As for the part of the Choral Symphony I [illegible] my [illegible] supposed to be made up of the screaming, the bellowing, the howling, the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] most [illegible] admiration [illegible] of an [illegible]. As [illegible] the words [illegible] to the programme [illegible] of the [illegible], and what [illegible] the [illegible] was about it was hard to form any idea. There was a constant [illegible] again between the soprano and the tenors, which should scream the highest, in which struggle, I have scarcely need to observe, the tenors came off decidedly second best. In fine, the general impression it left on me is that of a concert [illegible] of Indian war-whoops and angry wild cats.

Now it is a most curious fact in connexion with the subject [illegible] that, not one [illegible] only but [illegible] those who I see heard this Choral Symphony [illegible] I meet, concur in admiring it as one of the greatest triumphs of musical genius: and though it will no doubtedly be my own case after a certain number of hearings, provided I can persuade to suffer as much, to them.

Can there be a more forcible commentary than the above on my proposition, that great music must be [illegible] to be appreciated?

Meanwhile it is very evident that the heading of these letters should have more properly been, "A Bedouin at a Concert."

The Works of M. Auber.*

In a recent feuilleton of La Presse, M. Jouvin asserted that up to now M. Auber has produced thirty-eight operas. For a writer who has published a long [illegible] of the master, this is a slight mistake; for, if we calculate correctly, we shall find we have, according the composer of La Muette and Gustave [illegible] forty-one works produced before the blaze of footlights. It is true that [illegible] these there are four written in conjunction with other composers, and two which consist only of arrangements (though very [illegible] arrangements) of works already performed; for we know that Marco Spada and Le Cheval de Bronze were transferred from the stage of the Opera-Comique to that of the Opera. They all count, however, and ought to be included in the returns. However this may be, the following is the exact official list, as detailed as possible—such a list, in fact, as has never yet been given—of the works of M. Auber.

AT THE OPERA.

Fenella ou La Muette de Portici, opera in 5 acts, words by MM. Scribe and Delavigne (music written conjointly with Hérold)—[illegible] December 1836.

La Muette de Portici, opera in 5 acts, words by Scribe and Germain Delavigne.—29th February 1828.

Le Dieu et la Bayadère, ballet-opera in 2 acts, words by Scribe.—13th October 1830.

La Barcarolle, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—22nd April, 1845.

Haydée, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—28th December 1847.

Marco-Spada, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—21st December 1852.

Jenny Bell, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—2nd June, 1855.

Manon Lescaut, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—23rd February 1856.

La Circassienne, 3 acts, words by Scribe.—2nd February 1861.

La Fiancée du Roi de Garbe, 3 acts and 6 tableaux, words by Scribe and M. de Saint Georges.—11th January 1864.

Le Premier Jour de Bonheur, 3 acts, words by MM. D'Ennery and Cormon.—15th February, 1868.

AT THE OPERA NATIONAL.

Les Premiers Pas, opening prologue, in 1 act, words by MM. Gustave Waëz and Alphonse Royer (music written conjointly with Ad. Adam, Halévy, and M. Carafa).—15th November, 1847.

AT THE COURT.

Les Trois Genres, opening prologue in 1 act, (in [illegible] which performed opera comique and vaudeville at the Odeon), words by Dupaty, Scribe, and Pichard (music written in conjunction with Boïeldieu).—27th April 1824.

How many new successes does the above perusal of this list evoke and cause to pass in review before our mind! How many successes, how many triumphs for the master are represented by the works above! Here, we may safely assert, are [illegible] letters of gold in the registers of our first theatres! How many great artists, too, [illegible] before us simultaneously with the above [illegible]. Many alas are no longer [illegible] the splendor of the masters that glitters [illegible] such are Ponchard, Nourrit, Hall, Gavaudan, Chenard, Nourrit, Duboulé, Levasseur, Mesdames Prévost, Rossi[illegible], Dorus-Gras, Giraud[illegible], Boulanger, Damoreau, Lavoye, Jenny Colon, Anna Thillon, etc. Others have retired from the scene, like Mad. Albert, MM. Laurent [illegible] and [illegible] or have taken to a different career. The [illegible] Falcon[illegible] has left opera for comedy. As for the [illegible] on the [illegible] of the [illegible], whom we all know; they are Roger, Couderc, Montaubry, Achard, Capoul, Sainte-Foy, Mme. Marie Cabel, Mlles. Marie Roze, Caroline Duprez, Lefébure, Monrose, Cico, Bélia, &c. &c. The fact is that during the period of more than half a century which has elapsed since the performance of Le Séjour militaire to that of Le Premier Jour de Bonheur, many generations have succeeded each other; but the master has remained true and [illegible], always young, always gay, and always smiling.

At the present day, it seems as though M. Auber had still a portion of youth, as though he would re-ascend the stream of time, and as though he forgot ever [illegible] to enjoy once again his Premier Jour de Bonheur for such is the title of the work with which, at the age of eighty-six and upwards, he has once more appeared before the public!

Le Premier Jour de Bonheur! What a pretty title, and how many sweet reminiscences it awakens in the minds of those who have never had any more [illegible]! But it is most applicable to M. Auber, whose own tranquil life [illegible] and constantly recurring successes, has always glided along in the midst of perfect calm without aught to trouble it any more than the pure and transparent crystal of a brook, flowing peacefully beneath roses.

Let us hope, then, that this Premier Jour de Bonheur which resembles a gentle sportive [illegible] dressed to the public, may not be the last, but on the contrary, may be succeeded by many others.

The spoilt child of the Muse (the Muse of elegance, wit, and delicate feeling, who is not everybody's Muse by the way), M. Auber has always lived on good terms with her and there is no reason for supposing that these friendly relations will ever cease.

As for the public always delighted at being with him, M. Auber knows very well that he has nothing to apprehend from them: for, since the day which produces a work by the author of so many masterpieces, is a genuine, if not the First Day of Happiness! ARTHUR POUGIN

A fine work of art has been added to the attractions of the [illegible] Broadway, in the shape of a beautiful life-sized marble bust of [illegible], executed for them by Thomas Ball, the famous Boston sculptor. As a work of art it will rank among the happiest of Mr. Ball's efforts. A more appropriate ornament for the place is one that could not well be conceived.—Eve. Post

The Triennial Festival.

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 7.—"ST. PAUL."

For the first time the Music Hall was crowded. Strange that so grand a festival must reach the middle of its period before most people, made hearers too, begin to realize their opportunities. But this is not owing really to indifference,— think how readily, how widely the Festival was guaranteed! It is rather because life here is so full, so is [illegible], so [illegible] good part with things well worth the while. [illegible] takes time to make the current set toward a point to which in our hearts we have been eagerly looking forward, it is not that we do not care about it, but it is because we are so engaged in current, interesting talk with [illegible] that [illegible] comes a little late. In such a community and just in proportion to intellectual, moral and aesthetic culture, the programmes of the days grow rich and it is [illegible] easy to pass punctually from each attraction [illegible] to the [illegible]. But from that point of the Festival it was full tide to the end.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" is the one [illegible] [illegible] to the repertoire of the Handel and Haydn Society since the last Festival. It was slowly approached [illegible] many times it was talked of, looked at, tried a little, and then put back on the shelf again. But once taken up in earnest it got a great hold on the singers, and in each successive performance it made a deep impression on the public. This time, the deepest of all; for it was so truly a magnificent performance of an essentially great, [illegible] deep, religious work,— Mendelssohn's greatest in that kind, we are convinced. An Oratorio worthy to be grouped with the Messiah and Israel in Egypt and Bach's Passion music from which last especially it derives its general plan of treatment (the narrative recitative, the introduction of Chorals, &c.) and not a little of its inspiration. It was one of the best possible selections for this Festival, and we indulge the hope that it will prove a stepping stone to Bach himself.

The solo parts in "St. Paul" were all creditable. Mrs. H[illegible] had the trying responsibility of all the soprano portions. [illegible] and [illegible] especially now and then in the [illegible] of a passage [illegible] her voice was [illegible] and [illegible] She feels the music, loses herself in the spirit of the song, so many [illegible] and more largely furnished singers do not; and her rendering of the air "Jerusalem" was full of fervor and of beauty. Mrs. C[illegible] whose unaffected truth and simplicity of expression, and [illegible] of [illegible], we place before all the contralto singers that we know, while her voice, though not heavy, is of the [illegible] and warmest, and her style tasteful and artistic, sang the Arioso "But the Lord is mindful" in her best manner [illegible] [illegible]. It was fairly [illegible] was no better piece of singing in the Festival; and this one little piece, besides some fine [illegible] later in a quintet, was all that fell to her lot during the whole week. Another time we hope to hear more of her. Mr. Simpson, sweet and clear, but somewhat tame in the tenor recitatives, sang his principal aria: "Be thou faithful unto death," admirably, and was obliged to repeat it. Mr. Rudolphsen has not wholly overcome the hardness of his voice; it is not so mellow as Mr. Whitney's, but the care and accuracy, the intelligent conception and artistic style with which he rendered the music of St. Paul, was worthy of high praise.

For the rest, it is not easy for us, having so many times spoken of this Oratorio, to go into particulars [illegible] from one of the New York reports of our Festival (Watson's Art Journal) what chimes with our own estimate both of the work and the performance.

If we judge St. Paul as to its stature among the great Oratorio works, we should place it the foremost of Mendelssohn's sacred compositions, and next to the Messiah and Israel in Egypt in character of thought, grandeur of conception, and to the same [illegible] [illegible] the second rather than the Oratorio form. It deals wholly with the religious [illegible] [illegible] of Paul [illegible] in the goodness and the greatness of the Christian [illegible] [illegible] the power [illegible] of those who dare and suffer for His sake. It has pervading gravity and more [illegible] than Elijah; it [illegible] [illegible] to be human than [illegible] [illegible] it speaks in a loftier [illegible] of prophetic [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] to be readily understood that St. Paul will never be as popular with the masses as Elijah. Still the stand[illegible] [illegible] of Mendelssohn in the world of Art will unquestionably be gauged by his greatest work St. Paul. In the majesty of thought, [illegible] [illegible] to be questioned, in its refined [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has hardly its peer, and it may only be compared by such other [illegible] of the revival, great and noble [illegible] [illegible] have [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] defined by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] we [illegible] that the [illegible] of [illegible] will [illegible] the glory of Mendelssohn's [illegible] inspiration, St. Paul.

There is no [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] of this work and their leading characteristics are [illegible] with [illegible] skill by the composer. Contrast the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] chorus! the chorus "Lord! thou alone art God," "O great is the depth of the riches of Wisdom." "The Lord, he is good." "The [illegible] [illegible] the Lord." But one God abideth in Heaven, [illegible] and [illegible] well. Not only unto Him, with these wonderful [illegible] choruses, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Take him away. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "This is Jehovah's Temple." [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] of Mendelssohn's genius [illegible] be [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] compared with the above and with themselves [illegible] [illegible] renderings of these Choruses [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] they [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "O [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] light," and "[illegible] [illegible]" with the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] "The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]" and "[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] as the religious [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the composer of St. Paul [illegible] a level with the great master Handel. His Elijah is replete with [illegible] in support of our [illegible].

Admitted that St. Paul is a great work, we must as candidly admit that on this occasion [illegible] its [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of its greatness. The [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] they had studied the work thoroughly, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for the [illegible] [illegible] and with the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the old and honored Handel and Haydn Society—a reputation which [illegible] that of any other [illegible] organization in this country. [illegible] [illegible] the effectiveness of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as we have become [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] body of [illegible], the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], "Lord, thou alone art God!" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] Hall and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A great [illegible], a stupendous waterfall, the rolling [illegible] the [illegible] ocean, the vast [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] ebullition, which appeal to the imagination of the beholder and are developed by the [illegible] of fear, awe or admiration; but the outburst of a great body of harmonious sound, where voices, instruments and the mighty organ, with its ponderous diapasons combining, swelling and [illegible] [illegible] and pour onward a flood tide of triumphant song, sweeps the soul along with its [illegible] current, and wraps it in a rapture, which is neither awe, nor fear, nor admiration, but is simply a sense of sublime perfection, [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] and divine, which [illegible] through every chord of the being an [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible], [illegible] us to the earth and lifts us to the heavens, and [illegible] the soul with an [illegible] of [illegible], which no word painting can portray, and no heart can transmit to another heart.

The superb performance of [illegible] [illegible] chorus was but the first number of a series of grand vocal efforts which seemed to increase in [illegible] with the development of the work. In those strongly marked and emphatic choruses "Take him away," "Stone him to death," &c., the spirit and the promptness of the singers were admirable. Every point was taken up with decision, and the emphatic [illegible] of the whole gave a feeling of [illegible], which is not often achieved by a chorus, however well it may be trained. It [illegible], besides evincing an ambition to excel and a love for the work being done.

In the [illegible] chorus "[illegible] is "Happy and blest," "How lovely are the messengers," [illegible] other fine choruses [illegible] [illegible]. The piano was full, rich and soft, [illegible] [illegible] of sound was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] voice and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] choruses all [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] difficult to select [illegible] special [illegible]. The chorus "O great is the depth," which is [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], was [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be surpassed. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] be [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] choruses of the second, [illegible] [illegible] the most impressive of all [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible] up, arise!" which [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Sleepers wake!" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] the highest [illegible] of [illegible] singing was attained, and [illegible] [illegible] last notes of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] away and the entire [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the people. Mendelssohn [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in any part of the world, no finer or [illegible] [illegible] to interpret his inspirations and [illegible] [illegible] more [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] body [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to perform a [illegible] work. [illegible] [illegible] that New York could [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that night and at such [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Festival, for we are certain [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of its [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] to achieve a similar result.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.—CONCERT.

The hall was crowded, for expectation was on tiptoe for Beethoven's Choral Symphony. That was preceded, as a first part, by Wagner's Tannhäuser Overture (bringing in with superb power and breadth by the orchestra of 115 instruments). Weber's grand Scena from Oberon: "Ocean, thou mighty monster," to which P[illegible] was scarcely equal; and the two movements from the Unfinished Symphony in B minor of Schubert, which by their sweet, [illegible] [illegible] and occasional moments of grand symphonic power [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] upon every hearing. This was the third or fourth time in Boston, and the rendering was perhaps as nearly perfect a piece of orchestral interpretation as the week afforded.

Then came what has been so generally, and truly called the great event and climax of the Festival, the first entirely satisfactory performance in this country of the NINTH or CHORAL SYMPHONY. We had [illegible] [illegible] a good performance of it last year in the Harvard concerts. But then Mr. Zerrahn had only half as many violins, and [illegible] under his baton as now; and though they had rehearsed it thoroughly and [illegible] into the spirit of it, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible], as in all former attempts, here or in New York, the quartet of solo singers were not equal to the frightful difficulties of their parts; the chorus, however, of some 200 select voices, had studied it in earnest, until the music really inspired them, and the result was that the audience got a never to be forgotten glimpse of the meaning and the grandeur of that highest reach of Beethoven's creative genius, and the return of the 9th Symphony from year to year was rendered certain.

Now what we had in outline and in [illegible] then, this time we had both in spirit and complete embodiment: if that was the clearest foretaste [illegible], this was the full fruition. The [illegible] at last was realized. Thanks to the fervent co-operation of that noble orchestra,—that chorus of 130 voices, who had become so well consolidated (as the Germans say) into the music that it lifted them above themselves so that they surprised themselves and [illegible] song where [illegible] the great of nearly our most [illegible] breakdown,—the quartet of soli (Mme. Rosa, Miss [illegible], Mr. Simpson and Mr. [illegible]) the first composers one [illegible] had in this country,—and above all of Carl Zerrahn's all-animating, untiring zeal and valor, as well as master spirit the whole preparation and achievement [illegible] perplexing. Much [illegible] and in such exceptional [illegible] of the deaf composer's [illegible] of not only general public so large but even [illegible] of [illegible] surprised, was felt, confessed, almost unanimously so in full mood.

The three instrumental movements were wonderfully well brought out. No weakness this time in the [illegible] of tone in the middle strings; no mere [illegible] of the cello part so all important, no lack of tone and weight in double basses, so that he avoid of [illegible] simply [illegible] in the beginning and the [illegible] force of the mere [illegible] that [illegible] it and the strong walking on of the violins [illegible] with such conviction of the earlier elements, toward the end of the Allegro, were [illegible] in general [illegible] and [illegible] while the [illegible] of the wood part of reeds, flutes, horns, &c., more [illegible] show all the anguish and longing of those pleading human souls, in which a [illegible] of the now dark life struggle is presented, and a [illegible] of the final "Joy" theme is [illegible].

The [illegible] of the Scherzo, the [illegible] off of that [illegible] for [illegible] yet it is wonderful how long and [illegible] the drums and the strength [illegible] simply forgetting it in perpetual [illegible] and [illegible] up [illegible] all the senses, with [illegible] of horns and oboe in the Trio, was a [illegible] blossom too. And then the heavenly Adagio, where the tones of the first [illegible] one by one like musical [illegible] from heaven and the choral [illegible] with the alternating 3/4 strain so rich and deep in feeling. It varied with such infinite fine [illegible]—the whole [illegible] and these [illegible] in the [illegible] set all [illegible], as if possessed, [illegible] by the theme, until the [illegible] good-natured bear itself [illegible] and [illegible] eloquent [illegible] not [illegible] the souls of all. One [illegible] poised in upper air a blissful, serene, spiritual element of eternity.

But neither the struggle of the strong will nor [illegible] to the simple joy [illegible] our spiritual [illegible], however high and holy could it solve the problem. Hence the second part of the Symphony. The wild fierce [illegible] of the orchestra [illegible] for the baritone, and the [illegible] with the [illegible] (Rise unto a perfect [illegible]) almost [illegible] in their [illegible]. The same [illegible] the Allegro and Scherzo [illegible] better, but the [illegible] greatly, [illegible] the [illegible] only Adagio [illegible] the [illegible] The [illegible] the "Joy" theme [illegible] the basses take it up and [illegible] in their low [illegible], other instruments [illegible] of accompaniment, [illegible] of the whole orchestra [illegible] in full harmony [illegible] siding to a sweet meditative cadence, before the theme, once found, is taken up for voices and instruments in fine forms all along [illegible]. The orchestral prelude is [illegible], and the [illegible] the bass solo voice [illegible] to cheerful song, in words of love and universal brotherhood, in Schiller's "Hymn to Joy." How it is sung, by alternate solo and full chorus, with what wondrous changes and surprises of rhythm and of modulation, and to what a sublime height all the voices soar and hold out on the long [illegible] notes, where the thought of the "embrace of all the millions" leads to the felt presence of the Creator and the Father, while the whole air thrills with the vibrations of the [illegible], we [illegible] here [illegible] words. Suffice it to say, [illegible] all that [illegible] and firmly [illegible] passages and figures [illegible] and that [illegible] powerful soprano of Mme. Rosa so all-enfolding and [illegible] powerful. [illegible] mastering the difficulties of [illegible] the two middle voices, not important [illegible] in [illegible] every quarter before the [illegible], down [illegible] so palpably and [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] of Schiller's [illegible] interpreted with the [illegible] of the movements, whose [illegible] here the very text is wanting.

Concerts of the Blind.

Those who attended at the of the [illegible] concerts given a few weeks since by the pupils of the Perkins Institution for the Blind must have been astonished by their musical proficiency. It has been generally known that music was a great resource to those [illegible] of sight, and most persons have had some [illegible] that music has been [illegible] taught and practised in that school especially. But until these meetings [illegible] what that meant or [illegible] to what a high degree they attained become musicians, capable of performing well as [illegible], capable of carrying long and complicated compositions by note and correctly in [illegible] in their memory, capable of [illegible] What we then heard from the [illegible] for them, [illegible] to challenge comparison with [illegible] of professional [illegible] and players [illegible].

The first of these concerts, [illegible] the closing, was a Chickering Hall, Monday evening, May 18, and was more in the [illegible] of a chamber concert. [illegible] and Bach's Concerto in D minor (3d movement) for three Pianos, Mr. Campbell, their teacher [illegible] the middle, a gentleman and lady pupil the other instruments. This was played with perfect smoothness, clearness and [illegible], the [illegible] and conduct of the contrapuntal parts [illegible] the [illegible] moved also. The concert closed with the Introduction and Allegro of Beethoven's first Symphony (the [illegible] on three pianos) [illegible] of the performers of both sexes, being children and three [illegible] with good precision and ensemble, and the piece was well arranged. A lad of [illegible] played Bach's [illegible] (from the Well-tempered Clavichord) and a [illegible] very [illegible] by [illegible] off by his [illegible] by his music. Beethoven's first Sonata, in F was played entire, with a good deal of fluency by a young girl who, to be sure, was not entirely self possessed and as a to her tempo, and had a [illegible] on the quiet movement of the [illegible], but yet gave a most favorable impression of her ability. Another [illegible] Sir Robert Franz by [illegible] and a Song without Words by Mendelssohn. [illegible] of another [illegible] Prelude, [illegible] young men all [illegible] a [illegible] of [illegible] songs, [illegible] by Mendelssohn, in excellent [illegible] and [illegible] the other [illegible] well.

There [illegible] good specimens of singing too. One of the older pupils who had figured in the [illegible] pieces and in the [illegible], sang Handel's

Prayer: [illegible] with a rich, well-trained baritone voice, and, pretty good style and feeling; the influence of Mr. Whitney [illegible] A very sweet [illegible] with a flexible soprano as sweet as her [illegible] verbose [illegible] another blind young lady doing justice to the accompaniment. A young gentleman, with an agreeable, not powerful tenor, gave a fair rendering of Handel's "Total Eclipse." It was in truth a classical and charming concert, well worth one's coming to hear so as to lose [illegible] in serving so willing from the blind!

The second concert, on a larger scale, on Thursday evening, May 21, was given at the Tremont Temple which, though the night was stormy, was completely filled. Over a hundred performing people occupied the stage. An Organ Concerto would have led off but the organ being out of tune, besides the absence of the [illegible] before mentioned, compelled a complete change of programme. First they all sang a [illegible] Choral in four parts with [illegible] precision and [illegible] well-blended tone, nothing harsh or coarse about it, but only a refined ensemble. The Beethoven Symphony [illegible] for [illegible] hands was played again; but the hall was less favorable for the players [illegible] could not [illegible] and thus deprived of their [illegible] keeping perfectly together did [illegible] and [illegible] as [illegible] Chickering [illegible]. What most [illegible] and [illegible] was the "Wedding March" and other things performed by the full Band of 30 pieces, by [illegible] the grown up [illegible] boys of eleven or twelve [illegible] their part [illegible] upon [illegible] or [illegible] bigger than themselves. The composition of the band is [illegible] with that of our public bands; plenty of reeds and other instruments, the trombones and bass [illegible] played the whole effect in point of euphony, good tone, smooth [illegible] accord [illegible] and orchestral [illegible] of [illegible] would bear comparison with some of [illegible] bands. Indeed a certain [illegible] refinement characterizes all the music of these blind [illegible] as artistic [illegible] from [illegible] them. It is because they [illegible] an admirable [illegible] in their blind teacher, Mr. Campbell, who not only keeps them always learning Bach and Beethoven (as also a great variety of lighter things) but [illegible] constantly to all the classical concerts in the [illegible] them to the [illegible] of good music only and [illegible]. For [illegible] we thought the blind inclined to [illegible] that [illegible] has [illegible] right [illegible] and it is plain that [illegible] music, that it [illegible] of [illegible] in our nature, and that they sing and play [illegible] from the heart. This concert included a variety of vocal and instrumental pieces all [illegible] we have not room to mention.

On both occasions striking instances were shown of the facility with which even the youngest pupils read from the embossed books [illegible] and [illegible] pieces [illegible] asked [illegible] complicated questions in arithmetic &c. But what most astonished all was a single example which Mr. Campbell gave of the process by which they learn a piece of Music,—not by rote but always and entirely by note. It was [illegible] he dictated to the whole chorus one [illegible] measures ([illegible]) to be sung. Having named the key and rhythm, he tells the [illegible] the [illegible] and length of every [illegible] in every bar consecutively [illegible] through [illegible] the same to the Alto, Tenor, Basses; then marks the tempo and gives the word to sing; they [illegible] carried the [illegible] in their mind, and they sing the new piece in four-part harmony as correctly as good sight-singers from a book! What a [illegible] of the memory, such sharpening of musical perception,—enough to make musicians! And may not all our music schools, even our "Conservatories," learn something from this blind teacher of the blind?

The School Festival.

The Regular Musical Exhibition [illegible] of the Public Schools of Boston, was held on Wednesday afternoon, May 20, at the Music Hall.— [illegible] than [illegible] has been [illegible] heretofore and coming so closely upon the heels of the great Festival that it was not easy to give it all the [illegible] we could wish. The occasion, however, was even more inspiring and more beautiful than ever, giving [illegible] proof of the thorough, [illegible] manner in which [illegible] and the elements of music are now taught in our schools, and [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible] forever of the [illegible] [illegible] have [illegible] been [illegible] to discredit it as a fantastic waste of time and money.

This time the Festival was purely musical, [illegible] from the [illegible] pertaining to the close of the school year, the presentation of medals, &c., and what was truly a great improvement, there was no speech read [illegible] [illegible] of the 1200 girls and boys arranged as [illegible] the stage, the sound of their fresh voices, and of the orchestra and [illegible], were rightly deemed a fair and glorious whole which spoken words could not improve upon, and which needed no interpreter [illegible] its own appeal to eye and ear.

After an Organ Introduction by J. H. [illegible], the very efficient teacher of singing in the [illegible] Schools, Weber's Overture to Oberon was played by a good orchestra of some 40 instruments, which, as well as the whole concert, was conducted by Mr. [illegible], now the musical director in the Girls' High and Normal School. Then the beautiful Choral [illegible] was played [illegible] on the organ and the 1200 children rose, [illegible] an [illegible] and sang two English stanzas to it ("[illegible] 'Now [illegible] comes [illegible]; Now wakes the deeper feeling'") a richer organ and orchestra supplying harmony. It was [illegible] [illegible] with a fine firm sweet round quality of tone, in which every voice appeared to bear its part, and yet the ensemble was as one voice. To us it was by far the most impressive piece in the performance and we never heard a choral to sound more better. The only criticism we can make is that in a [illegible] the second stanza [illegible], whereas the [illegible] character of the words is soft and [illegible]—we should have liked to hear a portion of [illegible]—not [illegible] produced [illegible] but with so many voices how unspeakably beautiful!

A three-part song by Meyerbeer "The [illegible] [illegible]," and [illegible] by Abt, "Our [illegible]" and "[illegible]" with orchestral prelude and accompaniment, were [illegible] sung, the three parts telling quite distinctly. But we feel that these Abt pieces lead [illegible] [illegible] than a [illegible] [illegible] character after such a Choral. Abt at best is commonplace and sentimental. Still less can we think the Gloria from Haydn's [illegible] Mass suited to this kind of performance. These things were never written for a great multitudinous chorus, but for an ordinary Cathedral choir. The greater the multitude of voices, the more [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] until the four parts reduced to three, the bass taking refuge among the [illegible],—and then, [illegible] English words. There were quick running passages in which the army of young singers could not [illegible] the figure clearly, and therefore could not avail thereof. Instead of this number we would far rather have heard another Choral. And when a third Choral is prepared, can we not give the [illegible] have [illegible] actually [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] (the harmony and not the tune) sung not [illegible] played. Suppose, for instance, that a moderate [illegible] [illegible] be provided, to make up, [illegible] portion of the young sopranos and altos, a four-part chorus for one stanza of the Choral be sung by the 1200 in unison with accompaniment, full and strong, and then let the following stanza, [illegible] taken up by the select choir in [illegible] four-part harmony without accompaniment. We are sure if this were done, that both the [illegible] and the [illegible] would [illegible] [illegible]. Choral upon such occasions, and would [illegible] [illegible] better than the Catholic [illegible] and the [illegible].

After a short intermission—in the course of which Mr. [illegible] put the children through a few of the [illegible] in the course of "Vocal Gymnastics," in which they own the admirable [illegible] and military precision of their movements, as well as the [illegible] improvement in the bringing out of their voices,—the Overture to Der Giovanni was played by the orchestra, and then an Easter Hymn, in three parts, by Abt, was finely sung by about 150 members of the Girls' High and Normal School. This was followed by a [illegible] performance of Hatton's, "The Wood Thrush," in which the full choir [illegible] with first the Altos, then the Sopranos of the [illegible] School [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] music could not escape [illegible]. And [illegible] more [illegible] [illegible] on in the case of the next piece, an exquisite [illegible] song by Romeril: "Wake gently [illegible]" sung by the whole choir, and [illegible] the most [illegible] of the pieces sung in years.—The Old Hundredth Psalm, the audience joining in the last stanza, closed this most interesting occasion, which we have [illegible] [illegible] to chronicle, hoping ere long to return to the subject of music in the schools.

The second Grand Musical Festival, under the direction of Mr. [illegible] F. Harrison, [illegible] on Monday evening, the 11th inst. at Steinway Hall. A large audience attended, in defiance of the bad [illegible] [illegible] of which is very [illegible] in these days. The [illegible] [illegible] was Haydn's [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] about two hundred singers, members of the New York Harmonic Society. Mr. [illegible] J. Connolly presided at the organ. The solos were sung by Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Miss Jenny [illegible], Mr. George Simpson and Mr. J. R. Thomas. The orchestra numbered some forty performers. The whole was under the direction of Mr. F. L. Ritter. The New York Harmonic Society [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]." They have [illegible] [illegible] it from two to three times each year. The judgment to be pronounced on the present performance must, therefore, be based on the well-known fact that the society has had ample opportunity to interpret the difficulties of the work. We [illegible] to say the performance was in no wise equal to the previous performances of this society. There was an unusual uncertainty in the choruses, the modest not being delivered with any precision.

Mr. Ritter whom we all acknowledge to be one of our most able and learned musicians, has not the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to form the [illegible] leader of an orchestra. He seems [illegible] of himself and [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] uncertainty and want of confidence are fatal to success.

The last concert took place last evening, with this programme:—

[illegible]	Bach.
[illegible]	Handel.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	Beethoven.
[illegible]	Spohr.
[illegible]	[illegible]

The Bach Suite, which Mr. Thomas gave us at his last Symphony [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] very [illegible] and very charming, and [illegible] a most favorable impression. Indeed the audience [illegible] [illegible] upon encoring the last movement, a sprightly Gavotte, written in a most [illegible] and [illegible] vein.

Mme. Parepa was in possession of her full powers, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and her clear [illegible]

[illegible] performance of the Handel aria brought down such a storm of applause that an encore was a matter of course. She was also recalled in her second selection, "[illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]."

Of course public curiosity has been very much excited [illegible] in regard to the "Reformation Symphony" and the audience was very attentive [illegible] [illegible]. My own impression of the work is that while it abounds in beautiful passages and often [illegible] characteristics of its author, [illegible] [illegible] add to the renown of Mendelssohn. To me the first movement is the most attractive, [illegible] [illegible] and full of purpose. The 2d movement, although melodious and pretty, seems [illegible] and weak; this was [illegible] encored. And [illegible] the Symphony suffered from coming after the Suite which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The Lenore [illegible] was better [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] orchestral substance, possibly because it is more familiar. The orchestra numbered 80, and was under the very able direction of Mr. Theo. Thomas.

On Wednesday evening we had the "Elijah," in which the solos were taken by Mrs. [illegible], Miss Hutchings, Mr. Simpson and Mr. J. R. Thomas. This performance was not quite such a [illegible] as that of March [illegible], but it was far from being excellent. The choruses were decidedly the best portions of the oratorio, [illegible] the solos were, however, quite [illegible]. Mr. Thomas's voice was not [illegible] [illegible] to advantage in his part, and the aria, "Is not his word like a fire," was very [illegible] and faulty. Miss Hutchings has the merit of singing with ease, and pronouncing her words with distinctness, yet her voice is [illegible] of sweetness and of sympathetic quality. Mr. Simpson improved upon his [illegible] on Monday evening, and really did well in the aria, "If with all your hearts." Miss [illegible] and exhibited a very noticeable tendency toward singing sharp, and many of her high notes were struck with [illegible]. Indeed in the Angel Trio she led the two other voices from the original key of D into E flat, a semi-tone higher. The Trio was encored by a not too [illegible] audience, and the [illegible] [illegible] again, when the orchestra and chorus came in on D (in the next number) the effect was painful. Two choruses were excellently done, viz.: "He watching over Israel" and "Behold God the Lord passed by." Mr. [illegible] conducted.

Concert No. 3 occurred on Thursday evening and was mostly orchestral in character. Mr. S. B. Mills and Miss Marie [illegible] were the soloists, and the programme was [illegible]:

Vorspiel: "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"	Wagner.
[illegible] Aria, [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Miss [illegible].
2nd movement from [illegible] Concerto, Op. 11	Chopin.
Mr. Mills.
Ave Maria, adapted to [illegible] 1st Prelude	Gounod.
Miss [illegible].
Mephisto Waltz	Liszt.
6th Symphony, Pastorale	Beethoven.

The Wagner "Vorspiel," so full of power and grandeur, was perhaps better played than any of the other orchestral selections, not excepting the lovely Pastoral Symphony, in which the chief [illegible] of performance was the dropping of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Allegretto (3d movement). Curiously the [illegible] Mephisto Waltz seemed very acceptable to the audience.

Mr. Mills has often played in public the 2d and 3d movements of the 1st Chopin Concerto (in [illegible] [illegible] before the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has at most always [illegible] the [illegible]. This [illegible] he supplied on Thursday evening, but did not do himself justice; there was a very unusual and unaccountable "[illegible]" about many of the rapid passages and much of his [illegible] was weak. For an encore he played a lovely [illegible] Chopin in C sharp minor and [illegible] [illegible].

The Ave Maria, arranged for soprano, violin, organ, piano and orchestra, was a decided success and was very [illegible] encored, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] commencement where the [illegible] seemed to be no fault. Mr. Thomas was obliged to stop and begin again, and then every thing went smoothly.

On Friday evening came Haydn's "Creation," with Mme. Parepa, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Thomas as soloists. In this oratorio, succeeding the Wednesday evening order of things, the soloists were far better than the chorus, whose attacks were poorly done. Of course Mme. Parepa was superb in "With verdure clad." The and then was immense. Quite a small [illegible] was produced by the lighting of the large "sun-burners" in the ceiling just at the words "And there was light." The sudden change in brightness from gloom to light was really startling. [? !]

On Saturday afternoon there was a matinée, of which the principal attractions were these:

2 movements from unfinished Symphony	Schubert.
Violin Concerto, op. 64	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "St. John the Baptist"	J. W. Morgan.

The Schubert fragments need no criticism; the two movements have been several times played this winter and [illegible] grown steadily in our liking. The Mendelssohn Concerto, which has long been the cheval de bataille of [illegible] was performed (that is to say, two movements, commencing with the lovely Andante) not very creditably by Mr. Kopta, [illegible] nervous, hurried the time of the last movement, and seemed generally [illegible] with regard to the proper tempo. The orchestra was, also [illegible] uncertain as to whether it should and the result was a confused and likely performance.

Mr. Morgan's Overture to "John the Baptist" (Mr. M. [illegible] to have an Oratorio of that name in the works) is quite good [illegible], well up to pretension in a[illegible] [illegible] is [illegible] enjoyable and agreeable at hear[illegible]. Mr. Colby [illegible] at the organ, and the Overture was conducted by Mr. Morgan himself.

There were some miscellaneous pieces. Mme. Parepa sang two solos and Mr. Harrison did likewise, the former acceptably and the latter as usually so.

The Festival (nominally) terminated with a grand orchestral concert on Saturday evening, of which these were the interesting features:

Introduction to 3d Act to Lohen.	Wagner.
Romanza, Amador	F. L. Ritter.
Concerto (pianoforte)	Henselt.
... F. Parker.
Symphony, "Wellington's Victory"	Beethoven.
Overture, "Semiramide"	Rossini.

Beethoven's so-called "Symphony" is interesting as a curiosity, but in no other way. Of course the numbers list of orchestra, two military bands (one playing "Rule Britannia," and the other "Marlborough s'en va-t-en guerre," from which is taken the familiar song "Wont go home till morning"), a drum corps and a squad of [illegible] [illegible] could not fail to please a general audience, but I could find no enjoyment in hearing it.

Mr. Parker displayed his great dexterity of finger and the good qualities of an exceedingly brilliant-toned Steinway grand in the neat performance of Henselt's extremely uninteresting and rambling Concerto. Mme. Abbott and Mr. Hill contributed two solos each in a very seemingly acceptable to the audience. Mr. Hill made quite a "spread" in the "Marseillaise Hymn," which he evidently selected as his solo for the purpose of displaying a very good and praiseworthy [illegible].

And now for the best thing in the programme, Mr. Ritter's Symphony. Those orchestral works which he had already given to the world had prepossessed me in his favor, and therefore I was the more agreeably surprised as I found this Symphony to be a work of very great ability. There are, it is true, traces of Mendelssohn, as he found in [illegible] the second; the theme of the first movement reminds one of the same in the Italian Symphony; the Menuetto or rather its Trio is almost exactly a copy in treatment of the "Scotch" [illegible] Italian, and the Andante (its opening bars) is very like the Lento in "Elijah," "How lovely are the messengers." Therefore we do not find Mr. R.'s new work a wholly and entirely original one, yet it is unquestionably the most complete and most thoroughly fine symphonic composition which has ever been written on this side of the Atlantic. The Minuetto with its Trio proved so attractive that it was encored, and throughout the whole work the applause was very general, emphatic and sure demonstrative. Mr. Ritter has set a deep notch high up on the pillar of Fame, and I feel it to be time [illegible] reaching higher [illegible] for me to acknowledge his undoubted merits and ability. It is not impossible that he may be the "coming composer" whose advent we so earnestly await.

Notwithstanding the villainous weather which has prevailed during the week, the audiences have been encouragingly large and Mr. Harrison is entitled to the warmest thanks of the musical community for furnishing so much good music for so reasonable a price [the tickets were $5 for the series of seven concerts].

On Sunday evening (May 11) there was an extra concert, of which the Tribune says:

It commenced with Schumann's lovely Symphony in B flat, No. 1, a composition so [illegible] characteristic, joyous and so lovely. Mme. Parepa sang Beethoven's noble aria "Ah! perfido," which was only excellent in part, [illegible] the [illegible] qualities of her voice and [illegible] in the introductory scena, the intensity and [illegible] incapable of [illegible] and in the pathetic air proper she ought to [illegible] of her recollection. Superb as her performance was, we express [illegible] not [illegible] half the applause that was showered upon her rendering of Stradella. The [illegible] later in the evening—a song which is [illegible] better adapted to a less [illegible] than a Mozart to voice. Being recalled after this, she gave, in the most charming manner, Gounod's "Cradle Song," accompanied by Mr. [illegible] on the violin and Mr. Colby on the piano. Mr. Carl Rosa played Spohr's violin concerto in G major. Mr. A. [illegible] a good specimen of the broad and [illegible] German art, [illegible] Spohr was the [illegible] and a piece [illegible] which Mr. Rosa's [illegible] and [illegible] are [illegible] barely [illegible]. Mr. Morgan [illegible] his organ [illegible] an arrangement of [illegible]'s well known air, "By the Sad Sea Waves." And then we had for the first time in America Schumann's overture to "King Manfred," a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] work, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and I [illegible] that by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The orchestra did it full justice and we hope they will let us hear it again. Mr. A. H. Pease, and his new piano-forte concerto, of which the second and third movements were performed, with orchestra there is little to be said. The second movement is a barcarole, rather pleasing but not at all original and much too long; the third, an allegro con fuoco, is trashy. What a blessed change was the Overture and March of Meyerbeer, which followed in the delicious church of a throng of [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] orchestra, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] in which Meyerbeer's genius was so prolific, the grand arrangement of the Danish National Song, "Holger Danske," for instrumental and male chorus, led brilliantly by Mr. Ritter, and finally the grand Polonaise of the last scene.

So has passed away the second annual Musical Festival of New York, and [illegible] among the results, we hardly know whether to be gratified or [illegible]. That we have a manager like Mr. Harrison with the courage and enterprise to take the labor entailed upon him is [illegible], that we have a leader like Mr. Thomas is more so; [illegible] as the half [illegible] [illegible] of the musical season [illegible] [illegible] the musical and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in New York that 2,000 people or more will go through storm and mud every night for a week to [illegible] music, [illegible] [illegible] as has generally been not [illegible] [illegible] at Steinway Hall—these things certainly are [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible]. The base of a Mendelssohn Festival, however, is oratorio, and the [illegible] of the performances of "The Messiah," "The Creation," and "Elijah" [illegible] [illegible] no [illegible] satisfaction. The chorus showed no progress since last year [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In "The Messiah," which they have been studying so long that anybody can remember and ought to know as well as the alphabet, their performance was [illegible]. They acquitted themselves [illegible] "Elijah" better than they did among the [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] well, and, if our recollection serves us, worse than they did last June. "The Creation" was the best of the three, but this is slight praise.

A German Critic on Musical Critics French and German.

Among the [illegible] [illegible] a musical [illegible] now-a-days is the fact that more physical labor and [illegible] more mental freedom and independence are demanded from the critic. [illegible] years ago [illegible] had [illegible] three concerts [illegible] and [illegible] that was too much. Now he may congratulate himself if [illegible] large towns, he has not to attend two or three concerts [illegible] The most [illegible] [illegible] three days, [illegible] the present flood of concerts, an article more than three days old in a political paper would appear quite [illegible]. People want to read the freshest intelligence about operas and concerts as well as telegrams and the state of the funds. [illegible] musical circles, [illegible] curiosity [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] not the most [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of highly spiced piquant news. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who is obliged to write, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] not only on the performance of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] independence of judgment. That is impossible [illegible] mental repose, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than [illegible], who deprive him of the very mental repose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to him, [illegible] [illegible] are even some who do not require independence, but only love [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible] Heaven, a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to pray that there would be [illegible] all [illegible] therefore, [illegible]. As a rule [illegible] may assume that our virtuosi [illegible] [illegible] the best [illegible] that they think if he does not praise them sufficiently, or speaks too highly of a [illegible] [illegible] question. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] resemble the German [illegible] in the [illegible] fairy tale, Der goldene Hahn oder Nabe, Frau [illegible] [illegible] Sohn (The Golden Cock, or Nabe, [illegible] first-born Son), by a remarkable author now long forgotten, [illegible]. The [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for his beautiful laughter. From all quarters of the globe come Princes and Knights, Noblemen, Generals, Artists, &c. There comes, also, from Germany some one who is no [illegible] in the Categorical Imperative. Some philosopher of one country or another introduce [illegible] philosophy [illegible]. With the object they manufacture a [illegible] figure in which one of these [illegible] himself with a speaking-trumpet. After the introduction of the princes and other [illegible], the figure is brought forward and a voice says: "[illegible] friends I am not a nation. I am a principle. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] becomes a [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible]. That is all very well, but [illegible] [illegible] laughter to marry.—An [illegible] critic, according to German ideas of objectivity, would be [illegible] [illegible] a phenomenon as the [illegible]. I [illegible] [illegible] endeavored to criticize with perfect impartiality, to go to work quite objectively, and the result was that I really pained my friends most, because, of every word of censure, I thought it did not proceed from [illegible]. This connection, and on the other hand, because my friends complained of my [illegible]. I found myself precisely the position described by [illegible] in his Gesellschaftsspiel:

"Gar so [illegible] [illegible] Freunde, dass [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
That [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."

Determination:

"[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."

The attempt to [illegible] ideal views with [illegible] personal relations gives rise to very peculiar results. In one of the most [illegible] towns [illegible] a man whose honorable principles cannot be doubted for a moment, there appeared a long [illegible] about a concert which, I [illegible], had afforded evidence of the most [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible], and a [illegible] account of what he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] production. [illegible], the performance of the principal part [illegible] a [illegible] estimable [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the most glowing terms [illegible] possible to conceive. [illegible] I suppose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] vulgarity can be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of representation, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for the rendering of an [illegible] [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] for the Traviata, even when the leading part is sustained by an accomplished and personally very estimable lady. How would [illegible] Don [illegible] the Dame aux Camélias was produced at the Theatre Royal! Such contradictions, one which [illegible] honorable critics fall [illegible] unconsciously [illegible] the puffing system. The fresh concert-givers springing up every year, who wish to [illegible] fame and, through fame, to make money, must, above all things, endeavor to have their names mentioned in public as frequently as possible. Promises excuse the [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. So the [illegible] the name of [illegible] concert-giver is subjected to the pressure of the [illegible]; the higher stands the barometer of his reputation; but only a constant pressure keeps the [illegible] [illegible]. What [illegible] trouble must be taken nowadays by [illegible] who does not belong to the very first rank and [illegible] [illegible] well-disposed and influential friends are at work, in order to attract to any [illegible] [illegible] to himself! [illegible] Every town in which [illegible] publicly has its own peculiar tendency, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in every one, the travelling virtuoso must [illegible] himself afresh, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their support. Now the German critic who, as a rule, is good natured and [illegible], does not wish to [illegible] anybody, or [illegible] anybody's [illegible]—at the same time he does not [illegible] the trouble of writing an exhaustive analysis, when he knows beforehand that he has nothing extraordinary to analyze, and thus [illegible] the strange phenomenon of an honorable [illegible] [illegible] from pure [illegible], to [illegible] which in France would be the [illegible] of very direct [illegible]. I cannot explain this [illegible] better than by reading a description written by [illegible] in the year 1841:

"Musical [illegible], the [illegible] of an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] word, the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] concerted and [illegible] a crowd of [illegible]. Like [illegible] of [illegible] do the piano [illegible] every winter to Paris, less for the purpose of gaining money than for that of making their [illegible] [illegible], which [illegible] [illegible] them a proportionately richer pecuniary harvest in other countries. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to a certain extent [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be read in colossal letters. [illegible] [illegible] to be read [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the credulous world, and the [illegible] [illegible] a great amount of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the very [illegible] of journals and journalists. They know how to gain access even to those who are inaccessible to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], of [illegible] the part of [illegible], and [illegible] hand washes the other. [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the journalists, and even [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at the same time a [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. People [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the press; people are very [illegible]. On the [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as regards [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] speaking they are all [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] their [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], or [illegible] [illegible] by a [illegible] or [illegible]. It is scarcely credible [illegible] humbly they beg how they [illegible] and [illegible] in the newspaper offices for the smallest [illegible] of praise. While I was in high favor with the manager of the ——, I had an [illegible] opportunity of seeing with my own eyes how unfortunately these celebrities lay at his feet and [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] before him in [illegible] to be praised a [illegible] in his paper, and we might [illegible] say [illegible] of our [illegible], who [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in all the capitals of Europe, the [illegible] of —— kissed [illegible] [illegible]."

There are sure to be optimists who will assert [illegible] things are managed differently and better in Germany than elsewhere. I, on the other hand, say that in many respects, they are managed worse. What I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with one [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] almost every town through I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to appear [illegible] I will not go into further description, nor speak of theatrical singers, because they are mixed up with agents and [illegible] of which one cannot well speak in respectable society.

The musician who does not choose to adapt his bearing and his conduct to the state of things I have described, must abandon all hopes, except through some extraordinary piece of good fortune, of attaining to a brilliant position or to fame. He must be satisfied with [illegible] that the same Providence which endowed him with talent [illegible] also help him to reach the proper goal. On public taste he must no longer rely for the very simple reason that such a thing as strongly-defined public taste no longer exists, the public taste of the day being always made to take one direction or the other by secondary influences. I can no more [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the most different [illegible]. It is frequently [illegible] than is supposed, and [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] good. With the continual change of persons and things, [illegible] follow in [illegible] one another, the public cannot be supposed to form an opinion upon every person or everything [illegible] is most brilliant and not what is best, commands its attention. Just so, generally, what is great, and not what is good, appears as manifold. We cannot deny that the public possesses a dark consciousness of the better tendency, but to cause that consciousness to become a fact, and a support to art, means are frequently required which are antagonistic to noble aims. It is not for the public to do away with this antagonism; the public does the best it can. It is for musicians and for the few lovers of music who are acquainted with the circumstances, to put an end to it.

Mendelssohn's Letters to Baermann.*

VII.

Düsseldorf, July [illegible] 1834.

My dear Edward Baermann:

Do you know the man who writes that letter and wants music, and would gladly hail Munich and loves you with his whole heart, and is of the same name as myself? It is indeed nearly a year since I have written to you, but I have thought of you daily. Since I saw you I have been to Berlin and to [illegible], have [illegible] and preached the gospel of the clarionet to the heathen. I don't give it to those at all, but I wish I too could have been here to hear you. Twice however I thought of you as a while that I seriously contemplated a journey to Munich, and I think it considerable circumstances combine I will attend to go there this autumn, or if not, certainly next summer. Heavens! what music we shall play together (although no doubt you will not care, and will make me play alone) and how I delight in the thought of being with you all day long! The first [illegible] a proper occurred to me was last year at Cologne, when I was call upon a Leong's banker who said he had been at Munich. I asked if he had heard you. He said no, but he had seen you and that during the whole opera you were leaning in an [illegible] against one of the pillars of the gallery, looking very merry and sending a [illegible] there was a [illegible]. Then I thought, why had I not been standing beside you and laughing with you, &c.

But the second time was still worse. The [illegible] prompted a clarionet player here to play Weber's [illegible] concerto in public. I having previously told everyone that now they would hear the most celebrated beautiful piece and all were eagerly looking forward to it, when he scrambled and puffed through the whole thing till I was in agony and the people said "His a very queer composition?" and I thought "If only the Baermann could be here for half an hour, and place that sort of thing by [illegible]!" I often thought too that the sole I was a [illegible] for the Basset horn—I was to have been in D major—but I do not know whether Cöln? Carl can as well make one of a [illegible] or [illegible] only to mess for your [illegible]. Therefore beg he will send me a few lines on the subject, for as he told me in his last letter that I should certainly be distressed at being as [illegible] come to Munich without a new duet and the trio, and as I am anxious at least to get as far as the Carlsruhe, I mean to be guided accordingly. His letters were most [illegible] and [illegible] and often for days brought back my cheerful spirit [Violino], in which mood you no doubt are when you receive the letters, and are drinking best of Pschorr [beer also of a [illegible] in Munich]; so you may as well despatch me another epistle and let me know at once how you all are, how things are going on at Munich, what news you are hearing there, what is given at the theatre, and further—about all my acquaintances in there—about [illegible] [illegible] Carl still cares for poems, whether he has heard anything more of Stern or of Pianos Wallerstein, or of black—he really and truly [illegible] of Munich. Behm passed through here recently; he is going to America, and now a long time in Sweden and Norway; but he is just the same as he was at the Neckarschwäige. We talked over old times, and drank your health repeatedly in Rhine wine; if your ears tingled half as much as our glasses, you must know this already. Stern's whist parties, too, and the programme of my [illegible] and Zacharias von Tolsd, who is now starring (for Heaven's sake, tell me what has happened; why did he resolve to become a singer?), and the swimming baths, and your little dog—everything, in short, connected with those days was discussed. Pray what did you think of my being a fixture here for two years? You were furious, no doubt, here write [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] long—but you must know that each year I stay here I have three free months for travel, and even more I [illegible] and capital time to work upon a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] I now turn to right good account. Besides, I have only to direct the concerts (as yearly) and [illegible] open one or a under my "[illegible] management" (what [illegible] practise it also); but above all (and it's [illegible] point) I have the forenoon free till one o'clock, and [illegible] Three months every [illegible] what can any man wish for more? I believe this is the first letter I have written for forty years not an answer to another. Give me very great credit for this, but above all by every Leipzig post [illegible] my music page! (on salt quite as [illegible] the eyes of a clarionet player) tied by the golden age answer and answer what follows.

Give me the whole account of your journey from Petersburg, how you found Munich and your belongings, and whether your new play as is perfected, and how contented with your situation. What did you see to Dr. [illegible] [von Schauroth] marriage? and what shall I say to it? I said Donnerwetter! Is she still in Munich? Has her mother—or married again as [illegible] sister? What is Madame Vespermann about? Give her my kind regard and say that I hope she is well. Much love to the [illegible] [illegible] too; [illegible] (have he [illegible] a tell on by [illegible] and Josephine Lang [a singer] and pretty Therese, at my former lodgings, and Count Pocci Hertz and the Stumdachers, and old Poppenberg. A propos is the tenor Hoppe with you? and has he been a [illegible]? What was your opinion of him? I should like to know how he is turned out for some years ago he showed much promise. Greet old Fuss from me. Where is Archt now? still in Munich? And Veichtel? also there? [illegible] [illegible] to thank all your family or tell Carl to do so, and sign your name adding a short postscript; above all, give my best love to all belonging to you.

Yours,

F. M.-Bartholdy.

Berlin, Sept. [illegible] 1834.

Dear Baermann:

I leave this the day after to-morrow and go straight back to Düsseldorf but I must write to you again because honestly to thank you warmly for your kind letter. Do you need to console my fair fiancée? Oh truly, I you could certainly do no better than anyone, and at length the [illegible] made them no doubt quite forgot that they were inconsolable; and then I served [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] you [illegible] &c. Pray look at the biographies that I send you and bravo and which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] knows the laid [illegible] of [illegible] he knows what earthly happiness is better than our man." Yes, you what is [illegible] of [illegible] "[illegible]" and "earthly happiness," and all that kind of thing? Sure I [illegible] merely go more and [illegible] home? We know better. I wish, though, that I had been at Munich to sing to you. Who can tell when I may again see the Carlsruhe? but that I do you wish myself I love you well know. It is famous that I am soon to see you in Düsseldorf. In December you say? It is really does not [illegible] you to lodge with me; you shall find comfortable rooms when you arrive either in an hotel or when [illegible] you please; but before we settle I say that your staying with me would not put me to the slightest inconvenience; so if the [illegible] we should agree, [illegible] [illegible] and pitch your tent with me. But just as you like best. I will make every necessary arrangement for a concert in Düsseldorf, and as I am now going through Cologne, I will consult measures with some of my musical friends there, and the authorities with whom I am acquainted, that you may find all in readiness when you come; I should be glad therefore to know as soon as possible if you will positively be there in December, and in what part of that month? I beg likewise that you will write to me a fortnight before you set out, fixing the day for your concert in Cologne, that it may be properly advertised. Is Carl to be with you, or do you travel alone? If I can find time, I might even be able to go with you to the Hague for a few days, having received many [illegible] from home and once more to play with [illegible] public would indeed be jolly. It is all the [illegible] so [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] I [illegible] that and your [illegible] of it, and the [illegible] of [illegible] of the Stadt theater at Düsseldorf [illegible] [illegible] which gives me more work in the [illegible] than more of [illegible] [illegible] I like your biography very much. I never tired [illegible] and a bit pleases me most of all is, that there is no [illegible] expression nor [illegible] of [illegible] on the century. It true is that of public sympathy and appreciation of your music and yourself. Some of the passages made my mouth water for the sounds of a good clarionet. Here, where I have been at [illegible] times at the opera, they [illegible] away at the clarionet as if it were wood; a sort of pea shooter for each time the clarionet comes in the noise is like a shower of blows and quite startles you when they set so sharply so coarse and clumsy and [illegible] and [illegible].

When Marschner was last here Taubert took him aside at a general rehearsal and told him that the whole instrumentation of his opera was bad, and that he ought to be more careful in her future works. If I ever write an opera for the stage, I will write it entirely without instruments and without singers, and so I cannot endure a ballet; the scenery alone shall sing and play and dance. Now answer me accurately the following questions:—where is Wilhelm [illegible] [illegible] to be found when in Greece? I wish to write to him and do not know his address. Many kind regards to your wife, and thanks for the [illegible], which are still a pleasure for me; also my compliments to "little" [illegible] (here I am a bachelor [illegible] before him as a [illegible] man). Is Ralph as still without his husband? Would I only had a chance once more to see that charming creature; and when does she return to England? What is Madame Vespermann doing, and where is she; and has she not yet quite forgotten me? and is it long do you see more [illegible] her? Above all, what is going on in Munich? You wrote about Franz Wallerstein but nothing of [illegible] which is of more moment. Make up for lost time, and answer me soon—that is at once, and now farewell!

Yours,

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

Leipzig, Oct. [illegible], [illegible].

Dear old Fellow:

You have done well in not forgetting your old companion, and [illegible] your [illegible] to him. For this you deserve to be praised, and I warmly thanked and eagerly longed for. How gladly would I have come to you this year, and all was arranged for it, when our [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with Düsseldorf was taken seriously ill, and it was several months before she recovered; so I was obliged as a matter of precaution [illegible] her back to Berlin myself, and gave up my journey altogether; so this year [illegible] I have been deprived of seeing my beloved Munich, but feel all the more delighted that I am to see my dear Munich friend [illegible] such as that is worthy of you, that is, quite superb! If I only knew when you are to come, for now my wishing hinges on that point. Unfortunately, I cannot at present secure my meeting [illegible] of last year to stay with me, for my quarters here are very limited compared to my house in Düsseldorf, where I had several spare rooms; but still I hope we shall be together the whole day and talk and make music to our hearts' content. If you speak me fair, I will write you such another [illegible] for your journey, with [illegible] accompaniment, as the former two [illegible] in Berlin; but in return you must [illegible] promise to play the E minor concerto [Weber's] again and again for me. I spoke to the directors of the subscription concerts here [the Gewandhaus] about the concert you propose to give; they said that the new year would be the most favorable moment, but I think that you would prefer coming soon, and [illegible] some [illegible] time.

Why should you not [illegible] play in one of the subscription concerts? We might, perhaps, first off [illegible] together [illegible] all the [illegible] you [illegible] here and [illegible] stay as long as possible. I like this [illegible] school and musical life is most [illegible] here. [illegible] might spend a few famous days together, so do come, my good fellow, and come for a good long time. Excuse these hurried lines, which I [illegible] forced to write between sleeping and waking, as I have passed the last [illegible] days in [illegible] concerts and rehearsals [illegible] having [illegible]. Farewell, and [illegible] meet. My regards to your wife and to [illegible]; remember me to all [illegible] and to my pretty Therese. Yours, FELIX M. BARTHOLDY.

Offenbach's Last Opera.

For some months the Parisian public—or that portion of it [illegible] which everyone [illegible] with theatrical questions, and what Trouveur does not? has anxiously awaited the [illegible] production of the most [illegible] of [illegible] "Orphée," "Belle Hélène," "Barbe Bleue," "Geneviève de Brabant," the "Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein," and [illegible] both composed of [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible]. The event was at length consummated on [illegible] the [illegible] "La Périchole," and Offenbach's latest piece, "Le Château de Toto," has achieved a [illegible] success. [illegible] the [illegible] which marks every new production, and to suppress the [illegible] from the [illegible] Trouvé [illegible] as at present [illegible] the [illegible] journals [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] everybody [illegible]. The well-known [illegible] has lay a new [illegible] with the [illegible] Mousquetaires [illegible], of giving [illegible] very pleasant [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] a curious amount of learning and research, but of affording you absolutely no knowledge of how the piece was played and what the [illegible] had. The [illegible] are [illegible]. They have not the [illegible] and power of [illegible] of their great [illegible]; they cannot [illegible] with [illegible] Trouvérisme—such as the [illegible]. They therefore [illegible]. [illegible] everything that took place; the performance was [illegible], the [illegible] and [illegible] itself [illegible]. [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] by [illegible], and [illegible] beyond [illegible]. As for [illegible] Rossini wrote a Mass [illegible] time ago, a celebrated critic [illegible] the work in an attack of [illegible] of which the following is a fine specimen:

"Then follows a fugue. Mais mon Dieu, quelle fugue! [illegible]"

The fugue being thus exhaustively explained and disposed of, the critic passes to another portion of the work, which he [illegible] in an equally concise manner. For another [illegible] "Château de Toto" [illegible] in the following style:—

"La pièce a nom 'Château de Toto.'"

"Ce n'est pas le château de Mon [illegible] chanté par de Walters Scott.

"Ce n'est pas le château Laffitte [illegible].

"Ce n'est pas le château d'If.

"[illegible] château en Espagne [illegible]."

* * *

"[illegible] véritable château de la Dame Blanche [illegible] le [illegible] qui [illegible] Toto [illegible] Tante Aurore."

"Château de Toto . . . [illegible] Quel titre charmant! . . . Toto—[illegible] qui [illegible] à Pâté de Lapin . . ."

And so on for several columns, [illegible] by the latest [illegible] of [illegible], without which no French paper would be perfect.

It is difficult enough to find in this [illegible] of criticism the [illegible] up and down the [illegible]; and groping through so much rubbish is always [illegible] task. But taking the truth with the [illegible], the sound and [illegible] as many [illegible] as the [illegible] would [illegible] in the [illegible] of his salon; but among the few [illegible] his [illegible] Offenbach has [illegible] here is no [illegible] which are [illegible] with the usual [illegible]. The libretto, which MM. Ludovic Halévy and H. Meilhac have supplied, [illegible] on the "Dame Blanche." The Château de Toto [illegible] La Roche-Trompette, [illegible] whom we [illegible] of Crécy-Crécy. "Toto" [illegible] and [illegible] Hector [illegible] the young [illegible] of Château Trompette, who [illegible] his [illegible] the [illegible] by the Marquis de Crécy-Crécy and his daughter, and the Marquis [illegible] the reign of Louis XI. and [illegible] from that time down to the [illegible] Henri IV [illegible] Gabrielle d'Estrées. The [illegible] Marquis [illegible] with the rival houses Roche-Trompette and Crécy-Crécy [illegible]. [illegible] "Dame Blanche" [illegible]. The honors of [illegible] are [illegible] Mlle. Tostée as [illegible] de Crécy-Crécy. Gil Pérès as [illegible] Mlle. Z. Bouffar as Toto [illegible] Hector de la Roche-Trompette. Mlle. [illegible] pretty girl who plays the [illegible] of the [illegible], and has a [illegible] and [illegible] a [illegible] a very engaging [illegible].

Among the [illegible] the [illegible] the Trio du [illegible], the [illegible] sung and danced by the whole company, the [illegible], the Duo des [illegible] the [illegible] Toto and his [illegible] with great [illegible] by Gil Pérès. But the prominent defect in these and other portions of the [illegible] is [illegible]. They are all old [illegible]. A [illegible] of the first act [illegible] in [illegible] with a [illegible] from "Robinson Crusoe," [illegible] by the word [illegible] of [illegible] in "Dame Blanche," the [illegible] Château de Toto is itself [illegible] "Orphée aux Enfers."

The Wonders of Musical Criticism.—New Lights at the Festival.

[illegible]

The Great Organ Concert came [illegible] yesterday noon, performer Mr. Lang.

[illegible] of mine, or [illegible] of Boston [illegible] the organ. [illegible] church organ [illegible] and [illegible] the Music Hall of [illegible] it would be [illegible].

The first piece was Bach's Prelude and Fugue [illegible]. Through the whole of [illegible] than elegant [illegible] listening [illegible] the sound of [illegible] hundred [illegible] full operation. When the Fugue came in, I [illegible] up my [illegible] to follow [illegible] but after two or three bars [illegible] at the end of the chapter. The fact is, instrumental fugues may be very interesting affairs to learned musical people, but I don't believe in them. In character they [illegible] of [illegible] constituting one harmonious whole. And they [illegible] played on instruments, they are more [illegible] of skill [illegible] of a [illegible]—and have no deeper meaning. [illegible] enough [illegible] played on an organ in full [illegible].

In Mendelssohn's Sonata in F flat major, Nos. 3 and 8, [illegible], were very sweet and [illegible]. In Nos. 1 and 4 [illegible] the melody, if there was any, being drowned in the noise.

[illegible] in E major was a very sweet and [illegible] melody [illegible].

I [illegible] Fugue on Bach, and the [illegible] of different combinations of stops [illegible] Bach's Fugue [illegible] of the concert. [illegible] passage of [illegible] the fairy music in the overture to Midsummer Night's Dream [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] the overture was [illegible]. What Mr. Lang played was, [illegible] the Midsummer Night's Dream Overture and [illegible] in the printed programme! [illegible] Everything here was distinct, with [illegible] of light and shade. Towards the end [illegible] the [illegible] accompaniment of the organ [illegible] and [illegible] you could almost [illegible]. Then was [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] one [illegible] of [illegible] grand forte [illegible] with a [illegible] the piece [illegible] of the organ by a [illegible] instead of [illegible]. There must have been a [illegible] Bostonian [illegible] the audience, for he was the only [illegible] the Improvisation, that was heartily applauded.

THE REFORMATION SYMPHONY AND LISZT'S CONCERTO.

Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony was performed for the first time in this country. It was not produced in Europe till after the composer's death. It is the grandest I have heard of his orchestral [illegible]. The first movement is in a remarkably bold and large style. But the second movement, an allegro [illegible] was [illegible]. The melody which was [illegible] was more [illegible] music, has [illegible] and [illegible] a character [illegible] to suggest [illegible]. It was [illegible] and though very long [illegible] a melodic treatment and by [illegible] this was [illegible] a repetition of it.

Spohr's [illegible] to belong to the class of [illegible] impression on [illegible] the [illegible]. Next came Liszt's concerto in [illegible] Mr. Tapp. [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] generally. But I have heard so often those [illegible] on the piano, [illegible] a large [illegible]. As to the concerto as a whole, I must admit [illegible] satisfactory development in [illegible] In other words, [illegible] composition that [illegible] in [illegible] style. C. M. Von Weber at Munich.

Weber arrived on the 14th March, 1811, at Munich, having always received [illegible] the capital the central point of his artistic [illegible]. King Louis did not yet occupy the throne of Bavaria, and Munich could not boast of [illegible] which the names of Cornelius, Hess, Kaulbach, Schwanthaler, [illegible] Klenze, and others, were destined to surround it. But, since Carl Theodor, all its princes had displayed both taste and zeal for musical art. Maximilian Joseph had already done much to deserve the name of [illegible]. The fact is, however, that Bavarians preferred the pleasures of the table, and other [illegible] of those [illegible]. Artists, [illegible] could scarcely seek glory among them, [illegible] [illegible] popular. At a subsequent period, he said, with simple delight, "Schelling and myself are like two good friends."

Peter Winter, the old conductor, behaved at first to Weber as he behaved to all young persons: he kept him at a distance, and overwhelmed him with compliments, as long as he saw in him only an amateur; [illegible] when he found out what he really was, he treated him so roughly, that all the members of his orchestra were indignant at such [illegible]. Weber, however, had enlisted their sympathy, and [illegible] of no doubt of their support. [illegible] On the 5th April he gave a concert in the Theatre Royal. He had already become [illegible] [illegible] Bassoon Concerto [illegible] The King [illegible] [illegible] Weber [illegible]

Tone and Temperament.—First impressions in music are too easily effaced, and often prejudice the hearer against a fine performance [illegible] I have observed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] [illegible] and book—implying, of course, that it was a matter of feeling and judgment. Mendelssohn, in my presence, once said much the same thing, adding, that as to a shade faster or slower, when he played, all depended on the humor he was in. Amateurs are mostly taught quick music at the pace which professors perform in public; and seldom have I heard Mendelssohn's quick music played so fast by a professor as by the composer himself. Much enjoyment is lost where persons are carping about the precise degree of tempo, instead of listening to the true spirit in which the composition is expressed by a great and conscientious artist. The critic of a daily journal, some years ago, complained that the pace at which the [illegible] of Weber's Freyschütz was played, under Costa's direction at the Philharmonic Concerts, [illegible] [illegible] Dresden Opera Band. It so chanced that, within a few months of this carping observation, I heard Reissiger conduct the overture at Dresden [illegible] [illegible] which so offended the English critic.—Musical Sketches, by [illegible]

dience, have been received by the audiences with evident pleasure. It is not saying too much to assert that while the character of the music is not excelled anywhere, at least in this country, the audiences are [illegible] and appreciative. It might not be the subject of remark that good order always prevails at these entertainments: it is chiefly because every individual takes it upon himself to take care of himself, and not so many others. It is doubted that the usual modes of expressing satisfaction with the performances should be dispensed with on the Park. What is now needed to give fulness and perfection to the music is an increase in the number of the performers, and others of the new instruments lately introduced in Europe. There is no popular entertainment more indeed more exciting and agreeable, than that of the harmony of sweet sounds under the influence of leaves and flowers, and all the other elements of the natural landscape. The cost of these entertainments is [illegible] reasonable limits, it is not trifling; when the numbers who find pleasure in them is taken into account."

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—Here is the fourth programme of the season, with comments from the Orchestra (May 18):

Symphony in A minor	Spohr.
(Composed expressly for the Society.)
Trio, "Tergi il pianto" (Idomeneo) [illegible]	Mozart.
Signor Foli.
Overture Symphonique, 1868	[illegible]
Cavatina "Il piano" (La Gazza Ladra) . .	Rossini.
Mlle. Kellogg.
Concerto for pianoforte	Schumann.
Pianoforte, Herr [illegible]
Symphony, [illegible], No. 2	Beethoven.
Aria, "Think Meadows" (La Figlia del [illegible])	Meyerbeer.
Mlle. Kellogg.
Overture, "Ruler of the Spirits" . . .	Weber.

The revival of Spohr's symphony was very acceptable, but though the monotony of the scoring and frequent repetition of the sentimental short melody of the first movement are in direct evidence, its clever treatment of the finale, so ingeniously wound up by a handful of [illegible] subjects, made a favourable impression. Mr. Barnett's overture is at once an [illegible] and character of composition for an orchestral concert. This new production has a lovely and well-conducted introduction, nicely scored, but the subject of the Allegro which follows is not of sufficient interest for a lengthy development and the tonal march episode to become a standard work. Mr. Barnett will do well to remodel his symphonic overture. It is not sufficiently dignified and compact to be a masterpiece for either an overture or a symphony movement; still it contains materials too good to remain in their present shape. It is rather daring for a young composer to venture one of the heaviest trials of bass bringing as the task of [illegible] new ideas, new effects and original treatment. On the whole the composition was well played, and the composer appeared at the orchestra to receive the applause due to his work. The concerto of the Leipzig Kapellmeister Reinecke at very equal [illegible] [illegible] arrived with great [illegible], but neither the leading melody nor the solo passages for the piano in the first Allegro were very interesting. The Andante was far more pleasing, and the finale a masterpiece, complete in every sense, with spirited rhythm and effects, varied and ingenious in its passages for the pianoforte. Both in the bravura and cadenza passages Jaell played splendidly. The absence of effort of the most rapid and complex passages, the loving expression of the [illegible] did much to the favourable impression [illegible] the audience. Although a novelty much of such a work perhaps had been [illegible] by the old subscribers, yet Jaell is an [illegible] [illegible] for making new [illegible] with a new work of one who is undoubtedly an impressive master. [illegible] and who now holds the position once occupied by Mendelssohn at Leipzic. The Eroica completely eclipsed all that had previously been played, and was listened to with admiration.

And here is what was offered at the fifth concert, announced from the same source:

Symphony in C, No. 9	Beethoven.
Romanza, "Angiol d'amor" (La Favorita) . .	Donizetti.
Sig. Bettini.
Violin Concerto, [illegible]	Spohr.
Herr [illegible].
Romanza, "[illegible]" (Roméo et Juliette) . .	Gounod.
Mlle. Tietjens-Bettini.
Aria, "[illegible]" (I Puritani) . .	[illegible]
Signor [illegible].
Overture, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Symphony in A minor (Scotch)	Mendelssohn.
Solos for the Pianoforte:
a. Andante and Rondo Capriccioso . .	Mendelssohn.
b. Valse, Fantaisie	[illegible]
Signor Alfonso Rendano.

Duo, "[illegible]" . . . . | Handel.
Mlle. Tietjens-Bettini and Signor Bettini.
Overture, "Die Zauberflöte" . . . . | Mozart.

The solo played by Piatti, was too long by one half. Dreary bits and a succession of uninteresting of unpleasant solos, although marvellously well played, were really wearisome. The old formula of concertos is now obsolete, and all that is required for violinists and violoncellists is an expressive cantabile movement, and a brilliant rondo for the display of mechanical skill. In concerts of long symphonies, numerous pieces and overtures, solos should be limited in duration. The Italian youth who played the piano is said to be thirteen years of age, and from [illegible]. Whether this the performance to a boy of [illegible] age, neither the valse nor the composer justified the following pressing at the bottom of the programme: "The blossom has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], that, by a fortuitous circumstance they are enabled to introduce to the subscribers the youth Alfonso Rendano, who, as a pianist and composer has made a great impression in Paris during this season." Such a perfunctory puff is quite unbecoming a society of classical renown. The Brothers Le Jeune are more talented only [illegible] the Neapolitan pianist, and might be introduced to play a Fugue of Bach without pleading fortuitous circumstances by way of apology.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS. The last Orchestral Concert on Wednesday week, included a selection from Acis and Galatea, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" and his psalm "Hear my Prayer," the overture to Zampa, Meyerbeer's, and the composer's Templar with several solos by Mlle. Tietjens, M. Santley and other artists. A more varied or excellent programme could not have been chosen, and the fact that it was the Maestro's benefit rendered the success of the concert not more gratifying for in no past season has Mr. Leslie been so much to rob of the sympathy of the lovers of high class music, as in that which has just been closed. The final performance of choral music took place on Wednesday night. The following important works have been performed during the season:—The words to D'dona Mendelssohn Concerto [illegible] for pianoforte, Weber. Chorus Fantasia, for pianoforte, orchestra and chorus, Beethoven; "Messe Solennelle," Gounod. Hymn "Hymn of Praise," Chambers' Symphony, The Reformation, Mendelssohn. Concerto in D Minor for [illegible] solo, Mozart. The music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn. Concerto in D for violin, Beethoven. Acis and Galatea, Handel. Symphony in A Major. The Italian, Mendelssohn. Selections from the following important works have also been presented, most of them for the first time in this country:—Victoria de Bonnafon, Mozart, Mass in B Minor, Bach, Mass in E Flat, Schubert. The Ruins of Athens, Beethoven. Antigone, Mendelssohn; Mass in C, Beethoven.

M. [illegible], to whom the English musical public is already largely indebted for giving compositions of Hiller and Brahms, for the first time in London, will introduce a quartet, of Brahms's at the next Musical Union for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello.

Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's oratorio "Ruth," having been carefully revised by the composer and a part re-modelled during the winter, will probably be produced in London in the course of the coming season.

CHRISTINE NILSSON.—The Athenæum gives its opinion of the Swedish soprano as follows:

An excellent miscellaneous concert was recently given at the Crystal Palace for aiding Signor Randegger. [illegible] with Mlle. Christine Nilsson as principal soprano. Whatever the latter has of "vocability" against the [illegible], we cannot but go on record as our entirely [illegible] and opinion, that this charming young lady is by no means yet the finished artist hailed by her contemporaries to be the equal of those who startled the world three years ago—much, for instance, as Sontag—or in any respect a compeer with the Nightingale of Sweden. Mlle. Nilsson has a graceful presence, is fresh and perfectly true soprano voice, and doubts of execution, but boasts the slightest apparent [illegible]. But, so far as we are as seen to judge, the best fields which make the best singer is wanting. To plan and achieve—the sequence of ascending shakes, which is a striking feature in the "Inflammatus" and which Madame Grisi used to give with such metallic brilliance was confused and ineffective. In the [illegible] "Quis est homo," she was under many as last compared with Mme. [illegible]. Lablache. Chorus on that lady who has to lay the pure [illegible] [illegible] her voice with another voice just possible to the charm of duet-singing. [illegible] of all when the duet is signed with Signor Randol's name. The most real and thoroughly finished execution was that of Mr. Santley.

HANDEL FESTIVAL.—This colossal choral celebration was to take place in the Crystal Palace this week (on Monday, Wednesday and Friday). A London paper says:

A great choral rehearsal took place at Exeter Hall, May 15th, in which only two thousand two hundred amateurs—a section of the force, be it remembered, which is to be mustered from all towns of England—took part. Among the novelties laid out for the occasion are the chorus, "We saw the lovely youth," from "Theodora," "Now Love, the cruel [illegible] boy" (a remarkable example of Handel's [illegible] and invention) from [illegible] "[illegible] The song and the [illegible], from Alexander's Feast." Our two thousand two hundred amateurs (with perhaps some fifty professional singers to lead and to [illegible] them) had to grapple with that [illegible] [illegible] music at sight. There was a time when there were not to be found in London one hundred [illegible] chorus [illegible] able to undertake such a task. Now it may be said (and not without experience) that no such exhibition of this kind is likely possible at the [illegible] in any other country than England. And to [illegible] London be in its [illegible] represents England so far as chorus-singing is concerned.

HANDEL'S MSS. SCORES.—The Athenæum, it would appear, in these two paragraphs:

Is there not some latent sentiment in the following paragraph which appears in a foreign journal?—"A recent sale of [illegible] has brought, at London, one hundred and twenty-six volumes of manuscript, scores, which contain all the parts and orchestras of Handel. [illegible] bearing [illegible] with [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] their handwriting. They are deposited in the public library of Hamburg."

We believe the "original scores" of most, if not all, of Handel's oratorios, are, or were, in Her Majesty's Library at Buckingham Palace. When we were permitted to consult them some years ago, [illegible] of the [illegible] controversy with regard to the [illegible] "[illegible]" by "[illegible]" the [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] to [illegible] as they are [illegible] valuable. We are still led to the fact by the announcement concerning the manuscripts now at Hamburg, to which attention was called, not by a more recent [illegible] of news, that the wing of the building in which they are deposited was too far the other evening. Surely such treasures ought to be placed beyond peril of accident.

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ announced (May 8) his pianoforte recitals, a series of performances which will take place every Friday of the present month and June. The programmes will comprise the pianoforte [illegible] of Schubert, including, besides the eleven sonatas played during 1868, a selection of "Impromptus," "Moments Musicals," German dances and other pieces with which the English public [illegible] been hitherto [illegible] an opportunity of making acquaintance through the now unusually popular medium of performance by an important artist. In addition to the works of Schubert, the present scheme includes the whole of Beethoven's [illegible] [illegible] things for pianoforte alone and it seems he finds that this arrangement will impart [illegible] special interest to the season. Last Friday such [illegible] [illegible] two Schubert sonatas, that in D, op. 53, and that in A, op. 120. "Moments Musicals" in C sharp minor and "Wanderer [illegible]" op. 15, by the same composer. Handel some [illegible] in C, op. [illegible], No. 1. [illegible] [illegible] as well as [illegible] in C minor and [illegible], op. 31 Nos. 2, 3, 4. The [illegible] of following these pianoforte compositions with vocal pieces has been adhered to.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday Don Giovanni (in lieu of La Favorita—postponed in consequence of the indisposition of Mlle. Lucca).

On Monday, La Sonnambula.

On Tuesday, Le Nozze di Figaro—first time (Pauline Lucca, Bagagiolo, [illegible] of [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a performance never to be forgotten).

On Thursday, Don Giovanni.

On Friday (first night), the Prophète—Roi [illegible].

To-night, Don Pasquale.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.—On Saturday Lucia di Lammermoor—first time (Christine Nilsson).

On Tuesday, Don Giovanni.

On Thursday, Lucia (Christine Nilsson).

To-night, Cherubini's Medea (Medea, Mlle. Tietjens; Jason, Signor Mongini; Neris, Mlle. [illegible]; [illegible], Mlle. [illegible]; Creon, M. Santley) first time.—May 20.

BREMEN.—A second concert was given on Good Friday last in the Cathedral of Bremen, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of musicians. The following was the programme:—

Requiem in German; words selected from the Bible. Composed by Johannes Brahms, and conducted by the composer.

This was a success. Musicians from all parts of Germany flocked to hear this and it more than fully realized expectation.

Andante (J. S. Bach), Andante (Tartini), Abendlied (R. Schumann)—for violin, with organ accompaniment. Violin, Joachim; organ, Rheinthaler.

Joachim played magnificently, and was admirably accompanied on the splendid organ by Rheinthaler.

Aria for alto voice, with violin solo and orchestral accompaniment, from the Passion Music of J. S. Bach—sung by Frau Joachim; violin solo by Joseph Joachim.

Frau Joachim sang to perfection, and the effect of the violin and orchestral accompaniment was delightful.

Chorus, "Behold the Lamb of God," etc.; "I know that my Redeemer liveth," sung by Frau Joachim; chorus, "Hallelujah!" From Handel's Messiah.

This brought the concert to a close. The orchestra consisted of about seventy-five instrumentalists and the chorus of about two hundred voices. The Cathedral was crowded by an audience of upwards of three thousand. The success of the Requiem of Brahms was so marked that it was decided to repeat the programme at the next concert.

MUNICH.—Herr Richard Wagner's Lohengrin was performed one evening during the recent visit of the [illegible] to the [illegible] majesty.—During Passion Week the Royal chapel performed several sacred works [illegible] Agnus Dei [illegible] Palestrina, Allegri [illegible], Hasler, Hasse, Lachner and Witt.

SCHWERIN.—The Mecklenburg Musical Festival will take place on the 14th, 15th and 16th June under the direction of Herr Schmitt, Court Capellmeister. Among the soloists will be Herr and Madame Joachim, Herren Schild and Carl Hill.

WORMS.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul has been selected as the work to be performed at the grand national festival of inaugurating the Luther Monument, on the 26th of June.

AMSTERDAM.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul was performed at the last concert given by the Society for the Promotion of Music.

COPENHAGEN.—Concerts given by Herr Joachim. [illegible] Mendelssohn; Violin Concerto, [illegible] Mendelssohn; [illegible] Gade, etc.—Concert of the [illegible] Symphony in C [illegible] Haydn; [illegible] Chorus from Gluck; Weber; [illegible] Concerto, [illegible] and Chorus, from Die Ruinen von Athen, Beethoven, etc.—Concert given by the Musical Union under the direction of Herr Gade: Symphony in E flat major, Mozart; Concerto for [illegible] Instruments, Handel; fragments from St. Paul, Mendelssohn, etc.

LEIPSIC.—Having accepted the post of musical director of the new School of Music at Basle, Herr [illegible] retires from the directorship of the Leipzige Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung, and is succeeded by Herr Arrey von Dommer.

An amateur violinist recently gave a performance at Leipsic of an Andante by Spohr and a Lied ohne Worte by Mendelssohn. The performer was born without arms. He holds the bow with the toes of his left foot, and presses the strings with the toes of the right foot; the instrument being placed on a little bench before him. As a tour de force it is shocking, in the contemplation of such resources, to think of the waste of the power which goes on in the world. This man first appeared already in Berlin, and then in that in Paris.

MILAN.—The Società del Quartetto inaugurated, on the 12th of [illegible] the first grand symphony concerts. Two symphonies by Haydn and G. Verdi; a symphony by Beethoven and an overture by Ferrari were the first given. The orchestra was conducted by Cavallini.

PARIS.—Fragments of Gounod's "Mireille" and of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" (an opera full of beauty) were given at the concert of the Société des Concerts du Chant Classique. They are about to perform, at the Théâtre des Fantaisies Parisiennes, Paisiello's "Barber of Seville." Of this opera, during our stay [illegible] by Rossini's, [illegible] of the [illegible] that were the best-ventured upon [illegible] not a note beyond the finest melody.—Jennie Linder.—Athenæum.

The Triennial Festival.

(Concluded.—Omitted last time.)

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.—CONCERT.

The last two items of the programme—one of the two novelties—came first. Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony." And this was the first performance in this country of this most talked of of the posthumous works which Mendelssohn's English admirers, as well as the speculative instinct of publishers, have fondly hoped [illegible] generation from giving to the public against his own express desire. One does not like to judge from a single hearing; but we must own that, fine as it rendered as it was, it did not impress us as a work which its author would have been willing to have go forth with his other Symphonies. Yet they in imaginative invention are entirely free of doubleness, if it were not all equal to them,—still less to the Overtures which are still more original and individual. Its significance and its chief interest are found in its last movement, which is based on the Choral "Ein feste Burg." This takes on the type of Protestantism, is worked up with a wealth of counterpoint and a fertility of resources, thoughts by far more edifying than the fury of Nicolai with which the festival began. The first movement (Andante and Allegro con fuoco) strongly felt of rush and stir and brilliancy—a struggle of the old and new religions they call it—but not giving us a feeling as if a weight [illegible] within, nor did it, for one, and pages sound very much like Mendelssohn. The Scherzo is a charming bit of sunshine, healthy, bright and happy enough for Haydn; of thought in art and grace in the Trio with its answering trills; but what it may have to do with the Reformation is not so clear. The Andante, sweet and serious though it is only one of Mendelssohn's Lieder [illegible], we must fairly what it has to be taken as nowhere. The Symphony is interesting and proved its right to be heard at least until we fairly know it.

The other novelty, a Concerto in E flat by Liszt, served for a special display of Miss ALIDE TOPP's wonderfully brilliant, surprising playing; there were delightful touches, to be surmounted only by immense will and energy; and there were scattered flowers and graces and wild freaks of fancy—to the young composer's abundance of the right faculty for all. She played it with enthusiasm—worthy of better intent. In anything more wilful, whimsical, subtle and licensed than is a composition, in anything more eccentric, a capriccio utterly in the finer instincts, we have hardly known, under the name of music. In a large and a true sense there seemed nothing great at exception a quaint delightful playful episode in the trios, or, the end did it persuaded grace for the piano, showed flowers of delicate fancy scattered about among the fugue. Much tremendous massive of it was quite waste. The close, strong, coming along of the first part, recurring above as the orchestra, of [illegible] received in preference to all one's tenderness and Spring-tempered beauty, was it the Yes. It was so much! Not in detail in passages and figures, there was much to enjoy for one who marked the types of fingers on the travelling up terrace of the young player. We must speak in any such way for it will be bearing recalled, a key Liszt's Rhapsody [illegible], more poetic Nocturne of Chopin which she played—not better than we have heard before, but well.

Miss PHILLIPPS sang "Voi che sapete" charmingly. For Overtures by the great orchestra there were Spohr's to Jessonda and Rossini's Tell; the latter taken with as much fire and spirit.

What can we say of "THE CREATION" and "THE MESSIAH"—Oratorios that we have written of a hundred times—more than that the hall was crowded both on Saturday and Sunday evenings, and that the performances were of the very best in quality, as they were the grandest in extent, that we have ever heard. The soloists,—Mme. ROSA, Mr. JAMES WHITNEY (tenor), Mr. WINCH and Mr. M. W. WHITNEY (basso) in the Creation, and Miss HOUSTON, Miss PHILLIPPS, Mr. SIMPSON and Mr. WHITNEY in the Messiah were all we could expect of artists known and approved as they are. Many of the choruses, especially the "Wonderful" and "Hallelujah," we have not that we ever heard so grandly given, not forgetting Birmingham. We only regret the omission of one of the most beautiful and pathetic of all the choruses "And with His stripes," while we could the omission of "All we like sheep" leave a part of a wild Fury.

——Again we have no room for general reflections, nor for credits due so liberally to all concerned in the design and execution of this triumphant jubilee of noble music. But Boston's First Triennial Festival is not yet a cold story. It is the beginning of a Future, and we may take time to read its lessons.—Handel's Hime. Rosa and her husband go on their way to California for a season of opera and concerts, and CARL ZERRAHN is at [illegible] of the helm as he ruly and won universal praise, a new upon another kind of sea, a passenger by Wednesday's steamer, bearing the good wishes of hosts of friends upon his summer tour to Europe (where he will hear both the Crystal Palace Handel Festival) and much good music and whence he will come back newly furnished next November for new Symphony and Oratorio season. The President and Directors of the Handel and Haydn Society, and above all its indefatigable enthusiastic corresponding Secretary Mr. LORING B. BARNES, may well rejoice in their complete and signal reward of long continued faith and energy and skill. By the report in another column of the Annual Meeting of the Society it will be seen that that week's work has added largely to the nucleus of a permanent Festival Fund.

Concerts.

Although the musical season fairly ended with the Festival, the last two weeks have offered a variety of concerts of considerable interest. The prominent figures in the most of them has been the young pianist, Miss ALIDE TOPP,—a consequence (most likely of her brilliant debut at the Festival). The first was a Matinée at Chickering Hall May 31 privately arranged in compliment to her. We were not present, but the success, we learn, was all that her best friends could have wished,—hall crowded, and most appreciative and delighted, performance admirable. She was finally assisted by Miss PHILLIPPS, who sang an air from Gluck's Armida and "[illegible]" by [illegible] and by Mr. ERNEST PERABO in the accompaniment. Her own selections, all played from memory, covered the following wide range; classical in the first part, of the Liszt school in the second:

Fantasie, d minor	Gluck
[illegible]	Bach
[illegible]	Händel
[illegible]	Beethoven
[illegible]	Liszt
[illegible]	Raff
[illegible] Rhapsodie, No. 2	Liszt

I hear yet [illegible] of Miss Topp from taking part in the concert given at Farwell Hall that most sadly and disappointed [illegible]. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, which took place at the Music Hall June 8. But in spite of her disappointment, the concert did not lack its great attractions and the interest in the singer alone was enough to fill the hall. We were only sorry that her own share in the programme was so slight, her selections for the most part unimportant. With the exception of the simple, noble air from Handel, which she sings so often, "Lascia ch' io pianga," and to which her large rich tones and noble style told with more power than ever, so that the air had to be repeated, they consisted only of a couple of English songs (in America) to words by Miss Procter: "Echoes" and "Cradling Sentiment," composed by M. B. Dowse,—the first a rather pleasing strain, the second altogether commonplace and unworthy either of so rare [illegible] of such a concert and such a singer;—and of a bold and laughing Cuban Song, which she sang in Spanish, rather to suit and humor very early and heartily and show up her [illegible], as we all know. A small orchestra, conducted by Mr. B. J. Lang, opened and closed the concert with the Introduction and Finale of the genial Haydn Symphony (in C) which became so popular in the Harvard concerts, and the Egmont overture, and accompanied the Handel Aria, also the [illegible] "Serenata" song in a sweet tenor voice by Mr. MacDonald, and two Concertos. One of these was played by Mr. Petersilea, who kindly stood in the breach in the absence of Miss Topp. It was the E-minor Concerto of Chopin (that is, the middle and last movements) and was played with real studied, brilliant execution, though the deep-souled tone did not speak to us as it has done. Artistically the main feature of the evening was Camilla Urso's playing of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto [illegible]. For years there has been no violin playing in this country so pure and perfect, both in technique and expression, as Madame Urso's, and the Mendelssohn Concerto affords the finest and completest manifestation of her art. We would that her powers were exercised more frequently on music of so high an order! She was to have played the Beethoven Concerto in last winter's Symphony Concerts but disappointed us. This time we need not tell how beautiful her rendering was: we have heard it and admire, and to fall in nothing short of the impression was produced, except as the whole programme and surroundings[illegible] a purely private concert, no opportunity and chance to each good thing singly used as it comes here in a mere miscellaneous [illegible]. Miss Urso also played her "Dreams" as a violin solo for an encore.

The reception of Miss Phillipps was enthusiastic and the concert was a hearty Godspeed on her voyage to Europe, whither she [illegible] was to go in charge of a younger sister also gifted with musical voice and talent, for whom she goes to seek education in the best schools.

The next in order (June 6, at Chickering's) was a purely private concert, to which we were many [illegible] free to allude. It was arranged by friends to afford a last opportunity of hearing a young lady of remarkable voice and talent, who goes to Europe, for the culture there so fully warrant, with Miss Phillipps,—Miss M. A. Markham. Her singing—and as yet she has only hoped—has been for a few years the theme of [illegible] and delight in a [illegible] private circle here, including some of our foremost musical critics; but she has never sung in public except on a pleasant occasion in September last at Mr. [illegible], which we briefly chronicled, when we alluded to her as

A young lady from a suburb, who has been spending a year in Boston, whose voice and talent have seemed [illegible] to awaken [illegible] as they had yet sprung up around us. Sweet, rich, large, thoroughly musical and sympathetic, it is voice, in [illegible] of gentle [illegible] [illegible] to the whole scale, a [illegible] and is singularly mature. We had hoped soon to hear her in a more [illegible] Oratorio and [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] but she is soon to study and we have lost her.

Only for a time, we hope, and so all hope who heard this charming little concert. Miss M. was assisted by Mrs. Cary, who sang with exquisite [illegible] and gave the Song of the Page from the Huguenots, and a couple of Franz songs, especially that airy fairy witchery one to Goethe's "Liebhaber in allen." Also by a couple of amateur gentlemen, who joined ladies in the Quartet from Fidelio (which had to be sung twice) and who sang with Miss M. the Trio from Don Giovanni (Elvira at the window). These were nicely sung, with the accompaniment for two pianos by Mr. Hobson and Mr. Leonhard, who also contributed a couple of movements from a very quaint and enjoyable four-hand Sonata by Moscheles. Miss Markham, for solos, sang: "Ecco ridente" by Mozart; the song of Adina, "Vanne, vanne," from the Huguenots; the Scena from Der Freischütz, where she pronounced [illegible]. Many of her high notes had glorious tone in the [illegible], and a couple of Spanish songs, in which she proved in her native [illegible], so quaint and [illegible] the accents and the shading of the tone. It all confirmed the impression and the hopes her friends had had of her rare powers.

Last Tuesday evening the postponed concert of Miss Topp at Brookline took place in the Town Hall, which was crowded with appreciative listeners, [illegible] the work of musings of the fine June evening to go out from Boston. It was truly a charming, thorough artistic concert. Mr. [illegible] opened [illegible] of [illegible], much to the [illegible] of good man [illegible] garden [illegible] song, as he only can: the [illegible] of Schubert, the "Frühlings Nacht" of Schumann and three songs of Franz, with exquisite accompaniment by Mr. Leonhard. Miss Topp's selections were the same as in her Boston concerts already announced. The Original Ballade of Chopin, a composition of great power and breadth and depth of feeling, taxing the strength and versatility of a player to the utmost, full of imagination and all [illegible] was wonderfully well brought out and sustained; it seemed hardly possible that one so delicately framed, so young, to feel it, [illegible] make so much of it. The [illegible] Mendel[ssohn] pieces were [illegible] [illegible]. The Beethoven Variations in [illegible] a [illegible] set of stately themes (Allegro vivace [illegible]) we have not been heard in [illegible], full of interest. No two of them are the same in form. One is a smoothly flowing [illegible] piece in [illegible] another takes a [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] accent, in [illegible] another is a quaint [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] Bach style [illegible] and in [illegible] and the main features of the one theme hold boldly out through all the [illegible], and [illegible] a whole [illegible] beauty and variety and power. Show [illegible] to thinking and you will know how good [illegible]. Well, here was enough to show that she is not small of sight to the Liszt's school.

In the second part she played one of the most expressive and Liszt-like pieces, the [illegible] by Liszt, called Consolation (Pensees of [illegible]). This is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so much as Mendelssohn's is [illegible] and the very grace and delicacy, the [illegible] on [illegible] which her fingers [illegible] through [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and smile as in a dream. The Valse Caprice by Raff [illegible] as to the waltz as [illegible] so many other waltzes, but as [illegible] with a more dashing energy, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] she was a [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible]. The Hungarian Rhapsody, [illegible] a deep and solemn march like Chopin's, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Hungarian [illegible] [illegible] the whole [illegible] fiction.

Two more concerts, the next one at Chickering Hall, in which Miss Topp was the central attraction, though [illegible] in the [illegible] of Miss Houston [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. There [illegible] been interesting Chamber Concerts of the N. E. Conservatory of Music.

American Musical Fund Society.—At the Annual Meeting held in New York, May 19th, 1868, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, D. L. Downing; 1st Vice President, J. Ernst; 2nd Vice President, S. Lasar; Treasurer, J. N. Pattison; [illegible] W. Wenzel; [illegible] Wiesbaden; Board of Trustees: H. Peace, J. Stockbridge, M. A. Lawrence, J. T. Waring, F. [illegible], H. Hoffmann, C. Müller, Trust[illegible], H. [illegible], Y. Ancona; Librarian, Thos. Goodwin; Honorary Physicians, Drs. Anthony, Goodwin and Chas. Rease, of New York; Dr. C. N. Miller, of Philadelphia; Honorary Counsellor, Jas. L. Herron; Secretary, D. Schaad.

Total amount of receipts since last report, $8,743.27.

Paid for Sick,		$1,[illegible]
"	Funerals,	990.00
"	Pensions,	2,193.50
"	Widows and Orphans,	2,237.00

Total amount of Permanent Fund duly invested, $60,872.00

This looks like mutual benefit indeed, like true "protection." If our Boston musicians, instead of banding together in "Protective Unions," for the purpose of dictating the price at which each may engage his services, interfering with his freedom to play with whom he [illegible] and for what he chooses, and so virtually compelling them to measure to the same level and [illegible], would take a step a base the above and simply combine their efforts to raise a fund for accumulation and benefit, they would [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible] of the whole musical public and rate the whole level of music to a truly and effective aspect.

Handel and Haydn Society.—An adjourned meeting of this Society was held at Bumstead Hall last evening (June 1), the President, J. Baxter Upham, in the chair. The report of the Treasurer, Geo. W. Palmer, showed the receipts, including cash on hand, to have been $27,[illegible], expenditures [illegible]. Balance on hand [illegible]. It was stated that the receipts at the recent musical festival were $[illegible], expenses, $29,[illegible] net proceeds, $9,[illegible] which, added to the permanent fund makes the total amount of the fund $[illegible].

The report of the Librarian, Geo. H. Chickering, was read, giving the experience of having a uniform edit on of all the [illegible] oratorios which are performed by the Society. Also the copies were in a deplorable way [illegible] have been well [illegible] improved all these. The [illegible] [illegible] the organ and make a noble musical library to the Society, [illegible] many additions having been made for the purposes of the recent festival, and which were to a considerable extent imported.

The President then submitted his report. He paid a special compliment to Mr. and Mrs. Parepa Rosa. Never since the formation of the Society had there been a greater interest and equal degree of attention and discipline among members as during the past year. The recent festival was alluded to as an achievement worthy of pride and congratulation.

The decease, during the past year, of Mr. Stephen Stone, a member of the Board of Trustees, was alluded to [illegible] to the attention of the Society as a few words of appropriate eulogy by the President. Officers for the ensuing year were then elected as follows:

President—J. Baxter Upham; Vice President—J. P. Frost; Secretary—L. B. Barnes; Treasurer—George W. Palmer; Librarian—George H. Chickering; Directors—Theodore Stone, D. L. Laws, E. C. Daniels, R. M. Lowell, O. H. Lothrop, George Fuller, Samuel Jennison, Reed B. Jotham.

Votes of thanks to Chickering & Sons, to J. B. Thay & Sons, Carl Zerrahn and others were adopted.

Boston Music Hall Association.—The annual meeting was held in the Music Hall this forenoon (June 20). Mr. Eben Dale in the chair, in the absence of the President. The proceedings of the meeting of 1867 were read by [illegible] Stackpole, Jr., the Secretary. The report of the Treasurer Henry P. Waters, showed that the receipts during the past year were $30,346 88, and the expenditures $22,[illegible], leaving a surplus of $7,[illegible] 65. The only incumbrance was a mortgage of $50,000 held by the Suffolk Institution for Savings, and a floating debt of $1,[illegible].

The report of Dr. Upham, the President, was read. He congratulated the Association on the promising results of the year which, during so many years was of [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] increase in the use and means of accommodation. The improvements comprise a [illegible] gallery and work room in the lower hall, the construction of a level floor therefor, more chandeliers for the platform and increased engine and motive power for the organ, which is represented as in excellent working order. The New England Conservatory rooms have been completed since the last report, and give good satisfaction to teachers and pupils. Miss Cushman's gift was alluded to in connection with the fund that has been started to pay for figures and marble. The importance of improvements in the Tremont street passage way, the roof of a new [illegible] [illegible] the Winter street approach, and other matters of repair, were dwelt upon.

[illegible] W. Williams, George Linder, and T. [illegible] Morris were appointed an auditing committee on the Treasurer's accounts, and the following named gentlemen were chosen Directors: J. Baxter Upham, Ellen Hale, John P. Putnam, S. T. Osborn, H. W. Pickering, H. H. Appleton, and S. L. Thorndike. At a subsequent meeting of the Directors, J. Baxter Upham was re-elected President, Samuel Batchelder, Jr., Clerk, and Henry P. Warren, Treasurer.

[illegible] —Flotow's Opera "Martha" was performed here on Friday, the [illegible], at the theatre, before a crowded house, exclusively by amateurs. The [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] that the [illegible] City possesses no small amount of musical talent. The [illegible] Mme. [illegible] Porta, who occupies the position of Organist and Director of Music in Christ Church, was the main [illegible] in producing the opera. Lady Harriet was [illegible] by an accomplished and talented lady who is blessed with a most wonderful compass of voice, extending from the lower G to the upper E flat. The quality of her voice is sweet, flexible and pathetic. The [illegible] young damsel who so admirably [illegible] and the character of Nancy seemed to have a more perfect conception of her part. Her very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and singing were almost faultless. Mr. [illegible] [illegible] of a Lionel, Messrs. [illegible] and [illegible] as Plumkett and Tristan. The whole affair was a triumph for amateurs in the lyric art, and will long be remembered here. [illegible]

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., MAY [illegible].—Scarcely had the last sounds of your great festival died away before the [illegible] was taken up on the banks of the Hudson. On Monday, the 10th the Messiah was given for the second time this season. The choruses were sustained by a [illegible] [illegible] society under the direction of [illegible] [illegible], once a pupil of your much esteemed [illegible] [illegible], for the past six years a resident of Poughkeepsie. His chorus, the best since [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] greater proportions might not be attained. The accompaniments were played upon a grand piano and one of Mason & Hamlin's Cabinet organs (producing a pleasant combination) by the Brothers Van Vliet and Mr. Martin. They were so fortunate as to secure the services on both occasions of Miss Maria Brainerd, who sang all the soprano solos and, in the absence of a sufficiently accomplished tenor, the Recit. and Aria "Comfort ye," and "Every valley." It is needless to say that we were charmed with her admirable singing, especially in the Air "Come unto Him," which was given with an incredible tenderness, and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in which the sublime truth of the words was expressed with a depth and fervor which we have never heard excelled. The contralto part was sustained by Miss Virginia Tucker of New York, who, although a novice in public Oratorio singing, made a very favorable impression, being most successful in the Air "He was despised." I must not omit to mention the very excellent singing of the choruses, which reflects great credit upon the skill of Prof. Martin as a conductor. A better trained chorus I rarely heard, both as to precision in time and correct intonation. The numbers "For unto us," "All we like sheep," "And He shall purify," and others [illegible] in the character of the [illegible] [illegible], were executed with a [illegible] which was really surprising. Next season it is the purpose of this enterprising society to take up the "Creation." [illegible]

CHICAGO SÄNGERFEST.—The reception of the various delegations will occur at Crosby's Opera House on Wednesday June 17th. An address of welcome will be delivered by the Mayor of the city—to be followed by a chorus of greeting, "The Singer's Welcome," by Otto, which will be sung by the Chicago societies. On Thursday, the 18th, the first grand concert will take place. Following the overture of Genoveva the concert will be preceded by a cantata, which Reinhardt, the eminent German composer, has composed and sent in honor of the Fest, called "The Singer's Greeting," with the audience joining in singing it. The concert proper will then proceed, with Wagner's Sieve Overture, "On the Open Sea," with orchestral accompaniment by Meinberg, the Liederkranz from New York singing the solo quartet; and all the societies uniting in the full chorus; Andante, from Ulrich's Triumphal Symphony, for orchestra; "German Nation's Prayer," by Abt, full chorus, and solo quartet by the Arion from St. Louis; "Hymn to Music," by Lachner, full chorus and solo quartet by the Arion of New York; "Linden Tree," by Schubert, full chorus; Grand March from Rienzi, with recitative and "Battle Hymn," by Wagner, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible].

At the second concert on Friday the 19th, there will be given Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; "Who is the German's Fatherland?" by Reichardt, full chorus and solos by the [illegible]; [illegible] [illegible] Overture by [illegible], orchestra; [illegible] solo by [illegible], [illegible] of New York; "Turkish March" from "Ruins of Athens" by Beethoven; and three choruses by the leading societies of the country, the Arion of St. Louis and the Liederkranz of New York. Interspersed in these programmes will be vocal solos by artists whose names are not yet announced, and also a [illegible] [illegible] by a [illegible] of [illegible].

On Saturday the 20th there will be a business meeting, and in the evening a grand ball at the Turner Hall. On Sunday there will be a picnic in a grove near the city. The orchestra that takes part in the Fest will consist of 100 musicians selected from players in Chicago, Milwaukee and Cincinnati. Rehearsals of the instrumental music have already been held by Mr. Balatka, who proposes to make this a marked feature of the concerts. Fifty-six societies have already signified their intention to be present.

CINCINNATI.—The Orpheus Society performed the charming opera of "Zampa" at the Mozart Hall on the 20th and 21st, and will produce Lortzing's comic opera "Der Wildschütz" on the 22nd, 23d and [illegible], for the benefit of the German Orphan Asylum of Cincinnati.

ST. LOUIS.—A young Chilian girl bearing the euphonious name of "Teresa Carreño" has been surprising and delighting our musical world for the past week by her marvellous playing on the piano and violin. She is but fifteen years of age, but a ready and [illegible] power of execution and of expression [illegible] well with [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of these instruments. She is not confined to any one style of composition, but renders the grand [illegible] of the old [illegible] composers and the [illegible] [illegible] with which the [illegible] [illegible] of the present day. Musical [illegible], who have listened to all the great performers of the present generation here and abroad, [illegible] that this little South American [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] all whom time [illegible] [illegible] upon her wonderful powers. On the piano she plays readily in any key, no matter where her strength [illegible] [illegible], but her [illegible], though marvellous, does not equal her [illegible] of [illegible]—[illegible] [illegible] expression through [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] becomes enchanted and gives out such [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].—New Boston Advertiser.

MRS. SARTORIS, better known as Adelaide Kemble, a sister of Fanny and equally gifted, though in a different way, says that, though music is widely cultivated, it is neither properly appreciated nor well clearly understood in England [illegible] much less in the United States as well; and adds, that, as early as it should be so, no early apprenticeship to the higher class of music is absolutely necessary. She would have all the members of a family learn music. All, most all children, she says, have naturally good ears and can catch tunes easily, and they are able to master the mysteries of time much better at an early age than they do later. Both boys and girls should be taught the piano, and at a more advanced age they would have time to learn the grammar of music, thorough-bass and harmony. The steady reading of classic [illegible] of all music every day would very soon become to any one who chose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. When musical education [illegible], the music, is conducted on these principles we shall no longer have music for only for the show, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] drawing room and not [illegible] drawing-room music exiled to places for which it is entirely unsuited."

Beethoven's Letters according to Nohl.

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Grenzboten XXI. No. 10 March, 1868.)

Beethoven's Briefe. Herausgegeben von Dr. Ludwig Nohl. Stuttgart: Cotta, 1865. [Beethoven's Letters, edited by Dr. Ludwig Nohl.]

The sneers but well deserved reproofs which Dr. Ludwig Nohl has been obliged to accept from various quarters, on account of his earlier literary efforts,—in particular the first volume of his biography of Beethoven (See Allg. Musik. Zeitung, 1864, No. 41 et seq.)—might, one would suppose, have induced him, before entering upon the execution of new projects, to have acquired, by means of conscientious study, that knowledge, that extended scope of judgment and that scholarly caution of whose want he had given such striking proofs. Not so however; for, therefore did we learn that very soon after that luckless biographical attempt two new works (if they can be so termed) appeared,—upon the letters of Mozart published in 1864, "Letters of Beethoven" have quickly followed.

Though for reasons adduced above, it may readily be supposed that we take this last book in hand with a strong prejudice against it, still the interest of the subject, perhaps also the hope of being able to discover some improvement in Herr Nohl's method, may justify a renewed careful examination. We must, through the book it seems only—but only so that to be so much the more disappointed. We utter our opinion—that based upon a very thorough study of the volume,—all the more freely now because other notices and articles upon it which have met our eye, have not given any judgment of the real value of the collection founded upon actual knowledge of the subject. We wish one merely to be understood, to differ from them in this respect: viz. that we do not discuss the question, whether the collection offers interesting matter for perusal or not; but inquire as how far it is to be considered a scholarly production,—as a valuable addition to the materials for a knowledge of Beethoven's life.

As it is the first collection of letters by Beethoven which has appeared as an independent work (it is well known that shorter series long since appeared in the volumes of Wegeler, Seyfried Schindler), it is first to be inquired in how far such a collection is justifiable.

Now we believe there is no danger of stumbling against any well founded opposition, if we demand for an independent collection of letters the twofold object, first, of giving us a valuable memorial of a distinguished personage and additions to our knowledge of his life and character; and, secondly, of affording us matter for perusal which is itself interesting because characteristic of the writer and complete in itself. Even when the latter demand is not met, it is still possible—as in cases of great literary authors—to proceed upon the principle of not allowing anything produced by their minds to be lost; but can it be in these cases it is exceedingly easy to pass these bounds, beyond which it is culpable to lay before the world such characteristic productions of his intellect which the writer never intended for the public eye.

For those distinguished in other spheres, as in science and art, the same holds good; and the effort to save every one of his words seldom or never results in adding anything to the fame of a great painter or musician. His written words offer an important material for the knowledge of his life and character, but do not give the right of separate publication, until they are found to possess within themselves independent and particular value, and this, especially as regards to private letters, cannot be unless the writer—not to speak of the contents of his letters show—urge decided intellectual and individual type—be a careful and regular correspondent and not an occasional and unwilling one.

In Mendelssohn's case both these demands are met, and for this reason the appearance of his letters excited such great and deserved favorable attention. They give us not only a wide knowledge of the rich life of that artist, but they are the productions of an active mind of manifold culture, to which every talent and consistent pen, [illegible] had made the power of expression in words, almost as easy as in musical tones, and which knew how to write [illegible], both as to external experiences and upon questions of his art, in the most elegant and attractive manner. Now with Beethoven the case was totally different. First, he was to be himself says, not an industrious letter writer. True, Herr Nohl calls him "the much-writing master" (schreibseligen Meister); but his own table of contents should lead him to see how undeserved such an appellation. His collection contains, including the Appendix, 411 numbers. 20 of these numbers—as he himself hereafter—must be deducted, because they are not letters: there remain then 391—and these are spread over a space of about 32 years (1 [illegible] 1826) so that there is an average of about 12 per annum. If we add to these the 83 addressed to Archduke Rudolph, and remaining published by Köchel and some 200 existing in the [illegible] of other admirers of Beethoven, of which Herr Nohl knows nothing, still we at the most obtain 20 in over a year, i. e. less than two a month. Of the whole number an enormous proportion are notes, but short occasional notes which Beethoven wrote to his friends in Vienna; compared with which, the longer letters addressed to distant correspondents form an extremely small number. It is clear how much more correctly Beethoven judged himself than Herr Nohl has done; and upon the value of an independent collection of Beethoven's letters this circumstance alone sheds a suspicious light.

Now take the contents of the letters into account. The greatest reverence for Beethoven the musician, need not make us hesitate to acknowledge that the larger part of them are sufficient outside for their contents nor characteristic of Beethoven in their extent. With the exception of the few addressed to friends, objects of his affection and near to his heart (Wegeler, Ries, Amenda, Archduke Rudolph, &c.), one sees in them at first they were the hasty productions of the occasion, that the object and affairs of the moment often determined the style and contents. Hence they are written in a certain careless and unrestrained tone, which naturally interests us in a high degree, unquestionably and teaches us to know the man better, but which no[t] give them an independent value; and one sees very soon that Beethoven, upon questions of art,—generally those which were dearest to and discussed by him—expressed himself only unwillingly and with the greatest brevity.

When one sees, how he intercourse with his familiar friends—Baron, a Zmeskall for instance —he gives full play to his whimsical, often rude, by no means always pleasant, fancies,—how he writes to Madame Streicher upon trivial domestic matters,—how in business letters to distant publishers and other persons, such as those in the appendix to the advocate Kanka he indulges [illegible] a manner careless and ever eccentric [illegible] all this is important to the student of his history, and to [illegible] understanding of his nature and of his relations to the persons in question; but, however, who displays these momentary feelings before all [illegible] eccentric utterances of his genius, and, so to speak, cries aloud to the reader: "Come and learn also here to understand and appreciate this great man!"—such a one in our opinion has not comprehended that genius's true greatness, and sins against his memory.*

Accordant with these views is our conviction that the preparation of an independent collection of Beethoven's letters is a mistaken undertaking in itself. We see in them an indispensable and interesting biographical material, and those from which one can learn to know him, combine a strong regard for him as a man of noble nature and an unrivalled artist.

The publication of all Beethoven's letters, however, is, in our opinion not timely, and all the less called for at the present time because thus far we possess no complete and satisfactory biography of him. But since the result of an undertaking to bring out a complete collection actually lies before us, it remains to inquire as to the extent to which our knowledge is enriched by it, and in what manner, also how, Herr Nohl has executed his task.

He begins with a preface studded with the turgid, bombastic obscure phrases, which have offended most greatly in his former publications; but at the same time marching on with a self-sufficiency which is only surpassed by his superficiality. There is not a word of explanation to the reader, why he is the person who laid aside his Biography and sent out instead a volume of letters. He tells us of his trace for investigation: how far these must have extended, we shall soon see. With hardly condescension he admits the value of Thayer's "Chronological Catalogue of Beethoven's Works," which, however, affords him few new data;—naturally, as he had hardly glanced through it, and, for instance, had discovered nothing of the correspondence with Thomson quoted in it. But when he is immediately obliged* to correct one of his own errors by Thayer's book (p. 112), he appears all the more naive in expressing the opinion that Thayer will be able to obtain corrections and additions from him. After the far reaching and comprehensive researches of which Thayer's book gives proof, we scarcely believe that he can be added to or corrected in any single instance from Nohl.

That his collection is not complete, Nohl is conscious; but in light of [illegible], but what he has collected of unprinted, when added to already printed matter, is sufficient to form the weightiest such a compilation. Among his contributions, the papers left by Schindler occupy an important the most important place; but these were well known to former collectors, and one is astonished at the paucity of really interesting new matter now added to what Schindler himself has already made public. Moreover, one readily sees that Nohl's researches are confined to the [illegible] the Imperial Royal Library in Vienna, to the Archives of the Society of Music Friends in the same city, and to that which a happy chance has thrown into his hands through private channels; and no doubt he found a few new letters at Zurich on the journey thither of which he speaks in his preface. On the other hand he has made no "tours of investigation" to Berlin, Prague, Leipzig for instance, where [illegible] all the original letters are to be found, and [illegible] those which he [illegible] only after manifold repeated copies.

In fact, one remarks at once, that Nohl has seen the originals of but very few letters, even when he knew where they were still preserved; and that in the cases where printed authorities lay before him—as for instance the letters to Mme. Hofmeister, Gleichenstein, [illegible] and others—he, for the most part, as it seems, has not troubled himself about them. And when he proceeds in his preface to enlarge upon the difficulties attending such researches, and the concealment of many papers, as in "English Collections of Curiosities"—these lamenta[tions] sound at least very peculiar in the mouth of a man to whom, as we shall see, not even all the letters in print are known.

He further tells, in his preface, of his method of editing, that he has corrected orthographical errors, but has left untouched Beethoven's peculiar style in respect to grammar or rather syntax. But it is very perceptible how reluctant he is, where the line between orthographical errors and the grammatical peculiarities of the time and how arbitrarily he undertakes to correct Beethoven's punctuation and the like, even in letters expressly printed by others. Before adopting such a course of correction, he should have been more scrupulously aware himself and not have written, for instance on p. 11: "Beethoven treated the [illegible] very defectively."

What [illegible] his usual exaggerated bombastic phrases—and that not clearly marks the influence of Richard Wagner*—he proceeds to say of the character both of the letters and of Beethoven himself we must pass by. The only point of interest in it is the manner by which he relieves himself from the task of preparing an explanatory biographical text to accompany the letters, the want of which is felt far more here than in the letters of Mozart, but which here also was a matter of much greater difficulty. An electric current, says he, binds these letters together: I (Nohl) felt it to a surprising degree, and convinced myself that a biographical commentary would only break it.

* "To the Master Richard Wagner" the volume is dedicated.

We leave behind the high sounding phrases in which, among other things, the parallel between Beethoven and Napoleon again pops up already known to us in the Biography, and advance to the items themselves to see what of new matter has in fact offered us in so pompous a style.

And to begin with, we must deduct a series of numbers, which in our opinion, have no proper place in a collection of letters. As in the dedication of the first Sonatas (No. 1), and the original draft of a declaration (49). Nohl himself thinks that Beethoven was not their author; but nevertheless they would aid in swelling the total of his numbers. Several other official documents and documents, though in their way characteristic enough of Beethoven, have no place in such a collection (Nos 3, 16, 111, 201, 187, 278), and still less written communications to the publishers relating to compositions (Nos. 61, 30, 102, 118, 124).* Are indeed the dedication of the Trio op. 38 (No. 83), the new title of the Quintet arranged from the C-minor Trio (198), and other minor dedications (71, 225, 361).

The testament addressed to his brothers is certainly one of the finest proofs of the master's noble nobleness of character, and was already long [illegible]; but on the principle which determined his purpose to a place among letters, the demand may be made for the same favor toward the interesting mentions and good in himself which are scattered in his memorandum books. But least of all had contributions to albums, occasional canons and the like, which make up 8 numbers (8, 90, 113, 247, 273, 318) any right to place here; thus we find 26 numbers which are improperly included in the list, and of these, more than half were already in print.

Of the remaining 385 actual letters, which the collection embraces, about half (189, if we have rightly counted) have been published before. One point we must lay stress upon, because Nohl has not deigned to note the fact in many cases, while in some he did not know it. And among those previously in print, the longest and those which are really characteristic of Beethoven are for the most part to be found; such as those addressed to Wegeler (7 in number), to the members of the Brentano family (8), to Ries (11 of which are No. 272, in one), to Giannatasio del Rio (21 copied from the Grenzboten), to Amenda (3 from the Signale), to Jahn (corrected) (7), to Bettina (3), to Hollmann and Peters, Leipzig publishers (over 12, most of them from the Neue Zeitschrift), to Varena (7), Steiner & Haslinger (mostly from Seyfried); Birchall (from Cleyssen(?)); Schott (1, from the Caecilia); Mosel, etc. (4 from Schindler), and many single ones besides. Among these not hitherto published the most by far in number is that to Zmeskall (about 50, most of which are from the Imperial Royal Library at Vienna); next come those to Schindler (16, known in part from Schindler's book); and then, the letters to his Nephew (31, of which 12 were already made known by Schindler); then, of the more important ones, 7 to Archduke Rudolph (from the archives of the Society of Music-friends); 13 to Mad. Streicher (given-most, after copies); 3 to Pasqualati (from the I. R. Library); 13 to Advocate Kanka (after copies); 4 to Holz; and many other single ones, in part to persons now [illegible] extremely few of importance or of much length.

* [illegible] would it not [illegible] in this direction he must include the declaration signed by the Composer [illegible] upon the Overture to C, and the Concert bill of Feb. 27, 1814, all of which he could find in Thayer.

It is clear then when his collection already is so astonishingly meagre gain of new and interesting matter Herr Nohl could not have been deceived as to its incompleteness, and he is therefore as much the less excusable for its publication as he neglected in this research. One misses letters to known intimate friends of Beethoven the existence of which should have been known or at least suspected; instances, those to Brunswick and the Countess Erdödy. Instead of the few billets to Treitschke, one would expect to have the interesting correspondence with him relating to the projected opera "Romulus," which is found in other collections,—collections in which, as we happen to know, the series to Pasqualati, to Steiner & Haslinger, to Fries, St. [illegible] and even to Zmeskall, are far more numerous and complete than as given by Nohl. Of those to Giannatasio the one not given in the Grenzboten is also wanting in Nohl; while, as to the Rudolph series, it is well known that soon after the appearance of his book he received a very unpleasant proof of its imperfection through Herr von Köchel.* But why should we dwell on this point, since there is a still more mortifying reason for the incompleteness of his collection,—the overlooking of letters already published. In the Grenzboten 1859, 2d quarter, p. 236, communicated by Otto Jahn, are six letters to Brunswick and seven to Fräulein Amalie Sebald, with whom Beethoven had become acquainted in Teplitz, all from the year 1812. They are of special interest for the study of his character and would have been an ornament to the collection.† Herr Nohl, who has printed the letters to Giannatasio from the Grenzboten, must with anything like careful research have come upon these; but this not being the case, he gives in their stead a short contribution to the album of "the singer Auguste Sebald" (97), to which, however, he adds no critical note!

In Thayer's Chronol. Catalogue (p. 109 et seq.) are excerpts from 10 letters to G. Thomson of Edinburgh. Herr Nohl, into whose hands that work came before he had finished his book, does not notice them with a word; but he states that he has found hardly anything new in Thayer.

A short letter to Pasqualati, which Nohl does not give, may be found in the Neue Zeitschrift, vol. 3, p. 164. A letter to Schindler from Heiligenstadt, printed by Nohl in part, is given in full in a fac-simile in Breidenstein's "Festgabe" to the Inauguration of Beethoven's Monument, Bonn, 1845. One of Nohl's errors is this, in "July" instead of June, 1823. Of a billet to Editor Bernard which Schindler mentions, II. 73, Nohl knows nothing.

* Who published [illegible] letters to R. to Rudolph, [illegible] of which were [illegible] unknown to Nohl.

† The tenderness of B. to women and his dearth of feeling in [illegible] let all involved [illegible] letters, so clearly and [illegible] that the [illegible] may be looked upon as an especially attractive addition to documents for judging his character. [illegible]

[illegible] Google

A like superficiality exhibits itself throughout, both in what he imparts and in the manner of imparting it. As a compilation effort, it was a first duty never to fail in giving his authorities exactly, and in particular to carefully distinguish that which is now published for the first time, from that which had already been given to the press. Instead of this, he often leaves us completely in the dark, both on this point and whether he has ever seen the original. To those who have an intimate knowledge of the subject, he therefore appears in a false light—not, as such an editor for his own credit should by all means do. He omits to state of many of the notes to Schindler that they had been printed before; also the letter to Moscheles (145) and to Baroness Ertmann (134), the three to Moscheles (387, 391, 399). Of several addressed to Haslinger he was in duty bound to state their previous publication by Seyfried; and the letter to Matthisson (11), he does not know, or if he knows, suppresses the fact, that it may be seen in the Wiener Zeitschrift (Vol. VII. 34). Other instances are very much the same.

Some of his doubtful show how useful to Herr Nohl it would have been had he obtained sight of the originals of Beethoven's letters; they will also place clearly before our eyes his hobbies. Take the letter to the Schotts of Augsburg (1). Herr Nohl gives it in his Biography, after misunderstanding it first German, as a discovery made by him in the Revue Britannique and had, at the time, to digest the information (Allg. Mus. Zeitung 1856, No. 42) that the French translation had been made after an English article, by Thayer and, moreover, that he might have found the letter in its original tongue in the Vienna Zeitung of 1845. Now he reprints the letter in its proper form, but without once saying his duty in describing the error in the Biography, and merely states that the letter had appeared both in the Vienna Zeitung and in the Berliner Musik Zeitung of 1845 [a much-neglected fact communicated to him by Thayer himself, from whose own copy of the Vienna Zeitung Nohl took the letter in its present form]. The original still remains unknown to him,—after all great search? We will not [illegible] that point; but, simply in case good luck should hereafter play it into his hands, we [illegible] some of the variations as a foretaste of the pleasure it will afford him. First the address is to Schaden, not to Schade; Beethoven, apparently addresses the original "A Monsieur de Schaden, conseiller d'Augsbourg, à Augsbourg." Line 13, original has "ich will." Nohl "will ich" [illegible] "schreibt," Nohl "schreibt" [illegible] "war." Nohl "wäre." (Such peculiarities should be preserved just as the "Täge," in many letters, which Nohl finds himself bound to make "Tage") [illegible] original "einige Nachricht." Nohl "einige [illegible] Nachricht," [illegible] Nohl "da ich," and besides all this, many changes in the punctuation and the use of capitals, which we pass over.

Berlin, Nov. 25, 1835.

Dear Baermann,

I received your letter yesterday here, where I have been summoned by the most grievous misfortune that can befall any man. I have lost my father; he has been taken from us without any previous illness, quite calm and free from pain, just as he had always wished. My mother and my brother and sisters are well in health, but none of us can yet realize this blow, for less think of the future, or recover composure. On the evening of the 18th, my father was still with them all, cheerful and happy, and on the 19th, at half-past ten o'clock, his life was at an end. I must try to strive to fulfil his wishes while he was still among us and occupy myself and do my duty, [illegible] without I may find any other thought, but this is the only way, so far as I can see, to live in conformity with his will, and therefore I shall attempt to do so.

I enclose you a letter for the music director in Düsseldorf which will give you the best information and assistance about a concert. I doubt, however, whether, [illegible] any there would secure you, for almost all these concerts bring only very moderate receipts. When I was in Cologne I spoke to Prof. [illegible] about you, but he dissuaded you from giving one of your own and thought your best plan would be to play once or twice at the winter concerts there, where indeed they only give a small fee, but you would at least be rid of all trouble. Liebl is a person of scarcely a year of name, so he will at once do all he can for you. If you choose to write to Verkenius (remembering me as my former correspondent as [illegible]) I feel sure he will arrange so that you need [illegible] go there to play the next day you arrive, without prolonging your stay.

The subscription concerts in Leipzig go on till Easter. Whether I shall remain there after that period, I cannot say. Concertmeister Matthäi is dead, and his place means to be filled [illegible]. I regret not seeing you there at present, but in these dark days of sorrow, I could not bear think of music nor [illegible] of [illegible]. Herr Schindler, formerly an acquaintance of Beethoven, is music director in Aix-la-Chapelle, but I have not seen him, and I doubt whether it would be worth the trouble. Certainly not in Elberfeld. I wish to answer every point in your letter but I can write no more today. Farewell! May all good fortune attend your journey.

Yours,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY

Leipzig, March 29, 1836.

My dear Friend,

I do not feel quite sure whether you know or care to know anything of me, but I am about to ask you a favor the fulfilment of which will very essentially oblige me, and therefore I hope you will grant it. The son of Heinze, our best clarionet player, who has for two years held the situation of second clarionet in the orchestra, and evidently shows such talent for that instrument, is to be sent by his father's wish for half a year, or three quarters, to some first-rate master to acquire the necessary finish, in which he is as yet deficient in spite of his facility of execution and musical steadiness. The father not grudging the greatest sacrifices to cultivate properly the full extent of talent, proposes sending him to Munich, and I have undertaken to apply to you to ascertain who has one of the distinguished instrument players there would be able to devote an hour to him for a fair remuneration, and receive him as a musical apprentice. Who the person is that we should prefer you well know, but my fear is that terms you would give him lessons, or only for a sum higher than the father could afford. If, there are no engagement or will not do this, say whether you would recommend Faubel, or some other in Munich, and let me know the terms on a [illegible] of lessons. You may imagine that the affair is of the utmost importance to both young and the father in a most upright, pure and sensible man. I venture to hope that you will oblige me by giving him the best advice in your power; of course, if you could yourself superintend his studies it would make me feel most grateful; but at all events, let me hear your candid opinion on the subject that the young man may act accordingly. He could set out in the course of three or four weeks, so I beg you will answer me by return of post and by so doing you will exceedingly oblige me as I have already said.

I had many and various things to write to you about, but I scarcely know whether I ought to do so, or whether you would care to hear about them. Let me know how this is in your answer, when I will forthwith write you a circumstantial letter about my wife and my little boy, about my life and my music, and then you must write to me in your turn about yourself, and all your belongings around you. I hope that Heinze will find you as [illegible], and with kind regards to your amiable wife and your two sons, and hoping soon to hear from you,

I am ever your old friend,

Leipzig, September 14, 1839.

My dear Baermann,

I heartily rejoiced, after so long space of time once more to receive some lines from your hand and to find from them that you are, as ever, my dear unchanged kind friend. I only received your letter on my return from a journey to Hamburg, or I would not have so long delayed my answer. Give Lachner* my best thanks for his friendly invitation. I would accept it with great pleasure if I had a little more time for my expedition, but as I cannot leave till four weeks after the beginning of our concerts, any prolongation of my absence would be very difficult. Besides, my journey to Vienna is by no means settled, and it is uncertain, all the time I could contrive to spare for a visit to Munich would be a few days on my return—somewhere between December 20 and 30. Do you think that so short a period would suffice? After such a lapse of time would not so shabby a visit be worse than none? Tell me your honest opinion on this point. Further (of course entre nous), are they prepared to defray the expenses of my long journey and, besides, and of my stay there, and in what way? How much I should rejoice to see at length once more all my dear Munich friends, but above all yourself, dear Baermann, and to have a chat with you again, to make music together and to walk about. But I don't need to tell you, for you know it already. So write to me as soon as possible by a few lines, and rest assured that so long as I live, I am, and ever shall be,

Your old friend,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY

Leipzig, September 30, 1839.

My dear Friend,

Much as I should have regretted at any other time to have received the letter I have just got, still it is a pitiful thing now for me to reply to it, because I was on the point of writing to you to say that all hope of this meeting has I think was at an end. My circumstances have assumed such a shape since my return, that even my visit to Vienna during the time of the concerts could only be purchased by great sacrifices and in any amount on my part. I am in considerable perplexity in consequence of this, as I certainly cannot deem it unreasonable that my personal presence should be expected here during the winter, when I have some months' leave of absence in the summer. At all events, it is now quite out of the question to dream of prolonging my absence by any détour. The worst part of the affair is, that we could and would have passed such very happy hours together, instead of which our meeting is now postponed for an indefinite period. Herr Pasetko and Rosenhain from Paris are here just now; they tell me a great deal and much that is flattering of you, and praise Carl and his playing, and his talent for composition in such enthusiasm that my mouth began to water again to make music with you and to play all sorts of nonsensical pranks. They cannot sufficiently extol a clarionet concerto of Carl, and likewise speak with so much affection of yourself that it quite gladdened my heart. May we soon

The Nether-Rhine Musical Festival.

Cologne, June 5th.

The fiftieth anniversary of the musical festivals established in Rhenish Germany in 1818 was celebrated last week at the old Colonia Agrippina, with increasing solemnity and enthusiasm. The first of these festivals was given at Düsseldorf, in 1818. The [illegible], therefore, numbers just a half-century, and it is satisfactory to note that the programmes have gone on [illegible] every year during that time. The bill of fare of 1818 would look rather meagre [illegible] The Seasons [illegible] The Creation. The [illegible] lasted only two days [illegible] was added [illegible]. Now compare the [illegible] programme [illegible] of last week. The Festival was inaugurated by a remarkable speech pronounced by Herr Schück. The orator sketched the origin and results of the musical festival. The Allegro maestoso, the Scherzo vivace, the Adagio cantabile, and the finale, which is composed by the whole of the choristers and of the musicians, electrified the audience.

Now the third and last day of the festival. It is commonly [illegible] though the Gürzenich, which is the concert-room, ought to be [illegible] [illegible] the two choruses who [illegible] the principal [illegible] who pretend to represent Agrippa and [illegible] Never [illegible] and every one seemed [illegible] would have been [illegible] the Crystal Palace. The Saengerfest at Chicago.

Correspondence of the N. Y. Evening Post.

Chicago, June 17, 1867.

This day will be ever memorable in the annals of Chicago. The city has been all [illegible] from [illegible] o'clock this morning and [illegible] of the "Saengerfest" [illegible] under the direction of Mr. Frederick [illegible] of New York the "Fest Hall" has been [illegible] hand-some style, considering [illegible].

FEST HALL.

The large skating rink improvised into a music hall, has been neatly decorated with [illegible] and [illegible]. The [illegible] was [illegible] in fact every beam was [illegible] covered [illegible] paper [illegible] Banners and [illegible] the support in the [illegible] roof [illegible] in the back of the [illegible] At each end of the railing of the stage [illegible] with wreaths of evergreen and flowers [illegible] two pyramids made of [illegible] American flag [illegible] On each side in the [illegible] German Confederacy [illegible] black, white and red.

The north and south sides of the room are also decorated with [illegible] wreaths and [illegible]

On the walls, and surrounded by wreaths, are placed busts of great German composers. Among these is one of Handel, [illegible] and placed between two fine mottoes. On one side is:

"Wie [illegible] Macht [illegible] Am [illegible] Lied."

On the other was:

"The [illegible],
[illegible],
[illegible],
[illegible]."

Next is a [illegible] bust of Mr. Lincoln; and near to it busts of Beethoven and Liszt. The word "Welcome," in German, meets the eye on every side.

THE SINGERS FROM [illegible] TOO LATE.

At half-past two to-day a despatch was received from Fort Wayne announcing the detention of the European singers in consequence of a [illegible] which caused a break in the road.

THE PROCESSION.

At [illegible] the societies formed in procession at [illegible] Block, and [illegible] marched to the Fest Hall on Wabash avenue. There were over forty different singing societies and several Turner societies in the procession.

THE RECEPTION CONCERT.

The following is the programme of the Reception Concert:

Jubilee Overture.	By C. M. von Weber.
Chicago orchestra.
Welcoming speech to the foreign singers.	By the Mayor of Chicago.
Greeting of the singers,—Chorus with orchestral accomp.	By J. Otto.
Chicago singers and orchestra.
German speech of welcome to the foreign singers.	By the President of the Festival.
Overture to Mendelssohn's "Athalie".
Orchestra.
Oration of [illegible] Schlaeger, Esq.
The [illegible] Chorus with solo and orchestra. [illegible]
Chicago chorus.
Presentation of the flags of [illegible] to the President of the General Committee [illegible]
[illegible] National Hymn. [illegible]
Singer-Speech [illegible]	Music by [illegible].
Sung by all the Vereins.

At half-past seven the Singing and Turner Societies came into the hall with their flags crowned with [illegible] which were then hall up [illegible] at the back of the stage making a beautiful effect, which was enhanced when Ellsworth's Zouaves marched in [illegible] the hall and filed upon the stage.

The absence of the foreign singers compelled some change in the [illegible] of the programme. At eight o'clock the concert began with the "Jubilee Overture" by C. M. Von Weber, which was finely executed by the orchestra.

Mr. J. B. Rice, Mayor of Chicago, was then introduced and delivered his welcoming speech, which was loudly applauded even by those who did not understand English.

Herr [illegible] as president of the "Fest," then read in German a speech of welcome to the foreign singers (who were not there). The speech was also heartily applauded by both Americans and Germans.

The overture to Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was [illegible] and then followed an oration by Mr. Schlaeger, which was decidedly humorous and excited much laughter.

The national hymn wound up the concert, all standing and [illegible] with the singers.

It will be seen from the programme that the "Greeting to the Singers" the overture to Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and the [illegible] speech by [illegible] were omitted. The concert was therefore short and ended at 10 P.M. It was [illegible] every one seemed satisfied. Pyrotechnics and [illegible] made the night lively [illegible] with their noise. The sound of music strikes upon my ear as I now write.

[illegible] TORCH[illegible] PROCESSION.

After the reception, the torchlight procession, with two [illegible] formed, and marched from the "Fest Hall" through the principal streets to "Turner Hall" [illegible] music of Meyerbeer's "Marche aux Flambeaux." At the Hall a poem on greeting to the guests, composed by Emil [illegible] was delivered al fresco. The end of the evening is to be given up to social pleasures.

SECOND DAY.

Chicago, June 18, 1867.

The chief feature of interest in the second day of the "Sängerfest" was the arrival of the foreign singers

... Anticipating a crowd at the "Fest Hall," the Committee at [illegible] raised the price from $1 to $2, and $1.50 for reserved seats. At 1.30 the hall (or rink) was rapidly filled, until there were some four thousand persons crowded into it.

The following was the programme of the first concert:

Overture to Rienzi, by Wagner ... Festival Orchestra.
[illegible] chorus with baritone solo, male quartet and orchestral accompaniment, by [illegible]; the baritone solo by Mr. [illegible] of New York; male quartet by the New York Liederkranz.
Adagio from Haydn's [illegible] Symphony. Festival Orchestra.
"The German People's Prayer," chorus with solo quartet [illegible] accompaniment [illegible] by the United [illegible] of New York.
Concerto [illegible], complete [illegible] piano-forte, wind instruments [illegible] accompaniment, performed by Mr. [illegible] [illegible] chorus with solo quartet and orchestra [illegible] solo quartet by the [illegible] New York.
"The [illegible]" People's Song, by [illegible] chorus.
[illegible] March, for [illegible].
Battle Hymn, chorus with orchestra. From Wagner's Rienzi.

Mme. Louise [illegible] was indisposed, and her solo, "To Princes of Baal," was omitted. "The German People's Prayer" was well given and the solo given by the Arion of New York was loudly applauded.

[illegible]

The concert closed with the "Battle Hymn" from "Rienzi," in the course of which the young man who sang the solo received a shower of bouquets. Thus ended the first grand concert, and it certainly went off well. The roof of the Rink however is too low for ... [illegible] did not succeed. The Rink is also too small for such an affair and I believe that many persons were crowded out. To-night the second concert is to take place, and the programme [illegible].

THIRD DAY.

Chicago, June 1[illegible], 1868.

The third and last concert took place last night. Everything was done to make the audience comfortable. The heat being great, blocks of ice were placed in the "Fest Hall" and fans were sold in bags. The attendance was not so large as at the previous concerts, but there were at least about three thousand persons present. The singing of the [illegible] performers was the chief attraction. The number of singers and musicians was about eight hundred. The following was the programme:

Symphony in B, No. 1 ... Beethoven.
By the Festival Orchestra.
Solo.
By the Arion, of New York.
The [illegible] [illegible] Solo.
[illegible] Mme. Louise Rieck.
[illegible] The German's [illegible] Chorus with solo quartet. By [illegible].
The solo quartet by the [illegible] [illegible] singers.
Adagio and [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven.
Performed by H. [illegible].
[illegible], for a Baritone.
By Mr. [illegible], of New York.
[illegible] By Lindpaintner.
Festival Orchestra.
Solo.
By the New York Liederkranz.
[illegible] By Abt.
Mme. Louise Rieck.
Solo.
By the Arion des Westens, of St. Louis.
[illegible] March. By Meyerbeer.
Festival Orchestra.

Mme. Rieck, whose absence was excused [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] Herr Balatka, conductor, announced that Herr [illegible], of Berlin would take his place as director.

He added that the song they were about to sing was sung in every city, town and village of Germany. Here at at least [illegible] ... called for three cheers for Germany, and three thundering hurrahs were given.

The Jubilee overture, by Lindpaintner, was well played and applauded. The eighth piece, a solo by the New York Liederkranz, was very well executed, [illegible] being plainly heard above the other voices. This piece was encored, and a second song was given by the Liederkranz.

The tenth piece was one of the best of the evening, the Arion of St. Louis proving themselves admirable singers, and disputing the palm with their namesakes of New York. The Arion des Westens sang a solo, ... [illegible] March [illegible] the concert, and was [illegible] of the renowned executed. The violinists in the orchestra were musicians of no common order and their execution was generally admirable. They played with ease and spirit.

Herr Balatka announced before the execution of the last piece that in consequence of an anticipated [illegible] for a repetition of some of the choruses, there would be a matinée to-morrow at 1.30 P.M. with [illegible] announcement was greeted with applause.

This ends at an end the last of the concerts in the "Fest Hall." To-day is to be a day of rest, and on Sunday there will be a concert at the [illegible] grounds called Wright's Grove. A [illegible] concert will be repeated all the music of the Sängerfest.

The Sängerfest has been a success. The receipts from sale of tickets have not been less than $[illegible], [illegible] the Rink been larger they would have amounted to [illegible] more. The sum leaves $[illegible] to be raised to meet the total expenses of the Fest.

The Handel Triennial Festival.

This unparalleled act of homage to the genius and memory of a great man is once more close at hand. [illegible] Handel had been dead a hundred years, and the Sacred Harmonic Society, which has the Handel would probably never have existed, ... [illegible] by a performance of his works on a scale of unprecedented magnitude. The [illegible] went further than its promoters can anticipated [illegible] Handel ... every [illegible] the Crystal Palace ... [illegible] composers. In 18[illegible] and 18[illegible] ... army of singers and players amounting to thousands ... brought to a successful [illegible] ... of performance [illegible] What these events [illegible] for the composer's reputation may be easily imagined. [illegible] ... which Handel [illegible] lived and died, and by which his immortal memory [illegible] a priceless heritage. Hence the triennial Festival is a thing to be welcomed. [illegible] which one may [illegible] of a performance such.

Profiting by experience the managers have made each Festival an improvement upon its predecessor. Just as 18[illegible] was better than 18[illegible] and 18[illegible] ... [illegible] (and Handel Festivals [illegible]) ... This is true in nearly every department of the gigantic scheme. [illegible] the progress of music in England [illegible] three years showed [illegible] ... and capacities of [illegible] for a place in the Handel Festival chorus. Well [illegible] a [illegible] the managers [illegible] ... body of singers capable [illegible] Lord [illegible] ... anything [illegible] ... we shall say more presently ... either now [illegible] former occasions, the "pro[illegible]" have been [illegible] for all [illegible] ... At the same time ... of Festival doings—Birmingham, Norwich, Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester ... will send up their best voices ... [illegible] Bradford and Leeds for instance ... The proficiency of these ... [illegible] the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts ... Costa has been doing in Exeter Hall [illegible] London ... in which [illegible] equal [illegible].

Turning to the solo artists we have a prospect equally fair. When may the reader—[illegible] ... a list of names including Thérèse Tietjens, Christine Nilsson, Clara Louisa Kellogg, Euphrosyne Parepa, Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Rudersdorff, Santley, Sims Reeves, Foli, and Rudersdorff? A single glance at this list shows the managers' determination to have the best available artists in every department, and, as far as expenses are concerned, to have all the best. They might have been content with the skill and experience of such recognized oratorio singers as Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, and Madame Rudersdorff, who, [illegible], are well able to render Handel's airs every [illegible]. But they seem to have determined upon an accumulation of [illegible]. Hence their engagement of the young Swede who [illegible] at Birmingham last year [illegible], also [illegible] as well as the [illegible]. Yet, of the young American whose [illegible] ... of the young Hungarian [illegible] during the past [illegible] the Sacred Harmonic Society's [illegible] ... It may safely be assumed that every [illegible] of [illegible] will appear at each performance, and the general interest thus [illegible] on the side of success will, no doubt, justify the managers' profuse liberality. With regard to the male artists what need be said? To [illegible] ... Sims Reeves's delivery [illegible] ... upon the splendid [illegible] singing of such artists as Mr. [illegible] Reeves and Mr. Santley would be "wasteful and ridiculous excess."

The band may safely be left with Mr. Costa. That accomplished chief [illegible] ... of risk [illegible] department especially his own, [illegible] department [illegible] to a conductor [illegible] at home with all. The Sacred Harmonic Society and the Crystal Palace [illegible] ... a nucleus of thoroughly safe players around which will be grouped experienced professional and amateurs in numbers sufficient to make the instrument [illegible] ... We are told that of these there will be [illegible]. What would [illegible] Handel could have such a band performing his Occasional Overture ... [illegible] Selection day [illegible] ...

But the Festival preparations are not exclusively such as bear directly upon the [illegible] result. [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... difficulty. [illegible] ... has been carried on in the [illegible] ... the Handel celebrations began. Each [illegible] has been a step towards [illegible] ... Mr. Bowley, we are assured, [illegible] a coup de grace, [illegible] ... for all [illegible]. The [illegible] the Napoleon's favorite device of piercing the enemy's centre, it simply [illegible] ... the 4000 [illegible] ... and stopping [illegible] "dead" from harmonies [illegible] away where there are no ears [illegible]. We ... [illegible] "surplus" in consequence, and we do the bidding [illegible] possible [illegible].

Coming now to the programme ... for performance, [illegible] ... it was [illegible] easy and [illegible] difficult. A Handel Festival [illegible] but one concert [illegible] ... is probably there [illegible] chosen the Messiah ... [illegible] "Israel in Egypt." An [illegible] ... for the third would be hard to find [illegible] ... Everybody knows what hold [illegible] ... Festival managers have not been equally embarrassed [illegible] But with [illegible] Bowley has been [illegible] ... and the result will [illegible] ... Before proceeding at particular [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... of Handel are at once ... of the oratorio. Proofs of this [illegible] In the first place there is the Occasional Overture with its [illegible] ... and the stately March, by which, perhaps, it is best known.

This, the most generally known and admired of Handel's orchestral [illegible], will be followed by the [illegible] selection from Saul, which has been so marked a feature at previous Festivals. No one who [illegible] heard the splendid choruses, beginning with "How excellent Thy Name" and ending with the "Hallelujah," will feel other than glad that they are once more in the programme. The same remark applies to the selection from Solomon ... [illegible] ... some [illegible] of Handel's magnificent [illegible] ... double chorus, "[illegible], Lord of earth and sky," the [illegible] "Let no rash intruder," the glorious [illegible] "Shake the dome," and the [illegible]

dise" choruses, to prove that Solomon could on no account have been overlooked. From Judas Maccabæus the powerful "Conquering Lord" has been selected, while "The many rend the skies" will represent Alexander's Feast as holding the equal [illegible] that famous secular work. But the greatest interest centres in two choruses so rarely performed that they might well be termed "novelties," even though their composer died more than a century ago. These are "How, Lord, the everlasting boy," from the well-nigh forgotten Semele; and "He saw the lovely youth," from the scarcely better-known Theodora. In making this selection the managers have done well, and if the result be not a surprise it will assuredly be a disappointment. There may be good reasons why Semele and Theodora are practically shelved. That is a question we have no [illegible] to discuss now; but there are still better reasons why for Festival purposes [illegible] should be made of the particular numbers [illegible]. Handel's own estimate of "[illegible]" is very familiar, and those who [illegible] the great rehearsal of Friday [illegible]. They may, however, [illegible] extract from Theodora [illegible] Semele [illegible] a [illegible] on the [illegible] that Handel in his grandest mood. We must [illegible] a [illegible] in which [illegible] have been [illegible] by [illegible] the [illegible] section of the show. For [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] the present Handel Festival chorus [illegible]. For [illegible] than [illegible] to satisfy Mr. Costa, that all the [illegible] programme [illegible] is a fact the character of the programme [illegible] of large and [illegible]. With regard to the second day [illegible] in connection with [illegible] they are allotted. To say the [illegible] the beautiful air from Judas Maccabæus [illegible] and the [illegible] from Rinaldo [illegible] "[illegible]" and [illegible] Mdlle. Clara Louise Kellogg [illegible] Mdlle. Carola [illegible] Let the bright Seraphim [illegible] soprano takes "[illegible]" [illegible] of Handel [illegible]. For these reasons, then, we hold the Selection programme first in interest, though yielding to none in homage to the master of the Messiah and of Israel.

Of the grand rehearsal and of the first and third days of the Festival proper it is superfluous to speak. Not a word will be needed to commend it to public favor. The [illegible] of the "[illegible]" and of the gigantic [illegible] now enough, a [illegible] for which [illegible] is too small. The programme [illegible] the [illegible] of its best movements must speak for itself.

To close this article without some [illegible] personal reference would be unjust. Whoever else may be worthy of praise after the event, there are two men to whose praise must be given beforehand. One is Mr. Costa, [illegible] be spared [illegible]. Remembering what this gentleman has done on former occasions, we [illegible] for another triumph, and [illegible] Ave Costa Imperator. The [illegible] is Mr. E. Bowley of the Crystal Palace, to whose [illegible] and unsurpassable energy and experience the Handel Festivals have, from the first, been [illegible]. [illegible] time, that [illegible] the smallest [illegible] in the smallest [illegible]. [illegible] "general manager" [illegible] of an [illegible] and [illegible].

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 4, 1868.

Concerts.

The musical season has been over for a month or more, yet there have been a few occasional performances which we have to record. First the debut of a new Oratorio Society.

The Boston Church Union [illegible] of singers residing mainly in South Boston. Mr. Frederick H. Underwood is the President and Mr. L. H. Southard musical Conductor. The chorus numbers about 2 [illegible] voices, who have devoted their first season to the practice, one evening every week, of Haydn's "Creation:" once well considered and [illegible] in a good performance of so familiar and popular a work, they will doubtless address themselves to newer and more formidable tasks: [illegible] course. The public performance took place at Phillips Church, Broadway, on the evening of Monday, June 29. The Creation was, judiciously, somewhat abridged, leaving off the Adam and Eve dialogue, which [illegible] be tedious except when the [illegible] is greatly done, and transferring "The heavens are telling" to the end for a sublime conclusion.

The place was not very favorable for good arrangement of the forces, nor for the best effect; but in the whole they worked together with good understanding, and the rendering was creditable to a young Society. There is very good song material in those voices: the soprano and contralto sounded particularly fresh, and clear and musical; and Mr. Southard had evidently trained the chorus well; they entered into it with spirit. They were supported by an orchestra of forty or more instruments, with [illegible] at their head, besides the organ, played by Mr. G. E. Whiting. The soprano solos were sung by Mrs. H. M. Smith, whose clear, bright tones, flexible and even execution, and highly cultivated fine style of trills and fioriture won much favor. Mr. M. W. Whitney's ponderous bass was grand [illegible] and the tenor part was sung by Mr. H. L. Whitney, whom we heard for the first time, with a voice of considerable power and sweetness, carefully and in good taste.

It was an encouraging beginning. We shall be glad to see such local choral organizations spring up in the several quarters and suburbs of our city [illegible] grand oratorio [illegible] themselves in working order, ready to reinforce the central (Handel and Haydn) [illegible] and let all [illegible] several streams pour into [illegible] great flood in a festival of song.

We go back now to concerts which we had not room to chronicle before. First Miss S. W. Barton's Matinée and Concert, at Chickering Hall, June 17. The Hall [illegible] for the overflow (not large) of applicants for the enjoyment of the evening. The programme offered only a few vocal selections. In the afternoon Miss Barton, who has quite a rich [illegible] voice, singing always true for everything [illegible] a [illegible] dramatic expression [illegible] "[illegible] fils" and in a Duo from Il Giuramento," and the Trio of Maskers in Don Giovanni. Miss D. C. Hall, a beautiful and powerful soprano, [illegible] many respects a charming singer. She puts life and meaning into her song only [illegible] the [illegible] not always true. In Rossini's [illegible] and luxurious melody Bel raggio she made a marked impression, as well as in the Duet and Trio. Mr. McDonald, a tenor sweet and flexible enough and rather lack [illegible] manner hardly brought to life again the [illegible] "Spirto gentil" and "Robin Adair."

In the evening, the tenor gentleman [illegible] many whose fine poetry and [illegible] out of his reach. Solo here a "Du bist die Ruh" which he sang in English, [illegible] of robust [illegible] ballads: "The [illegible]" Miss Hall sang a song by Thalberg ("The sighed [illegible] the rose"), another, by Curschmann ("The village bell be heard"), and the "Last Adieu," a sweet and simple composition of her own, we are told—all with good effect. Miss Barton sang "La Separazione," by Rossini, and a ballad (Peace of Mind") by Spohr. A Buffo Duet, "Il Marinaro," closed the first part, and a Trio ("[illegible]"), by Curschmann, the second. The accompaniments were played by Mr. H. M. Dow.

The magnet of the two concerts was, of course, Miss Alide Topp, whose pianoforte selections were the same in both. First a Fantasia by Liszt, consisting of a Venetian Gondoliera and a Neapolitan Tarantelle, each thoroughly characteristic and picturesquely suggestive. But what pleased us most in the Fantasia was a third part, not one of [illegible] the others, but longer and more elaborate than both of them together, [illegible] a slow movement of exquisite charm and delicacy of feeling; though the spell is soon broken and gives place to the furious extravagance in which the Abbé and his school delight. The young artist played all this by heart, as she does everything; and though suffering from fatigue, with a perceptible abatement of her usual spirit and enthusiasm, her fine and searching touch, perfectly finished passage work, admirable Zartheit [illegible] of light and shade, and really poetic rendering throughout. For encore she gave again Liszt's airy fairy fancy the "Gnomenreigen." In the second part she gave another of Chopin's Ballades, the graceful one in A flat, 6-8 measure, and most delightfully she played it, though it may [illegible] a deeper finer, more intense feeling as interpreted by one or two of our maturer artists. Miss Topp is young; yet for one so young, wonderfully at home in the best works of all the great piano writers. We hope next winter to hear her play not only the Schumann Concerto again, but some of those by Beethoven and others who [illegible] them all and loves them.

New England Conservatory.—This great popular music school—[illegible] in its [illegible] of [illegible], nearly 1600—has surely sought to educate the [illegible] as well as teach the rudiments, by making [illegible] opportunities of hearing master works interpreted by artists. During the past season some twenty classical Chamber concerts have been provided, partly in the hall of the Conservatory, partly at Chickering Hall, to which such pupils as [illegible] can [illegible] admitted freely. The performers are mostly teachers in the institution, or other well-known artists, with occasionally an advanced pupil. Here is the programme of one which we attended on the 20th of May.

Sonata, Op. 24, Piano and Violin	Beethoven
Song	Schumann
Trio, Piano, Violin and 'Cello	Haydn
"Rondo all' Ongarese."
Song	[illegible]
Quartet, Piano, Violin, Viola and 'Cello	Mozart

The Sonata, Trio and Quartet were all played by the Fischer Bros., who form a family quartet by themselves, all excellent musicians: the elder Fisch, the Father Haydn, taking the viola or [illegible], Mr. Henry Fisch the first violin, Mr. August Fisch the 'cello, while a younger brother, whom we had not met before in that capacity, surprised us by the firm and facile way in which he bore his part at the piano. It gave the assembled young ladies a rare opportunity of beginning acquaintance with these charming model works of three great masters. The songs were sung with good voice and expression by Miss Hall.

In the nineteenth concert (June 11) we are told

Mrs. Cary was the singer, and Mr. [illegible] the pianist. The selections were: Beethoven's Sonate-Duo, in G minor, op. 5; two songs by Robert Franz ("Evening" and "O welcome fair Wood"); and Mendelssohn's C minor Trio, op. 66.—The twentieth and last occurred last Tuesday morning, and offered the great B flat Trio of Beethoven; two songs by Mendelssohn ("Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and "The Shepherd's Lay"); and Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, op. 58, for piano and violoncello.—A larger [illegible] concert, of pupils in all kinds, is to close the [illegible] [illegible] Dresel, Mr. Ernst Tuckerman, has arranged a musical picnic for his followers, to Walden Pond in Concord.

The Boston Conservatory of which Julius Eichberg is Director had an exhibition concert, a "Closing Matinée," in the Boston Music Hall last Saturday. The Hall was crowded and this was the programme, all by pupils:

Fugue in G minor for Organ	Bach.
The Twilight Hour. Part Song	[illegible]
Polonaise in A major, for Piano	Chopin.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible], Bassi; Quartet, E flat major for Piano	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] and Fugue F, [illegible] for the Organ	Bach
[illegible]	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Beethoven.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] Part Song	[illegible]
[illegible] for Organ	[illegible]

The two Bach fugues were brought out cleanly and clearly in good sound style. The part-songs, sung by about twenty young ladies, in three parts, showed a good ensemble of fresh [illegible] voices. The vocal solos, too, each in its way, were highly creditable, especially the Duet. The Mozart Quartet, owing to the absence of one of the performers, had to be withdrawn and in its place, Mr. Eichberg with his young daughter [illegible] of the Conservatory [illegible] a Sonata of Beethoven for violin and piano. The young lady made a [illegible] impression both in this and in the movement from the Sonata Pathétique. Two other young [illegible] a Chopin [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] showed talent and the influence of good teaching.—But after all one can learn a great deal of the [illegible] working and tendencies of these schools from such noble [illegible] of the choicest specimens.

Personal. It seems as if all our leading vocal artists were possessed with the idea of spending their summer in Europe. Zerrahn and Wolf Fries have been gone these six weeks; the former has been [illegible] with delight at the great Handel Festival in London, and has been cordially received by the musicians there as the Conductor of our Festival. Mr. [illegible] and Mr. [illegible] and Dr. Tuckerman, the organist, have sailed within the week past. It is useless to say nothing the [illegible] of these who go abroad in search of [illegible] art of song, that we see the old Italian and one which [illegible] by the testimony of [illegible] [illegible] Mme. [illegible] Mme. [illegible] does not [illegible] in [illegible] Verdi days [illegible] Italy. But that they may get better [illegible] than at home may [illegible] be hoped. Mr. [illegible], our refined and charming tenor has [illegible] himself a wife, has gone back to [illegible] a [illegible], and will spend some years in Germany & Italy and when he may [illegible] [illegible] voice and [illegible]. Mr. M. W. W[illegible] has gone to cultivate a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. [illegible], a favorite singer in one of [illegible] church choirs.

The Handel Festival.—Doubtless by the time this number of our Journal meets the reader (we have to go to press earlier than usual) full reports of the grandest of all musical festivals will have come to hand. Meanwhile the following extract from the letter of a lady to the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, [illegible] [illegible] of her impressions of the first day's performance and its beautiful surroundings:

Yesterday we went to the Crystal Palace, at Sydenham, to hear the oratorio of The Messiah. During its performance I was in that [illegible] of [illegible] that St. John describes, "Whether present in the body or absent in the spirit I know not." Four thousand voices sang "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world!" Nineteen thousand people sat around me breathless and hushed. Then one woman stood in the midst, and every note of her silvery voice thrilled that immense concourse of people as "I know that my Redeemer liveth" rang clear and harmonious above the organ's roll, the hundreds of stringed instruments and the [illegible] in the [illegible], in the [illegible] of [illegible] nobility and rank, foreigners, people from all parts of the earth, with one feeling of submission, bowed their heads or wept [illegible]. Mysteries passed away one [illegible] the [illegible] of their works on earth. Handel was there. As [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] victory, I fancied she was oppressed by the excitement of her audience. Whether something in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] the first gust of [illegible] through [illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] thousand to her [illegible]! At this juncture I became nervous [illegible] with a companion [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] delightful experience, and my [illegible] toward the [illegible] by the waves of harmony from the [illegible] orchestra, I observed with immense interest the effect of that great assemblage, as a world [illegible] by it [illegible] amid the [illegible] collection of works of art and copies [illegible] ever brought together. I speak [illegible] of [illegible] the Great [illegible] of Paris. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in effect the general [illegible] of the Crystal Palace.

Under the [illegible], hundreds [illegible] flowers [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] spray, [illegible] children, [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] [illegible] the air. On pedestals appearing, [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] Palace, a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] they [illegible] by the [illegible] and as if they were placed there to form a tableau for my delight. I [illegible] for myself and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible]!" I looked from the palace windows. [illegible] the expanse of rich meadows, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to which the terraced [illegible] of Sydenham seemed but a [illegible] of flowers! I thought of England's Queen. [illegible] this [illegible] her pleasure? Alas, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A [illegible] to the nations of the world, [illegible] royal [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Queen [illegible] [illegible] of life's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and look from the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which the reign [illegible] [illegible] kingdom where there is "One God, one law, one element

And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

Later. Our London papers of June 20th have arrived. We have only room for what the Athenæum says:

Up to the present time, it may be asserted that no [illegible] musical performances in any country have approached in [illegible] [illegible] of this year's Handel Festival. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] performances, chorus and orchestra combined. There [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] before the public. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mass, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it [illegible] on the other hand [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Europe [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] Europe has never had a finer [illegible] more accomplished bass and baritone singer than Mr. Santley [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in one [illegible] with the choral and orchestral splendor of this year's Festival. In no other country [illegible] would it be practicable to perform grand works as perfectly as "The Messiah" was performed without rehearsal. In no other country than our own could there have been such a [illegible] rehearsal as that of yesterday week. Then the mass of choristers and orchestral players had to deal with a new [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] went through their work with such precision that there was only one [illegible] to stop the orchestra [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] splendor. A stronger [illegible] of [illegible] and memory [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] which the art has taken in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] rehearsal. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Lastly, [illegible] [illegible] added that it has afforded only one more proof [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] power and discipline wielded by Mr. Costa. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] would [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] possible.

It is useless to descant [illegible] on "The Messiah," on the still greater glory of "Israel." To all who know these works by heart, the two-hours' cantata by Handel, performed on the intervening day (Wednesday), had a fresh charm impossible to be overrated. We need only specify the lovely song from "Rinaldo," "Lascia ch'io pianga," and the delicious chorus from "Semele," "Now Love, that everlasting boy," as two of the number.

For the moment, we can merely register, on good authority, a contradiction forwarded to us as to the present state of the Handel MSS. in the Royal Library. What then our [illegible] [illegible]. Meanwhile, the fac-simile of what Mendelssohn called "the [illegible]" manuscript of the inimitable "Messiah" has been issued [illegible] of the small [illegible] and remarkable Sacred Harmonic Society. The immortal work [illegible] hurried on the paper, scored [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] words, [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible], possibly [illegible] by plagiarism. But the might of the master has never been so well asserted in all the time being and in the memory which he glorified by his royal genius.

Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.—Mr. E. L. Ritter the musical director of this institution arranged a couple of "Historical Recitals of Vocal and Piano-forte Music," which took place here on Friday evening June 10 and Saturday morning June 11. The performers were Mme. Raymond Ritter, vocalist, Mr. S. B. Mills, as pianist; and Mr. Ritter himself as accompanist. The programmes, it will be seen, are very interesting and various, containing much that is seldom heard; indeed the pieces mark [illegible] of which we believe were performed in public for the first time in this country.

Rubinstein the Pianist will, it is said, soon visit this country. Some of the London critics [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it find such high and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] capabilities, so frequently disfigured by the [illegible] of ungoverned enthusiasm." One of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] correspondent, "A. W. T." now of Trieste, writes us:

"I see by the papers you are to have Rubinstein. I assure you you will have heard the greatest when he has played to you the last Sonatas of Beethoven. His power and expression are incomparable and indescribable."

CARLOTTA PATTI has recently been honored, by admirers of her professional skill, who are residents at Paris, with a present which gracefully acknowledges her very high reputation with that city's dilettanti.

This present consisted of a pair of earrings or pendants, which cost $1,100 in gold. They have sixty-eight diamonds of the finest water, and their workmanship is creditable even to Parisian art.

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.—The London Athenæum has the following letter:

Hamburg, June 4, 1868.

In reference to the [illegible] published in your Journal of the 16th of May, page 681, in regard to the purchase of 120 volumes of Handel's operas and oratorios, I have the pleasure to state that a small number of admirers of Handel's music in Hamburg have bought from Mr. T. Schmidt in London the well-known manuscript scores of Handel's works, written by his friend and amanuensis Schmidt at the dictation of Handel's own handwriting. This being the identical copy which Handel used in all the performances of his works, we have great satisfaction at having obtained the possession of one of the most valuable legacies of our illustrious countryman; and we hope that it will form the keystone of a musical library in our city.

FRIEDRICH CHRYSANDER,
President of the Committee.

MRS. LAUSSOT writes from Florence to the Athenæum concerning the [illegible] and [illegible] and hopes of the Cherubini Society in that city. "During the seven years the society has existed," she says, "I have frequently endeavored to transfer the direction to hands more efficient than my own. Herren Louis Ehlert, Hugo Bussmeyer, Kapellmeister B. Scholz, from Hanover, and Tagliafico, from [illegible], have each in turn undertaken it; but, all being obliged to return to Germany, it has reverted to my hands after a while, and for the present is likely to continue so. This winter it has met with great encouragement on all sides, both from distinguished artists who have attended and from the higher and more cultivated classes of Italian society; so that I have now great hopes that I may have succeeded in founding a durable institution in the first [illegible] singing society which has yet been in any of its Italy. We have at present fifty to sixty singing members,—having performed in some years, besides Beethoven's C major Mass, Mozart's and Cherubini's Requiems, Hymns by Cherubini and [illegible] scenes from 'Euryanthe,' &c. It has been my principal object to endeavor to excite a taste for music of a serious sort, and to bring some life and interest into the [illegible] of this sort, which to the present moment in Italy is either unusual or is tolerated in the lowest possible standard. The Music Lesson is my [illegible]—and we can desire but [illegible] [illegible]—every [illegible] and [illegible] in its most [illegible]."

HOW THEY DO IT IN GERMANY. The subjoined paragraph from the London Orchestra is worthy of the attention of managers of musical festivals:

A friendly correspondent who attended the recent Nether Rhine Festival in Cologne sends us some very shrewd remarks on the difference between a German musical festival and an English one. In the first place, he points out, he is in earnest and experienced [illegible] in rehearsal; and so there are other occasions the performances are more finished than in one festival, of which [illegible] rehearsals take place for seven concerts. In Germany there are six rehearsals for three concerts. Second, by their sole object in England is to make money. In Germany the first and only object is to benefit art. One of the results of our system is that the managers of festivals shrink from risking the performance of any but well-known popular works which are certain to draw and to pay." One of the results of the German system is that only works of high artistic merit are given. No such selections as those at the big concerts in our [illegible] ... which we have so often protested as unworthy of those occasions and experiences year after year of [illegible] ... [illegible] ... great would be tolerated in Germany. Another [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible] ... [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] ... as be permitted to give their gratuitous services. Hence the refinement of programme and the [illegible] [illegible] planning which even to a foreigner is so manifest.

HANDEL'S FIREWORK MUSIC. A London paper [illegible] the close of the Bristol Festival says:

There will be an interesting Handel revival at the Crystal Palace tonight, it having been decided to perform the Firework Music in connection with a pyrotechnic display. As the work is rarely heard, and but very little is known concerning it, a few particulars may not be unacceptable. On the 27th of April, 1749, the Peace of Aix la Chapelle was celebrated by a firework exhibition in the Green Park. The machine, we read, "represented a magnificent Doric temple, from which extended two wings, terminated by pavilions 114 feet in height to the top of his Majesty's arms, 410 feet long." Preceded by a salute from "101 brass ordnance" the affair ended by the Gothic temple taking fire, and very nearly burning down the King's library, which stood close at hand. The overture "Mr. Handel" had written for the occasion was duly played out, and seems to have pleased the crowd immensely. The greatest curiosity had been felt about it. A contemporary [illegible] records that, when the music was rehearsed in the Spring Gardens, Vauxhall, 12,000 persons attended and "occasioned such a stoppage on London Bridge that no carriage could pass for three hours." This excitement probably arose as much from the peculiar character of the music as from the popularity of its composer. The overture for example, only demanded "a grand overture of warlike instruments," was written for twenty-four hautboys, twelve bassoons, nine trumpets, nine horns, three pairs of kettledrums, a serpent and a double bass. No remarkable an orchestra would account of itself for any degree of curiosity. The other pieces, intended to illustrate various [illegible] ... [illegible], were two [illegible]—the second called "La Réjouissance"—one Bourrée, one Siciliana, entitled La Paix, and two minuets, in all of which the "martial instruments" were joined by others more peaceful. Handel must have been gratified by the success of his grand effort. Firework Music had a place in concert programmes for a long time; and when the composer directed its performance on behalf of the Foundling Hospital it brought £1,000 half as more to the funds. In return Handel was enrolled a governor and guardian of the hospital.

MUNICH. The rehearsals of Herr Richard Wagner's Meistersinger von Nürnberg have commenced, and the first performance of the work is fixed for the 21st [illegible].

LEIPZIG. Herr C. Reinecke's opera, King Manfred, has been produced with great success. The composer, who himself conducted, was called for all on each act, and the scenery as well as the costumes in the fifth act was encored. The two novelties will be Mignon and Hamlet, by M. Ambroise Thomas, the former in the autumn, and the latter towards the end of the year.

BADEN. Mme. Viardot-Garcia's two-act operetta, L'Ogre, Conte de Fées was performed on the 23d ult., in the Villa Turgeneff and proved a decided success. The performers were the fair composer's children and pupils. The audience consisted of some thirty persons all belonging to the highest circles. Among them was the Queen of Prussia.—M. Gounod's Roméo et Juliette has not come up to the expectations formed of it.

Rossini has for the last thirty years scarcely more carefully been besieged as to speak. Will he be found [illegible] all this time? He [illegible] well, [illegible] [illegible] young singer [illegible] upon the forehead and [illegible] [illegible] in his leisure hours. How many such are sent [illegible] to the [illegible] old gentleman! Ex[illegible] [illegible] and the best flowers in the [illegible] of human [illegible] to [illegible] to Rossini, who very [illegible] [illegible] this mark of [illegible]. Why should not he? It is not long since the papers [illegible] an account of the way in which he got rid of a young composer who had written a [illegible] which he [illegible] [illegible] on Meyerbeer's death. "Very good," the maestro is reported to have said, "but I should have been better pleased had you died and Meyerbeer written the music." The first is of every one, including the writer of the present lines, who says the same even now, though he is about to [illegible] the paternity of the joke. About August, 1839, appeared the Musical Almanac for 1840, and amongst the anecdotes it contained we find the following: A wretched musician of the name of Löffler called upon a celebrated pianist who once had requested the favor who was leaning back comfortably in an arm-chair and smoking a pipe, to allow him to play his newest sonata, The Death of Mozart set to a sonata by Löffler. My dear sir, replied the pianist, "if it were the death of Löffler set to music by Mozart, I should like very much to hear it; as it is, I prefer my pipe."

Whole No. 712. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1868. Vol. XXVIII. No. 9.

Beethoven's Letters (according to Nohl).

(Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Grenzboten, XXV. No. 10 March 1866.)

(Concluded.)

So in the case of No. 220, to which letter Nohl suggests the address of Artaria, his ignorance of the original has been very unlucky, for the initial letter used at the beginning is an H not an A. Both from the contents and from the words at the signature, "Amicus et Aminus," —which Nohl has not given—Schindler may well be supposed to have been the addressee, for judging from No. 266, Schindler does not appear to have carefully preserved in full all the letters addressed to him.*

Numberless instances too might be brought together here, which would imply prove how greatly Herr Nohl is wanting in every sort of philological tact and the exactness which is indispensable to one who assumes the duties of an editor. Thus (to that [illegible] point) he omits in some cases the needed comments as to the form of the letters, and in others makes arbitrary changes in the text. To No. 190 (Ries) there is a postscript "by his (Ries) own hand" as Ries expressly says. No. 216 Ries himself calls "Extract of a letter the beginning of which is not at hand," both these facts Herr Nohl deems it unnecessary to report. The particular instances of caprice and lawlessness are too numerous, that we should point them all out.† It is particularly annoying to see how he frequently alters the orthography and punctuation. In place where there are peculiar to Beethoven's mode of expressing himself. He even makes these unjustifiable changes, when editing already printed letters.

But though Herr Nohl decides not to prepare a running biographical commentary to the letters ("so as not to disturb the "electric current") he nevertheless adds to most of these notes, longer or shorter, containing explanations of fact or expressions of opinion. But in extremely few cases are they such as to convey any new information,—though certain notices from the papers of Schindler and one to No. 65 founded upon an oral communication of Mälzel are exceptions; for the most part they are copied from well-known biographies and other sources easily accessible, though he rarely names his authority; thus repeating the fault which has been censured above. In this part of his work too, no fixed principle seems to guide him: while that which was already well known and unnecessary abounds, we frequently miss needful explanations to passages really containing new matter. Why, for instance, has he nothing to tell us of Mademoiselle Gerardi, of Augusta Sebald, of Frances Fl[illegible] (Nos. 163), &c.? On the other hand, it is not easy important to learn that Dr. Schebek in Prague has a very fine collection of autographs.

Besides, the same untrustworthiness appears here in comment, as seen in these comments; and when a doubtful or contested point comes up, his want of judgment appears to an incredible degree. Let us take the letters to Bettina von Arnim as an instance; the authenticity of which, so the form in which we have them, it is well-known, is one severely doubted. Now Herr Nohl comes and informs us that he has never doubted their genuineness, and no one, who reads the collection as now published, can longer retain a doubt; while for those who are not convinced by the "internal evidence" let the testimony of the "competent expert," M. Carrere, who has seen the letters, suffice.

What Nohl means here by his "internal evidence" we are unable to perceive; for the affected sentimental, and more self-conceited tone, which runs through these three letters is not to be discovered in any other one whatever. Just compare the third, dated August, 1812, at Toeplitz, with the letter above mentioned, written at the same time and place to Amalie Sebald, and the difference is manifest. What Bettina says in the letter of the meeting with Goethe, of his demeanor in the presence of persons of the very highest rank and of his contempt for honors and distinctions—judged by what we know of his character from other sources—is an absolute impossibility. When one thinks of the additions made by Bettina to the letters of Goethe, we feel many loss in value and Professor Carrere. In a mere question of memory can he of no more weight as an expert than any other person. Both internal and external reasons, therefore, combine to force us to the opinion, that these letters, as we have them, never have come from Beethoven. And we shall retain of this opinion until somebody comes and assures us that he has seen the original letters in that form.*

Of other mistakes in Nohl's comments, we note a few.

To the 14th letter (to Varena) and as a correction of Schindler he notes the composition of "King Stephan" and the opening of the Pesth theatre as having been in the winter of 1811. From Thayer and also from the Allg. Mus. Zeitung 1863 No. 2, he might have known that the latter event took place February 12, 1812. The letters to Giulietta Guicciardi he dates 1800, because she, according to Thayer, was married 1801;† this obliges him to change the date of a letter to Wegeler from 1801 to 1800, in order to avoid a contradiction. Where Thayer makes that statement he does not inform us, while, if he refers to an oral communication, his memory must certainly play him false; The letter of Wegeler must however rest on a fact in 1801; for in that year that first portrait of Beethoven, mentioned in it, was made. We glean this fact from a source, which, nevertheless, would convince even Herr Nohl. The marriage took place in 1803 and, therefore, the well established date of these letters is not to be altered.

The letter No. 10, intends to refer to a concert described by Reichardt, as 1809; but a comparison of the facts for and against this conclusion makes it appear, to say the least, in the highest degree an arbitrary one. Such instances of carelessness naturally make the reader suspicious of all Nohl's statements in which he has not added his authorities and so given means of control.

To mention other errors would be but a roll of trivial and superfluous. Still there is another lead not to be passed by without mentioning that Nohl, when he comments can, he made it not one few words, is accustomed to place them in [ ] in the text, and thus before it. It is inconceivable how he could bring himself to thus continually interrupt the "electric current," and cause us, in the midst of the best expressions made by Beethoven's words, to stumble over his own.

Herr Nohl has attempted to arrange the letters in chronological order. These having dates arrange themselves of course. As to those which are without them, he sometimes hit the mark pretty well; in other cases, all is caprice and uncertainty; not to be avoided especially as regards the numerous notelets, whose contents afford not the slightest clue to a date. Thus the letters to Collin (46), Gleichenstein (48), Hammer-Purgstall (59) and others, have received their present positions, either quite without reason or at best by the vaguest guess. Moreover how is it possible that two letters to Ries should fall upon the same date, (Sept. 5 1813), he has omitted to explain.

Such confusion having been unavoidable, no chronological order should have been attempted; the letters were much better arranged in groups according to persons, in which case Beethoven's relations to individuals would have been more readily understood.

The three divisions of the book into "Life's Joy and Sorrow" (1783-1815), "Life's Task" (1815-1823), "Life's Toil and End" (1823-1827) are equally preposterous and ridiculous. Whoever knows Beethoven's life knows that its task did not begin in 1815, and that 1815 forms no distinct era in it.

Another external annoyance is that the letters are not uniformly superscribed, for which no reason appears but the haste of the editor.

Not a word is needed to show how far the faults, here criticised are from being a recommendation to a man employed upon a biography of Beethoven.

A table of names and contents is added to the collection, apparently to aid in reference,—but this table is not quite so essential as it seems at first sight. The names take almost imperceptibly the forms of short biographies, not imparting anything new but giving the old as the characteristic Nohl-coloring. For instance, Carl Holz is called "a rather [illegible] Vienna character (Zeisel), who with his light views of life sometimes even [illegible] and controlled the severe Beethoven." (?!) And Marx receives from him this eulogy, "that he up to the present day remains the most pregnant representative in our art."

* In this letter, moreover, instead of "in den Jahr," which makes no sense, it must be, according to the original, "in den Wende."

Perhaps this last Nohl-production has engaged us too long; but it was necessary to show that [illegible] the fact is, that all the carelessness which characterized him in the biography of Beethoven, comes before us again in this collection of letters. If Herr [illegible] Nohl goes on making books [illegible] the [illegible] he may perhaps [illegible] upon children and the ignorant, but the higher [illegible] will not be able to take further [illegible] of him.

The Handel Triennial Festival.

(From the London Times.)

[illegible]

The Handel Festival commenced worthily on Monday at two o'clock, with a truly magnificent performance of the magnificent Messiah. If the first day of so great [illegible], now triennial, [illegible] "the glorious Handel," is to be looked upon as the day of [illegible], no other work than the Messiah could [illegible] justly demand.

After an [illegible] and well-marked [illegible] Mr Costa [illegible] the National Anthem was performed [illegible] the vast [illegible] as were described [illegible] of the great [illegible]. The vast audience, considerably [illegible] of 10,000 [illegible] ing the [illegible] An [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and at [illegible] the [illegible] giving utterance to any of the [illegible] that need no frequently to disturb the satisfaction of all listeners to the performance.

Then began the masterpiece of masterpieces in sacred music—the grandest epic, although Handel's [illegible] language [illegible] develops [illegible] of [illegible]. This great oratorio the Messiah [illegible] has been familiar [illegible] of [illegible] on Monday may be taken [illegible]. By the Messiah can only be heard once in [illegible] years as it was heard on the present occasion; and indeed [illegible] never before heard. Nothing [illegible] of 1862, was the execution of the overture, with its grave and [illegible] introduction [illegible] vigorous fugal movement, [illegible] "He shall feed [illegible] Egypt [illegible] it was [illegible] on Monday. The "[illegible]" in the [illegible] orchestral [illegible] Comfort ye, my people, was delivered [illegible] Sims Reeves [illegible] of words and [illegible] interpreted by the [illegible] the recitative "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness." [illegible] gentleman's [illegible] with [illegible] of the first passages of "Every valley," the quiet movement [illegible] quoi [illegible] could be desired. The sudden appearance of the chorus [illegible] one of the striking points of the Messiah. [illegible] would hardly be possible to obtain a more effective [illegible] of "And the glory of the Lord" [illegible] three [illegible] from each other and yet so homogeneous when employed in combination. When the phrase, "All flesh shall see it," [illegible] the Lord hath spoken [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] any other [illegible] The whole [illegible] of [illegible] part. Mr Santley [illegible] with the recitative, "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts," followed by "But who may abide the day of His coming?" which—according to Handel's own [illegible] a [illegible] which [illegible] bass voice. [illegible] by Mme Sainton. "[illegible] [illegible] of the Lord," the admirably-worked fugal chorus that succeeds, [illegible] the [illegible] counterpoint to the [illegible] by the multitude of voices, and the next piece—the prophecy of the Messiah's advent—[illegible] with the recitative, "Behold a virgin shall conceive," followed by the exultant and melodious air, "O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion" [illegible] sung [illegible] Mme. Sainton's [illegible] by the same words, in full chorus, was as effective as usual. Here, as in the recitative and air that follow, "For behold, darkness," and "The people that walked in darkness," [illegible] which could not [illegible] of the [illegible] in the [illegible] of the [illegible] worked. This prophecy of darkness and the sequel [illegible] rise [illegible] Egypt [illegible] Messiah. The picturesque [illegible] chorus. For unto us a Child is born [illegible] of the prophecy of [illegible] a word [illegible] Wonderful" [illegible] his own [illegible] demanded. Mr Costa however (and we think [illegible] was [illegible] and thus a good part of the "Pastoral Symphony" was heard [illegible] What was heard nevertheless, of [illegible] orchestral [illegible] was thoroughly enjoyed. The [illegible] from the [illegible] and the old story of King George declaring that [illegible] the performance of this movement he could imagine "he saw the [illegible] did not seem so [illegible] But [illegible] "Pastoral Symphony," with an ordinary orchestra [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] in England.

The pastoral scene that ensues, which commences the [illegible] of the oratorio and [illegible] could hardly have been given better. All the recitatives of the angel who announces the [illegible] "There were shepherds," [illegible] were [illegible] by Mlle. Tietjens. [illegible] "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion," [illegible] adapt it the [illegible] style of Handel—who, had he [illegible] beyond [illegible] than he actually was. The [illegible] chorus of angels, "Glory to God" [illegible] device with [illegible] movement [illegible] The passage. And peace on earth [illegible] example of [illegible] by an energetic and [illegible] Mr Costa, he brought [illegible] We have heard [illegible] Equally good was the [illegible] orchestral [illegible] a Handel [illegible] the beams of angelic [illegible] the "Alleluia" [illegible] accompanying air "He shall feed His flock," of which, according to the [illegible] "Come unto Him" [illegible] the whole being [illegible] [illegible] "He shall [illegible]" [illegible] (Mme. Sainton and Mlle. Tietjens), and the [illegible] and [illegible] of the superiority of Handel's original design [illegible] movement with [illegible] The [illegible] chorus "His yoke is easy, and His burden is light," [illegible] brought the first part [illegible] to a close with admirable effect.

At the [illegible] there was an [illegible] between [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] which appeared to [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] to look back upon what had passed, and look forward to what was to come. We cannot but think that the plan adopted this year is preferable to the other. Upwards of three hours of serious music, [illegible] the [illegible] The result was that the second part of the Messiah, including the grand and [illegible] of the Passion, was more [illegible] enjoyed and thoroughly appreciated than could otherwise possibly have been the case. If this section of the oratorio [illegible] the sublimest of all music, it is certainly the sublimest in the Messiah. The slow and measured phrases of "Behold the Lamb of God," the deep feeling of "He was despised and rejected of men," [illegible] [illegible] here [illegible] And with [illegible] "All we like sheep have gone astray," and [illegible] And the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of [illegible] produced an impression not to be forgotten. [illegible] could hardly [illegible] [illegible] of the most [illegible] of the [illegible] Handel's choral [illegible] [illegible] of performers. Instead of [illegible] the [illegible] which [illegible] the [illegible] Mr Costa [illegible] [illegible] This is [illegible] [illegible] chorus and orchestra of some 4,000 to keep in check.

The rest of Part II. was for the most part beyond criticism. Has Mr Sims Reeves declaimed the affecting recitative and air [illegible] upon him in the [illegible] of the Messiah our readers need not be told. From "Thy rebuke hath broken his heart" to "But thou didst not leave His soul in Hell" [illegible] which [illegible] The [illegible] chorus "Lift up your heads." [illegible] the King of Glory [illegible] and [illegible] Handel [illegible] of the most elaborate devices of counterpoint [illegible] How beautifully [illegible] Mme. Rudersdorff and [illegible] accompanied on the [illegible] by Mr. [illegible] the [illegible] "Why do the nations so furiously rage together?"—to execute the [illegible] passages in which with more fluency and [illegible] than Mr Santley would be impossible. [illegible] Mr Costa's [illegible] "Let us break their bonds asunder" [illegible] [illegible] than before [illegible] the other [illegible] [illegible] "Hallelujah." The effect of [illegible] with such an orchestra to accompany [illegible] and such a conductor to keep them all together, is beyond description. Loud, unanimous and prolonged were the applause that followed this really wonderful display.

There remains little to add. The third part of the Messiah [illegible] of consolation "I know that my Redeemer liveth," [illegible] sung by Mlle. Tietjens, [illegible] "Worthy is the Lamb," which [illegible] "Amen" [illegible] [illegible] from the second part of the Messiah at the Handel Festival performances, but more are omitted from its third part. And those selections, however [illegible] "The Lord gave the word, and great was the company of the preachers" [illegible] the [illegible] with chorus [illegible] Mme. [illegible] Sainton, [illegible] "The trumpet shall sound" given [illegible] by Mr T. Harper on the trumpet [illegible]

[illegible] and the glorious final chorus we have [illegible]. "Hallelujah," as we have never heard [illegible] the third part of the Messiah sufficiently interesting and [illegible] a performance of a great work unparalleled in our experience.

The following were the numbers present:—Admission on payment, 11,930; [illegible] tickets, 7,392; total [illegible], 19,317.

SECOND DAY, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 17

At two o'clock precisely, that most sight of [illegible] and pageant of [illegible], Mr. Costa, made his appearance in the orchestra [illegible]. Then the performance began with the [illegible] commencing with the chorus, [illegible] a condensed epitome of [illegible] with the [illegible]. Mr. Lemmens Sherrington was [illegible] the trio [illegible] "Wretched Lovers" [illegible] (Acis and Galatea) [illegible] Handel. [illegible]

[illegible] "Hallelujah" [illegible] Handel [illegible] chorus [illegible]

[illegible] The appearance of Mlle. Nilsson was the signal for a general [illegible] the Messiah [illegible] Judas Maccabæus [illegible] Mlle. Nilsson [illegible] Mr. Sims Reeves [illegible] Judas Maccabæus [illegible] Her Majesty's [illegible] "Waft her, angels" (from Jephthah) [illegible] Mr. Sims Reeves [illegible] the lovely [illegible] from Theodora [illegible] Madame [illegible] the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn, as arranged in the interesting "Recitals" of Mme. Arabella Goddard; and the [illegible] English orchestra.

The second part was "inaugurated" with a [illegible] performance of the overture to the "Occasional Oratorio." To this succeeded the so-called "Nightingale Chorus," from Solomon, the delicate execution of which was beyond praise. Nothing could be more delightful than the melodious phrase —

[illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Costa [illegible] Mme. Rudersdorff [illegible] Mlle. Tietjens [illegible] Mr. Santley [illegible] Samson [illegible] Mlle. Nilsson [illegible] Mme. Sainton-Dolby [illegible] Mr. Sims Reeves [illegible] Mlle. Tietjens [illegible] Judas Maccabæus [illegible] "Sound an alarm" [illegible] Handel [illegible] Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Carola, and Mme. Sainton and the whole [illegible] fairly performed.

THIRD DAY, JUNE 19

The third and last performance was decidedly the best of all. The Israel in Egypt has, from [illegible] commencement, been the day of the Handel Festival, and so it proved on the occasion under review. The weather was splendid, the crowd was enormous, and the performance was unparalleled in our remembrance. [illegible]

The oratorio was preceded by the [illegible] to the Occasional Oratorio [illegible]

[illegible] Grand as was the performance of the Messiah on Monday that of Israel in Egypt yesterday was grander [illegible] Mr. Costa [illegible] the Festival [illegible] "Now there arose a new King over Egypt" [illegible] Mr. Cummings [illegible] Israel [illegible] Handel [illegible] Exodus [illegible]

the passage, in the fugued style, "He brought them out with silver and gold"—in which it has, not altogether unnaturally, been remarked that "one might almost see the precious metals glitter and hear them clink;" and, last and perhaps finest, the sublime [illegible] "not one feeble person" so [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. All this was admirable; but most especially to be praised was the [illegible] [illegible] piece, whatever the [illegible] [illegible] phrase, "He led them forth like sheep," comes. Bringing the [illegible] and [illegible] rigid fugal chorus, "Egypt was glad when they departed," a somewhat [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], even grander and more impressive than what has gone before. We need scarcely name the [illegible] [illegible] "He rebuked the Red Sea" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of thunder [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ("pianissimo"). And it was freed [illegible] "He led them through the deep" and "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies." The [illegible] and steady theme of "He led them through the deep," given out [illegible] [illegible] one of the most striking in Exodus, is graphically suggestive of the [illegible] from passage of the [illegible] people through the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the wonderful power [illegible] [illegible] repeatedly and repeatedly [illegible] one of the enemy is left; and [illegible] the story of their annihilation [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] And the people feared the Lord and believed the Lord [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], which [illegible] [illegible] the first part of Israel in Egypt, was worthy of the [illegible]. [illegible]

The second part, the Song of Moses (written [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Handel's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than Exodus itself. Here the [illegible] in Exodus [illegible] [illegible] described, are referred to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] song and praise. The choruses belonging to the Song of Moses are far more complex and elaborate than the choruses in the opening section of the oratorio. [illegible] from first to last—from "Moses and the children of Israel sang this song unto the Lord," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], to "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] splendid episode "The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea,"—they were as admirably given as any of those already commented [illegible]. Two of the most difficult among them, the [illegible] [illegible] as short as the [illegible] [illegible] "And with the blast of Thy nostrils the waters were gathered together," and "The people shall hear and be afraid"—were sung with as much precision and unusual delicate observance of "light and shade" as if they had been the [illegible] [illegible] of the most intricate of them [illegible]. There are [illegible] many years [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] to the performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society in Exeter Hall, but now we heard them [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of perfection from a chorus [illegible] by the [illegible] instead of [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Handel's choruses [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in London, but in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the improvement [illegible] [illegible] singing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] England—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the influence of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and [illegible] [illegible] the Sacred Harmonic Society [illegible] [illegible] the Handel Festivals. The only [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] second part where the slightest [illegible] was detected, and where Mr. Costa's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the very [illegible] of [illegible]. And with the blast of Thy nostrils" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], "And the floods stood upright as an heap," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], "And the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Here an [illegible] tendency [illegible] [illegible] was immediately corrected [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible] possessed by Mr. Costa would be [illegible] valuable [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the world of [illegible] [illegible] at large. Among other remarkable [illegible] [illegible] of choral power and precision in the Song of Moses must be named the [illegible] double chorus, "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power," and that most characteristic piece of "word painting," among all the legend choruses, "Thou [illegible] [illegible] Thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble"—the last of which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But to [illegible] the choruses, which in Israel [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to forget other parts of the oratorio [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] chorus, "The horse and his rider"—the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible].

The [illegible] [illegible] duets of Israel in Egypt, though [illegible] [illegible] one of them is excellent, are overshadowed by the colossal proportions of the choruses. About the [illegible] there is of "solo" in the first part we have spoken. In the second a great deal more occurs. The three duets were all well sung—"The Lord is my strength," by Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Rudersdorff; "The Lord is a man of war," by Mdme. Sainton and Signor Foli [illegible] [illegible], in accordance with a long-prevailing [illegible], and "Thou in Thy mercy," by Madame Sainton-Dolby and Mr. Cummings—whose [illegible], by the way, during the Festival [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] recognition. The first of these [illegible] is [illegible], the second animated, warlike, and declamatory, the third graceful and [illegible] devotional. Each in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of emotional expression [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] had a [illegible]. The two airs, "Thou didst blow with Thy wind" for soprano and "Thou shalt bring them in," for contralto, were [illegible] assigned to Mdlle. Tietjens and Madame Sainton-Dolby. The first, which in addition to its [illegible] beauty, is remarkable for one of the most [illegible] [illegible] of Handel's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a "ground bass," was [illegible] [illegible] by Mdlle. Tietjens, the second with true Handelian expression by Madame Sainton, one of the most experienced of Handel's singers. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Festival [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Sims Reeves has made his own, and which to say after him would be an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Mr. Reeves more magnificently than on any previous occasion [illegible]. Every phrase had as well as [illegible] from every part of the building to which the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the orchestra [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To resist the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was impossible, and Mr. Reeves [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with the same power and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. A more marked [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Reeves [illegible] [illegible], according to Edmund Kean [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Edmund Kean.

At the end of the oratorio, as at previous commemorations, the National Anthem was given, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Then there was a loud and universal cry of "Costa," to which the indefatigable conductor of the Handel Festival responded by repeated bows, during [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that seemed as though it would never cease. Mr. Bowley, too, the [illegible] general manager of the Crystal Palace, to whom the organization of these [illegible] [illegible] is principally due, was loudly called for, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to be made no appearance.

The numbers were—Admission by season tickets, 12,[illegible]; on payment, 6,[illegible]; total visitors, [illegible].

The Footsteps of Song.

BY JULIA WARD HOWE.

(Poem permitted to print the following Poem, written by request for the closing Summer Concert of the New England Conservatory of Music, and read by the author in the Boston Music Hall, on Monday evening, July 1, 1868.)

If you will walk with me, I'll lead you far away

From the limits of our Music Hall, the aspects of to-day;

We'll close this glittering door of life, and in dark memory seek

The childhood of the art we praise, the infancy of man.

Nor rails should be [illegible] [illegible]; the faith [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] here

Follows beloved footsteps from the cradle to the grave;

And he who was with manhood's grief the blessings we enjoy,

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] hailed Him a [illegible] in many a palace fair,

His mother in the [illegible] proud [illegible] [illegible] her [illegible] care;

And they whose wonder gifts [illegible] Prince nor Prelate thinks to scorn,

Left [illegible] the altar and the throne the babe in manger born.

I have no pencil heaven-imbued, to paint a theme so great,

Nor ask our Goddess [illegible] be throned in such transcendent state

So I with humble instrument may praise her varied power

Who lifts the marble palace, who thrills the leafy bower.

"When Music, heavenly maid, was young." Sure that was long ago.

But was she ever young or old, like humankind, I trow?

The world, that out of chaos came from childhood grown to age—

Scarcely with the stars she [illegible], and turns the [illegible] [illegible] page.

She was not seen, she was not heard till man, with purpose shod,

Of need and beneficiency received her golden gift.

The state was wrought with bars of song, the temple and the throne;

The virtues first of concern came, then nature was her own.

She [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] toys,

The lyre [illegible] simple twanging made, the pipe their feeble noise,

The Harps of the mountain cave, the Dryads of the grove

She help did make intelligent. She taught the speech of love.

Grief rang his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and soothed himself to rest,

The dignity of utterance made [illegible] [illegible] blest;

Man withers not to speechless pain, [illegible] like the beasts,

But [illegible] [illegible] own indignant cause, 'gainst Nature dread and [illegible].

Old legends keep the name of one so [illegible] and so deep,

That rocks and trees obeyed his call, and felt his master sweep.

Fair fable of surpassing power we [illegible] [illegible] and fate,

Thus, waking Music's magic spell we met [illegible].

[illegible] the stately theatres unfold their marble round!

Upon the rocks of Cheeronea the Titan struggles bound

Unmastered [illegible] or sky he falters not for pain,

But keeps the purpose that [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] chain.

The bird that by the seat of Jove doth plume his haughty wing,

[illegible] [illegible] of the life he [illegible] [illegible], the [illegible] suffering

The God, whom[illegible] this a pang his magic could not cure,
Is conquered by the mortal a power the a [illegible] that can subdue.

The graceful classic histories present their lessons fair
False Phaedra forms love heart that spurns her guilty power
Orestes with his dark motor see, and Jason's crafty [illegible]
Contrives the poisoned wedding gifts that steal her rival's life.

Beneath the cloudless heavens of Greece, how fair that noble stage,
The poet's shining characters a poem a sapphire page!
Like stars, that on God's highway move by mystical course,
These glowing forms of passion mark the orbit of the soul

Close winding in the orchestra, the danced chorus [illegible]
With the unfolding argument the act accompany
The chorus sings its rhythmic rest, a [illegible] a [illegible] profane blunde
And when the need grows imminent, the God himself descends.

Another hand doth beckon me; beside his father's sheep
A stripling tunes his minor harp, his tuneful watch doth keep.
No skill of sword or shield has he, but they unknowing
Lends him the spirit wings that win the heights of victory

The psalm that glorifies the ages divinely deep and true,
He descend from that heritage vast, whose story [illegible]
A champion blest, a monarch crowned, the later [illegible]
The conquest of the king that could find a [illegible] [illegible]

Oh! many a weary pilgrimage that falls on [illegible]
Comes [illegible] by that master faith, that [illegible] [illegible] mind.
By Jordan's river low we sit, and [illegible]
And darkness grows a line of light, and God delivers all

From those low cradles of our race, whose infant need and cry
Found answer in the mother's voice, the loving lullaby
To answer mankind we move [illegible], a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
Where on the sweet [illegible] [illegible] Rome [illegible] her [illegible] [illegible].

Illustrious twins the she-wolf nursed, great [illegible] power and law
On Tiber's shore she stood at bay and held the world at sway;
While from those piers a born Jordan [illegible] and Rameses held her rule,
A band of civic glories [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] school

For them [illegible] the [illegible] tale, the trumpet of command
The tribute upon the fearless breast, the spear in [illegible] hand
Nor [illegible] they the softer tones that soothe the [illegible] strife,
What Virgil sung the end of Troy, and Horace, love and life

"I build of me a monument, more permanent than brass,
A pyramid above the height of [illegible] that pass
The [illegible] rain shall mar it not, the wind with powerless spite"

Shall turn his fury otherwise, and curb his vanquished in [illegible].

"The wrecks of the years, the flight of time I shall not fear
Of whom not every thing shall pass the funeral [illegible] [illegible]
My [illegible] shall grow in regions far the days as long [illegible]
As priest and a [illegible] virgin climb the [illegible] shrine of Rome."

Again I bid you pause and look where, in a chamber dim
The Muse breaks the bread of [illegible], and sings the parting hymn.
"Remember me." We hear him still, and [illegible] as I [illegible] breath
The record of his tenderness, in living and in death

Far as the Roman catacombs deep winding in the earth
The echo of that music [illegible], low voiced as its birth;
"[illegible]," they [illegible], where hidden [illegible] waits
To weave the web of circumstance, and mould the form of [illegible]

The throne of Jove is overthrown. His eagle [illegible] the sky
Where burns a brighter messenger, a light that will not die.
[illegible] rude the monarch at the [illegible], her chief and [illegible] fell down
Before the pledge of victory, the cross above the crown.

The conquests has its [illegible] and [illegible] for peace and [illegible] [illegible]
As [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible], as billows [illegible] and surge.
The glowing empire of the East [illegible] be broken line
And scattered as the trampling hoofs the pearls of Palestine

For Nature, in rude [illegible] [illegible], maintains her lordly way
Against pale arts of luxury and law's despotic sway;
And Jove's affairs [illegible] [illegible] more the Christian's earnest dream Profound and pleasured, like the groves of Plato's Academe.

And after that [illegible] light, that Pentecostal flame
The darkness of the Gods [illegible] on all the nations came.
For Pan was dead, and Jove [illegible], whose truth in [illegible]
Rough [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] had [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible].

Then slowly man to [illegible] at star to star on high,
And [illegible] and [illegible] turned a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
While fiery Gaul and fanciful Spain yet bore the Roman yoke
Lo! from his dim [illegible] into the distant Briton spoke.

From South to North, from East to West, the waves [illegible] [illegible]
That bore the circling sympathy of human good and [illegible]
The harmonies that gathered there no further silence [illegible]
As [illegible] a [illegible] with [illegible] that thrills [illegible] [illegible] through.

Song came, and carried sorrow back. With [illegible] upon the heavens,
The grim Crusaders took their way [illegible] and dreaded [illegible].

"Restore the sacred tomb of Christ," demands their battle cry
"We gladly yield our blood for him, who for our weal did die."

The [illegible] commerce swelled and sank far out with mortal power
The kingdom [illegible] a [illegible] silent growth o'ertakes the sleeping hour;
The sceptre [illegible] they retained, the crown doth still belong
To those whose deeds of bravery survive in Tasso's song.

But music two-fold measure has, the platform and the square,
And all [illegible] mysteries her moulding [illegible] [illegible]
Now [illegible] the mighty [illegible] up, as [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible],
In [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the soul a prophetic fire.

Of those grand days the voice and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] wholly lost,
We read the purpose in the stone, the [illegible] and embossed,
In [illegible] book and in [illegible] in pageant old and [illegible],
In [illegible] lighting [illegible] [illegible], with [illegible] and [illegible].

But Faith grew feeble in her cage and shivered, near to die,
While [illegible] [illegible] to ope the door and for the captive fly
Till one clear voice from [illegible] [illegible], from [illegible] and vesper [illegible]
"A Saviour is not [illegible]," it sang, "In freedom [illegible] [illegible]."

"This form is but the picture of the truth a [illegible] the heart,
The [illegible] of canons give us not the miracles of art
Trust we the inner thought, revealed in [illegible] and in rhyme,
And build no prison to [illegible] the prophecies of time."

I follow now a sailor's song, a [illegible] rudely trolled
Of courage for the new world's sake, [illegible] of the old;
The [illegible] walks the narrow deck, and [illegible] the boundless sea,
Seeking the [illegible] of the age, through [illegible] and [illegible]

And Music in his exile went forth, who travels every where
To consecrate the [illegible] land with order and with prayer;
Well pleased that new found realm she trod, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible],
And quenched her [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The [illegible] sends his minister, too, a band of [illegible] [illegible],
With all [illegible] broad [illegible] the work and worship [illegible]
Then from the Mayflower's deck [illegible] rise, to dawn and closing day
The [illegible] of the [illegible] that the Stuarts chased away

Not [illegible] did it [illegible] [illegible] the shrill and [illegible] [illegible]
Which [illegible] [illegible] fortitude they gave and patience [illegible]
That music held those [illegible] resolved and hung its silvery shield
Between the savage wilderness and the hearts that would not yield

Then Faith, the [illegible] of our day walked [illegible] the [illegible] wild
Under [illegible] from old [illegible] feet, and [illegible] and forms [illegible] [illegible].

Rocks into gracious shapes were wrought, and lofty trees laid low
Till in green ways the thrifty Age did journey to and fro.

Yet back to Europe like my song in certain tie-wigs good,
Crowned its immortal sons beyond the monarch of the land.
There Handel's ark of weighty sound the wondrous legend dreamed,
That fills our hearts at Christmas tide, from wrath and toil redeemed.

And Haydn wrought "on mighty pens" and earth, "with verdure clad,"
In him her blest interpreter her tuneful teacher had.
And he who stands in metal here,* with heavenly care and haste,
Filled high the costly cup of joy he gave and could not taste.

Oh friends! I meet you here to-day in precinct loved of all!
This is the home of our delight, our pleasant Music Hall.
Here rank on rank the singers rise, the well-tuned strings below
With reeds and fiery brasses blend to give the goods we know.

And churches bristle thro' the land and chambers of debate,
And halls where sleepy judges sit, and ministers of state;
And banks where golden treasures hide while paper flies about,
No matter how it severally, it never can get out.

But this shall be our temple, where'er a heathen tribe
Of willing hands and loving hearts in melody shall vote;
The paper that is gathered here, in golden song we come
And all our strivings end in peace, for which all Nations yearn.

For we have had our discords when the dominant abroad
Controlled our modulations kept so mounded and cowed
Until a certain saucy tune one drum and fife did play
And "Yankee Doodle" went to town, and Bull, he went away.

Then grew this untaught symphony, mov'd from shore to shore
It grasped the steam engine, and the mediums' tours
The mountain passes thrill'd it out, the wide unwatered plains,
The fiery sod grew merciful and yielded golden grain.

It grew until its very growth new shapes and colors strike,
Till, armored with Batteries and with dreams, the band of friendship broke;
And battle cry in peace changed, and peace changed in battle,
Before the shriek of agony that marked unhappy Lincoln's fall.

The bow that bore the tempest springs, but serves those rays,
Whose numbers make the notes that range in His hymn of praise.
No storm that must be borne high, in wild Titanic sound
But yields to that fair messenger that harbinger of good.

The seven voices are lent to us for wide and weighty themes,
To follow hidden meanings out in maps with mystic dreams.
Though all Creation stand aghast at dissonance abhorred,
It knows the ever-failing hand that strikes the master chord.

That hand doth loose terrible powers that agonize and writhe,
That hand upon the bow of peace its prophecy doth write
That hand maintains in argument its heaving cord in sighs,
It bears the crown of harmony, the ... of light.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 15, 1865.

The Catholicity of Music.

Music is religious and prophetic. She is the real Sibyl chanting a romance of unity. Over wild, a sad ocean of discord, floats her silvery voice, the harbinger of love and hope. Every genuine strain of music is a secret prayer on faith, rapport demand to be allied a th all of the Heart of all things. Her appeal to the world is something that the world can yet appreciate. Kings and statesmen and men of affairs, and men of theories, would stand aside from their vain over-rated occupations to listen to her voice, if they knew how nearly it concerned them, how much more it goes to the bottom of the matter, and how clearly she foretells to man the great destiny. The soul that merely escapes us of music learns angelic wisdom and grows more child-like with experience. The sort of experience which music gives does not plough cunning furrows in the brow of the flesh and not darken its expressive face by knitting there the tangled Tree of Satan. Here, the most deeply so tried are in spirit the most youthful, and Hope delights to wait on them.

The sentiment of unity strongest and deepest sentiment in man, the great affection into which all his affections flow—is God, not less themselves what looks to the Source whence little wants conflict and struggles, they are reconciled as creation under the glory of the whole which lifts man above the thought of self by making him in every sense fully himself, by refining his primeval party-colored passions into one which is as clear and universal as the light; the sentiment which seeks only universal harmony and order so that all things, whether of the inner or of the outer world, may be perfectly transparent to the love in which they have their being; and that the sole condition of all peace and happiness, the consciousness of one in all and all in one, may never more be wanting,—that is what the common sense of mankind means by the religious sentiment,—that is the pure essence of religion. Music is its natural language, the chief vehicle of its message, the one which cannot lose its sacredness; for music cannot cease to be harmony, cannot cease to symbolize the sacred relationship of each to all, cannot consecrate to any more than the sunbeam which shines on all creatures. Music cannot narrow or cloak the message which it bears; it cannot limit it to sectarian questions in the creed, or muddle any other than a pure enthusiasm. It is God's alphabet, and not man's, unalterable and unperverted; suited for the harmony of the human passions and affections; and sent us, in this their long winter of disharmony and strife, to be a perpetual type and reminder, rather say an actual foretaste, of that harmony which must yet come. How could there be religion without music? That sentiment would create it again, would evoke its elements out of the completest jargle of discords, if the scale and the accords, and all the use of instruments, were forgotten. Let that feeling deepen at any nation, and church its individual ambitions, and we shall have our music greater than the world has known.

There was an age of faith, though the doctrinal statements and the forms thereof were narrow. But however fixed the spirit which the forms expressed. Music above all, woke to celestial power and beauty in the bosom of a believing though an ignorant age. The Catholic church did not neglect this great secret of expression and of influence; and the beautiful handservant served it at a larger spirit than itself had dreamed of. When it could not teach the Bible, whose narrow formal interpretations thereof were perhaps little better than stones for bread, it could bring the spirit of the Bible and of all love and sanctity into the most ignorant and thoughtless words types through Sublime Masses, at once so joyous and so solemn, so ennobling and so exalting, so full of tenderness, so full of rapture uncontrollable, so confident and so devout. In these, the hearer did for the time being, actually live in a celestial state. The mystery of the cross and the atonement, the glorious doctrines of the kingdom of heaven, were not reasoned out to his understanding, but passed through his very soul like an experience in these all-pervading floods of sound; and as the religion became so less an emotion, a faith could not so easily become a thought, which had better not become such thought as the conventional teachers of the outside church would give him. The words of the Credo never yet went home with all minds; but their general tenor is universal, and music is altogether so. Music extracts and embodies only the spirit of the doctrine, that sweet life of pure love all feel and sometimes surrender, and transfigures the cold statements of the understanding with the warm faith of feeling. It unites there is no controversy. In music, there are no opaque, its springs are deeper than the foundations of any of these partition walls, and its breath floats undivided over all the enclosures. Less danger to the Catholic whose head is clouded by dull superstitions, so long as his heart is nourished and united with the life of all lives by this refreshing dew!

The growing disposition, here and there, among select musical circles, to cultivate acquaintance with the forms of music, is a good sign. What has been called sacred music in this country has been the least sacred in everything but the name, and the forced reverence paid to it. With the superstitions of the past, the soul of rapture also was suppressed; and the free spirit of music found small sphere and no local peculiarage. A joyless religion of the ... almost merely which could know God faith with the age's thinking, closed every pore of the self-controlled and famous soul age out the subtle, unceasing around of this most eloquent apostle of God. The sublime sincerity of that wintry energy of self-denial having for the most part passed away, and the hearts of the descendants of the Pilgrims having become opened to all worldly influences, why should they not be also visited by the heavenly converting of holy and enchanting music, which is sure to call forth and to nourish germs of loftier affection. Can the better spirit of sectarianism, can the formal preachings of a worldly church which strives to keep religion as distinct from life, ever the influence so draw this great city of trade, give the soul such nourishment and such connection of the higher life as the great religious music of Bach and Handel Mozart and Haydn and Beethoven? The pomp and pageantry of the Mass we have not. But the spiritual essence here in the music itself! and a mere quartet of voices, a social friendly group, bound alike by moral and by musical sympathies, may drink it in inspiration, may pour it out on others. The songs and operas of the day which take the multitude, become insipid in comparison with such music.

In music of this kind, there is somewhat that is peculiar in the individuality of the composer; but there is more that is universal, true to the inmost meaning of all hearts. Every sentiment, if it be deep enough, becomes religious; for every sentiment seeks a and tends to unity, to harmony, to recognize of the one in all. And a very sentiment in music is expressed in its purity, and carried up as it were to the blending point of all the emotions in one, which is the radical Sweet and feeling of the soul, its passion to be one with God.

The church afforded to genius that sphere for its highest and holiest ambition, which it found not elsewhere. The Masses of Haydn are more numerous, and some of them elaborate great efforts, than those of Mozart, many of whose Masses were composed at so early an age; and his genius steadily leans from towards that sphere of music, in which he was destined to reign supreme,—the opera. But, though in Haydn we must grant the very perfection of artistic skill and grace, a warm and childlike piety and a spirit of the purest joy; and though at times he has surpassing tenderness; still there is an indescribable atmosphere as of inspiration, a gushing forth as of the very sacrament, heart-like blood in Mozart's religious music, which affects us, even when it is simpler than Haydn's, with more power. Religion takes in Haydn more the form of gratitude and joy. The common failure of a Miserere or a Crucifixus of his is a passive mood, where the subject calls for it rather than a permanent and inherent quality in the whole music of his own being. Himself seemed at once to be a certain domestic grateful sense of life, a whole the clearest order and the sweetest kindliness and thankfulness for ever reign. In Mozart the ground tone is love, the very ecstasy and sadness and bliss of the re-union of souls long separated, at once romantic and platonic, serene, and yet exalting the senses to a most spiritual intensity. In him we have what is nearest to the naked soul of music,—its most ethereal, transparent, thrilling body. One would scarce suppose, that the soul of Mozart ever inhabited any other body than those melodies and harmonies in which it dwells for us. Something of a personal love, however, which is humanly religious of course. It is the worship of the Holy Virgin; the music of that phase of the religious sentiment, which Swedenborg might call conjugal love.

To Beethoven's two Masses, especially the great one in D, it seems most natural to add the term solemn; for, with him, all is a great effort. It is the very sentiment of the man,—aspiration, boundless yearning to embrace the Infinite. With him the very discontent of the soul becomes sublime, and opens sublime visions, which are like a flying horizon of ever near, yet unattainable order and beauty. In the unfathomableness of the heart's cravings he finds revelations; and out of those depths, with gloomy grandeur with fire now smothered and now breaking out, and always with a rapt impetuosity, the melody of his nature springs, carrying like a dance to heaven.

Then, too, besides this captivating music of the Catholic church, we should think of the plain Choral, the music of the musical reformers, in simple solemn solid sea strains, presenting themselves as one before the Lord. From one modern psalm, so commonplace and artificial as it often is, satisfying scarcely more than the great natural conditions of a musical proportion has wholeness an unsurpassable grandeur. Where thousands sing the same slow melody, the mighty waves of sound seem to make in the air their own accompaniment; and the effect is that of harmony. On this broad popular basis, Bach and Handel built. Both expressed the deep, intense soul and spirituality of Protestantism, the religion of personal experience is more his theme. Handel, too, is Protestant, the people's music, in essence. In him the great sentiment of a common humanity found expression. The individual vanishes: it is the mighty music of humanity; his theme, the one deep theme, and properly the burden of all music, humanity's looking-for and welcome of its Messiah. What a prediction and foreshadowing of the future harmony and unity of the whole race is that great Oratorio! What are those choruses, those hallelujahs and amens, but the solemn ecstasy, the calm because universal and all-sympathizing everywhere sustained excitement which all souls shall feel, when all shall feel their unity with all individually and with all in God.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.—We have wished in our paper to contain the fullest and most appreciative record we could find of this colossal affair, and we believe the report we copy from the London Times will be perused with interest in spite of its great length. At the same time we take the liberty of printing the following extract from a purely private letter (dated London, June 11, a day after the Festival), which we have received from a well known member of our musical world.

"The great Handel Festival is over, and I ought to say to you a little about it. A little, for it was one of those grand things however undertaken, which are attempts of such a work as not to be most truly felt as describe. By this I do not mean that the performances were perfect, nor indeed. I would merely refer to the colossal, impressive mass of sound. The choruses often moved with a great deal of uncertainty and unsteadiness for more than eleven or twenty-four bars; a way of them was very rare. It might have gone a great deal better; and I think it could have done better, for the material was there.

The different parts of the immense choir were splendidly represented, and might seemed to call which seems a great deal. If you remember the case, that that took part, only it's a of 800 voices on each part, making 4000 in all, and a band which had 161 first Violins, 96 second Violins, 70 Tenors, 66 Cellos and 63 Double Basses, but I'm sure all could hardly not have been done, &c., &c. The effect of sound was at times overpowering, with one great defect, however, viz.: whenever the four parts of the Chorus sang together in a pp, or even p, there was not a single sound to be heard either from the violins, tenors or violoncellos. Brass, trombones, trumpets and drums were blown, and overwhelmed all but the Chorus, which sounded, as I said before, overpoweringly grand at times. The three concerts (and the preceding rehearsal) have been attended by 80,000 people altogether.

"Amongst a great many operas and concerts that I have heard during the short time here, there are two representations that I shall always think of with great delight. The first is the opera of 'Médée' by Cherubini, a most beautiful work, and splendidly given by all the cast, particularly by Titiens and Santley. The second was a 'Piano-Recital' by Hallé, of which I enclose the programme.

Impromptu, in B flat, Op. 142, No. 3	Schubert.
Variations in F, No. 32	Beethoven.
Song
Fantasie Sonata, in G, Op. 78	Schubert.
Impromptu, in E, Op. 90, No. 2	Schubert.
Sonata, in C minor, Op. 111	Beethoven.
Song
Impromptu, in E flat, Op. 142, No. 2	Schubert.
Moment Musical, in F minor, Op. 94, No. 3	Schubert.
Rondo a Capriccio, in G, Op. 129	Beethoven.

"I will mention another concert, which was given to invited guests by the Queen, at Buckingham Palace, at which Adelina Patti, Christine Nilsson, Mongini, Santley, Reeves, Miss Edith Wynne, Mrs. Cummings took part, besides orchestra and chorus; and where I had the pleasure to be invited. The concert was finely, most beautifully performed, and best of all the parts assigned to Nilsson and Patti. And now you may laugh at my astonishment, when, in walking in at Drury Lane the other night to hear Médée, I met our friend Ch. C. Perkins in the corridor; he had just that evening arrived from Paris.

"The reception I have here is, from all sides the most hearty and cordial, which has made my stay very pleasant."

GERMANY. Richard Wagner's comic opera "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg" was performed for the first time on the 21st of June, in Munich. Herr Richard Pohl in the Leipzig Signale, pronounces it a complete success. As to its fabulously great length, he says "The first act, including the overture, lasted 1 hour and 17 minutes; the 2nd 58 minutes; the 3rd (which is divided by a lowering of the curtain) 2 hours and 23 minutes. So that the music of this lasts only (!!) 4 hours and 38 minutes, and the whole performance, counting pauses, 5 hours and 40 minutes. We have many grand operas," he says, "which last as long and many shorter ones which seem longer! — There is enough music in these Meistersinger to serve a richer composer, supposing him to have any such power of invention, for half a dozen operas. There is a richness of invention in this score, a wealth of outline, ornament, coloring, in short all sorts of detail work such as we find in no other opera of Wagner's, if we except Tristan, which is of course wholly different in style."

The performance was pronounced a masterpiece: an admirable orchestra conducted by Hans von Bülow; singers and actors of the first rank; an exquisite chorus, a model mise en scène, &c. The prominent parts were those of Herr Betz (as Hans Sachs), Nachbaur (Walther von Stolzing), Hölzel(?) (Beckmesser), Schlosser (David, apprentice to Sachs), Frl. Mallinger (Eva), and Fr. Diez (Magdalena). A long list is given of noted artists, theatre Intendants, capellmeisters, composers, journalists, from all parts of Europe, who were present at the performance. From Paris had its half dozen representatives, including Pasdeloup.—But we have yet to hear the soberer judgments.

A concert in aid of a Mendelssohn monument was given in the new Leipzig theatre on the 11th ult. The Overtures to Athalia and Meeresstille, and the Reformation Symphony (first time in Leipzig) were given under the direction of Julius Rietz from Dresden. Mme. Joachim sang Mendelssohn songs and Herr Joachim played the Mendelssohn Concerto and an Adagio by Spohr. The Octet, too, was played by such artists as Joachim, David, Röntgen, Grützmacher, &c.

Professor E. F. Richter of the Leipzig Conservatorium and organist in the Nicolai Church (author of the excellent "Manual of Harmony" translated by J. P. Morgan and published in New York) succeeds Hauptmann in Sebastian Bach's old place of Cantor at the Thomas-Schule.

Schumann's Faust music was recently performed in Basle, with the aid of Julius Stockhausen.

The same paper [illegible] the very curious programme offered by Mr. [illegible] for the benefit [illegible], last Saturday. First comes [illegible] opera "[illegible]" with the following characters: Blanche de Montaigne, Miss Fanny Fairfield; Hortense de Coylus, Miss Lizzie [illegible]; Count Merceillac, Mr. Amber Matthews; Baron Pompaduf, Mr. Gustavus F. Hall. Then we are to have Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony with dances and pantomimic [illegible] by Costa, performed by [illegible] in Palmer's [illegible] Ballet Troupe. Scene in the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]—Mlle. Sohlke and M. Van Hamme. As a [illegible] concert is offered. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony illustrated by the White Fawn Ballet Troupe [illegible] and gives fresh life to the theory of Wagner, that in the works of art of the future [illegible] ought to combine. Poor Wagner probably never dreamt that his idea would be first applied to one of the symphonies of Beethoven, just as the master surely never imagined that his lovely musical tone-pictures of rural life would [illegible] from the theme of modern legs-opera."

The Athenæum thus remarks on Mlle. Schneider's personation of the Grand Duchess:

One daily paper has not hesitated to affirm that Mlle. Schneider's Grand Duchess is quite as [illegible] in its way as the Othello of Kean. We may assure that this opinion was entertained by a majority of the members of a crowd and distinguished house who thronged the theatre on the 10th of June. Not even when [illegible] by names the most powerful [illegible] of our generation, [illegible] the stage with half right [illegible], was St. James's Theatre honored by so many of the "[illegible] of [illegible]." And what was the attraction? A lady, whose vocal qualities consist of a very small voice which she has apparently never learnt to use; who, as an actress, depends chiefly for effect upon looks and gestures, and who, as to her appearance, might be described [illegible] as being "fat, fair and forty." Mlle. Schneider has the inestimable merit of being always thoroughly in earnest [illegible] attaining success on the stage, and she has the still more potent advantage of being unencumbered by any considerations of conscience. Thus, when she first comes on the stage, her admirers roar with laughter by the lady['s] [illegible] of [illegible], General Boum [illegible] with her whip. When she [illegible] her confidence with a wink [illegible] presses her sollow passion for Fritz, a [illegible] Mlle. Schneider shows great tact in her management of her slender vocal means in [illegible] passages, such as the romance [illegible] "Dites-lui qu'on l'a remarqué [illegible]," which passes [illegible] through the opera as though it were the [illegible] of a vulgar burlesque; but in the one [illegible] role in the work "Dites-lui" her [illegible] clearly in musical education [illegible] as compensation for the inability of the composer to express sentiment.

The Relation between Poetry and Music is well shown in the following extract from Hauptmann's "Die Natur der Harmonik und der Metrik," translated by John P. Morgan of New York.

It is certainly only half the [illegible] that an æsthetician has said that poetry in connection with music, seems to hold no other right except the right to be half each [illegible] [illegible] in contents and expression in most [illegible] this is to allow of musical representation. [illegible] offered as composed words in a music [illegible]. The contents of a discourse would however offer little for musical expression. The joy over familiar scenes in the former, and articles of food in the latter could no be sure, be expressed musically; but to emphasize the sense according to its verbal expression [illegible] is the [illegible] of music than it is the office of [illegible] to do the opposite. [illegible] in [illegible] to connection in the language of feeling what the comprehensible language of words can present only in a separate and successive manner. Where the latter speaks of joy and suffering and must mention especially first the one and then the other, music can and should express suffering in joy and joy in suffering, however necessarily emphasizing the one word joyful and the other sorrowful.

Musical expression leaves the importance of poetical language far behind it in this respect; and music where it is at [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] which would be [illegible], will always make poetry subordinate. [illegible] [illegible] has no other claim on musical [illegible] that it should not be violated by incomprehensible [illegible]; and that the music should never lose all [illegible] and make an expression the [illegible], for music expresses the [illegible] feeling contained in the words, not the words themselves.

Music may be compared to algebra, language to arithmetic. What words consider generally, expressed, language can express only as something special. The algebraic formula exhibits the interweaving and working of the factors—the factors and the product in one [illegible], either the factors alone or the product alone. The former however is applicable to an infinite number of [illegible] single values. Thus it is with words. We have often seen the attempt made to express the contents of a piece of instrumental music in words, in a poem. The result can never be satisfactory. If we take the algebraic expression, $a+b=c$, and seek to substitute for $a+b=c$ the application of the former is certainly a perfectly correct one; for an indefinite number of other [illegible] be substituted for such [illegible], which [illegible] [illegible] although the contents of the formula is satisfied as completely by the combination of factors. Thus also, music can [illegible] be most surely [illegible] in words; and of no one can it be said that it is the only one—that it contains the one only and the whole signification of the music, for that is contained in the most definite manner only in the music itself. Not that music has no definite sense; it says the same in every way. It speaks to the mind and says only what is musically felt. As ambiguity, first appears if such as [illegible] we, [illegible] attempts it [illegible] in a particular thought the impression upon the feelings which the music [illegible] [illegible] to give form to the [illegible] of music is to express what, in words, is inexpressible.

Wagner's "Meistersinger."

pass it off as his own. But confused and timid, he forgets the text, and wanders away meanders into nonsense, so that he is obliged to suffer amidst mocking and laughter. Hans Sachs declares that the poem was originally admired, and only fell through so disgracefully on account of his shocking rendition. Upon his invitation, Walther himself now sings the song, which is received with acclamation. We do not rightly understand how it is that the same mastersingers, who only the day before scoffed at an absolutely similar song of Walther's as "mere [illegible]," [illegible] [illegible] by his poetry [illegible] Richard Wagner [illegible] [illegible] that we are delighted to see the loving pair united, and that the opera has come to an end with a picturesque group.

So far the libretto and the way in which it is illustrated.

We now proceed to dig into the critical treatise [illegible] method by [illegible] composer of the [illegible] has proceeded [illegible] which he holds. Wagner, Dr. Hanslick asserts, has returned in his "Meistersinger" manifestly true to his musical [illegible] "Lohengrin," and [illegible] "Tristan und Isolde." It always leaves a respectable impression when an artist holds earnestly and [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] by reason of any temptation whatever—imparts to the "Meistersinger" the mystery [illegible] of [illegible] and dramatic. Wagner knows thoroughly what he means to do, [illegible] [illegible] speaks from every note: [illegible] [illegible], but as [illegible] one of those beautiful emotions which [illegible] [illegible] upon [illegible] [illegible] they do upon those of Nature herself. We must [illegible] principle [illegible] Wagner [illegible] [illegible] "Meistersinger" has not induced us to adhere. It is the recognised [illegible] of every [illegible] a shapeless, [illegible] [illegible]—the substitution of vague [illegible] melodising for independent, shapely [illegible]. [illegible] Wagner [illegible] [illegible] melody [illegible] technical expression for that kind of thing we now-a-days everybody knows what he has to expect under that name. "Melody-weaving" [illegible] power [illegible] wallowing about the "Meistersinger" as well as "Tristan und Isolde." A small motive is struck up; before it has had time to grow [illegible] a proper melody [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by means of continual modulation and [illegible] rises showing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] then chopped up [illegible] pieces and [illegible] repeated or inverted now by this, now by that instrument. [illegible] every [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] itself. To [illegible] entire lengthy acts [illegible] [illegible] always the same uniformity [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the Ballads. Only in a very few places where the text [illegible] something in the shape of a song does Walther's air and the cobbler's ditty [illegible] to concentrate itself for the time being [illegible] substantial [illegible] melody; [illegible] the other hand, throughout the [illegible] parts of the opera—in the monologues, dialogues, and concerted pieces—the melody is not entrusted to the voices, but transferred to the orchestra, where, being "infinite," it is wound out as though it were passing through [illegible]. This melody-weaving orchestral accompaniment [illegible] [illegible] the coherent and [illegible] [illegible] of the "Meistersinger," the voice being compelled to accommodate itself to the accompaniment by [illegible] [illegible] phrases into it [illegible] [illegible] half-song.

It now [illegible] [illegible] that the method of composition is diametrically opposed to that hitherto employed by every master. Heretofore, the melody for the voice was the first thing conceived by the sound-poet—the positive thing, in which the accompaniment (however free or complex in movement) was made subordinate. As a rule, one could devise the accompaniment, or an accompaniment, to the given melody for the voice; and the accompaniment thus, in some sort, became one's own unalienable property. In the "Meistersinger" the voice-part in itself is not only something merely incomplete, but is, in fact, nothing at all—the accompaniment is everything. It is an independent [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. If you were to place in the hands of an accomplished musician—not [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of Wagner's music—nothing but the libretto and the orchestral accompaniment, he would construct [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] statue. But nobody could succeed in adapting (even [illegible]) the orchestral [illegible] [illegible] of the part of Hans Sachs [illegible] [illegible] more than the sculptor could restore the whole statue from the severed hand. The natural relations are turned upside down for the orchestra [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of the leading thoughts, while the singers on the stage are only [illegible] [illegible]. In order to obtain for this method (which [illegible] [illegible] sharply characterising and specifying, but, as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible]) a means of establishing the characteristics of the dramatis personæ and to preserve for the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the means of "melodic [illegible]," Wagner [illegible] the so-called "memory-contrivance"; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the orchestra [illegible] [illegible] comes on the stage, or a certain [illegible] is referred to. The Master-Singers' Guild has its own march [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] own theme as well as musical [illegible] by a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] general rights, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Wagner [illegible] founds here for these "memory-contrivances." As soon as any mention is made in any part of the opera of St. John's Day or of the prize-singing, so soon is struck up Pogner's address from the first act. Walther's motive not only accompanies the person, but every [illegible] to him to [illegible] [illegible] poetry in contradistinction to [illegible] poetry [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the "Meistersinger" and besides, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the happiest musical phrases in the whole opera—you are doomed to hear them throughout the whole evening alone or together [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] orchestral part, followed lengthily or doubly as the case may be. At first the listener rejoices over these tiny melodic [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in recognising and [illegible] hearing them again but the more [illegible] they [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] become just as [illegible] [illegible]. The whole course of the opera is made up of four or five of [illegible] motives. [illegible] and sparingly employed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] effect, of which Weber has given [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the Zampa; but [illegible] cannot build up an orchestral principle [illegible]. It would [illegible] seem that these faithful scraps of melody [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Wagner [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] the "Meistersinger" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. From being [illegible] it has become a bane.

The production in Munich was a great success. The slim young King, with the dreamy look, listened apparently alone in his state-box from beginning to end of the opera. When, however, at the end of the second act, Richard Wagner was loudly called for, as well as the singers, he (Wagner) stepped forward from the back of the Royal box, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This highly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] after the third act somewhat astounded the strangers present, since [illegible] expected that the next thing would be that the King would be called for! As a theatrical representation, the "Meistersinger" is a spectacle perfectly excellent, scenically incomparable. Pictures of dazzling colour-glory and novelty, groups full of life and character, discover themselves to the eyes of the spectator, who has scarce time to reflect how much or how little of the effect produced upon him is to be ascribed purely to the musical creation.

The Voice in Singing.

(From the [illegible] [illegible].)

The Voice in Singing. Translated from the German of Emma Seiler, by a Member of the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

This is a book which all persons interested in vocal culture, [illegible] for themselves or others, should welcome. The [illegible] [illegible] to Madame Seiler by two such eminent men of science as Helmholtz and Du Bois Reymond is in itself a guarantee of the scientific value of her work, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] taken simply on their own merits, [illegible] [illegible] cannot be doubted or [illegible]. That the art of singing is now in a state of decline, if not altogether devoid of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To believe [illegible] it is only necessary to [illegible] [illegible] Madame Seiler [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] proof of the fact that modern singing-teachers do not know how to teach singing appear in the "lost voices" that we hear lamented on every side, both by professionals and amateurs. Madame Seiler herself was a melancholy one of the many victims of bad vocal practice, and, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] been entirely [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] under [illegible] instruction, she resolved to try and rediscover the secrets of the old masters of the art, and, if possible, to establish scientifically what they [illegible] only [illegible] [illegible] empirically. An inquiry [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of singing had already been begun by Garcia, [illegible] the most celebrated master now [illegible], who studied the larynx of his [illegible] by the aid of the laryngoscope. He was able [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a desired and [illegible] a different quality [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "register" as it is called in singing, [illegible]. The [illegible] so formed are of hard and impure quality, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sweetness, compass and expression are lost, and not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. All this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Garcia, [illegible] [illegible] singing-teacher [illegible] [illegible] great [illegible] in Carlo Bassini of New York [illegible] [illegible], whose Methods for the Soprano [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Voice respectively are among the best we have and may be well taken [illegible] with the methods of Panseron, Concone and [illegible]. But as the [illegible] Garcia and Nissen [illegible] [illegible].

The subject of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] chapters of the book. The third treats of the "Formation of Sound by the Vocal Organ," showing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Madame Seiler [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] good singing [illegible] and what should be the [illegible] of the brother of the composer and celebrated oboe-player, founded the "Concerts Spirituels," which, during Lent, and on grand festivals, when there was no opera, were given in a large room at the Tuileries, and at which sacred choruses and airs of the period alternated with instrumental solos, and with concertos for the violin and the oboe. The enterprise was exceedingly flourishing between 1770 and 1780, so much so, indeed, that Mozart considered it an honor to write a Symphony for it. During the [illegible] the Concerts Spirituels were discontinued. Somewhere about 1830 a Société d'Amateurs had been formed, but it ceased to exist even before the Revolution. In fact, people in Paris did not care a great deal for concerts.

In Italy, even from the seventeenth century, opera had made such progress that there was no room for the development of instrumental music. The Italians, as the vocal instrument, could boast of great artists; the male sopranos exercised their skill even so [illegible] only the most celebrated artists could [illegible] with success [illegible] points of correctness, and [illegible], moreover, took every possible pains to produce [illegible] upon their instruments. Their composers [illegible] models. With regard to [illegible], the only one of any repute is Domenico Scarlatti, a remarkable personage, [illegible] instrument [illegible] have been any [illegible] works. There is one fact which we may look upon as certain [illegible] this [illegible] development of the art [illegible]—those [illegible] Mozart's letters from Italy contain some account [illegible] and [illegible] Courts, [illegible] present [illegible] concert, possessing [illegible] power of attraction for the [illegible]. With regard now to concert-giving in Germany during the past century—so far as it is possible to obtain trustworthy information—in most parts [illegible] one fact which at first sight appears strange, namely that there were few or no concerts [illegible] where music was most general. In Vienna even, [illegible] there were only Subscription Concerts [illegible] Academies [illegible] to their [illegible] any concerts [illegible] lessons and [illegible] patrons, to whom [illegible] they endeavored to [illegible]. This [illegible] however, such concerts were [illegible] by a letter of the year 1784 from Mozart [illegible] his father [illegible] great [illegible] that he had [illegible] concerts, that [illegible] than [illegible] together who were the most popular teachers of the period. The [illegible] of these concerts [illegible] however [illegible] only [illegible] that [illegible] nobleman [illegible] musical [illegible] in their own houses, and generally paid [illegible] magnificently. Hence people who [illegible] belonged to good society [illegible] heard every celebrated artist at an after [illegible] private concerts that [illegible] had but little attraction for them. Only [illegible] particularly [illegible] could [illegible] upon [illegible] success. This was especially true [illegible] among whom Mlle Hong [illegible] and [illegible] were [illegible] in those days as Miles. Nesseth and Ferrel's [illegible] [illegible].

Very different was the state of things in the North. The higher classes there hardly troubled themselves at all about music; but among the classes of burghers and Government officials, on the other hand, music was very generally cultivated, even so far back as a little after 1770; and concerts were everywhere well attended. [illegible] the sole [illegible] so far from [illegible] the [illegible] of the period that concerts were regarded as the most agreeable and most becoming class of entertainment by many worthy families, only because the latter entertained scruples against going to the theatre that was probably the case more especially in the Protestant parts of the country. Between 1770 and 1780, there was not in the whole of north, or middle Germany, a single town of any importance, where there were not regular concerts of amateurs or professional musicians. Thus in Strelitz there was a concert every fortnight, and there were concerts also in Magdeburg, Erfurt, Ludwigslust, Coburg, Schleusingen, Detmold, and Nordhausen. At Göttingen, Forkel [illegible] 1780 and [illegible] ing to hear him talking at [illegible] of opera, and [illegible] concerts as the only place of refuge for good music. According to [illegible], Hamburg seems to have been the Promised Land for travelling virtuosi. Breslau was highly celebrated for its [illegible], and, when, after the battle of Kunersdorf Frederick the Great [illegible] the Saxon capital, one of his first commands was to [illegible] the fact that he wished to hear a concert. In Berlin Reichmann's Subscription Concerts [illegible] 1783. Sometimes [illegible] they were supported by [illegible] Orchestral Concerts, in which the Royal Chapel took part, and which were attended by the Royal family. At that time, also, there was a concert taken for the [illegible] at the "Ellerscher Haus," the monthly subscription for three persons being one thaler and eight groschen. A Mme Lewy, a Mme Wolff and [illegible] appeared there as pianists. The [illegible] what was favorable about the music, but no doubt that there was too much [illegible] and [illegible] for any one to be able to hear it well. Between 1780 and 1790, Reichardt founded Concerts Spirituels, or the Parisian model; symphonies by Dittersdorf, Haydn, and Kalessis were the order of the day. Solo-players also gave performances. The favorite concert instruments were the flute, the Tausel [illegible] fiddle, the oboe, the [illegible] and [illegible] were considered [illegible]. The last named instrument, moreover, was, at the commencement of the present century, frequently employed for solos at concerts in Berlin. I myself heard a Berlin [illegible] later than 1795 play in Vienna variations on "At Alcove wert [illegible]." The worthy man looked [illegible] deeply moved while playing the not [illegible] part. The piano, now so fearfully maltreated, was then but rarely used as a solo concert instrument. The music catalogues of that time, down to the year 1820 contain only trios, and other concerted pieces, but very few brilliant fantasias, and works of this description. The facts I have adduced were not to be found in one book, but have been collected from the most various journals and periodical publications.

American Artists in Florence — Thomas Ball.—The Salon of Liszt.—Kaulbach.

We take the following extracts from the Correspondence of the Chicago Tribune. The letter is dated May 29, 1868.

Above the hill of Bellosguardo, where there are several handsome villas, the view is magnificent. It was here that Hawthorne had his home when in Florence. The observatory from whence he no doubt often contemplated the wonderful loveliness of the Val d'Arno and its grand framework of moss and distant mountains I pointed out as Monte's Tower—so called from the hero of that masterpiece of his "The Marble Faun."

Here, too, is the villa Albani, where Galileo spent a long time. Over the entrance is his bust and an inscription.

On another hill, and for Jessie Freeman, the sculptor, is building a home [illegible]. It stands just off the fine, broad, approaching road which leads to the Poggio Imperiale—a palace built by the Duchess Magdalena of Austria in 1622. It belongs to the Pruna Eugenio, and [illegible] the better for that. [illegible] much [illegible] than [illegible] the city's walls. Near by [illegible] is about erecting a fine house [illegible]. It will not be commenced however [illegible] from America, until he has now [illegible] to set up at Boston the grand equestrian statue of Washington. It is to be hoped that this will glow the Bostonians most amelioration than Story's statue of Everett. Is doubtless will, for the competent judges pronounce it the best sculpture of its kind in America. Being distinguished as it is, in spite of a pose that is otherwise conventional, and unavoidably so, by wonderful individuality and character. Indeed, I suppose there are few sculptors so successful as he in catching any peculiarity, whether it be that of attitude or feature, and making it serve his purpose in a [illegible]. His likenesses are always [illegible] vivid and yet they are something more, for he succeeds in [illegible] of the [illegible] who he spoke of. The idea as well as the face of a hero.

His busts of Webster, Everett, and Starr King are particularly renowned. They are all equally good, but that of the former is marked one [illegible] than the others. I am glad to see that a New York [illegible] has been so much admired [illegible] that only the [illegible] of our sculptor. Mr. Aspinwall—as a [illegible] friend said [illegible] in [illegible] for the New England [illegible].

A bust of Liszt was among the first we saw on entering the studio. It is considered by all who have seen the great pianist, [illegible] faithful portrait. [illegible]. As I saw [illegible] again [illegible] of the resemblance to Washington [illegible] as I had observed when I saw the [illegible]. That was a memorable [illegible] I shall not soon forget, not merely because I heard such music as I never expect to hear again [illegible] I found myself [illegible] a [illegible] of Hungarian and American [illegible]. My [illegible] English Lord, who insisted, [illegible] the instruments of [illegible] durability [illegible] and [illegible] changes of climate. In [illegible] there were by which piano-fortes in the world [illegible] recommends. Of course, I [illegible] of [illegible] country, and you can fancy how delighted I was when Liszt himself came to my assistance, confirming all I had said by going up to the Chickering grand, standing [illegible] upon it the [illegible]. Lord [illegible] was [illegible] much astonished and had nothing more to say [illegible]. He soon took his departure, and shortly after, in our general flutter, Liszt offered to play. I was [illegible] accomplished musician—though [illegible] an amateur—who knew [illegible] the Abbé's genius. Whether we [illegible] by the grandeur that we seem to the crowd about to be ready in no manner can be. Meanwhile [illegible] where he showed us some sketches his friend Gustave Doré had given him and some photographs. This room [illegible] and larger apartment [illegible] and the perfume of flowers—all having been sent him by his [illegible] admirers. [illegible] was covered with busts, [illegible] and [illegible] bouquets [illegible] I remember how [illegible] complete [illegible] language [illegible] to convey through [illegible].

It is hardly to be wondered at that Liszt is spoiled, when upon his friends confess he [illegible]. His whole life has been [illegible] of triumphs and [illegible]. Even now, as an Abbé, partially retired from the world, he finds such a [illegible] he would [illegible] could produce that effect. The day that we were there [illegible] kept coming and going like waves of the sea, [illegible] them all by their [illegible] to their [illegible].

There were Polish Counts and Countesses, Russian nobles, German Barons and Baronesses with [illegible] number, Italians of all ranks, from an obscure [illegible] to a Prince, Spanish artists, and Madame [illegible] as [illegible] English Lords, Americans, and [illegible] who was Pinto & Marquis, who being [illegible] with [illegible] language [illegible] of [illegible]. But who [illegible] a bleed [illegible] would not have been [illegible] "Breathes there the man with soul so dead"? I doubt I ever approached the old words. [illegible] in English the effect produced [illegible] had the advantage of [illegible]. So it was the first time I had ever heard the great pianist [illegible] so [illegible] to begin with. The [illegible] It was getting [illegible] that [illegible] much [illegible]. All was quiet [illegible] were only [illegible] of us [illegible]—and we could see [illegible] through the great window beyond the piano—over the lovely Campo Vaccino—toward the Tiber, where the ruins of an ancient imperial palace outlined themselves against a sky of fading gold and purple—a picture

Music in Spain.

The distinguishing character of music purely Spanish, is great vivacity of rhythm, which even borders upon vehemence in [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of their national [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the minor mode. The species of music in which the Spaniards most delight is the Romance. They have many beautiful compositions of this kind [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Ramon [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] greater part of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The guitar is the instrument most generally employed. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ry house, from that of the peer to that of the barber. All play the guitar; all have a [illegible] for playing it, from the amateur who performs "por musica" as they expressly, to the artist who employs it professionally. The last allows the nail of the forefinger and thumb of the right hand to grow to a considerable length for the purpose of producing more clear decided tones. As the aficionado also constantly hold between these nails, they acquire a yellow tinge, which seems to be considered as ornamental. The rasgado (from rasgar, to scrape) is the favorite mode of playing among the peasants; almost every leading [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with the thumb or back of the hand. This rasgado [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] judgment and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Serenades are [illegible] frequent in Spain, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] window of the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] by the silence of night, breathes all the fervor [illegible] [illegible] in the romances which he sings. Sometimes he comes [illegible] by his companions, and then a number of voices and guitars are heard in concert. The favored [illegible] [illegible] from behind her curtain [illegible] [illegible] of the power of her charms, and readily distinguishes the voice which goes most nearly to her heart.

The Spaniards [illegible] an instrument peculiar to themselves. The castanets, used by these dancers to mark the measure of the fandango and bolero and all [illegible] they employ with such grace and agility, have been known for ages in Provence. The pipe and tabor of the Biscayans are the same with those employed in the South of France. The bagpipe of Galicia and Catalonia reveal the instrument of the same kind common in [illegible] and [illegible]. The Spaniards differ in this respect [illegible] [illegible] to other. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a musical [illegible] [illegible] and the same thing may be said of the dulzaynas of the peasants of Valencia. The sounds of these [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and dissonant [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The Valencians, however, are passionately fond of this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in their festivals and processions. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] without being accompanied by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].*

It appears from what I have said, that music [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Madrid and the larger cities of Spain; the rest of the country being in almost total ignorance of this enchanting art.—Revue Musicale.

BOSTON, AUGUST 1, 1868.

"The Heavens are as Brass"!

Such answer brings the youth sent out by Elijah (in the Oratorio) to the hot drouth to look the signs of rain. But fancy that extreme heat aggravated by the sound of brass, brass bands on every hand, relentless, irresistible as brassy days,—common experience here during the late [illegible] days (100° to 100° Fahrenheit)—would not the torture of that drouth have been more exquisite than Dante ever dreamed of? "The Heavens are as brass above me," calls the soprano of the messenger, and the earth about us," dryly chant or gasp the congregation in response. "All, all is brass! becomes the body all [illegible] motive of a chorus fugue. The chosen people of the Prophet's time were not so badly off as we are: we seem to be living in the real [illegible] Age, and not the one of fable; perhaps the brass band music directly impressive in the display it makes, is only the outward sign and too faithful symbol of the self-advertising, notoriety seeking, loud, "fast," brassy spirit of this advanced day of Christendom!

Brass music certainly is heating, so that the terms loud and hot become convertible to some minds prevented by it in warm weather. "The heavens are as brass." The image has often occurred to us; never more forcibly than lately at an academic festival, where at the dinner table, beneath cool classic shades, while wit and poetry sparkled on all sides refreshingly, suddenly all were startled, stunned, distracted by such stentorian bursts of brass band music, as thus querulous with [illegible] the [illegible] spacious hall, [illegible] [illegible] completely this [illegible] (so-called Tent?), that all at once it became conscious of a profuse perspiration oozing out from every pore; and the dose was frequently repeated. Did any doctor ever know enough to prescribe brass band in a case of fever? Its sudorific virtues, too well known by sad experience, though not perhaps yet scientifically recorded, might be utilized.

Bands of brass instruments, martial bands as such, are good in their own way, and useful for their purpose. Mere, who could cannot spare them: but they belong not to the culture of Apollo. In the noisy street, the camp, the battle field, they are serviceable, because their sound goes farther, reaches the ear in spite of the surrounding Babel; and the arrangement was economical, the quantity being great for the small number of "pieces." On all other than martial occasions, much of course depends upon the kind of music which they undertake to discourse. Being for the most part of a loud, coarse, blatant quality of tone, or timbre, and being all homophonous, or of the same family, without due variety or contrast of shades of tone and the same color variously diluted, mere brass instruments must be much limited in their range of subjects and expression. Except in martial, brisk and stirring strains of rather simple harmony, their collective sound soon grows monotonous and unrefined and unsympathetic. For whatever they attempt outside of their own narrow circle is but coarse and vulgar imitation. The instrumentation of brass music is of a positively vicious quality; the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. When it affects to "transcribe" and arrange for you love-sick "gems" from operas, dramatic scenes, or florid [illegible] melodies, it [illegible] caricatures and makes them vulgar: [illegible] the sentimental cornet solo [illegible] Nick Bottom roaring you [illegible] [illegible]! But it is the fashion, and Fashion with her sweeping claims covers a greater multitude of [illegible] and sins than even Charity with modest mantle did.

[illegible] music merely serves to add a little brightness and grace, by way of accompaniment and [illegible] incident to some occasion mainly social, ceremonial, literary, or what not, we do not expect of [illegible] that we should of a purely musical occasion, where Music figures as principal and in her high and serious character. But really in the first case it would seem a simple, reasonable requirement that the music should in style and subject show some adaptation to that which precedes and follows it. Now and then at commencement [illegible] a polka, nor play a dirge or a tragical Verdi Miserere after a humorous impromptu. Yet that is what, for lack of some presiding thought some prearrangement of a programme, happens every year with the musical part of our academic anniversaries at Harvard. Our complaint of last year has to be repeated, and the details of the record must be about the same. On Phi Beta happy day for instance after the poem, which formed the principal literary novelty, the company were obliged to listen ten or fifteen minutes to a potpourri from Der Freyschütz, in which the overture and all the horrors and diablerie of the Wolf's Glen scene made day hideous through the loud brazen medium of a brass band! Granting the music to be ever so good and the arrangement also, and that it might have succeeded by [illegible] in the open air at a good distance, as in the evening concerts upon Boston Common, here it was wholly out of place, apropos to nothing, and both by incongruity of the time and concentrated loudness of [illegible] only disturbed with the best will to refresh. Afterwards at the dinner in Harvard Hall, where cheery spirits meet and little speeches, verses, witty impromptus, tender college reminiscences make the sweet hours fly fast, the same monstrous enginery of brass is pent up in that hall with us, and while the mood would fain prolong the influence of some thoughtful, sincere, perhaps playful words, out burst the big and overwhelming sounds from those brazen lungs of the Sax family, and the spell is rudely hopelessly broken; no conversation and no thinking possible until that ended. Again one poet, who is always young, [illegible] some verses, half humorous, yet of the dead that makes the tears start, about how we must still be boys on the ground of these old college memories, however different now in fortune, sphere of life and ending and emptiness. Hic jacet Joe, hic jacet Bill. What follows, as if a spirit waking like the winds of Aeolus to be let loose, but blast upon blast of a right roll[illegible] loud polka! As if we did all set to it madly dancing over the graves of Bill and Joe!

These instances suffice to show the haphazard incongruity that reigns on these occasions. The musical selections seem so wholly unconnected. Just to fill pauses anyhow,—we can hardly say pauses for relief though doubtless that is the excellent intention. Now music which neither aims to silence nor aids to conversation, can as well be spared. No music is often better than any but just the right music. Too often we employ it merely because it is the custom and we should miss it, only to find that we have invited a troublesome guest and on the whole a bore. If the guest be congenial, be in harmony with the occasion, be not overloud and prominent, say his fit [illegible] at the fit time, respond to the right key or not at all,—then very well, he is a real gain; otherwise we need him not. Such a guest, such a true-born companion might in [illegible] "flow of soul and feast of reason." The conditions are: 1. That the musical selections shall meet the mood of the moment, shall take up and continue, and soar beyond the power of speech such the sentiment awakened by the speaker's voice; or else afford a gentle, natural and graceful transition into the right mood for what comes next. 2. that it come in some gentle and civilian garb, not as full brazen panoply of war; that is, instead of a brass band, unsuitably and unmanageably noisy inside of a room, however pleasant outside, and of too coarse a fibre for the fine [illegible] of delicate subjects, let it come in the form of a small orchestra with strings, as once the classical string Quartet (some of our country colleges do muster than Harvard in employing the Mendelssohn Quintette Club) or a part-song club of graduates and students,—either one or both of these combined. In short, what is wanted is simply music thoughtfully selected and rendered by a gentle, refined combination of instruments or voices. There should possible at one [illegible] festivals it [illegible] manage, that where all else is so refined, so gentle, high-toned and graceful, the music alone should be barbaric, and seem to have been dictated by the rowdy element of college life!

Now let us not be understood as making any strictures on the bands themselves. Some of them are excellent in their own and in their own proper sphere, and we are quite willing to extend that sphere beyond military music, to popular concerts in the open air &c. although larger bands with reeds would be preferable. Our concern is now with music at the University. We plead that Alma Mater instead of still [illegible] lending her countenance to the old way of looking upon Music as a secondary matter, a mere part of the procession, an occasional [illegible], playing about the [illegible] of love and ribbons, should now begin to avail herself of her due opportunity for [illegible] of a true ministry of music as an equal Art among Arts, help up to make up a truly [illegible], consistent and inspiring feast, the other [illegible] of high generously culture meeting her on equal terms. Why should not this whole business be organized and put upon the right ground once for all? Why should not the College place the responsibility for instance, in the hands of the "Harvard Musical Association"? Here has musical society which had its origin in Harvard College life, whose members are mostly Harvard graduates, and one of whose professed aims from the first has been to insist upon Music as an important element in collegiate education,—it would seem to be high time that this Society were called upon to make good its profession and practically prove its loyalty to Alma Mater in this way.—But we must leave the academic question and come to a milder application of the theme with which we started,—consider the bands a little as they are heard all around us and down on places in the daily life University of the People.

CONCERTS ON THE COMMON.—All the bands are of brass.* This is partly fashion—of a [illegible] age,—partly economy, the bands depending for their support mainly on their military engagements. Some of them are very good brass bands; but brass bands are not good for every kind of music, and they are ambitious to attempt all kinds. They are the people's music and have much to do with forming the taste for better or for worse. Now it is natural that in this competition for the public ear and admiration they should have the [illegible] and [illegible], strive to outvie each other in offering "the last thing out" to fall up with the fashion, like the milliners and fancy goods dealers. So those they watch the Opera as they [illegible] watch Paris. Their chief study is the musical fashions as do the [illegible] the [illegible] of the selection of their repertoires is to see [illegible] "has a run," and strive to appear [illegible] as possible, but by all means lose no time in getting it. Of course the fashion always changes: you miss the good old pieces that made you feel so well some years ago; you cannot more get them at the present moment; then you can find another hat as comfortable, as sensible, so natural as the one you wore and liked so well last year. Much of the good old stirring music goes out, and much namby pamby, frivolous and vulgar trash comes in; no matter: it is the fashion, as long as the Fashion has her general head quarters at the Opera house. So it is given and the form is some dear old [illegible] of [illegible] or [illegible] become so [illegible], they are still known in them of one fashion.

Now this is well enough for fashion and for the idle curiosity and light amusement of the moment; but it is not so well for the culture of the world might get from music. In that point of view it makes a vast difference what kind of music the popular band selects. Just now the feathery Italian Offenbach reigns like the [illegible]. Those, with [illegible] potpourris of medleys of the most insipid [illegible] light and brilliant numbers of the greatest operas,—the [illegible] of national airs (very much worn on the) [illegible] upon lively [illegible], or rapid [illegible] upon the serious, [illegible] and then a Mendelssohn part-song, or some other classical "arrangement," just to save character with "the appreciative few," commonly make up the programmes. Still there is a great field for choice, and much depends upon the taste and temper of the master of the band. If he be a high-toned musician, respecting music as an Art, respecting himself, and not merely caring for the fashions and low habits of the day, he will make selections of [illegible] worth and beauty in the old faith that the public will enjoy and [illegible] music quite as well and better than bad, if they are only allowed to hear it as often. And he will so [illegible] render such music as these are with the possible [illegible] of his band.

He will not be too ready to translate Wagner's [illegible] or the [illegible] strains of single [illegible] [illegible] into [illegible] brass. He will find very [illegible] with the same [illegible] opera. He will not [illegible] all of [illegible] music, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. We are [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible], in [illegible], [illegible] every thing selected. It is the very end and aim of Art to [illegible] [illegible] this variety is not [illegible] at [illegible], [illegible] our thought [illegible] something [illegible], permanent, [illegible], as "things of the day" which [illegible] [illegible].

Now the City Fathers will have to provide music on the Common. On the cool evenings [illegible] have great crowds together, and as far as we have [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] nothing but cheerfulness, good order and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The music as it is done was a bold good, as a [illegible] demand for the [illegible] better. That too is a good thing. Much is heard which applauds the present one; and now and then a thing which good taste can take pleasure in. There might be more more of the sort, which while [illegible] the cold-[illegible], would be more fine and delightful to the many. We certainly [illegible] [illegible] what our bands, in [illegible] brilliant, [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] on the whole. It would of course be better to have one large band [illegible] [illegible] of a [illegible] character, not all of brass, but with plenty of reeds and finer instruments; but with our brass bands as they are there may be [illegible] improvement made by taste and care in the selection. And in this connection we may pay a passing compliment to the Germania Band, which in [illegible] [illegible] selections [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible], really giving a generous proportion of good music, with [illegible] like arrangement, [illegible], [illegible], and [illegible] in respect to [illegible], and [illegible] it was one of the best things by a 'brass band' playing [illegible] at times. The whole evening they were greatly enjoyed on the Common. The programme, among other things, included a [illegible] effective version of the Wilhelm Tell overture, some of a song by Schubert, a good potpourri from the Huguenots, a [illegible] and [illegible] Serenade, &c. Brown Brigade Band, [illegible] [illegible] and one of the best, [illegible] a series of promenade concerts in the Music Hall, from which we may hope good things,—provided it be done all brass.—We have only space to open our subject now.

TOO MUCH SUCCESS.—The London Athenaeum seems to think Miss Kellogg not beyond the need, even if she be beyond the reach, of criticism. It says:

"Miss Kellogg's triumphs are much at sea. Scarcely a week passes by without an assumption by her of some new part. The result is, that she comes before the public unprepared. She learns the notes, has the Italian catch [illegible] by which the music was arranged. The concerts she wears in and opera may it has done that which she wears in another has [illegible] in the same in both. La Figlia del Reggimento, [illegible] by her last Saturday, was only Annie in the dress but in crowdness. The [illegible] daughter of the regiment has never been sketched so slightly as by Miss Kellogg, nor has the brightness of the part ever been more weak or [illegible] pale and earnest. Last is the chorus singing. The five voices of the men came out like the deb red in a y [illegible] by Es bene."

Joseph von Wasielewski, the biographer of Schumann, is writing a "History of the Violin." The book, which will soon be published, is one of unusual interest, from the fact that the author is not only a good violinist but also a man of cultured education.

Comic-Opera, &c.—This, with the mass of Mr. Offenbach's music, the burst rock aristocracy brass band preparation and organ in Barbaric [illegible] the only route a vogue while the singers sing. The Offenbach [illegible] a not a creditable symptom of an age which boasts that it has grown too enlightened; but perhaps it is a fair way to work out its own cure, on the principle that murder will out, and humors have to come out on the surface or strike in and kill. Perhaps the sooner all is the better, and the fashion shall have run itself completely into the ground, and there are good hopes that this will not cost more than another season. &c., according to the New York Albion:

It would seem that the public is to be surfeited next season with opera bouffe. If report speaks true, we are to have "three B. Bateman's" in the field. Of Mr. Bateman's arrangements the public are already apprised. In addition to these it is now said that Mr. [illegible] will abandon the French dramatic performances which have appealed so by his hose and admirable representations of Offenbach's works. In which company, it will be so engaged. The first the new [illegible] is undergoing a very thorough renovation, by which, according, again, will be enlarged and various other improvements secured. Nobody knows by [illegible] the area of last season. M. Pike, it is said, will engage [illegible] the more familiar artists, and give us once in a while [illegible] representations by the reproduction of the organ. Grande Duchesse—the fat, the and fairy Schneider—if she is to be seen by either one of money. She will be supported by as many of the original set on as can be induced to leave [illegible] belle France for a trans-Atlantic season. The reader is probably aware that Mr. Bateman [illegible] is at present presuming that person secures the Duchess, with its [illegible], [illegible] and that Mrs. Ross and [illegible] representing [illegible] the character in England [illegible] another establishment. Mr. Bateman's season at Niblo's—for which the most complete preparations have been made—will open on Monday. "Barbe Bleue" will be first presented, in which Mlle. Irma—the new prima donna—has created a vast amount of reputation in Bordeaux. Of the opera itself we understand that [illegible] the same well-chosen and [illegible] has made the Grand Duchesse so [illegible] favorite. The personnel of the cast is as follows: Princess Hermia, Mlle. Lambelle; Queen Clementine, Mlle. Duclos; Barbe Bleue, M. Aujac; Prince Saphir, M. Hardinger; Count Oscar, M. Lagriffoul; Popolani, M. Duchesne; King Bobeche, M. Francis; Alvarez, M. Edgard. This, as will be seen, is a matured and strong distribution, even the secondary parts being in the company on the French stage, a course possible—being given to first-class artists. The opera is divided into five acts as follows: Act First, Parent and Castle of Barbe Bleue; Act Second, Palace of King Bobeche; Act Third, the Alchemist; Act Fourth, is the ... Act Fifth. In the first and third acts, Messrs. Jargon and Pulsanty, Fantoccio and Vittangeo, Ballet Troupe, with Mlle. Rossi as premiere danseuse, will be introduced.

The "Barbe Bleue" has since appeared, and its success is blazed abroad, of course, through all the trumpets of the New York press. Meanwhile we find a paragraph much to the purpose in the Saturday Gazette of this city:

On the 30th of December Mr. Bateman inaugurated Offenbach's French opera in this city, which is fairly to be considered as one of the largest of its kind, for the sensation of programme and the discharge of most grotesque which is plainly made for the stage. There is a weak scene in the "Grande Duchesse," which, under the same tendency to defiance and virtue, in the "Barbe Bleue" is one little as expressed, and [illegible] it may be a target for the shafts of censure and ridicule, because it is filthy. The music is in a kind of variety, and of that piquant sparkling quality which lingers upon the ear; but the mass of music-hall people are forced to exercise the virtue of patience, in order to reach the points which reduce them upon a much more fruitful occasion for smokers of cigarettes and smokers of hand organs.

Mr. Henry F. Chorley has retired from the London Athenæum, after thirty-four years of connection with the musical department of that journal.

Death of Samuel Lover.—Died on Monday, at a pleasant retreat in Jersey, to which he had retired about 18 months since, Samuel Lover, the poet, novelist, musician and artist. Mr. Lover's partial and indiscriminating friends were wont to compare him with Thomas Moore, but no one protested more energetically against the comparison than the deceased gentleman himself. He knew perfectly well that he filled a much lower position on the list of Fame, and was quite content to be regarded as the most successful among the [illegible] of the great Irish muse. Great Irish [illegible] between Moore and Lover was that while the former was a member of the best circles, the drawing-room, the muse of the latter appealed more generally to the people. Fun of Moore, the ideas were a ... popular ... "The Young ... ed Shamrock," "The Angel's Whisper," "Molly Bawn," ... the Low-backed Car. The similarity between Moore and Lover extended even to the personal appearance. Both were small men, with bright eyes and intensely fresh expression of countenance; both were in the habit of singing their own songs; and the main points which will be found more than once in Moore's biography, the poet's singing was rather a recitation accompanied by the piano than the actual singing of a song, applied equally to Lover. This rare facility was liable in a drawing-room, where the limited company can group round the piano, as a great measure prevented the success of a [illegible] which Lover essayed. Mr. Lover, who had for some time enjoyed a Government pension of £100 a year, was [illegible] years of age.—Orchestra, July 11.

Pianoforte (?)—The French papers are filled with delight at the aristocratic patronage which the English are bestowing upon Mlle. Schneider as La Grande Duchesse, at St. James's Theatre, and after describing the [illegible], one [illegible] and other attributes of a princess, grimaces and bends and lashes, etc., "which are considered to be Offenbach's music," the writer [illegible] characteristic impudence, that they will never again be able to accuse the English of being "shocked" [illegible] age."

With the following remarks on "La Grande Duchesse" from the Saturday Review we cordially agree: —"In the fact that 'La Grande Duchesse' ability created, is successful there is nothing extraordinary. The sort of success [illegible] in not a sign of the times."—London Club.

Nursery v. Offenbach. "Punch" makes the following parallel:

"Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse was present during the second part of the performance of Israel in Egypt. It is to be regretted that with the exception the Handel Festival was not honored by the presence of any of the members of the Royal Family."—Morning Paper.	"The first performance of La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein was honored with the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, H.R.H. the Crown Prince of Denmark, H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, H.R.H. the Prince of Teck, &c. &c. &c. The house was sparkling with the presence of royalty and nobility."—Morning Paper.

Chantez à mes yeux, oh M. Offenbach!

Queen Elizabeth's Music Book. A writer in the Gentleman's Magazine says: "In the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge is Queen Elizabeth's Music-book, containing compositions for the pianoforte or virginal of her time. The Queen is said to have been a skilful executant. Some pages of the book have been obviously often turned over, others hardly looked at. I believe the favorite ones are those on which the easiest pieces are written; the others contain the rarest and more difficult passages. Although her Majesty has the reputation of having been an accomplished performer upon the virginal, this music-book proves that she was wont to play the more simple compositions, and indulge in the less laborious practice of playing the tunes only. It is not easy to acquire the reputation of a pianist, to get together a set of her (?) little pieces of Thalberg, Liszt and others and play only the melodies; they arrange a ... the Hand ... which are so difficult to ... often ... at Queen Elizabeth did this with the music of the Lassie and Thalberg of her day, judging from her music-book."

The Development of the Concert System. Concert Rooms and "Salons." Aristocracy, Lovers of Art, [illegible]

With regard to Leipzig, I discover [illegible]

ance, was Paganini. His extraordinary success was undoubtedly founded upon what he did, which was then something unheard of—but on the great mass of concert-goers a far deeper impression was produced by the mysterious stories of his eventful life; of the strangulation of his mistress; of the dungeon where he languished for years; and of the fiddle which had been left him, and all the strings of which snapped except one, the G string, on which he then composed those variations that made such a noise in the world. Paganini's fame was frequently protested against these fabrications; he was not a virtuoso of the present fashion, for in [illegible] would be delighted if people would only relate similar [illegible] things about him; but Paganini's transformations and eccentric appeals to the [illegible] [illegible]. Romantic verse, poets, authors, and elegant ladies and gentlemen had made up their minds that no man could play like him, unless he had murdered his mistress. Heine wrote of him as a "Mann aus dem Mittelalter entsprungen" ("A man escaped from gloomy Middle Ages"); and, so late as 1835, Heine, in his Florentinische Nächte, described him in a series of such wonderful pictures, that poor [illegible] was dead, were said to have — "If you will undertake to describe me with the same I shall murder some one." The last renown that in Paganini's life is also the one which is retained by the most interesting. After he had heard Berlioz's Symphony Épisode de la vie d'un Artiste, and learnt that the composer asked it as young man in poor circumstances, he sent him 20,000 francs, a truly royal gift. The history of art does not probably contain another such fact, and yet that fact is but little, or not at all, known.

All the triumphs of Paganini were eclipsed by those achieved ten years later by Liszt in Germany. Paganini was worshipped only as fiddler; but Liszt appeared as the ideal [illegible] of every possible kind of real adoration. When he was twenty [illegible] he was a friend of Lamartine and Victor Hugo, and glorified by George Sand in her Lettres d'un Voyageur. Alexandre Dumas, a man of his most unbounded [illegible], described how he had played a [illegible] from [illegible] Weber's "Aufforderung zum Tanze," and drove all his hearers, male and female, wild with excitement. His name was coupled with those of the most zealous and above —no second only above, [illegible] belonging to the best society [illegible] to whom [illegible] He was, indisputably, the most perfect representative of the French romance school. From the prefaces of Victor Hugo and of Lamartine, from the stormy episodes of Alfred de Musset, he had learned the art of expressing the indescribable and of spurring them up to behold the divine. It is perhaps not necessary for me to make a point of assuring them [illegible] ever since the successes the Liszt could not be achieved with the [illegible] talent [illegible]. I [illegible] that as a virtuoso Liszt stood much higher, but as a concert-giver as a [illegible] where he was known to the public that he read the most difficult music at sight, as a practised pianist reads an easy waltz; but I want to prove that one concert-giver Liszt would ever have [illegible] half his success had it not been for his influence of his personality. The best proof of this is furnished by his first appearance in Vienna. He came out just at the time that Clara Wieck, Schumann's betrothed, and afterwards his wife, was the attraction of the [illegible]; her success was far greater than the most brilliant success Thalberg had ever achieved in Vienna. Her classical moderation was [illegible] and though at her concerts he generally produced the greatest enthusiasm by his "Etudes" of Henselt's, or Nocturnes of Chopin's, her programmes were always made of good music. Liszt appeared and played Weber's "Concertstück." The audience were appreciative it is true, but not much more so, after all than at many of Clara Wieck's slow pieces. During the concert, however, Liszt walked among the audience, and began conversing in French with those ladies and men present whom he knew. The Viennese gazed and [illegible] all he passed, who indulged in light, easy conversation with the people at concerts. A few days afterwards a report went through the whole capital that he had replied to one of the haughtiest ladies in it, who had asked him, at table, a somewhat indiscreet question as to his business success in Vienna: "Madam, I cultivate music; I am not in trade."

We cannot, at the present day, form a conception probably, of the effect of this anecdote, because many of the great virtuoso's people have already considered him in [illegible] of this kind, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. Then however Liszt was valued as a man who had victoriously pulled down the barriers between the artist and the higher classes. Many more interesting traits might be related concerning Liszt's subsequent career in Germany —how he frequently exceeded the concert-room lengthened, uncanny and in such a state that as it [illegible] the necessities of [illegible] performance [illegible] out of the question; and how despite all that, he was none the less with the same applause as in his most brilliant moments. But this would take me too far.

I remarked, at the outset, that, a former [illegible] every executant was expected to do something good as a composer as well, but that since Liszt appeared, such had ceased to be the case. Indeed, in the present state of musical execution, we can scarcely expect that any one who devotes himself to the career of a virtuoso should study composition profoundly. In order to attain the giddy height of execution reached by Liszt and his followers, from eight to ten hours' practice is required every day, and in the amount of time an addition from real dominion of [illegible] movements, is incalculably more dazzling, is so often the practice of the other art. It is, therefore, perfectly impossible for a musical performer who [illegible] to compose [illegible] others to preserve that purity of artistic sentiment on which so much is said and written in Germany. It is true that one never now sees a new programme sounded by a [illegible] virtuoso which does not contain classical works, side by side with all sorts of break-neck pieces of home and foreign manufacture, but the motive for [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] a sham programme [illegible] one of an anecdote related to me by the [illegible] [illegible] of the Figaro, M. de Villemessant. In April 1848, when it was still standing, the Republic he met some literary friends in the street. These gentlemen were all delighted at the new turn of affairs, and, in the moods, perceived each of [illegible] as a fresh era. Villemessant, however, was of opinion that the French were too [illegible] a people to bear a republic long. In him a republican [illegible]. "Let me" he [illegible] I will lay a bet that there are not five hundred republicans to be found in all Paris, and I am even prepared to have one of a [illegible] the question. I will go on the corner post of a corner of the street, and I will ask every passer every one who passes whether he is a sincere republican. Because each one, I will pay you five francs, a [illegible] for every man of a different opinion I ask you for only one franc." This strange wager was accepted, and the gentlemen with [illegible] two treasures placed themselves at the Café Riche, Boulevard des Italiens. Villemessant went up to the first passer-by, made him a polite bow, and mentioned his own name and the names of his companions, to show they were not mere stupid jokers, enquired: "Tell me on all accounts, sir, are you, in your heart, a republican?" "Comment?" followed the individual thus addressed, "Liberté, égalité, fraternité, ou la mort! Vive la république!" Villemessant took off his hat, made a low bow, and taking five francs from his pocket, gave them to his opponent. A second [illegible] came up, and the same question brought the reply, "My dear sir, replied M. Villemessant" was the reply "I am a republican, but my affairs have been in a very bad state since the introduction of the Republic, and under the circumstances, no man can be very sincerely enthusiastic." The [illegible] came [illegible]. "Citoyen ouvrier" said Villemessant, [illegible] "of course you are a republican?" "Scoundrels" answered the man, "with your Republic and your fine speeches, you smeared our lips with honey, and now we are starving." Then came a Bonapartist, who was a republican because he would not have any of the rotten Bourbon or Orleans lot; then a Legitimist, who was for the Republic till Henri V. could not reign; at last Villemessant's opponents paid him one hundred francs forfeit money not to ask any more questions. I think now that if any one were to place himself upon the Vienna Boulevards, and ask every concert-giver, on his conscience, whether he was really so classically disposed as he pretends to appear in his programmes, we might lay [illegible] every concert-giver of the Classical [illegible], and exhibiting one franc for every one who entertained in his heart different sentiments, he would be [illegible] profitable stroke of business. When we hear [illegible] a [illegible] of the present day first play sonatas by Beethoven, or fugues by Bach, and then their own compositions, in which they almost [illegible] he one [illegible] who shall worry [illegible] [illegible] we are reminded of those fashionable people who go to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it is not the correct thing to be seen at home, but who are terribly bored, and [illegible] when they exchange from [illegible] grave sound and real Romanz, for [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the products of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It is unfortunately only too well established a fact that even the greatest artists, urged by the desire of showing the [illegible] [illegible] of their art (that is of satisfying [illegible]) have pulled up the very worst things they could. From Jenny Lind herself once, amidst tremendous applause, at a musical festival, one of the most vapid Italian [illegible] ever written (and not to be understood one of those many sweet Italian [illegible], which, when well executed, are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]). A very celebrated actor also, in a [illegible] [illegible] of those lines ventured to remark that he [illegible] not to give any [illegible] as a certain [illegible] [illegible] tried only for making gentlemen as [illegible] his companions, replied very significantly, "That no other signal than to [illegible] every day a different [illegible] [illegible]" (which was equivalent to saying that the value of the piece is a secondary consideration; the first thing [illegible] is that it affords me an opportunity for display). We ask ourselves: Whither will this lead? It cannot be denied that the highest degree of executive skill is at present an indispensable necessary condition for successful playing; and if [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] days not in these attained it. But even the possession of such skill affords no longer any guarantee for its significance. In order to achieve certain and lasting success, the highest virtuosity must follow the most noble path. Joachim has succeeded in doing so. He has [illegible] rejected all outward glitter and yet his fame is [illegible] greater than that of any one else. But the stock of violin pieces for such art purposes is a much more limited one than that of pianoforte compositions, of which there is a large collection whereform to choose. Yet at present we hear at the public performances of pianoforte virtuosi nothing save the most difficult of Beethoven's Sonatas, and a light concerto by Mozart, but that only when the executant has completed an exceedingly difficult and brilliant concerto [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] at present steps everywhere into the foreground, careless of the higher claims of art and forgetful of Goethe's words:

> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible]
> [illegible]

The virtuoso is not a free man but a slave of the public; as a slave he must keep continually carrying fresh influence by new attractions, for whom he must [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for whom he can't only think of following for a time, as a more [illegible] or [illegible] [illegible]. The world will not rank [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. And what recompense has he this [illegible] [illegible] for the executant impaired by his everlasting speculations on [illegible] [illegible] to satisfy the daily increasing requirements of material life, and of his social rank [illegible] [illegible] This agreeable social position. "Die Meistersinger Von Nürnberg."

[illegible] tone, the very long tone, the tone of all colors [illegible] that of the nightingale, that of the grasshopper, that of the [illegible], that of English [illegible], that of the stork of [illegible], &c., &c.; after this, he will be called upon to write a number of [illegible], well rhymed verses, and then sing a suitable melody to them. Such is the ordeal to which he will be subjected in order to be received a master.

Walther, whose first [illegible] has filled with unbounded confidence, presents himself, rather as [illegible] for examination. Before the [illegible], [illegible] and in the middle of St. Catherine's church, he [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible]. He sings [illegible] without [illegible] that [illegible] in the [illegible] but with an [illegible] of the [illegible] the judges [illegible]. The [illegible] of his [illegible], the [illegible] or marker, Hans Beckmesser, [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] to [illegible] the support of Hans Sachs, who understands what he is about, and of Pogner himself. Walther is [illegible] rejected. He [illegible] the place, however, without first [illegible] with [illegible] the Meistersinger. This produces a [illegible] of disorder, of which the apprentices of the [illegible] take advantage to dance, as [illegible] will dance around the platform. The result is a [illegible] full of movement, as the reader [illegible].

The [illegible] figure of old Hans Sachs occupies the foreground in the last [illegible]. The [illegible] Beckmesser [illegible] at night to serenade Eva Pogner, the goldsmith's daughter. [illegible] Hans Sachs [illegible] and [illegible] him [illegible]. The next day, Walther, who, [illegible] his [illegible], has spent a very quiet night, [illegible] to tell [illegible] a charming dream he has had. "We are saved!" exclaims Hans Sachs; "this is a [illegible] subject for a [illegible] song [illegible] which [illegible], and which, as the same time, is [illegible] adapted for [illegible] to the rules." He then [illegible] to set about his work. Walther [illegible] and the [illegible] which [illegible] the [illegible] judges would find fault. While he goes to dress for the grand festival, which is to be public, Beckmesser [illegible] the song. At the [illegible] to [illegible], and [illegible], if he likes, to [illegible] a [illegible] render himself [illegible]. Beckmesser [illegible] and [illegible] off [illegible] the song is by Sachs, [illegible] value. The solemn moment [illegible] arrived. The Town-clerk, [illegible] up to [illegible], but [illegible] ought to [illegible] to [illegible] melody [illegible] and [illegible] the words [illegible] the [illegible]. He is greeted with shouts of derision from the [illegible] and [illegible] profane. "It is by Sachs," he exclaims, [illegible]. "No [illegible]" says the shoemaker; "I am incapable of writing anything so beautiful. He only who has [illegible] it [illegible] sing it." Walther now advances. His perfect [illegible] and [illegible] execution meet and find the applause of the [illegible], and the [illegible] in [illegible] him. [illegible] the crown of [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] festival. Pogner [illegible] his [illegible] hand [illegible] the badge of his [illegible], and Hans Sachs [illegible] the ceremony by [illegible] a few very sensible words upon the [illegible] and the [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] of German art, [illegible] by the Gallic taste and by [illegible].

Wagner was bound to finish with this [illegible], he did so at the direction of Herr [illegible], who wrote Art and Politics.

The libretto of Die Meistersinger is rich in situations; the [illegible] was doubtless satisfied with the [illegible] but the [illegible] has [illegible] very [illegible] to make [illegible] of age and [illegible]. A [illegible] period [illegible] that wonderful [illegible] of Nuremberg [illegible] burgher, who [illegible] up to [illegible] by [illegible] to [illegible] and whose he [illegible] for a [illegible]. But, on the other hand, had [illegible] that [illegible] would [illegible] Meistersinger and we should [illegible] a long time before [illegible] how Wagner [illegible] him. The second act with [illegible] Pogner and Hans Sachs [illegible] of a [illegible] scenes of which [illegible] may be [illegible] until [illegible] three [illegible] and [illegible] in a few [illegible] of the [illegible], which is far from being deficient in interest. [illegible] and the public would have been spared an amount of physical fatigue which cannot fail to exert some influence upon their impressions.

Wagner's credulity is neither the sovereignty of music [illegible] nor the absurd [illegible] which has occupied the minds of [illegible]. It is the high [illegible] of Shakespeare and Molière, without the [illegible]. The scene in which Beckmesser [illegible] the [illegible] been [illegible] to [illegible], is, as the performance, [illegible] laughter. But, during all the noise, [illegible] the [illegible] at the end of the act, [illegible] the [illegible] out [illegible]. The final scene of the second act [illegible] Hans Sachs and Eva [illegible] incomparable [illegible] a [illegible]. As for Walther [illegible] he [illegible] third [illegible] and [illegible] sometimes grave, and [illegible] Hans [illegible].

The model [illegible] by Wagner in his new work differs a little from [illegible] in Tannhäuser, Lohengrin and Tristan, [illegible] of [illegible]. There is an [illegible] with [illegible] through [illegible] is true, [illegible] "endless melody" [illegible] his form, [illegible] as [illegible] periods [illegible] the [illegible] tender [illegible] in the midst of all this chaos [illegible] than [illegible] powerful [illegible] passed.

[illegible] for an opportunity of [illegible] that faculty of comprehension which [illegible] Wagner himself [illegible] the principal [illegible] of the [illegible] work [illegible] simplicity [illegible] the [illegible] new school [illegible] the idea of [illegible] from the [illegible] placed them. It is upon [illegible] doubt, that the new system [illegible] established. It happens, however, [illegible] the very passages in which [illegible] beautiful [illegible] in Wagner's work are [illegible] from the [illegible] which he has imposed upon himself [illegible] of these simple [illegible] in the school of Beethoven and of Weber, [illegible] the [illegible] of Lohengrin, the [illegible] Lohengrin [illegible] Tannhäuser, &c. It [illegible] of the [illegible] to demonstrate [illegible] Wagner [illegible] whose [illegible] "melody of the forest." The master's disciples will certainly reply [illegible] but [illegible] answer [illegible] the [illegible] of this [illegible]. To this there is no answer [illegible].

The prelude to Die Meistersinger [illegible] of Lohengrin. It is [illegible] Pogner [illegible] of giving his [illegible] taken up again by Walther [illegible] the second act, and [illegible] of the [illegible]. The scene [illegible] the first act, the scene between Hans Sachs and Eva, [illegible] Beckmesser [illegible] in the second act, [illegible] Walther's dream, which [illegible] in the second [illegible] the [illegible] and the [illegible] scene of the [illegible] as the principal [illegible]. Walther at each of [illegible] before [illegible] the [illegible].

I shall [illegible] no [illegible] to [illegible] any [illegible] on the hearing of a work by Wagner. From the present [illegible], I [illegible] as [illegible] from being [illegible] in [illegible] ground. [illegible] and character are to be preserved, unless we would end in a hybrid production, a [illegible] shall be called [illegible] as we may do at no distant period.

Mendelssohn.—Lind.—Ertmann.—Beethoven.

Here is an unpublished letter from Mendelssohn to the Baroness von Ertmann, communicated, with explanations, to a European journal, by Sig. E. C. Marchesi:

Leipzig, the 17th April, 1846.

"My dear and respected Baroness,—Since those never-to-be-forgotten days, which I passed in Milan, I have not written to you, and probably you scarcely know how profound and unchangeable my gratitude for you has become in my heart. Now days have passed [illegible] my thinking often and [illegible] of your [illegible] and friendliness, and again thanking you for the same. I had my share of all the good and [illegible] things I about [illegible] your [illegible] though I was compelled to hold away and remain silent. To-day, after so many years, an opportunity has at length presented itself for writing to you, and I cannot let it escape me, since I know that my writing will afford you gratification.

"The fact is my friend Jenny Lind is going to Vienna and I should like you to become acquainted with each other [illegible] I know in the whole course of my existence [illegible] more noble, more genuine, [illegible] true artist, and I do know any thing that would [illegible] you greater pleasure than to [illegible] the acquaintance of such an artist. Had she [illegible] a great [illegible] I should not require to use any more; you will hear her, and consequently [illegible] another word.

"[illegible] will remember [illegible] your [illegible]. The hours passed in your [illegible] delightful! [illegible] further [illegible] of my sayings and doings, Miss Lind is the very best person to tell you all about them, as I have seen her very often and she knows everything concerning me and mine.

"May I beg that you will not doubt the unchangeable [illegible] and heartfelt gratitude with which I am and shall be so long as I live, your most devoted

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY."

The above letter from Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy to the Baroness Ertmann,* was written at the time Jenny Lind was about to make her first appearance in the Imperial city. It is interesting to learn from it what a high opinion Mendelssohn entertained of Jenny Lind, and what respect he had for the Baroness Ertmann, whose acquaintance he made in Milan.†

As this lady was not merely a distinguished pianoforte player, but, for a long series of years, the friend and [illegible] of Beethoven, we have [illegible] a biographical sketch of her.

Dorothea Baroness Ertmann, was born at Offenbach, near Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where her father [illegible]. From a [illegible] she exhibited an extraordinary talent for music, but, as a young child she found the dark [illegible] very [illegible], she was frequently [illegible] by her [illegible], which she often [illegible] of [illegible] thankful heart. When eighteen, she married the Baron von Ertmann, a major in the Austrian service, who died at [illegible] Field-Marshal [illegible].

During her residence at Vienna, where she lived [illegible] years, the Baroness Ertmann became accidentally acquainted with Beethoven. [illegible] happened to meet him in the shop of Herr Haslinger, [illegible] publisher, who had known her some [illegible] of Beethoven's [illegible] that [illegible] they were [illegible] they had many opponents. The Baroness [illegible] herself in a room adjoining the shop, played the Sonatas through with a practised hand, and [illegible] at them. She had [illegible] at [illegible] of [illegible] appearance [illegible] to her [illegible] herself at the composer. From that moment Beethoven was a daily visitor of her family. [illegible] all his Sonatas and [illegible] of the [illegible] how [illegible] was, and how often [illegible] upon her [illegible] playing so that she might not move [illegible].

The Baroness Ertmann soon found him different [illegible] but she bore patiently [illegible] and caprices, perceiving how unhappy he [illegible]. His absence of mind went frequently so far that, during dinner, he would [illegible] suddenly [illegible] and then for the first time, remember that he had already dined. [illegible] the Baroness [illegible] St. Cecilia [illegible] she was the only person who understood him and his music. This did not prevent him from giving way to outbursts of feeling with her as with other persons, and avoiding her house for weeks together. He would then return, hold out his hand to her without pronouncing a word, and peace was concluded.

When the Baroness had the misfortune to lose her last child, Beethoven was the only person who did not express his condolence with her under the calamity. After the lapse of several weeks, however, he called. Without uttering a word, he proceeded to the piano, making a gesture of invitation for the Baroness to go and sit near him. He played and extemporised. "Such music," said the Baroness, "I had never heard! [illegible] the death of the child and the joy of the angels, who greeted his [illegible] in Heaven."

When he had [illegible] finished, he was not able to speak for weeping and left the room. It was not [illegible] afterwards that he would tell the Baroness [illegible]

As we know Beethoven dedicated to the Baroness Ertmann his Sonata Op. 101 in A major. Among the Baroness's papers, after her death, was all Beethoven's Sonatas, with observations written in his own hand.

Music Abroad

London.

Mr. Charles Hallé has commenced his very interesting recitals in St. James's Hall. In the course of [illegible] performances he has done exactly what he promised. [illegible] of the known one may use of the pieces [illegible] of Schubert, besides the large number of his [illegible] he has given besides, [illegible] of the variations [illegible] together and an [illegible] composition of Beethoven upon which he could readily lay hands. Thus [illegible] shows how carefully [illegible] he was [illegible] studied them. In the programme of the recital and last recital were comprised [illegible] of Schubert in A and E flat, belonging [illegible] (which Schumann could not believe [illegible]) best and [illegible] known the [illegible], which though published [illegible] a close connection [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible] There are [illegible] The [illegible] the [illegible] all the rest of the programme [illegible] being taken from Schubert.—Times.

Philharmonic Concerts.—The (old) Philharmonic Society has given in the Hanover Square Rooms its [illegible] and penultimate concerts. At the [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] and Beethoven's [illegible] Concerto [illegible] Mr. Cusins. [illegible] Overture "[illegible]" of Mendelssohn, for the [illegible] in the [illegible] by [illegible] an Emmanuel an [illegible] of the Royal Academy of Music and one of our most learned and [illegible] professors. The overture to Emmanuel written and [illegible] could be [illegible] capital [illegible] in short, [illegible] the Philharmonic and other concerts of [illegible] Of Mendelssohn's [illegible] no more than [illegible] every [illegible]. The concerto on the occasion was that of [illegible] A minor, [illegible] Herr [illegible] also [illegible] a reading of her own—a good [illegible] from that of Mme. proved by the fact that Herr Rubinstein was called back, and, in return for the honor, [illegible] arrangement of the quick march from The Ruins of Athens of Beethoven—an exhibition, not [illegible]. The singers at this concert were Mlle. Tietjens and Herr Rokitansky; and not by any means the least interesting feature of the programme was the scena, "Infelice," composed by Mendelssohn, expressly for the Philharmonic Society, so far back as 1834—of which Mlle. Tietjens gave the original version (it is published with a new [illegible]) superbly. At the seventh concert there was [illegible] symphony of Beethoven in [illegible] The last concerto, composed [illegible] a new [illegible] from Moscow, was [illegible] by the author and [illegible] applauded. The other Professor [illegible] Bennett's [illegible] one of the most [illegible] pieces of [illegible] written for the [illegible] under [illegible] he played [illegible] of Professor Bennett, as the Philharmonic Concerts [illegible] one that [illegible] of the greatest pianists of his time [illegible] would [illegible] enough [illegible] with which [illegible] True, they are not [illegible]. The overtures of this concert were A Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn) and Jessonda (Spohr). The singers were Mlle. [illegible] and Demorio Lablache, from Her Majesty's Opera.—Ibid.

Here is the programme of the 8th and "ultimate" concert. The singers were Mlle. [illegible] and her husband [illegible] Herr [illegible] playing the [illegible] Bach's Concerto; the Mendelssohn Concerto was played by Herr Auer, of whom the Times [illegible] speak in terms of praise.

PESTH.—Herr A. von Adelburg's opera, Zrinyi, lately produced with marked success, continues to be in favor. The local critics are unanimous in their praise of it.

BERLIN.—The members of the Singverein gave a special performance, under the direction of Herr [illegible], their conductor, in the [illegible] to celebrate the forty-third anniversary of its foundation. Among the pieces included in the programme were the motet a capella, "[illegible]," Palestrina; the [illegible] Mozart; and the "Kyrie," "Gloria," "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus," from Beethoven's C major mass.

INNSBRUCK.—A performance of Beethoven's C major mass and Handel's Samson, will shortly be given to celebrate the [illegible] anniversary of the [illegible].

SAARBRUCKEN.—The members of the Association for Classical Sacred Music recently gave a performance of Handel's Athalia.

MUNICH.—The second performance of Die Meistersinger was not given till the 28th June, just a week after the first, as both Herr Betz and Herr Hölzel were so fatigued by their exertions. The composer himself has since mysteriously [illegible] after the first performance, a great many rumors are assigned for this sudden flight, which is probably connected in some way with the fact of his bow off from the King's box. It would be unnecessary a very humorous notice of the power and rest in one of the court party and festival [illegible] to suppose that such an act would be allowed to remain unpunished. Wagner has, however, not gone to Dresden, where he was expected, but returned to Lucerne, to devote himself to his great work Die Nibelungen. That Wagner's opponents have been accused of being too bitter in their blame, has in the way of praise, I can't help it; simply to compare Herr Carnalin's story he gave in the Süddeutsche Presse. The orchestra can [illegible] the score of Die Meistersinger [illegible] a large abundance of unusual combinations of notes, each [illegible] of the [illegible] such movement of the kind, whether in [illegible], is [illegible] in an unmistakable manner." We cannot understand how a man can write such rubbish, and can only say in the language of the School of the Tavern [illegible] the [illegible]. Heaven preserve him from the friends! —A new [illegible] has excited a good deal of attention lately. It represents a splendid palace [illegible]. Surrounded with fatherly [illegible]. In which theatre the box is changed the castle will soon grow. The [illegible] of it, the [illegible] young man, and the [illegible] by [illegible] to the Bavarian [illegible] for the [illegible] place. Underneath it [illegible]: "Es soll der König mit dem Sänger gehen!" [illegible] The King [illegible] with the poet." —A new three act comic opera, Der Rothmantel, by Herr Krempel [illegible], has been accepted.

MME. VIARDOT'S LAST OPERA, "The Ogre," was recently performed at Baden to an audience of not more than fifty persons. These persons, however, were made up of Queens, Grand Duchesses, Princes, and Princesses, so the quantity was replaced by quality. The writer of the libretto played the principal character (none singing). Mme. Viardot played the Prince lover, the prima donna was Mlle. [illegible], of Dresden, a pupil of the composer, and Mme. Viardot's daughter, Claudia Viardot, [illegible] Paul [illegible] played the other characters. M. [illegible], Kapellmeister of Stuttgart, presided at the piano, and M. Louis Viardot was the prompter. The opera, founded on the well known fairy story, is characterized as enchanting, full of graceful melodies and fine harmony, perfectly written for the voice, so pleasant to [illegible], and in very good taste, inasmuch as there is no one voice, baritone, bass, nor male chorus. The female chorus is sung by eleven young ladies, all pupils of Mme. Viardot, and the success of the work was complete. There are fifteen numbers, and among them are especially signalized a grand [illegible], [illegible] reminiscence as well as a [illegible] [illegible] song, and some [illegible] of [illegible] in four parts. Marked improvement was observed in the last two years in the progress of the fair composer, and it is hoped that, [illegible] projected for Mme. Viardot will assist to a [illegible] to afford a wider scope for her talent.

Wagner's "Meistersinger."

Having copied, in our last, an unfavorable German criticism,—exaggerated, very likely, through its English medium,—we now translate from Le Ménestrel a portion of the report of one of Wagner's French admirers. At the same time, for the clearer understanding of the very [illegible] plot and incidents of Wagner's comic opera, we have transferred to an earlier page of to-day's Journal the larger part of the article in La Revue et Gazette Musicale which we find translated to our hand in the London Musical World. The musical journals, German, French and English, are full of the Meistersinger. The majority condemn; but there are a few strenuous advocates. One, in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift, has commenced a metaphysical, "world-historical" transcendental-æsthetic exposition of its beauties and deep meanings. He begins with the sweeping observation: "The poetical creations (Dichtungen—probably meaning poetry and music) of Richard Wagner are the ideal expression of the world-historical striving of our whole age." [illegible] And then he proceeds to show why it was necessary to Wagner, as the ideal exponent of the whole modern German development, to write also a comic opera. Perhaps we shall one day at least some abstract of his argument; but now it is our Frenchman's turn.

"First, the libretto. That time Wagner has broken with his own peculiar dramatic traditions. Here we are far away from sirens and the pagan pleasures of the Venusberg; we have no longer to [illegible] and cost of [illegible] [illegible] us on his legendary swan from the colossal heights of the Holy Grail, as in Lohengrin; the philters, the despairing love, the aspirations to [illegible] annihilation, in short all the accessories of the Muses of Tristan and Isolde, equally have disappeared. The action passes in a time and place not very far away from us, it is a [illegible] the imperial city of Nuremberg toward the middle of the 16th century;—but we find there at least our own instincts, our sentiments, our passions; we feel our hearts [illegible] palpitate and live there."

"I cannot explain to myself the severe criticisms which have been passed on this libretto,—some going so far as to call it deplorable. The economy of the action rests on three principal elements, each endowed with a rare skill (at least to my humble opinion) which are: 1. the sentimental element—the love of Walther and Eva, protected by Hans Sachs. 2. The comic element—the buffoonery of Sixtus Beckmesser, his grotesque lyrical effusions, and the more grotesque passion for Eva, which singularly enlivens the three great scenes; the serenade in the first act, the serenade and the squabble in the second, and the final competition in the third. 3. The pompous element, which has its place in the first act—the scene of the solemn assembly of the Meistersinger—and the finale—again at the end, the ceremony of the coronation—which fills entirely the last tableau, and of which the principal motives are reproduced in the overture.

"To be sure certain parts of the book are open to criticism. Especially the scene, in the first act, where Pogner solemnly announces to the assembled corporation that he will give his daughter in marriage to the hero of the approaching concours. Here the master jeweller exhausts your patience by the interminable considerations into which he enters. No doubt the piece is very interesting, musically; but, heavens! how garrulous the good man is!

"It is a strange and inexplicable thing:—Wagner in the composition of his operas preoccupies himself with everything, not a detail of execution escapes his attention; he goes so far as to indicate in what way, slowly or rapidly, the curtain is to fall at the end of each act. And yet this man so minute in all things, this poet-musician who sacrifices so much to the logic, to the truth of situations, will; see nothing like a [illegible] in [illegible] to the necessity of which absolutely compel the spectator. And observe, it is impossible to charge this, in the usual way, upon the musician alone; for we know that, in Wagner's operas, the librettist and the composer always march along together."

* * * * *

"Let us look now at the score. First, the structure. The magnificent symphonic piece has a considerable importance, and by its length—the overture to Tannhäuser is longer,—but because it bears a brilliant and complete reflex of the work to which it serves as a majestic frontispiece.

"The first movement (in C major) of the overture is the entire reproduction of the solemn march beginning the scene of the competition on St. John's day in the fourth and last tableau. This march, of a large style, of a proud and powerful gait, is accompanied by a well sustained counterpoint, on which the principal motive seems to rest as upon formidable underpinnings. Already you feel transported into the midst of old Nuremberg; you behold the procession of grave deans of the master-singers, rigid guardians of the secular traditions of the corporation. This imposing page bears no resemblance to the marches of Tannhäuser and of Lohengrin. But it is enough to have ever heard the Huldigungs-Marsch (march of homage) of the same author, dedicated to the young King of Bavaria, and composed four years ago, to be convinced that the last tableau of the Meistersinger was finished but a short time before Wagner addressed this homage to his royal protector.

"In the overture, a little before the appearance of the second theme,—which will be the triumphal [illegible] of Walther,—we remark a superb [illegible] of the march; here the phrase, pursuing its ascending movement and enlarging more and more, with a rhythm which accentuates itself on the same proportion; it is soon [illegible] on by a succession of retards and of major and minor seconds; then, as the culminating [illegible] of the phrase approaches, the instrumental energy increases in intensity until the terminal cadence is achieved upon a [illegible] of extraordinary volume and effect. This ascending phrase is a song of sublime enthusiasm; it is the word of Faust:

"Satan, [illegible] in höhere sphären."

"After this excellent episode, of incomparably bold and powerful [illegible], we [illegible] the [illegible] spaces to which the composer had transported us, [illegible] the moment the chief of the orchesers must redouble his vigilance and precision, while the hearer will lend his whole attention to what is about to rise from the orchestral depths. I will say more: if you have not an ear more than musical, you must resign yourself to seize but very imperfectly the first time at least, the curious dialogue which is preparing: for two themes, very different, are about to appear simultaneously, to develop themselves in continual interchanges. The first of these themes is the air which Walther will sing in the first competition, and which will win him at once the victory crown and the hand of Eva. The second theme, by an original choice, is on the contrary the piece with which Walther is to make a failure in his first examination.

"After this dialogue, which is prolonged through 30 measures, the picture changes anew: the first motive in C major re-appears in the key of E flat, in the form of a fugue that turns and circles tangled here and there with the remnant more of the second dialogue. We are in the heat of the overture; by these short fragments of themes, which rise and are swept away in the movement of the fugue, by the restless crescendo, by the rhythms clashing one another with an ever growing impetuosity we feel a near explosion. In fact at the end of thirty measures of this rolled trilled crescendo, a fortissimo bursts out on the chord of the dominant seventh of the key of G major; a chord spread out over the whole orchestral scale, where the basses which hold out a pedal end to bring back the piece to the key of C major; at the end of a diminuendo reminding us of that which precedes the return of the Chorus of pilgrims at the end of the Tannhäuser overture. Finally we reach the coda where all the themes and rhythmic elements employed are reproduced. The coda, which begins pianissimo with the triumphal air of Walther, recommences on the tutti, with the march of the commencement, in a movement tutti largo. [How long before our American composers will be affecting this [illegible] French phrase? one page [illegible]?] Here we find again, at the moment of the final fortissimo, the famous trill of which I have just spoken, and which now threatens not climbing the degrees of the major chord of the ninth. I do not fear to compare this last part of the overture of the Meistersinger to the superb finale of Beethoven's C minor Symphony [!]. It is prodigiously fine, as the boys say "immense."]

"As I have said, this overture by the composition of its themes and its polyphonic processes, is, in the genuine sense of the term, a complete preface to the score: that must explain the length of my remarks upon it. I shall now sum up as to the general traits of the three acts which follow.

"In Act I. I will specify the chorus of people of the congregation, whose expression with the personal gayety of their age, the probable recital of the examination of Walther. It has a charming youthfulness and a naivety. One notes, in hearing this chorus, sparkling with verve, if it be indeed the works of Wagner who has written these motives so fresh and short.—Then comes the scene of the Master singers, admirably reserved to hear the declaration of the jeweller Pogner relating to the marriage of his daughter Eva.—It speaking of the libretto, I expressed regret that the poet (one should make so much ceremony in announcing his resolution. But if we forget the jeweller for an instant, and only listen to the delicious babble of the orchestra,—and above all to the elegant arabesque of the violins,—we shall pardon father Pogner his interminable effusions.

"But here we have, soon after, the melodic pearl of the first act. It is the romance of Walther: "Am stillen Herd" (At the still fireside). I know nothing sweeter or more exquisite than this phrase; never, in the soft and melancholy kind, has Wagner written anything equal to it. Moreover, the whole following scene, which is but the development of this same phrase, is a perfect [illegible] it would, I am sure, charm Wagner's fiercest adversaries.

"I might say as much of the examination scene and the finale of the first act, but for the excessive length of these pieces. Yet there is here too a superb crescendo. Walther furious at the epithetical of Sixtus Beckmesser on his trial piece, becomes a butt to the raillery of the people. Convinced of the merit of his piece, he resumes the motive thereof in a tone more and more animated, while the young people also resuming their characteristic chorus, laugh more and more loudly at the protestations of the knight.—I hardly need to add, with a single reservation on the score of length, that this incredible piece, in which the master-singers take part in turn, is treated with a master hand.

"If most of the scenes of Act II were kept at the height of these relative importance, I should see nothing, absolutely nothing there to find fault with. Indeed this should only listen to my predilections and tendencies and go straight up to the constant charm of this symphony of an hour in which all chords vibrate in their turn, I believe I should accept this second Act just as it is. At all events it would be necessary to cite on Goethe's pages the duo of Eva and Hans Sachs, and the chorus of the quarrel. Melody, harmony, dialogue of voices and instruments, the duo of Eva and Sachs is one enchantment, one caress from beginning to end. As to the chorus of the dispute, I regard it as a marvel of musical realism; nothing is wanting there, not even the cries of alarm of the Nuremberg women which cries are heard, in the heat of the melée, under the form of a very high pedal note. All this is prodigious, without precedent. But if as I have already said the execution of the overture is only possible in a few orchestras, I am still more doubtful whose choral personnel is in a condition to confront this terrible scene. Yet should this execution fail in any point whatever, I can promise you the most frightful cacophony that ever caused a deaf man's hair to stand on end. Wagner was so admirably seconded in such scenes, backed by the artists of the royal theatre of Munich, particularly, and wrestling together with an exemplary furia, they sang with an [illegible] plomb and certainty.

"It is in the last tableau of Act III that Sachs relates his dream to Walther. It is also tableau we remark, besides a very beautiful quintet, the scene of the lesson given by Sachs to Walther, to prepare him for the concourse of St. John's day. The principal phrase of this duo,—the same in which I have already hinted at the contrary—is very beautiful and lends however in at a loss to account for its multiplied repetitions, seeing that it is to reappear in the following tableau, the ceremony of the concourse, sung at first by Walther and then by the final chorus. I admit that a license of such importance could not be given in a turn of the hand; but it seems as if the author might have varied more the melodic elements of this scene, the length of which is anyhow excessive.

"With the exception of a chorus written in the style of the purest compositions of Bach and Handel, this last tableau reproduces, with the developments that befit the addition of the vocal mass, the themes already heard, that is to say the grand march of the overture and the air of Walther's lesson.

"I will not close without one final glance at this score, in order to show that Wagner has not modified his style so radically as has been said.

"The truth is that, in the Meistersinger Wagner subdued by the nature of a subject which keeps itself almost always in the full light and in the temperate zones of passion, has modified a little his harmonic processes. No longer dealing with the heart-rending loves of Tristan and Isolde, he shows more sobriety in the matter of dissonances, more precision in his rhythms, and less frequent hesitations of key than in Tristan.

"But the fundamental principles adopted by Wagner for the conception of his lyrical dramas have not moved; only I repeat, the means have changed and hence the salutary influence which I have mentioned on the relief of the romance. The principle of unity in whatsoever cost, absolute unity has still prevailed in many scenes of the work, where the singers, the persons, have no musical relief except some instrument or other of the orchestra. To my mind, this is an error. It is just here that the new opera of Wagner is still somewhat open to criticism, and I have not understood that the singer, the individual role should be always absorbed in the ensemble. You will just to add that what was almost the rule in Tristan has become the exception in the Meistersinger.

"And now, in sum to say my opinion on the last work, I will say this. If the finale of the 3d act of Tristan, the scene of the transfiguration and the death of Isolde, did not exist, and if the representation of June 21 had been shorter at half an hour, the opera of the Meistersinger would be the master work of Wagner.

Music.

——A CORRESPONDENT of The Saturday Review (London) alluding to a performance of Haydn's Symphony in E flat, known as "Letter V," suggests who every lover of Haydn's music certainly will second:

Haydn stands greatly in need of some Nottebohm, a Thayer, or a Köchel, or Köchel, to prepare a chronological and thematic catalogue of his works, with a view a set ready in one royal octavo page with a complete and authentic [illegible] that have [illegible] to the artistic career of the [illegible] of the quartet and symphony. [illegible] is provoking not to be able to offer anything like precise dates to more than one out of some hundred works of a composer so marvellously fertile in productions.

——The programme of Mr. Benedict's annual concert, at St. James's Hall, comprised only fifty pieces, vocal and instrumental "which, with two or three exceptions, were all performed." For solo artists it had almost a dozen of any prominence in London operas and concerts, divers instrumental virtuosos and "an orchestra and [illegible] piano-forte." The Times must call us this [illegible] Mr. Benedict and in a well [illegible] account, Mr. [illegible] (Nemo?) would have arrived at such a concert. We think such achievements might as well be left to Nemo.

——One of the English papers tells us:

Professor Moscheles has composed a series of sixteen duets for the pianoforte which Miss Arabella [illegible] had the honor of playing [illegible] with the [illegible] and [illegible] a few days since. These pieces—which are published both at Leipzic and in London (by Messrs. [illegible])—are as fresh and charming as they are original. One of them, [illegible], is a masterpiece. Indeed, they are all, in their way, masterpieces.

We hope so, but it is some time since the old [illegible] used to produce works of genius, like the [illegible].

—The enormous salaries now paid to the opera singers, and the great expense incurred in giving massive benefit concerts, have, in more than one instance, [illegible] the [illegible]. Mlle. [illegible] was engaged [illegible] at the Crystal Palace Handel Festival and at a private concert in Belgrave Square [illegible] evening. [illegible] Such a fact's gain by [illegible] in London is unparalleled in ancient and modern history. Among [illegible] Grisi, and [illegible], the greatest singers ever known, when at the [illegible] of their popularity received less than a fourth of the terms now paid to Mlle. [illegible] for an evening concert.—Orchestra, June 6.

—Herr Georg Scherer has collected into a charming volume the "Village Songs of Germany" ([illegible]) which he has published in Leipzic (Alphons Dürr) with the tunes and [illegible] original woodcuts. These songs are full of character and nationality.

—The death is announced at his [illegible] near Mosen of [illegible] who was [illegible] by opera goers. He was [illegible] the [illegible] being [illegible].

—The rage for [illegible] contests is on the increase throughout the north of France and Belgium, and [illegible]. The [illegible] performers [illegible] their own, and [illegible] before the trial. [illegible] which the [illegible] the length of song, a bets for the various societies performed.

—We find the following in the New York Observer and the like statement having been going the rounds of the press for some time:

The [illegible] of Freyburg, in Switzerland, has the largest organ in the world. When in full play [illegible] forth a tempest of sound, through a forest of pipes, [illegible] thousand and eight [illegible] shaking the [illegible] foundations of [illegible] St. Nicholas church, in which it stands. All the musical bands in Boston, New York and Philadelphia combined would not swell an orchestra equal [illegible]. It is the work of one man named [illegible]. He was poor, [illegible] He [illegible] he formed the design of building [illegible] organ [illegible] from the [illegible] and [illegible] when heard [illegible] the darkness of [illegible]. And so great [illegible] he began his [illegible] and he persevered for long years, in the face of opposition and poverty and ridicule, until [illegible] finished together. [illegible] the [illegible] he persevered with the faith of a martyr till his work was done, and now it stands among all similar works in the world like Mt. Blanc among the mountains, peerless and alone.

There is a great deal of this sentimental and ignorant enthusiasm about famous organs,—especially among travelling correspondents of religious newspapers. The organ at Freyburg is not the largest in the world; there are many much larger organs in Europe; that of our own Boston Music Hall is full a third larger than the one at Freyburg. "Mt. Blanc among the mountains" a waste of fancy!

—The Saturday Review says: "There is a tragic in the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] be the [illegible] by us. His [illegible] when the [illegible] has "[illegible]" of the [illegible]. The [illegible] of the [illegible] appears from the fact that [illegible] of two hundred and fifteen pages, just [illegible] are comprised in the chapter of "Personal Recollections," which [illegible], after all, amount mainly to this, that the [illegible] has heard Mendelssohn play upon the piano. So that every thousand persons who have read [illegible] document it necessary to [illegible] shreds of Mendelssohn's published correspondence, diluted with a [illegible] commentary, and [illegible] with two or three [illegible] perfectly [illegible] letters; and a picture [illegible] as much as the [illegible] apology for his temerity in [illegible] the [illegible] of the wise men of Gotham. In a word, Mlle. Polko's work is a specimen of [illegible] making. The [illegible] features in some [illegible] concerning Mendelssohn's wife, who has hitherto been left much in the shade, but who appears to have been a charming woman, fully worthy of her husband.

LITTLE ROSE.

"What wakes me from slumber,
What music sounds so sweet?
Oh mother see who cometh
My to [illegible] hours to greet."

"Naught do I hear my darling,
And nothing do I see;
And no one cometh singing
A lullaby to thee."

"It is no earthly music
That makes my heart so light;
The angel's song,—they call me.
Oh mother, dear, good-night."

A SONG OF PARTING.

Farewell, my love, farewell to thee,
For we must part to-day.
A kiss, a kiss, oh give to me,
For we must part for aye.

A flower, a flower, O, give to me
Plucked from the golden bough.
No fruit, no fruit I take from thee,
I dare not ask it now.

THE TREE OF ROSES.

When in evening's latest beam,
Golden mountain clouds arise,
And Alpine [illegible] come to couch thereunder,
With them I often cry:
"Doth my [illegible] valley lie
There in that golden gleam?"

MORNING SONG.

Scarce my eye the sun's light [illegible],
Nor have yet the morning bells
In the dark valley rung.

And the woods, how still!
Only in heaven the young birds trill,
No song has yet been sung.

In the fields I've wandered long,
I have already sung of this song,
Which to the winds I've flung.

The Development of the Concert System, Concert Rooms and "Salons." Aristocracy, Plutocracy, Lovers of Art, and Mecaenates.*

In France the virtuoso merely occupies the position held by every other man of talent who is [illegible] agreeably to every one. [illegible], and it is a characteristic fact that none of our great virtuosos have settled in Paris. The truth is, these performers are not satisfied there, and authors, painters, and scholars are, some of the most fashionable society, in [illegible] more highly than the most celebrated virtuosi. In England the musician has no social position at all. He is either very celebrated and his services are secured and paid by the patrons of concerts, or he is a teacher. If [illegible] not, he is placed in a position to give a concert in some lady's drawing-room, the name of the latter fashionable ladies a lo patronesses, or to adopt the English expression, hono-

[illegible] their immediate relations [illegible] the programme. The English respect properly speaking only a celebrated composer, whom they regard as a high-class producer, but they have little or no consideration for the virtuoso. Germany is the country in which the middle, especially [illegible], is an [illegible] involved in all events of society being really the only person in whom the differences of social rank almost disappear. Social organization in Germany is [illegible] rather [illegible] may be summed up as follows: the monarch rules, the aristocracy represents, the plutocracy make a great display, and the middle classes take the floor. The monarch bestows or does favors and honor, the aristocracy patronises, the plutocracy pay, and [illegible] the middle classes [illegible]. An artist may endeavour to obtain the favor of the monarch; he may assert his independence towards the aristocracy, and will the plutocracy and make them pay him; but he belongs to the middle classes. This is [illegible] as [illegible] but, in each and [illegible] great German masters, such as Mendelssohn, Schumann (with [illegible]), Jews too, Beethoven, and many German musicians of less repute. Modern democracy [illegible] an established upon French traditions, and as represented by the followers of Liszt, were the first, takes the opposite path. Most modern virtuosos either [illegible] to the aristocracy or belong, like young noblemen, have to rank mention, and [illegible] to boast of sixteen quarterings. They associate with the plutocracy, although they [illegible] every day, has the mass of the middle classes, the [illegible] as narrow minds, very dangers. We frequently hear from them but [illegible] democratic sentiments, in the very time they are almost aspiring for very [illegible] in the course of some reigning prince. We are able to recollect a very great and celebrated musician conducting the very bad opera of a royal composer and receiving for so doing a high ranking [illegible] we involuntarily thought of the time of the answer made to Boileau, who when he was forced to consult on the [illegible] Louis XIV. when the latter read him some verses he had himself written [illegible]: "Sire," observed the poet, "you can do anything. You wanted to write bad verses, and you have been completely successful." We might address many people that most of the great [illegible] at one time preserve their independence less strictly than the great musicians. A [illegible] of perfect [illegible]. When any slight is shown to themselves personally they are certainly very brave, but they do not defend art.

Let us now consider the position of a musician in relation to the German aristocracy. Apart from the advantages of birth and the best education, on which points sufficient has been said for and against the aristocracy, appear to the [illegible] that [illegible] of society most likely [illegible] [illegible]. However perverted these may be, they are more consonant with his own feelings than that [illegible] founded upon gain, which calculates the value of everything by what it will fetch. The musician's ambition, too, may be [illegible] by the thought that he, in one of the [illegible] of the mind, may be accordingly appreciated [illegible] whom he [illegible] of birth. But in these cases, [illegible] upon correct conceptions, and in this [illegible] of imitation, lies the greatest danger. The artist and more especially the musician is far too prone to forget that he is a man of labour, [illegible] of the most [illegible] labour, far too prone to forget in the moment of success, that [illegible] of diverse [illegible] between him and persons of a superior rank.

Just a [illegible] to produce that inexplicable phenomenon by which heterogeneous bodies are momentarily [illegible], then I [illegible] immediately the phenomenon ceases, the wonderful [illegible] of music forms an [illegible] power between the [illegible] musician and more persons at a distance from him. He must not, therefore, be astonished if some persons, whom he has found extremely amiable after one of his performances, observe at another moment, when they do not meet him as a musician, only the most superficial forms of politeness. There is at work in the [illegible] [illegible] peculiar to it, which Goethe once defined as the "half poetry in [illegible] to the whole," and the effect of which [illegible] and the [illegible], [illegible], seductive and [illegible]. Many an [illegible] a man of [illegible], from his early [illegible] for [illegible], been placed in a state of [illegible] to [illegible], [illegible], and not to be [illegible] with [illegible] connections which point to [illegible] and [illegible]. We must see how [illegible] the [illegible] with the fashionable world [illegible]. The former is as well [illegible] while the latter is [illegible], a sort of [illegible] of the aristocracy, of [illegible] of [illegible] and of other ingredients, which [illegible] [illegible], and the great object of all is to get something out of some fashion [illegible] to amuse itself no matter what [illegible]—to-day at a concert, to-morrow at a race, the day after at an exhibition, and the day after that at a performance of La Belle Hélène. Many poets and prose writers have written on this most fashionable society, and I will here quote the opinion of those who formed one from their own experience. Goethe says:

"Dem Gedanken [illegible], [illegible] [illegible], Weil sie [illegible] [illegible] Gedicht, keine Gelegenheit gibt."

Byron observes:

"Is the great world—which being interpreted,
Meaneth the west, or worst end of a city,
And about twice two thousand people, bred
By no means to be very wise or witty."

Bulwer's opinion runs thus:

"The fashion, thin a set of a [illegible] people [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]."[1]

These quotations may, it is true, be set down as outbursts of cynical humour on the part of the three great poets. I will, therefore, cite some extreme passages [illegible] to be [illegible] from a book written by a man of fashion for the world of fashion. A Baron Mortemart-Boisse, Comte de Mard[illegible], in 1858 [illegible] of the Grand [illegible] [illegible], the Grand-Duke of Tuscany, published a book: La Vie Élégante des Gens du Monde (Hachette, Paris). In it we read that Count d'Orsay, the model of fashion in his time, spent one pound sterling a day for gloves (I knew the Count after 1850 and then he could not well have afforded them for the purpose); furthermore the book contains an exceedingly detailed description of [illegible] costume, and of the correct manner of saying a person [illegible], at page 248, is a eulogy of Paris, as the first [illegible] the [illegible] to the remarkable words: "Schiller with his [illegible] and hyperbolical genius has said:

Es glebt nur ein Kaiserstadt,
Es giebt nur ein Wien,"—

yet Paris will always &c., &c." It is a significant fact that, when treating of fashionable life, the worthy Baron never once refers to music. I am almost inclined to take this as a compliment.

[1] And I [illegible] a copy of Lord Lytton's work [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], I do not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the original English [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the "Pilgrims" [illegible].

or as an inducement to the musician that he had better not endeavour to belong to the world of fashion. Even should he hazard the attempt, he must make up his mind to be disregarded by the plutocracy, for they are decidedly a component part of the fashionable world. All the young sprigs of the nobility, of the gold-ring, the barons of the price-current lists, the cotton lords, who patronize music, because it is an article of luxury, and because a party is kept together by music better than by anything else—all those people who flock to wherever the nobility is assembled, all such people belong to the fashionable world. The art is never cared [illegible] for by them. [illegible] confound its plutocrats who would play [illegible] been as any employed as [illegible], in the [illegible] from music [illegible] and recreation for [illegible] and friends—a man of this description belongs to the middle classes—but all those who have pitchforked upwards, the successful building speculators, who would now pass, themselves, for political personages, the bold gamblers of the stock exchange, and even the half-learned who, thanks to a rich marriage, have suddenly [illegible] (in the eyes of many) great artistic knowledge—such [illegible] of the numerical race of parvenus belong to the plutocracy, among whom they find a welcome and a justification. They will always find men, more connected with art, who pay them court and towards whom they can give themselves the air of Maecenases.

But to speak accurately it must be said that they merely give themselves the air of Maecenases: they exhibit no similarity to the celebrated friend of the Emperor Augustus, to the man whom Horace so often sang and whose name has descended as an inheritance upon every patron of art even down to the present day. What Tacitus said about him in his Annals I will not quote, because the great Roman historian was a man who would have nothing to do with the fashionable world. Other and less austere judges, however, among the Romans give us a picture of him that by no means presents [illegible] patrons of art. He possessed a profound knowledge of precious stones, and everything appertaining to dress; he was the first to introduce the [illegible] at Rome, but whether from love for the art of [illegible] is a point that cannot be with certainty determined. He was one of the most competent authorities on the culinary art, and, according to Pliny, [illegible] of a peculiarly [illegible]. At his richly furnished table, [illegible] and volatile, were welcome; but, above all, Bathyllus the dancer, and Tigellius, the singer, the latter of whom played so great a part as any [illegible] of the present day. Horace describes him as a man who, at one time walked solemnly about, as though the [illegible] of the universe were resting on his shoulders, and at another [illegible] along the street as though [illegible] from his enemies, who [illegible] with the pomp of potentates and [illegible], and then after [illegible] an air of modesty, being contented with the smallest of silver [illegible] by company—a man whom the [illegible] brotherhood of boon companions would [illegible] a sensible man: quippe tempora [illegible]. —Really that Tigellius was the very ideal of a modern singer at some Royal or Ducal court! After Bathyllus, the dancer, and Tigellius, the singer, Horace and Virgil were, so to say, the favorites of Maecenas, who was fond of [illegible] poets. He made the former a present of a small estate, which, according to Suetonius, was worth about [illegible] had thrown away on Virgil [illegible]. Virgil, who had lost a little property at [illegible], was recommended to Augustus, and the latter gave him, also, a small estate, for which the poet in the Bucolics praised him as a God. "Deus nobis haec otia fecit." Another point of resemblance between the Roman Maecenas and the Maecenases of our own time deserving of especial mention is, that the literature and poets and scholars had no influence upon his art [illegible] culture; and that in prose, as in verse, his style was most bombastic or absurd. Of a truth, the greatest artist can have no greater gratification than to hear certain people considered Maecenases.

But, Heaven be thanked, art is no longer compelled to appeal to this class. It has friends and admirers who work to advance its interest all the more profitably because they do so without ostentation. Many a man, of whom the fashionable world knows nothing, pours out his offerings with an open hand upon the altar of art—and many a man who belongs to art avoids talking of what he does. Tigellius and Bathyllus are as well adapted for the Maecenases of the present day, as they were [illegible] years ago, for the founder of the name. But the true Maecenas is, now-a-day, a citizen of the world—and he certainly must expect less from individuals, if he would regard himself as belonging to all.

A Man of the Time.

(From the Orchestra, Sep. 1.)

The musical editor of the Athenaeum has just laid down the baton and retired from the post [illegible] of [illegible] the concerts and [illegible] of musical opinions with the public. For nearly forty years Mr. H. F. Chorley [illegible] well known and deservedly respected—but, in the columns of the Athenaeum and in the [illegible] of judgment on the change of the musical world [illegible] of the great and important [illegible] of popular journals [illegible] authority [illegible] in all matters connected with music. [illegible] he has done to the [illegible] paper [illegible] the satisfaction of the public, and notably with much credit to himself.

The position and duties of a musical editor to a newspaper are of new creation, and Mr. Chorley [illegible] one of the first occupants of the new bench. Forty years ago no morning paper had its musical editor and [illegible] reporting in any proper sense of the word was confined to the two papers—the Times and the Spectator. On the Athenaeum was Mr. Holmes, the well known professor of his day, and [illegible] author of the Life of Mozart, and many [illegible] in the Magazines and Quarterlies of the time. On the Spectator was Mr. Edward Taylor, afterwards Gresham Professor of Music, [illegible] Judges of those things, and Messrs. Holmes and Taylor were [illegible] engaged in the consideration and welfare of high and classical music. Both lived outside the church, and had small esteem for the [illegible] and yet both, [illegible] more for church music than [illegible] and by their writings did much to draw attention to the miserable state of music in the [illegible] Church and the means and appliances necessary for its [illegible]. Fifty years ago the opera and the [illegible] had [illegible] share of attention in the daily press, and [illegible] Mr. Ayrton in the Morning Post put out some [illegible] on the performances of the Ancient Concerts and the Philharmonic Society. To the distinguished manner in which the latter gentleman so long [illegible] the Harmonicon [illegible] need only give a passing acknowledgment.

At the advent of young Mendelssohn, there was no one on the daily journals [illegible] competent to weigh his merits [illegible] Mr. Holmes could [illegible] Weber and [illegible] Bach; [illegible] Mr. Edward Taylor at first took the young aspirant for fame under his protecting wing. [illegible] changed, and the musical [illegible] of the Spectator [illegible] calculated [illegible] the opening [illegible] of [illegible]. The Grand Festival in Westminster Abbey, the establishment of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the growing importance of the [illegible] Norwich Festivals, and the presence of her Majesty (then the Princess Victoria) at the York Musical Festival, gave an [illegible] of the highest class, and more attention was bestowed on musical criticism in the daily journals. The Times newspaper began to issue long and elaborate notices on the efforts of the art and artists, and the Morning Post specially engaged a musical editor as an accredited and formal branch of its establishment.

Music, had by this time made great advances in its outward mechanism, and a corresponding advance in the science of art-criticism was as quickly realized as it was imperatively called for. The popular exhibition of great art, growing out of deep knowledge and strong feeling, seemed to create [illegible] faculties of perception in the [illegible], and it was [illegible] the novel [illegible] desire to search into every part of the composer's work and to [illegible] to record the [illegible]. No ordinary talent was required to lay open the secret springs that guided the great artist in the progress of his work, and it is but justice to record [illegible] of the [illegible] journals [illegible] a sense of [illegible] and propriety that [illegible] the sympathies of the great musicians of the day, and secured the confidence of the public.

Among the original troupe was Mr. H. F. Chorley, who in spite of his prejudices and predilections stands forth a shrewd, broad-seeing and thoroughly honest critic. His writings have been narrowly [illegible] yet no one can point out [illegible]. Considering [illegible] place and time [illegible] he was what he thought [illegible] there an upright and unbiassed journalist. Whatever he [illegible] as an artist and art—[illegible]—all as truly and justly [illegible] as far as [illegible] judging [illegible]. Not unfrequently his judgments [illegible] dissenting from his contemporaries, and some of those judgments he has lived to see accepted by the public, and verified in every way by the course of events.

Besides his contributions to the Athenaeum, Mr. Chorley has published his [illegible] Recollections, commencing with the year 1830, and before the appearance of the [illegible] he had given to the public a [illegible] of musical life and the state of musical [illegible] here and on the continent. There [illegible] almost [illegible] a string [illegible] attempt to describe [illegible]. Ordinarily he [illegible] delicate, and reflective [illegible] rather [illegible] quaintly, and sometimes sarcastically. Occasionally he is somewhat too dogmatic [illegible] more rarely his [illegible] target on the [illegible]. Mr. Chorley generally ignores the church, and his musical standpoint is therefore the opera. His [illegible] historical notes upon the progress of the [illegible] as may [illegible] the works of Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, [illegible] and in the [illegible] of Meyerbeer, Berlioz, and Wagner. He [illegible] for having at first right [illegible] Gounod, and he has uniformly pressed the claims of this composer upon the attention of [illegible]. Many would not agree with all that he has written upon Gounod, but [illegible] the success of the Faust and [illegible] his prophecy was fulfilled [illegible]. When Mr. Chorley first came before the public as an operatic critic, the Italian Opera was simply a grand display of song [illegible] were all in all. The band was of small importance, and the scenery a mere thing of shreds and patches. Pasta and Malibran, Rubini and Lablache [illegible] nothing for scenery; and two fiddles and a bass would have been quite enough for all their wants in the way of accompaniment. There was no Costa and no Apollo in those days, and Pasta would probably have treated the conductor as an unnecessary [illegible]. [illegible] Hayes [illegible] Kind the opinion of Mr. Chorley with regard to [illegible] a singer [illegible] the [illegible] head, and there was an end of it. Knowing also, as he did, the greatest persons, and being ble-

Mlle. Adelina Patti's Career

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette," July 28th.)

The season just terminated at the Royal Italian Opera, although on the whole by no means one of the most prosperous in the history of that establishment, could not have ended more brilliantly than with the ... combination of entertainments presented the other night for the benefit of Mlle. Adelina Patti ... an act from Romeo e Giulietta, an act from Faust, and an act from La Figlia del Reggimento. In each of these operas—the first two of recent growth, the last about a quarter of a century old—Mlle. Patti has earned some of her fairest laurels; and for the purpose of displaying the versatility of her talent a better choice could hardly have been made. Of the Juliet, the Margaret and the Maria of Mlle. Patti there is nothing new to say. Their conceptions are now as familiar to opera-goers in London, and their merits ... It is not our usual custom to pay attention to such matters; but, as it is possible, though we trust improbable that this new turn of fortune may sooner than later deprive the Italian lyric stage of one of its brightest ornaments, we are tempted to refer to it, and further to take the opportunity of briefly recapitulating the history of Mlle. Patti's past career in England. Few lovers of Italian opera can have forgotten the universal regret caused by the almost sudden death, at St. Petersburg, of that admirable singer, Mme. Angiolina Bosio, in April, 1859. With her it seemed that we had lost the only genuine Italian soprano on the Italian stage. Her place was supplied at the Royal Italian Opera by Mme. parents, both Italian, and both exercising the same profession as herself, left Europe when she was scarcely a year old, and her first successes were obtained in America, North and South, where she was already famous before she came to England. It has been justly said that while Europe has sent many famous dramatic singers to America, in sending us Adelina Patti the New World has amply paid off its debt to the Old. Should we lose her now, we shall lose that which the Italian lyric stage can ill spare.

Marriage of Mlle. Patti.

The much debated question whether Mlle. Adelina Patti would really [illegible] —and a marquis to boot— [illegible] wedding [illegible] was finally set[illegible] on Wednesday by the performance of the ceremony. The wedding took place on Wednesday [illegible] the [illegible] ceremonies, the religious ceremony. French law requires the performance of a civil procedure, the publication of banns and registration of the contract. Sacred Music.

[illegible]

In our juvenile days we remember [illegible] in the house of a [illegible] lady, when an organ [illegible] He was not in [illegible] expected [illegible] Even a [illegible] the [illegible] We have [illegible] If we succeed [illegible] for certainly the only [illegible] we should never hear [illegible] again. There have [illegible] with a large number of the middle classes? Are there not many persons who will listen with resignation to compositions manifesting not even the germ of religious impression, provided they are told that the word "sacred" is engraved upon the title-page? And if this [illegible], is it not likely that it will be [illegible] supplied with the article it requires? Weigl, the composer, was once asked why he did not write any more operas. "Ah!" he answered, with a sigh, "I am getting old; I have no more ideas; I now only write Church Music!" If our readers ask for some specimens of the individuals who are satisfied with the mere outward semblance of a faith, let them search even in the advertisement columns of a daily newspaper and they will be at once assured of their existence. We select one which appeared a short time since.

TO DISSENTING MINISTERS.—WANTED, a Young Man of Christian principles, [illegible]

It would be curious to inquire how this [illegible] young gentleman's Christian principles are to be shown in action. Being fully impressed with the vanity of worldly display and [illegible] of finery, how can he do otherwise than [illegible] his feelings by dressing [illegible] shop windows [illegible]. Again [illegible] "pushing" [illegible] good-will [illegible] mankind? Why this is [illegible] for a mercy?

Whilst serious words can pass for religion, is it [illegible] that sacred music should pass for religious music? It may be asserted [illegible] but [illegible] that Handel's air "I know that my Redeemer liveth," for instance, [illegible] but the music [illegible] expressing [illegible] Composers who have true religion in their hearts [illegible] the religious market, [illegible] "sacred" [illegible]

It has been well said by Mr. [illegible] A. Macfarren, in one of his articles on the "Music of the English Church," [illegible] popular [illegible] "has been seized upon with [illegible] popularity for the local [illegible] system." [illegible] "The tune of Miss Ann Catley's Hornpipe [illegible]" [illegible] "Shepherd's Dream" [illegible] "Dream of the Night" [illegible] the Church. Could more [illegible] proof [illegible] adduced, that the [illegible] members of a congregation [illegible] religious [illegible] provided only that they have been [illegible] sacred [illegible]

[illegible] the Church [illegible] religious [illegible] remarks. [illegible]

But out of [illegible] Protestant Church [illegible] family circle. [illegible] Sabbath [illegible] art [illegible] Church [illegible] pianoforte pieces, with [illegible] by the bungling "arrangers," and also, which by some sacred title, are made to look religious; with vapid and tedious variations, [illegible] it high time that a warning voice should be raised against a system so pernicious in its effects. The best specimens of real sacred music [illegible] and are to be purchased at a price within the reach of every one. Why, then, have recourse to bundles of heterogeneous materials labelled "Sunday Recreations," or "Holy Recreations"? Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and many others, have supplied us with works which [illegible] that religious words can only be united to religious music by those [illegible] impressed with the sacred nature of their task.

But it would be good, if possible, to [illegible] of such music by the occasional introduction of compositions which [illegible] "sacred" by the composer, are no less capable of producing the truest feelings of devotion. We agree with Mr. Macfarren (as we have already said) in his assertion, that the words to which music has been originally set, will intrude themselves upon the mind whenever the notes are heard; but we particularly wish to enforce the fact, that instrumental compositions have no such character [illegible] them. It is true that certain "[illegible] sacred [illegible]" [illegible] but, [illegible] determined by the feeling of [illegible] composer. Some of the slow movements of Beethoven's Sonatas, many of Bach's [illegible], several of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte" [illegible] and his [illegible] "Ave Maria" [illegible] The [illegible] of real works [illegible] will tend materially to elevate the tone of Sunday evening music. Our opening remarks as to the [illegible] who [illegible] The subject has the deepest [illegible] reflect upon [illegible] music is not necessarily religious because it is dubbed.—Novello's Musical Times.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 29, 1868.

Annual Congress of Musicians "of the Future."

In this hot and lazy period of "suspended animation" in our own musical world, and while the [illegible] more attractive than the best of music, the journal [illegible] naturally looks abroad. Even the London [illegible] season is now over. Nor is there much of interest in Paris, beyond the dry details of the annual examinations and concours of the Conservatoire. In Germany however the summer solstice seems to warm the "Zukunft" element into life: it finds [illegible] in the [illegible] high festival. Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz seem to have it all their own way of late. The Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift, founded originally by Robert Schumann, and once the vehicle of so much fine [illegible] and sound criticism in music, seems now almost entirely preoccupied with Wagner worship. The two great Feste of the new church of late have been the performance, at Munich, of the "Meistersinger von Nürnberg," (of which we have copied some accounts) and more recently the five-days Congress or Convention of the principal apostles and disciples at Altenburg in Saxony. Probably for one who wished to form some clear idea of the spirit and tendency of the new school, and what amount and quality of musical creative faculty [illegible] there might be among its more zealous members, it would have been well worth the while to be present during these five days. But as we were not there, we propose to translate a good portion of the daily report of proceedings, made in the interest of the movement and by its friends,—of course without endorsing its opinions. Should we find dissenting criticism, also, which give internal evidence of weight and of sincerity, we may draw from those afterwards. Meanwhile we begin with the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, of July 24.

THE TONKÜNSTLER-VERSAMMLUNG IN ALTENBURG FROM THE 19TH TO THE 23RD OF JULY 1868.

The Congress was opened on Sunday, July 19, at 11 o'clock A. M., by a musical performance in the Brüderkirche. Bach's Motet "Jesu meine Freude" was performed under the direction of Musik-director Riedel of Leipzig, by the chorus of Riedel's Verein, [illegible] by the ladies Anna Drechsel, [illegible] Martin and Marie Gutschebauch from Leipzig, the Court-opera singer [illegible] of Dresden, and Herren Albert Goldberg of Brunswick and George Henschel of Breslau. The [illegible] of the old master, with [illegible] joy of faith [illegible] rhythms, defying all [illegible], was rendered in the exemplary manner [illegible] Leipzig, [illegible] and [illegible] failed not to surprise the hearers.

The [illegible] of the meeting followed about noon in the Aula of the Gymnasium, through the president of the Union, Dr. Fr. Brendel, who pronounced the customary words of greeting. Then Counsellor Oswald Marbach [illegible] address [illegible], "The regeneration of Drama and poetry through music." The speaker made the only possibility of raising the Drama out of its present decline depend upon going back to the Greek [illegible] harmonious co-operation of poetry [illegible] in the historical course of the separate development of these arts [illegible] advantages which have been won through the development of those arts singly will be [illegible] help towards the restoration of the drama in its complete sense. This stirring address was met with [illegible] applause.

On the evening of the same day, under Riedel's direction, [illegible] in the Brüderkirche occurred the first concert for soli, chorus and orchestra. The works performed were the Requiem by Berlioz, and Liszt's Thirteenth Psalm; the chorus again by Riedel's Society, the tenor solos by Herr Schild, and [illegible] by several solo singers male and female, selected from the meeting.

The Requiem by Berlioz had never been performed in full before, except in Paris. That heretofore there has been [illegible] call for an acquaintance with the work in Germany may be [illegible], partly in the [illegible] demands it makes in point of [illegible], and partly to the peculiar difficulty which [illegible]. Only Riedel's Verein some years ago in Leipzig in one of its regular sacred concerts brought out its first movements. The first of these obstacles was not to be got over in the present performance [illegible]. Berlioz prescribes an extraordinary strength of orchestra. For instance in the Dies irae [illegible] 10 pairs of cymbals, 12 horns, [illegible] 8 trombones, [illegible] tubas, [illegible] trumpets, &c. The instruments are to be divided into five orchestras, [illegible] principal, and four accessory. Could the forces have been got together, the room would have been wanting and a far larger [illegible] would have been required for the [illegible] of [illegible] . . .

The impression of the whole work was a powerful one; in parts, as in Dies Iræ, Rex tremendæ majestatis, and the Sanctus, it was thrilling, piercing through marrow and bone [illegible]. About [illegible] peculiarities, to be sure, [illegible] and conceptions of the time, audacities of style, unheard of means of expression, opinions may have been divided; many a hearer may have had his [illegible] reservations or have uttered them aloud; the [illegible] of the music may have struck [illegible] strangely in the beginning; yet by the gold [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of style, with which it [illegible] and objectively embodies so peculiar a conception of the world, and presents [illegible] [illegible] whole [illegible] certain satisfying conviction [illegible] unprejudiced hearers, whose hearts and [illegible] are open to the inmost import of all Art [illegible] of unaccustomed forms. The chief obstacle to the [illegible] of Berlioz lies, as [illegible] in the mixture of French and German elements, by which [illegible] is characterized. Berlioz is the first Frenchman who has taken up into himself elements of German life and feeling, and thus shown a depth of artistic conception never before known among his countrymen. Only this deep feeling [illegible] as the prevailing field of a picturesque-poetic creative activity, it does not stand forth so [illegible] dependently so purely [illegible] in such [illegible] as in the German Art, but in the form of the French "esprit" in the noblest, deepest sense of the word. His way of [illegible] by [illegible] his musical fancy [illegible] at vital [illegible] from a poetic picture-world conceived with glowing energy and carried out into the least details. All is steeped in poesy [illegible] the grandeur of the poetic conception [illegible] the [illegible] of his creations, the power of [illegible] as well as the sweet and glowing coloring. These traits pervade all of his creations; but in the Requiem there is especially a [illegible] of conception [illegible] by [illegible] upon the [illegible] of form an original [illegible] wealth and variety of musical invention, a shaping energy and sure mastery of the entire technical material which must compel the [illegible] respect even of his strongest adversary. Moreover each division of the whole [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] in atmosphere [illegible], so [illegible] [illegible], is clear [illegible] distinctly [illegible] from the other parts. * * *

Berlioz, to all appearance, expressly [illegible] develops the [illegible] contents of each single movement to a dramatical progression [illegible] at least, according to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] so that one has [illegible] to regard the movements as a certain series of acts. Thus the Dies iræ [illegible] [illegible] post begins in a [illegible] moderate movement, the echoes gradually [illegible] themselves [illegible] [illegible] rhythm [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] all is single instrumental phrases, [illegible] like [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] of all the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] hand [illegible] with its majestic [illegible] The [illegible] of the strongly [illegible] [illegible], as well as of the combined male voices, answered in a [illegible] by the female voices in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] overpowering and startling effect. One can imagine from [illegible] what a crushing effect [illegible] would have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the directions given by the author in regard to the grouping of the executive body!

To give those unacquainted with the work an idea of the [illegible] tendency and planned form [illegible] [illegible] we must call attention to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in which in the song of the tenor with the instrumental bass [illegible] the main theme of the Dies iræ [illegible] interrupted by [illegible] while [illegible] [illegible] sing parts the same melody with expressive declamatory accents, so that all speaks the most eloquent and touching language.—On hearing the Lacrymosa with its broad and edifying style, never following the subject, its weighty phrasing and its mighty climax to the end, many a person, who knows Berlioz by hearsay only as a vague poetiser and a composer speculating upon instrumental effects, will have found himself agreeably disappointed.—Very peculiar in design is the Offertorium (which B. himself entitles "Chorus of souls in purgatory"). The purely musical principal [illegible] [illegible] to the body of instruments, which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] while the [illegible] of the chorus [illegible] two notes forming [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. In a word, every movement surprises you anew by the originality of the conception and the significance of the musical treatment. But what a brilliant coloring is spread over the Sanctus * * *

The writer goes on to lament the exclusion of such "epoch-making" works as this of Berlioz from the programmes of "low-going" Art institutions, and thinks [illegible] [illegible] any one become a pessimist and fault-finder generally. But here we must take leave of him, reserving for the next time what he has to say about the Psalm by Liszt.

Mr. L. H. Southard, the well known composer and teacher and one of the most intelligent and thorough of American musicians, is about to take leave of Boston where [illegible] [illegible] won a high and justly [illegible] [illegible] position in his profession [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in Baltimore. He has accepted an [illegible] to preside there over the formation and growth of an Academy of Music in connection with the Peabody Institute. So important and promising a field of labor [illegible] [illegible] declined, in spite of Mr. Southard's love for Boston, and the [illegible] [illegible] which will be felt here of [illegible] loss.

The new position is one which he is to build up to a great measure for himself; but he will have the Peabody fund behind him, and he enters upon the work with the best assurances and sympathies of all the friends of music and of [illegible] [illegible] in Baltimore. The plan is a large one. It is not merely to build up a music school [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a classical and high order [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Southard personally will be chiefly engaged with [illegible] [illegible] higher branches by the [illegible] of orchestral concerts, oratorio performances [illegible] and by lectures, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as well as by [illegible] [illegible] of organ [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible], he will seek to [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Then in the matter of orchestral concerts, he already finds [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Symphony Concerts with which to educate the ear and sense of musical form first by the model Symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, then gradually the grander [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven, Schubert and the rest. We shall not despair of the [illegible] of Baltimore, if it be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the word. Mr. Southard [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of character, as well as musical accomplishment, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] he is a man to [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which it is an [illegible] [illegible] Baltimoreans to have [illegible] to him.

Milton G. Pope. The newspapers have published the sad intelligence of the death, by drowning, on [illegible] last, of this young man who was one of the most valued among the clerks in the music store of our publishers, Messrs. Ditson & Co. The sad event occurred at Campton, N. H., at the Pemigewasset [illegible] where he was spending his short summer vacation. Young Pope was the son of Rev. Rufus Pope of Hyannis, Mass. His age was twenty years. He enjoyed the confidence and high esteem of his employers and associates.

Newport, R.I. Among the pleasant recollections of this lovely place, during a fortnight's stay, we found some of a musical character. Miss Alide Topp, the wonderful pianist, is spending a few weeks there, and besides receiving a great deal of attention in the fashionable world, has twice played in public. First, she generously lent her aid in a very successful concert of two lady amateurs, residents of Newport, and created the greatest enthusiasm by her playing of a piece by Raff—"Raff" it was printed on the programme! Some classical pieces for two pianos were finely played, we understood, by the lady concert-givers. But for that occasion we were too late. On Monday [illegible] [illegible] Miss Topp [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the violinist from New York, Mr. Mauritz Meyer, whose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] sort of show pieces [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] might as well have been dispensed with. Miss Topp's own playing was superb, and [illegible] [illegible] very best, although the capital [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Fashion [illegible] [illegible] proof of itself by small attendance. The enthusiasm and applause [illegible] of the few hundreds who were present [illegible] of the sort that [illegible] [illegible] hopes for another one. And we hear the influential [illegible] have already taken the thing in hand and made the success of a second concert more than beyond peradventure.

We also heard an opera in Newport. "Stanwich's Opera House" is the [illegible] scene of the new [illegible] [illegible] Theatre! We heard, and saw, [illegible] [illegible] performance of Der Freyschütz, than we had ever supposed possible [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the Incantation scene. There was Frederici, to be sure, as charming as ever in the part of Agatha, and Himmer was up [illegible] as Max. But the [illegible] was a [illegible] chorus singer, the chorus of [illegible] [illegible] were a feature one [illegible] who sang [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to feel [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a song by Max and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the rest of the [illegible] being [illegible] [illegible] the orchestra of about a dozen [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as its [illegible] of number [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Zauberflöte or the Gazza [illegible] Martha the next night we are told went better.

Orchestral Music in Boston.—The list we copied, in our last, of novelties performed in the New York orchestral concerts during the past four years [illegible] [illegible] to look into the state of the case in Boston. Here the list for three years is quite as large and quite as interesting and contains the better part of the New York list. In the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association the following works have been heard here for the first time:

Season of 1865-6.

Schumann's "Abendlied," arranged by Joachim.
Overture to "Anacreon," Cherubini.
Polonaise in E, for piano, Weber, transcribed with Orchestra, Liszt.
Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann.
Piano Concerto, in G, op. 58, Beethoven.
Symphony in C, No. 2, Schumann.
Chorus of Dervishes, from "Ruins of Athens," Beethoven.
Overture to "Fierabras," Schubert.
Introduction and Allegro [illegible], [illegible] [illegible], op. 43, for piano with orchestra, Mendelssohn.
Toccata in F, arr. by Esser, Bach.

1866-7.

Piano Concerto, in A minor, Schumann.
Piano Concerto, F minor, op. 21, Chopin.
Piano Concerto, F sharp minor, [illegible] Hiller.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, Schumann.
Overture to "Les Abencerages," Cherubini.
Piano Concerto, No. 1, E flat, Beethoven.
Symphony (the "Parisian") in D, Mozart.
Aria (Contralto) "Erbarme dich," with violin obligato, from the Passion-music, Bach.
Rondo, op. 29, piano and orch., Mendelssohn.
Concert Aria, "Non temer," with violin obligato, Mozart.

1867-8.

Overture, "Weihe des Hauses," in C, op. 124, Beethoven.
Overture, "In the Highlands," Gade.
Overture to "Medea," Cherubini.
Alto Aria, [illegible] [illegible] from a Cantata, Bach.
Concerto for two Pianos, Mozart.
Symphony in C, Haydn.
Overture, "Ossian," Gade.
Piano Concerto, No. 1, in C, Beethoven.
Symphony in D, No. 2, Mozart.
Triple Concerto in C, op. 56, Beethoven.

In the Orchestral Union Concerts we have had during the same time:

Concert Overture, in A. Julius Rietz.
Overture to "Medea." Bargiel.
Overture to "Das Heimkehr." Mendelssohn.
Symphony in B flat, No. 4. Gade.
Overture to "Les Francs Juges." Berlioz.
Concerto, for clarinet, [illegible]
Overture to "Nibelungen," Norbert Burgmüller.
Suite, in E minor, F. Lachner.
Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert.

To these add the two following works first brought to notice here in the great Festival of last May:

Reformation Symphony (posth.), Mendelssohn.
Piano Concerto, in E flat, Liszt.

A Monster Orchestra.—In the last Tonkünstler-Versammlung (Meeting of Musical Artists—[illegible]) at Altenburg, a Requiem [illegible] was performed in the orchestration of which no powerful instruments except the [illegible] appear to have been omitted. In the [illegible] the band [illegible] 16 [illegible], 4 [illegible], 8 [illegible] of cymbals, 11 horns, 4 cornets, 11 trombones, 4 tubas, 4 ophicleides, 16 trumpets &c. [illegible]

Gottschalk in Buenos Ayres.—Here is a charming specimen of the [illegible] which follows everywhere in the wake of this sensational pianist. A Boston paper translates it from the French Art Musical which reproduces it from the Nacional of Buenos Ayres:

"April 4th.

"A rumor was being circulated since early evening that Gottschalk was to arrive, and the [illegible] [illegible] was literally [illegible] by a crowd anxious to see this great artist.

"It was a lovely night, the perfumed breeze of the [illegible] [illegible] softly moving the foliage, and the moon [illegible] [illegible] on the [illegible] [illegible] hidden amongst acacias, rose trees and [illegible] trees.

"A [illegible] the passer by, attracted by the [illegible] harmony were [illegible] in front of a small house, a [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] of [illegible] beauty.

"In this enchanted house hospitality was given to the [illegible] of America—[illegible] was in the [illegible]. Through a [illegible] [illegible] we could see the great pianist. [illegible] inspiration, [illegible] [illegible] fixed upon [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the splendor of a South American night, the poet [illegible] allowed his harmonies to flow in torrents, [illegible] all the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. As the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] from celestial spheres. [illegible]

"Upon [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] we gained the well worthy of the [illegible] [illegible] surrounded [illegible]. Twenty young ladies were [illegible] around [illegible] [illegible] was then playing his last composition, La Jeune [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] on the piano [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] This scene had a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

"The [illegible] [illegible] the flowers, the lovely sky, the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] darker the shades of the park [illegible] [illegible] of an [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] it marvellously for [illegible] of the best [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to his [illegible] [illegible]. Yes, [illegible] Gottschalk, the [illegible] [illegible] composer, the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the best part of his triumphs to [illegible] [illegible] and other charitable [illegible]. The [illegible] of the Orphan Asylum of Buenos Ayres propose to offer him a large gold medal."

Rossini as [illegible] [illegible].—All sorts of bon mots are ascribed to the [illegible] author of "The Barber" and of "William Tell." Many of them are probably [illegible] [illegible] of newspaper paragraphists. But we have no [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] upon the "Music of the Future" more [illegible] and [illegible] expressed than in the last sentence of the following letter to the director of the Milan Conservatory [illegible] the old Maestro ("whose operas," it is well said, "are more likely to be the [illegible] of the future than Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan, the Meistersinger and the Nibelungen") has lately published in the Revista of Milan:

"[illegible] Master [illegible].—Nothing could be more agreeable to me than to receive your letter containing the interesting [illegible] table in reference to the pupils of the Conservatory of Music, which you have directed for many years with so much [illegible] and intelligence, with truly exemplary devotion. I was not ignorant of the brilliant results which you had obtained during the last twenty years, and I take much pleasure in offering you, dear master, as well as the excellent professors who have so ably seconded you, the tribute of sympathy and the sincere compliments which are due to you, and which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

I cannot understand how any such [illegible] could be discovered or the [illegible] [illegible] which the [illegible] [illegible] addressed to me. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] between the Minister and myself there [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Could I have kept [illegible] [illegible] of so much importance? Haydn's Symphonies.—Apropos of the [illegible] mentioned in our last, we find the following statement:

As stated in a letter from Mr. George Grove, secretary of the Crystal Palace, we may hope for some classification of Haydn's symphonies, [illegible] [illegible] work on this subject, by Herr Pohl, of Vienna, the author of Haydn and Mozart in London. It is time that such [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphonies [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] Farewell, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Schoolmaster, Military, [illegible] [illegible], La Chasse, The Surprise, &c., of which few people know the origin or meaning.

The [illegible] critic of the Pall Mall Gazette, speaking of a performance of Don Giovanni, says: "[illegible] [illegible], however, but [illegible] [illegible] for a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Annual Congress of Musicians of the Future.—Tonkünstler Versammlung in Altenburg, July 19-23.*

To the grandeur and simplicity of the Requiem by De Lisle the Thirteenth Psalm by Liszt (also performed on the evening of the first day) forms a characteristic counterpart by its less sensory depth of feeling, by the prevailing tender coloring, and a corresponding warmth of [illegible] Hence the touching heartfelt simplicity the noble popular [illegible] all artificial, the artist profound, whereby the composer [illegible] his own religious need to that of the community and identifies himself with that; hence the immediate moral [illegible] as well as the poetic [illegible] the picturesque objectivity of the representation, and of the ideality of conception and of feeling.

The plan of the work shows a wonderful psychological architecture, which we are tempted to point out at least in its outlines. The first half of the Theme describes the downcast mood of the believer even to distrust in God, but which just at the [illegible] of danger [illegible] suddenly [illegible] gives place to a joyful confidence which awakens fresh life in him, arms him with new courage, and leads him on to final victory. The principal theme (I) introduced at the very beginning, and [illegible] at the very foundation of the whole, is this:

Joined with the mournful first phase in the development of the feeling explains the situation. A thought which [illegible] leads back to the second half of the principal theme forms the instrumental fugato (II) which now follows, and which depicts the [illegible] the soul conflict of the believer, while chorus and tenor solo form an independent, essentially homophonous group against the orchestra. In a third ([illegible] "Consider and hear me, O Lord," A flat major III), the same theme suffused with an [illegible] and [illegible] splendor of instrumentation, and [illegible] by the [illegible] figures of the [illegible] and violas, assumes a profoundly [illegible] and suppliant character. Yet the mood becomes even more [illegible] and there now begins [illegible] a psychological [illegible] in connection with the words "Lest at no enemy say I have prevailed against him, and those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved." To represent graphic traits the composer [illegible] a battle picture, whose thematic [illegible] formed again by a thoughtful modification of the same theme. The under-fifth in the third measure (see above) here becomes a questioning and [illegible] upper-fourth, as if alluding to another passage in the Psalm: "Where now is thy God?" The battling waves gradually exhaust; but the long-drawn sighs of the wind instruments and the [illegible] of the same theme, mostly in [illegible] intervals, point to a more quiet and subdued state, the broken spirit of the wrestler against God. Then as if the clouds divided and a mild ray of hope broke through flutes, clarinets and horns intone the same theme and lead over to a fourth phase of feeling (IV) expressed in the words "But I have trusted in thy mercy; my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation." The musical rendering of this passage (A major) is of overpowering [illegible]. The rest of the Psalm is an ideal [illegible] of the foregoing, shadow, but in the light of the new and [illegible] joyfulness. Next the third group "Consider" &c. (IIIb) brings in [illegible] the principal key A major; then [illegible] to the cross of the [illegible] (a cavalo) lead into a powerful fugue movement, whose correspondence with the second phase of Victory (IIb) is obvious. The instrumental fugato expresses [illegible] conflict, in which the soul entangled in [illegible] doubts, turned to arms [illegible] against [illegible] but now [illegible] at [illegible] in final action to the new subject [illegible] of its moral life. Now tenor solo as well as chorus take part in the stirring action; [illegible] The fugue movement flows into a final [illegible] of the second main theme ("But I have trusted" IVa) [illegible] and [illegible] crowning hymns in a majestic apotheosis of the same theme (Ia).

The return to the beginning completing the circle of the psychological development is already sufficiently indicated through the instrumentation (stringed quartet, horns, clarinets, bassoons). But as the coda must [illegible] as a poignant [illegible] sum up the whole dramatic musical development we find here also the ideal substance of every one of the four phases, specially characterized above, summed up and blended into living spiritual unity in the glorified main theme. The thematic substance of the choral part is carried back to groups III and IV, while the humane, noble movement of a trumpet solo tells like a fanfare of the victorious issue of the contest.

Thus all the single parts work together as one great mutual relation; no trace of anything arbitrary "of wrestling with form"; and that the composer has willed comes to exhaustive expression. Clearest artistic consciousness, [illegible] in shaping and [illegible] freedom and immediateness of musical [illegible] and feeling here join hands and in harmonious cooperation present an artistic whole beautifully complete in meaning and in form, which will never fail to take hold of susceptible hearers—and in fact did not fail in this performance here, though many a [illegible] with prejudices hard to get aside, may have had [illegible] about some particulars. We left the church heartily exalted. * * *

And the execution! All devoted to it their best powers, their entire attention. Out and here alike a mighty fervor for each individual capacity lies at the height that each contribute to the realization of an extraordinary undertaking. We must justly mention in the first line Riedel's society, steady, unwearied champion for all important artistic appearances. To them, these all applies the word that repeatedly forced itself upon us during the performance: Man grows with the greatness of his aims.

* * * Such unconditional devotion to its task is only attainable in a Society which systematically [illegible] all speculation upon external success [illegible] from its proper goal and seeks [illegible] constancy to the ideal one [illegible] duty of its members. [The remainder of the account of the first day's performances is [illegible] of praise in general and in detail, of the performers,—Riedel's Society, the tenor soloist, Herr Sch[illegible] the orchestra, and the organist Herr Papier of Leipzig. The report is signed "F. Stade." The report of the second day is furnished by Herr Hermann Zopff.]

Second Day.

Monday the 20th offered two important concerts, but taking a great number of novelties.

At 10 A. M. the concert for Chamber Music took place in the hall of the "Concordia" Society. For besides the programme consisted of: Trios for string instruments (op. 3, in D major) by C. Horn; two movements of a string quartet by C. G. Riedel; Violoncello melodies by J. Huber; Organ Fugue by H. Zopff arranged for two pianos; pieces for one piano by C. Thern; Trio (op. 16, F major), and a Suite by Wilhelm Speidel; besides Lieder by M. Hartmann, Ph. Rüfer, O. Tiehsen, Eckert, A. Horn, and Hm. Riedel, and various well-known works to be mentioned here. The executants were Messrs. I. Meyer of Darmstadt and Wiedemann of Leipzig; the Court opera singers [illegible] of [illegible] and Wallenreiter of Stuttgart; the pianists Paul Speidel of Stuttgart, F. Zopff of [illegible] W. [illegible] and Louis Thern of Pesth; the violinist [illegible] and Cabisius of Stuttgart. Concertmeister Jacobsohn of Bremen; the contra-basso [illegible] Simon of Sondershausen; [illegible] Hermann of Lübeck; M. Meyer of the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig; and the chamber musicians [illegible] and [illegible] of Altenburg and [illegible] of Dessau.

The Trio by Speidel of Stuttgart, represents the South-German standpoint of production in a way entirely worthy of respect. Admitting this standpoint, with its special regard to fine sonority, to transparency of design strictly adhering to the classic forms, and to unpretending natural flowingness of harmony, the Trio strikes us as a whole as very favorable impression through the freshness and fineness of its invention, based upon models like Mendelssohn, Beethoven and Schumann, yet by no means showing a want of independence and betraying a rare flexible talent. The main theme of the first movement, gushing forth in a F [illegible] fresh stream, is also rhythmically interesting; while for the second one a straight [illegible] and noble Cantilena is selected. The following Andante begins soulful and melodious in the Beethoven style, passes afterwards into impassioned strains with characteristic rhythms, and turns toward the end with warm and beautiful slender. The movement might be still more effective, if on the one hand, the main thoughts, here frequently [illegible] up and broken off, were to spread itself in a full and ready flow; and if, on the other, many a prolonga-tion, which allows the interest to cool off, were left out. In a more free but better-colored style is the pleasing and attractive Scherzo and its harmoniously fascinating Trio, while the last movement in its main theme, takes a bold, high-soaring start, and like the first, concludes with the sixth-position of the second theme. The whole work may be counted among the better and more extensive productions of the most recent past.

Not less deserving of our warmest recognition is the Octet of the Lübeck Kapellmeister, G. Herrmann, for 4 violins, 2 violas, 'cello and double bass. It moves in a sphere resembling that of motets like Beethoven and Spohr, without betraying lack of original invention. To be sure the composer among these has chosen eight solo instruments, might have made more use of polyphony and a more independent prominence of the lower instruments, in place of many [illegible] figures of accompaniment. This he has done only in single passages, for instance, very effectively and pleasingly in a fine [illegible] [illegible]. But the work, ever so it stands, shows a respectable talent for this kind of composition, and a skilful mastery of means. Among other things the addition of a double bass gave advantageous coloring and binding to the whole. The truly fine movement shows in its second half to an effective grandeur and contains pithy as well as rhythmically interesting movement. Then follows an elegiac Andante full of feeling, and so evenly and richly carried out that it may be called a wide-reaching [illegible] in [illegible], which is given to so few musicians to let a sustained movement flow along with real depth of feeling, yet with gladness and satisfying measure. The Andante is [illegible] by a novel and capti[vating] Scherzo will character and rhythms, and a Trio colored with a certain Hungarian [illegible] which might have served for more extended treatment. In the last movement, too, the happy note and experienced impulse of the leading thoughts is [illegible]. This work was deservedly applauded and with lively applause, in a second [illegible] [illegible] on the 28d.

The second part of the concert opened with two movements of a string Quartet by Carl von Bo[illegible] of R[illegible], which by the elegant [illegible] and [illegible] pretending [illegible] of the piece secured being seated in a [illegible] circle of heartily-listening [illegible] [illegible] to chamber music.

The violoncello melodies, by Joseph Hüber, are unpretending pieces, [illegible] in style and easy of execution. Carl Thiere's Nocturne and Scherzo for two pianos are a couple of very tasteful brilliant salon pieces in the nobler style, and at the same time interesting by the [illegible] and often truly characteristic rhythms.

As for the rest that in solo song composition, the Lieder chosen upon this occasion were generally much less striking than those of the former meetings.

[To be continued.]

Sunday Music.

(From the London Orchestra.)

Music publishers have at last made the discovery that there is a great want of proper music for the English family "on a Sunday at home." The want is a pressure of supply, mostly and mainly are very [illegible] with high tone songs with sentiment, and some with no tone at all. Firms of long and reputable standing in the trade are becoming [illegible] "sacred music-ware houses," for all that is strong and satisfactory to those of our countrymen who are desirous of [illegible] up the pleasures of piety with the works [illegible] [illegible].

We have in these columns again and again [illegible] on the necessity of putting life and heart [illegible] into our Sunday music, and to affect it is the [illegible] but must be connected with the spirit of worship. Indeed, this is the base upon which all great art is founded, and from which all great [illegible] has thus been produced. The history of art in music is short and simple. Music was given man primarily as the thank-offering to his Maker, and the divine order of ritual in national worship expressly declares music to be the absolute necessity of its vehicle. The history of music further shows us that where nations fell into idolatry, music was taken away from those nations, and, as a fact, ceased to exist with them. Further, those nations who [illegible] music by neglecting its cultivation and majesty in their national worship [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible]—the production of an artistic school [illegible] from that which had been created for the sanctuary and of infinitely less power over the strong feelings of the human heart. In cases where Christian nations fail it needs in their church services such as unprepared to produce musical composers, and are [illegible] out from the musical art-world as spots of darkness and corruption.

Music as our readers well know is the expression of [illegible] a heart speaking in the universal language of sounds. It has its material [illegible] its manner or form, progress and development of those ideas; and its spirit which is [illegible] to [illegible] the mind, soul, and body of man, the creature, in harmony with the Creator. The world in its right state, is simply one harmony of the [illegible] [illegible] was created it; and man can [illegible] all are really great that disturb this harmony, and what he may be in the way of interference cannot [illegible]. Where there are ten volumes of church music that we may term sacred, there are a hundred volumes of operatic music dead and passed out of all memory. There was a good-hearted [illegible] German composer of the last century named Weigl, who in budget-ness and dependence asked Mozart how he made his operas. "It cost me all the trouble to [illegible] [illegible] Weigl, so I had to find out." The man wrote some operas which he composed to be sung, but of which these days can look only these without disappointment and disgust. The poor creature had an idea of some, in the proper sense of the term for when asked why he no longer wrote operas, he answered, "Alas! I'm getting old and have no more decay to fall. I can only write church music." We hardly need say Weigl soon after departed for other regions, taking his "church music" with him.

We have been led to these observations by some remarks upon church music in one of our contemporaries [illegible] other [illegible] this month. In noticing the present state of church music in England the writer lays it down that if we must be [illegible] sacred music, for that old church composers were grand fellows after their [illegible] [illegible] but the "sacred" composers of the present day may be divided into three classes. First, composers who write for "the religious market." It would seem these are not lacking indeed. They are "[illegible] arrangers," and their efforts are "degrees," "washes," "[illegible]," "[illegible]" "[illegible]," without any sense of the sacredness of the trust [illegible] to the religious composer and all that they do is simply pure shams. The second class are those sacred composers who, "having learnt the trick of sacred harmonies, use them without any amount of religious sense on any given occasion."

The writer tells his readers that there is the artistic side of church music which he [illegible] describes as "the trick of sacred harmonies," and he admits that without this learning it may be of no use for such sense sacred to be produced at all; and he further [illegible] says a that he who has learnt what is called the art of a church [illegible] compose religious music whether he [illegible] be a [illegible] or not. But feeling this not to be true, he arrives more correctly to himself in laying it down that the third class of sacred composers are those who write from "the germ of religious [illegible]," having a real religion in their hearts, and feeling that religious words can only be legitimately [illegible] to [illegible] music. It is not enough to learn "the trick of sacred harmonies, the composer must also carry the truth of true religion in his heart. In fact, art becomes nothing and religion everything.

All this is a very loose way of writing, and can be productive of no good result. We grant unreservedly, that the man who sets himself at work to supply so much music professedly at so much a page, without any knowledge of the elements and original purpose of church song, and without any command over the [illegible] of church harmony, is a good-for-nothing hack, powerless for producing or even adapting any good music; and all that he does is mediocre and dishonest, depressing and disgusting. We [illegible] with no satisfaction the admission of the writer, [illegible] properly to compose a piece of church [illegible] [illegible] must first be trained in [illegible] [illegible] and the uses of it being. He [illegible] [illegible] this knowledge as the trick of sacred [illegible]—meaning, of course, to assert that [illegible], as the foundation of worship, consisting of [illegible] and forms, the necessary [illegible] of its existence. We are free to admit that a man may have the artistic command of these foundations of church music, and yet not be able to master any devotional or reverential feeling in his employ of them. Many a hard head, hard heart and a hard hand are to be seen every Sunday in some church pulpits—engaged in dealing with the most gracious and lofty subjects, and he [illegible] [illegible] most fear its [illegible]—and yet exercising no [illegible], and [illegible] producing some of the [illegible] of the hearers. There are wooden preachers in wooden pulpits as well as wooden musicians in wooden galleries, and alas with wooden congregations. But we deny that "religious experience" alone will make what the writer calls "a composer of real genius." The moment of art is a means properly executed in nature as the servant of [illegible] [illegible] worship without a perfect knowledge of its everything and all of his art and the composer who [illegible] the [illegible] knowledge of art [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of worship, is in one sense, all [illegible] religious music whatever he may be engaged upon. [illegible] [illegible] could not a Holly [illegible] harmony of the universe, so give outward and expression to feelings [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Handel's an opera or in opera as [illegible] [illegible] when he portrays [illegible] the [illegible] best and highest feelings of our nature, [illegible] [illegible] the opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his oratorio. What can be more devotional [illegible] than that song of Handel—"Lord remember David," and yet he wrote it for an opera, [illegible] Sosarme, the greatest opera singer of the day. Take, again, the grand scene of Cæsar before the tomb of Pompey in that most grand [illegible] the opera of "Julius Cæsar." [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] more sacred music in the "[illegible]."—are they not all [illegible], written in the highest forms of sacred music, and [illegible] [illegible] and amongst the [illegible] of worship? There must be the power in [illegible] the poet, and where the piety is real it [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the power.

Handel indeed had his special "trick of sacred harmonies" if we are to understand by that term that he had a [illegible] for his secular compositions perfectly opposed to, or differing from, that which he used in his sacred composition. The [illegible] [illegible] the "Messiah." And the glory of the Lord," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The second chorus, And He shall purify" is made up from a secular duet, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] chorus "All we like sheep." The chorus, "He spake the word," in the "Israel in Egypt," is not Handel's at all, for it is the composition of Stradella, being a serenata given by a [illegible] to his mistress, performed [illegible] by two orchestras in two coaches. The Hailstone Chorus is taken [illegible] from Stradella as [illegible] in the pretty manner of [illegible] led them forth like sheep." The chorus, "Egypt was glad," is [illegible] by Kerl [illegible] the chorus, Let us break their bonds asunder" is another by Krieger, and in Krieger is [illegible] the four subjects in the last chorus of the "Israel," the "Horse and his rider." It is true all of these compositions were written by artistic composers, who had learnt "the trick of sacred harmonies," for if these movements had not been a true [illegible] of high art they would not have suited Handel's purpose. It is harmony they are full of [illegible] [illegible] gy and joyfulness, and all the highest attributes of the spirit of worship, that they met the wants of the composers of the "Messiah" and the [illegible]. Handel never borrowed silly, stupid, dull or doleful tunes, to be well aware of this description was utterly opposed to all religious emotion. The word "religious" implies an ever-present sense of obligation, but obligation associated with the highest pleasures the human being is capable of. And it was this strong appreciation of the union of what we may term animal delight [illegible] forms of worship [illegible] A reference to the old [illegible] the high [illegible] Thornton the founder of [illegible] the worldly [illegible] dore of St. Isidore on the Margarita [illegible] —a reference we say [illegible] of these romances in liturgical history will demonstrate that real worship may [illegible] the gratification of that noble part of man's being—his body.

No authors of [illegible] can be said to be found in English [illegible] and we [illegible] if England, as a nation, at the time Handel came here, would have [illegible] mourned over the burning of all the anthems ever written by Gibbons and Lawes, Rogers and Child.

There is now what is called a great revival of the spirit of musical worship. To be of any real value, it must settle down upon the everlasting foundations of church song. That is the history of all reforms in church music. [illegible] fell back upon the old chorale and put an end to the masses as the "Armed Man" and other popular ditties of his time. Bach and Handel took the Lutheran forms of the old ecclesiastical melodies, and in this way made Germany the first of musical countries. Vogler [illegible] Weber and Meyerbeer with the ancient [illegible] music, and hence we have the old [illegible] songs in the modern operatic chorus. Mendelssohn hated this kind of [illegible] and he turned the feeling into its right direction. Not one of these great [illegible] grand [illegible] music. That, however, the two rivals were the best friends whenever they did meet, and went [illegible] together, so that [illegible] and on their own [illegible] is also a matter of [illegible] at the present day. Some persons may, perhaps, take objection to the fact of Haydn and Hans Sachs being thus placed in juxtaposition, [illegible] account of the long space of time by which they are separated, [illegible] of the much greater [illegible] attached to the name of Haydn [illegible] of Hans Sachs. than before him. It is not necessary, moreover, that a composer of comic opera should be a fantastic trifler, [illegible] of harmonic syllables that are flesh and nothing more. Real humor and pure and harmless fun are more likely to be the offspring of genius and purpose than the creations of talent which indulges in mad pranks and recklessly defies the laws of order, and more than that, of decency. Auber, Rossini, and Donizetti have written comic operas, and wedded humor to [illegible]. These men rank with the old masters of English comedy, while Offenbach is in the position of those very [illegible] by the [illegible] to tickle the public fancy with [illegible]. [illegible] His music is sometimes funny, but it is oftener contemptible. He presents the spectacle of a man who has won [illegible] popularity without [illegible] of genius or merit, [illegible] purely fictitious [illegible] composers whose genius [illegible] compared in [illegible]. There is more genuine [illegible] in one of Strauss's waltzes than in the whole of Offenbach's compositions, and yet there are thousands who know of Offenbach who never heard of Strauss.

And Offenbach [illegible] incapable of doing anything better. He made one attempt to [illegible] in legitimate comic opera in Paris, and failed [illegible]. A second effort was made to compose music for a [illegible] ballet at the Grand Opera, and again his [illegible] was demonstrated. He does not know the true [illegible] and [illegible]. He does not comprehend that [illegible] language of all [illegible] of man, with [illegible] expression as wide as the range of human feeling and [illegible]. [illegible]

But if musical [illegible] and folly were the most heinous of M. Offenbach's faults he might, perhaps, be forgiven. Unfortunately his offence is greater. He is the man who has [illegible] the [illegible] in Paris. [illegible] La Belle Hélène [illegible] La Grande Duchesse [illegible] Barbe Bleue. In Orphée aux Enfers [illegible].

The London Telegraph gives the following résumé of the past season at Drury Lane, and of the singers, a part of whom (not including Nilsson, the Titiens [illegible]) are [illegible] according to report, will soon be in New York.

The season opened on [illegible] the 28th of March, with "Lucrezia Borgia," an opera which is no longer [illegible] [illegible] of being [illegible] when it is efficiently performed. No artist has ever [illegible] at the beginning of his career more [illegible] than Mr. Santley, [illegible] all obstacles. For the sum of real [illegible] the word "impossible" does not exist. The [illegible] of Mlle. Titiens on one evening when "Il Trovatore" was announced, brought out very [illegible] the ready capacity of Mlle. The Autograph of Handel's "Messiah" Photographed.

One would like to know [illegible] some persons [illegible] It is well to [illegible] of contemporary [illegible] with the [illegible] of [illegible] his genius—

"A [illegible] approach to [illegible],
And ever-ringing avenues of song."

Still more difficult is it to suppose that one so gifted and so brave—for Handel was, in his way, a hero—[illegible] to greater present reward than the brightness of that fadeless summer of success which came to him when in the "[illegible] and yellow leaf." But, however this may have been, it is certain that of anything remotely [illegible] his genius the annalist never dreamed. "[illegible] of gigantic [illegible] were possible (he was once told that his music demanded armies for executants), but a reproduction of his autograph of the "Messiah" [illegible] could not have entered into his wildest imaginings.

It has long [illegible] to [illegible] the heavens with an unerring guide, brought home to us the rocks of the earth and perpetuated the changing glories of the heavens. Now [illegible] this [illegible] has [illegible] form of [illegible]. It was a happy idea that led the Sacred Harmonic Society to [illegible] the [illegible] of Handel's greatest work and [illegible] of [illegible] have interesting and important results. We may now hope to [illegible] the scores of [illegible] the great masters reproduced in the [illegible] and the masters themselves [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] and mark the [illegible] in which their concepts [illegible] took shape. [illegible] facsimile [illegible] Beethoven, [illegible] characters of Mendelssohn, [illegible] longer and more [illegible] than in [illegible] Schubert—by which we [illegible] the [illegible]. Yet the [illegible] the Sacred Harmonic [illegible] of homage to Handel.

[illegible] a pleasant [illegible] and hardly [illegible] to have an interesting [illegible] general public. The least curious of [illegible] cannot [illegible] creating presence. Even [illegible] the [illegible] which he produced [illegible] know how [illegible] came about. [illegible] world-famous and [illegible]. The various stages of [illegible] that [illegible] the [illegible] of Handel, the Apollo [illegible], or "Paradise Lost," would [illegible] an almost universal [illegible] feeling [illegible] in connection with Sir Joseph Paxton's glass palace than its first design on blotting-paper. The volume under notice, therefore, has an interest for every body. To a great extent it [illegible] and kept [illegible] which can not but be felt with regard to one of the finest masterpieces of art.

This "Messiah" comes at an opportunely [illegible] [illegible] volume [illegible] handsome [illegible] that [illegible] and interest.

It is easy to gain some insight into Handel's character from the volume under notice. We may laugh at the [illegible] and [illegible] who advertise their [illegible] correct [illegible] but they have merely [illegible] enough to make it ridiculous. This "Messiah" [illegible] proof. Has [illegible] special [illegible] for the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] agree, [illegible] of those who [illegible] the advantage of Handel's personal acquaintance. The [illegible] of the composer, for example, [illegible] is [illegible]. At one time he writes [illegible] and [illegible] to approach [illegible] of [illegible]. At [illegible] he seems to have a [illegible] which [illegible] the paper at speed and by no [illegible] upon the order of his going. At another it is plain that [illegible] laboured [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] them [illegible] with the [illegible] the [illegible] subsequently [illegible] by Mr. [illegible]. No [illegible] could have produced the "Messiah" manuscript. [illegible] work of one quick [illegible] an [illegible] about [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] a man of [illegible] [illegible]. According to the [illegible] [illegible] Handel [illegible] with [illegible] for because of an imperfect [illegible]. A [illegible] can hardly be imagined. [illegible] pages are free from blots and erasures, but [illegible] to suppose the [illegible] of abstraction, [illegible] thought about. [illegible] the work [illegible] a banker's ledger. [illegible] great or small [illegible] erased [illegible] according to the [illegible] of the [illegible]. Something, too, of his physical [illegible] be gathered from the writing. It must have been a heavy hand that penned such coarse, rude characters. No quill could [illegible] by itself for [illegible] so huge and [illegible]. The "Messiah" score, in point of fact, is just what might have been expected from the burly [illegible]. It reflects his physique [illegible] the splendor of his genius.

Interesting as it is to observe all this, and more [illegible] upon [illegible], the attraction of the volume lies in the fact that it shows us the "Messiah" [illegible] immortal work first [illegible] from the composer's brain. [illegible] of the [illegible], Handel [illegible] again [illegible] good deal of [illegible] and [illegible] long [illegible] balance. By help of the [illegible] every change that made [illegible] be traced.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 12, 1868.

The Musical Prospect.

What good music is in store for us this coming season? is a question often put to us of late, and often difficult to answer satisfactorily. There are newspaper [illegible] predictions, guesses, but as yet no announcements. The most that can be publicly reported is a certain busy hum of preparation; plans are forming, orchestras and choirs are rehearsing, and the silent work of programme making (which is a kind of work of art, a composition in its way) is taxing a few brains more severely than most people, who only hear and enjoy good music, can well be aware.

It is safe, we think, to promise of Boston that we shall have as much and as good orchestral, choral and chamber music the coming winter as we had the last, and even better.

The Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association will be no less than usual in the field, no [illegible] [illegible] number. There have been [illegible] and whispers about them in the newspapers, often incorrect; but all agree [illegible] the fact that the concerts are to be, as last, to begin early, which people [illegible] home from the country and the seashore have mistaken the [illegible] announcements. And Mr. Peck, at the Music Hall, as well as members of the Committee, are even now beset with [illegible] for season tickets, which shows a considerable degree of eagerness. [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] reserved and [illegible] will be ready. It takes time to organize such concerts, and for the [illegible] the [illegible] are not [illegible]. Meanwhile so much is [illegible]. There will be ten Symphony Concerts ([illegible] more than last year), beginning on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 12, and continuing regularly once a fortnight until March 18. Two of the subscription series [illegible] [illegible] or two [illegible] concerts besides. They will be in the Music Hall, of course, with essentially the orchestra of last year, only with such improvements as may be found practicable. Mr. Zerrahn, now in Europe, will return soon after the middle of October, in season for the first rehearsals, and will bring to the [illegible] his [illegible] and delicate task of conductor which he has discharged so satisfactorily, new light and new impulse from the hearing of orchestras and intercourse with leading musicians in England, Germany and France. Mr. Eichberg is already every day expected home, and also Mr. Wulf Fries.

As for the programmes, the very [illegible] of the three past seasons [illegible] the problem of selection. Most of Beethoven's Symphonies, all the important ones (those which have any concert vogue) of Mozart; the great Schubert Symphony in C; the most desirable, perhaps, of those by Schumann, &c., have been given in these concerts and given repeatedly. So have most of the great overtures. Other works of these kinds had grown so familiar in other concerts, that their presence could be spared awhile. To such [illegible] extracts of standard masterworks, classical in a [illegible] would be [illegible] from the intention of these concerts, which is to make sure and permanent [illegible] the community at least one clear [illegible] of unquestionably good music as a standard and corrective amid superficial shifting tastes and fashions. One feature in the winter's programmes will be a large allowance of the Symphonies of Haydn,—those models of perfect symmetry and elegance, which lie at the foundation of the whole symphonic art so far as it can be learned by example; while they are so fresh and pure and so balanced in their spirit, so right from a [illegible], cheerful, loving heart, full of well-ordering wisdom, of fathomless invention of exquisite graces and surprises of fancy, of humorous heat lightning in the midst of [illegible]. True one cannot listen to Haydn so long without weariness as he can to Beethoven; one may, by constant repetition become cloyed and dull to him. He seldom stirs so deep a chord as the great symphonists who came after him, from Mozart to Schumann. But [illegible], with Father Haydn, is not at all our case. It is strangely seldom that his Symphonies have been heard in Boston; only two or three (and these are published [illegible]) during the last three or four years, in only [illegible] [illegible] figured often on the programmes, but never anything like so often as Beethoven's; never till their ideas, their moods, their style could possibly become commonplace. Older musical publics have begun with Haydn and so have grown up, through Mozart, to Beethoven with these familiar as household words, schooled first in the classic models, such publics were prepared to listen with discrimination to the newer prophets and could even be safely trusted to indulge their curiosity about Liszt and Wagner. Boston began at the other end of the course. In our symphonic culture we were put in the first class before we were freshmen. We began with Beethoven; the glorious "C minor" was our first love thirty years ago; it was played here repeatedly, and it must have been heard hundreds of times in Boston since. All the Nine, the choral Ninth included, have grown familiar here; the least familiar is the Eroica. The best of Mozart are not strange to us. With Mendelssohn and Gade, even with Schumann and Schubert we have held more converse than with dear old Haydn. Yet old music-lovers all come back to him with a sincere delight, sure to find in him even more than they had given him credit for in their days of young [illegible].

There may have been a period when we were a little blasé to his ever-temperate elegance and [illegible] cheerfulness; but a Haydn Symphony, well played is sure to charm the most experienced concert goer at any time. We remember listening to one one evening, in Halle with Robert Franz, and how the music ran from head to foot grew radiant and laughing with delight. The two already given charmed the Harvard audience and it will be so again. It is the design to give at least half a dozen more of them this winter. They will work in well by contrast sometimes in the same programme with another symphony; one, for instance, with the "Reformation" symphony of Mendelssohn; another with the "Italian;" another with Beethoven's sunny No. 8.

Of other composers most of the old favorites of course will be repeated, and some noble works be given for the first time; for example, the Symphony in E flat by Schumann. So too with overtures; treasures new and old remain still to be shown, as appears we have had few by Cherubini and there are still more. It is probable that the season will open with Beethoven's Dedication Overture (Weihe des Hauses) and the Eroica Symphony grand and too seldom heard; while it is decided that the brilliant pianist Miss Alide Topp will play on that occasion one of the Chopin Concertos. The season will be rich as usual in Concertos, for piano, violin, &c. And there will doubtless be occasionally something choice in the way of singing.

3. ORATORIOS. The Handel and Haydn Society have not fully shaped their plans but it is certain that they will give a performance on Thanksgiving week—"Elijah" is talked of—and of course the "Messiah" as usual at Christmas time. There is a sincere thought of taking up, for a novelty, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which was so successful at the Birmingham Festival. And it is by no means impossible that the old Society will brace itself up to the work of making a strong, long siege upon Bach and revive one of those time-old wonders at the study of the "Passion Music" as it is in force [illegible] next Spring. After the triumphs of last May this would seem to be the one brave essay, the most worthy of the Society's ambition. It has shown that it can be all on for a great Festival, this would be style in such a new way, like which it of far more consequence; this would seem to be the natural next step of real progress for it keep the height that we have gained and must go over our. It would but new era in the Handel and Haydn history to have done this, not but it can fairly make good the [illegible] and claims, and place itself on a level with the great Choral Societies of Europe as it is passing, thence until it has done this.

4. CHAMBER MUSIC. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club will begin to give us classical string Quintets, Quartets, Trios, &c. after the first of January. Why not a short season (say of four concerts) before, and another after New Year?—We presume the two larger "Conservatories" will also furnish the usual hours of music of this kind for their pupils and friends.—We see as likely in many accomplished classical pianists; Lang, Leonhard, Parker, Kreissmann, Dresel, &c. All these give what concert [illegible] they have a [illegible] not are not informed, but while we have them with us, Beethoven and Bach and Mendelssohn and Chopin and Schubert and Schumann will not lack an airing. Dresel, it is said, will pass the winter in Germany; but none from which to tame his ability so. Then too, we shall no doubt have concerts by Miss Topp—both chamber concerts, and with orchestra, for it is her wish to play in Boston the Concertos of Beethoven, Mendelssohn and others, and of course we all wish to hear her. Moreover it is hinted that the famous Russian pianist Anton Rubinstein is coming to this country.

5. Of semi-private Social Club concerts there is like no lack. The interest in this form of musical activity, as compared with the more public, certainly grows with us now. Clubs of amateurs are not afraid of the finer tasks, though they may shrink from its finish. Having no end to speculate on, they incline to choose selections. Mr Parker's admirable choir will soon resume their Monday evening practice, and prepare more feasts of rare and rich things, Cantatas, Motets, part-songs, &c., for their friends. Our "Orpheus" friends, under the inspiring lead of Mr Kreissmann, intend to perform Max Bruch's music to the Frithjof's Saga, entire, with orchestra.

6. VIRTUOSOS, who make the music subservient to the exhibition of themselves, will shoot upon us like the meteors through the air and shine a momentary attraction; but fortunately the musical atmosphere has been kept so clear of late years, that the fixed stars outshine them and make more love and [illegible]. The tenant of this kind is the first of its nature; instead of the kind,—a man of genius in his way, with many noble traits.

6. And what of Opera? The whole operatic business, it must be confessed, of late years has gone on from worse to worse. We have no such Italian companies, no such Italian Season, as we had ten or fifteen years ago. Opera in this country is purely a matter of bold risked speculation; the managers care not to establish anything good and permanent, but only to reap short rich harvests at our city, after another by adroit management; speculation; and, by virtue of much advertising with newspaper puffery even up a fashionable furor (of course only among the large class of would-be fashionables who only fancy they love music) for a few weeks. This they can accomplish with cheap companies, weak orchestras and choruses and hackneyed pieces, or old sensation novelties, about as effectually for their purpose as with the best. The influence of these enterprises upon public taste is on the whole demoralizing; so one excitement follows the continual demoralizing and unsettling of all steady, wholesome currents in any one direction, make it impossible for the great appreciating public to form any taste. Appetite is constantly stimulated, cloyed, spoiled by the unnourishing novelty of variation. A few years ago we had an excellent beginning in the way of German Opera; the admirable singers, the ensemble, the conscientious regard to harmony of detail, as well as the selection of pieces (Fidelio, Freyschütz, Don Juan, &c.) far better than any Italian troupe has offered us for many years. But by some vagaries of management or singers, it went astray further, it went to pieces, and with it sank the only real hope of opera that stood our open in horizon. Now it has perhaps reached the point where it is wise to say, the worse it is the better. Then dying out the sooner, the better a new and healthier beginning. And indeed has not the downward tendency perhaps reached its lowest depth in that latest craze for Opera bouffe of Offenbach? It is justly characterized as the ostrich's bury english from a Philadelphia editor and we are glad to meet with such outspoken, caustic sympathy with the ground we took against alone last winter. It seems that Offenbach is likely to drown out all other opera next season. No fewer than four Offenbach troupes in the field! Well then, the more trumps the better. Let them run it into the ground as fast as possible and bury the thing out of sight. Then is another season, and then look for the wholesome reaction. Artisans sooner or later grow sick and ashamed and some real beauty and humor from the brain and brain of real genius, keep their sweetness.

"MEMORIES AND OTHER THINGS."—Lately has given us a pamphlet with some three charming tales and sketches by Mrs. Ha[illegible] (Adelaide Kemble) in the same size with her delightful "Week in a French Country House." These papers show the same genial lively talent in characteristic touch and in exquisite the more graceful writing; fine, noble in culture, large and generous views and hearty sympathy with human nature and with what is noble. The first and longest piece, to be sure, the only one which can properly be called a story, is a tale of life in Italy, through musical sympathies, with a lady hopelessly insane, and therefore, as a whole, in spite of many beauties, seems not quite natural. But music comes in as a chief pervading element into all the little pieces, and they embody a sincere love and large experience of what is best in music, with much sound, subtle criticism, and many happy hints of pleasure miles. The London operas and concerts, and fashionable Italian music parties, furnish the main Persons, while we are brought near to several master spirits of the art, for instance, Beethoven. By far the best piece of the book is "Recollections of the Life of Joseph Haydn, and Some of his Thoughts about Music." Here is one as a specimen, when has the Traviata been briefer as well?

"I went to the Italian Opera to hear Mozart's enchanting Nozze di Figaro. The house was very poorly attended; the stalls were looking only a thin sprinkling of people here and there. The music was sung with shameful carelessness, and the opera did not seem to think it worth while to give themselves the trouble to move. I was quite indignant at this disgraceful indifference. But was afterwards told that the Italian here Mozart's music which they consider tiresome and tedious, and that also, in a general way they seldom take the pains to exert themselves when the house is full.

"To make up for this disappointment, Wimbledon gave me a [illegible] for La Traviata, an afterwards, to listen opera which I was told was one of the great works of modern times. I remembered very distinctly the Italian music I had heard years ago—how it was effects and grand finale all Rossini the agreeable vein of melody somewhat poorly worked out, the strange charming as treatment of the [illegible] I hoped to have all those delightful old recollections delightfully revived. I declare that from beginning to end I was not continual lung and struck. Such was as there was was of the very commonest order and as to the story, it defied all comprehension and baggage of description. I only knew that there was a husband and wife who handed a bull-eyed chair with each other with the voice in their throat swelling till I thought they would burst and their eyes starting out of their heads at their own screams; and a mother who handed every one that had wanted to have won their baby and then by a new sentimental incident had to put her own baby in the fire instead, so that there was a case with the most extraordinary songs I ever heard also howled forth from together as the cause of all the rage his mother was going to be burned. I quite think a right to sentence all the rest of the general unpleasantness all that goes on, but I am not able characters had been it is a sort of an opera! There was at last a woman's rescue in a commonplace but all the impressions of the fiery towards the conclusion where the lady who has her child a children goes to sleep, and therefore is obliged to come howling for a few seconds and then sent in a pretty sweetened way, to be in [illegible] by the other one at the beginning and the other a thread with a bob sharing he saw. But on the whole the performance was of one way like the idiot's story—'full of sound and fury, and signifying nothing.'

And here again, as a description of a musical party:

"The only thing that gave me any real pleasure was the performance of a lady with a perfect piety of feeling, who at the piano had accompanied herself in one of Beethoven's sacred songs. The room was grand, and she sang admirably a selection of an old [illegible] who did well. Christine Reuter—Mrs. Hunter, was the name. Haven't she a lovely voice! But I think a pity she always will sing in [illegible] things.

"To conclude I said to rather wide lady on the other side, 'Mendelssohn, won't [illegible] is that in opera Mendelssohn, don't you? I always say, Verdi and Mendelssohn,—Verdi and Mendelssohn—nothing like 'em!

THE BOSTON CHORAL UNION (whose first concert last spring our readers will remember), gave an interesting entertainment last Monday evening in honor of their old conductor Mr. Sch[illegible]. The Ballad of the Boat was provided a cold set, and also a few songs and instrumental pieces the affair passed off with unusual satisfaction. At the close of the evening Mr. Sch[illegible] was presented with a massive silver pitcher, and the young lady accompanist received a handsome testimonial in the shape of a gold music-rack. The Hall and tables were handsomely decorated with flowers, the company was large and brilliant, the farewell was sincere and heartfelt.

THE NEW OPERA HOUSE AT LEIPZIG.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin writes:

OFFENBACH.—The English press is more outspoken than our own about the last few fashion in opera. The Pall Mall Gazette says:

The Music of the Spheres.

I.

Hast thou not heard it, the universal music?
The throbbing harmony, the old eternal rhyme?
In the wild billows roaring,
In the mad torrent pouring,
And keeping with the stars its best and march sublime?
Hast thou not heard it when the night was silent,
And sobbing sighed the winds amid the trees,
And the marvelous strings of harps celestial
Seemed quivering to the touch of melodies?

Annual Congress of Musicians "of the Future."—Tonkünstler-Versammlung in Altenburg, July 19-23.*

*Translated and abridged from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (Leipzig).

In the afternoon of the second day a sacred concert took place in the Schlosskirche. The court kapellmeister Dr. Stade opened the first part with Bach's great organ Toccata in F whereas the organist and organ teacher at the Conservatorium at Stuttgart E. Tod opened the second part with Liszt's Prelude and Fugue on the name B A C H confessedly one of the wonderful organ works of recent times. Both performances were truly brilliant both in spirit and in technique. The Altenburg Singakademie under Stade's direction, sang a number of by no means easy a cappella choruses, especially the Agnus and Crucis from Palestrina's Missa Marcelli, [illegible] some old German tunes from the collection "Lieder und Sprüche" of the 15th century by R. von Liliencron and W. Stade, a Kyrie by Th. Schneider, the 126th Psalm by Rebling, and a Motet by D. Engel. The last three choral works, taken together with several other compositions performed on this and the following days, gave an interesting picture of the School of Friedrich Schneider (Stade, Rebling, Th. Schneider and Engel). As has certainly formed many striking successes. The Kyrie by Schneider's son, now music director in Chemnitz, follows ably after the better models, has unity and high expression, and is an effective choral piece; the 126th Psalm by Rebling, music-director in Magdeburg, makes an altogether good impression by its fresh and sometimes characteristic representations and by clever contrapuntal treatment; while the Motet by D. H. Engel, cathedral organist at Merseburg contains strong passages and a well wrought form figuration.

A couple of songs from W. Stade's "Religious Cycle" very finely rendered by Herr J. Schild held the audience captive by their natural and heartfelt depth of feeling. Herr C. Hentschel of Breslau sang whom a aria from Clari's Stabat Mater with full sympathetic tone and noble expression; while Frl. Anna Drechsel of Leipzig gave Bach's Aria "Mein gläubiges Herze frohlocke" (the 'cello part by Herr Kranichfeld) in a somewhat dragging tempo and not enough of joyful confidence, but carefully and correctly and in the right sonorous organ. Herr J. H. Cross of Pesth, one of Bach's ablest pupils, won great regard by his performance of Bach's Violin Chaconne, but was even more brilliantly successful on the 23d in his rendering of a Suite by [illegible] so that not only was he warmly applauded after every movement, but he was privately bespoken next day at the palace and received a valuable present from the duke's own hands.

HERMANN ZOPFF.

THIRD DAY.

A concert for orchestra, chorus, vocal and instrumental solos. This occurred at 6 p.m. in the hall of the "Concordia" under court-capellmeister Dr. Stade's direction with the following programme: Handel's Acis and Galatea, the choruses by the Altenburg Singakademie, the solos by Frau Reinecke sang (of Vienna) and Herren court opera singers Schild of Dresden and Krause of Berlin; Allegro appassionato, a characteristic piece for orchestra by W. Stade; Violoncello Concerto by Grützmacher, played by Kranichfeld; Recitative and Cavatina from the opera "The Hero of the North" by Carl Götze, sung by Albert Goldberg of Brunswick; Symphonie fantastique by Berlioz; "Loch Lomond," a symphonic character picture by Ferd. Thieriot, conducted by himself; and Songs, with piano accompaniment, by Fr. Hiller, A. Jensen, and Liszt, sung by Herr Schild.

[Handel's piece of finds plenty of praise even with the New School reporter and so does the rendering.]

The Allegro appassionato by W. Stade was received in a manner very honorable to the meritorious composer. The work combines warm expression with very skilful treatment of form and an effective orchestral garb, may always be sure of favor.

Herr Kranichfeld won enthusiastic applause again by his rendering of Grützmacher's Concerto, a valuable addition to our meagre violoncello literature.

The fragment from Götze's opera (Hark, hither Melody, &c.) is a soft dreamy piece of tonal painting, in which the composer so far as instrumentation is concerned shows that fine sense of color which is found in so high a degree in his orchestral piece "Midsummer Night." It rather falls off at the end by a somewhat ordinary turn.

The brilliant point of the concert and one of the most brilliant of the whole festival was the "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz. There was a life at those tones that thrilled through every fibre of the hearer! There one forgot all the discomfort of the intolerable heat of the hall and as if spell-bound in a magic circle, follow all [illegible] now enthusiastically dreamy, now hopefully glowing, now coldly meditative, now dazzling by adventurous and almost grotesque loose pictures.—The irresistible effect of Berlioz's symphony, which then won for it so enthusiastic a reception [nothing said that we about five trombone matters] [illegible] but an [illegible] on two characteristic peculiarities. The first is the glowing, feverish passion and elevation, the nervous excitability which often assumes a pathological energy of expression and which [illegible] has been so far as our acquaintance with life's artistic activity extends, [illegible] appear [illegible] his latest working a side which may be [illegible] to the personal experiences under the impression of which he conceived the Symphony. On the other hand that same energy is wonderfully with which Berlioz controls his moods, bears up these stream within artistic forms and gives plastic consistency and grace of style to the whole.

The second important side to Berlioz's works one, which we found in a high degree also in his Requiem, is the grandeur of the poetic conception (which here to be sure from the nature of the subject, might easily lead into questionable and strange extravagance as is plainly the case in the last movement)—the strength and sharpness of characterization which brings the pictures before the hearer in the distinctest outlines and often with most startling instantaneous power. A masterpiece in this regard is the "Marche au supplice" (march to execution); a wild and startling picture of vigorous drawing, modeled as to say with bronze, consistently and steeped in sharp, flashing colors. A particularly surprising passage seemed to us the moment near the close, where the "fixed idea" comes up once but is interrupted by the blow of the fatal axe. And the composer with no fullness super human exhilarates, without side play or any sort vocal intentions, lets the scene quietly resume its determined course. This part is, strictly taken, the most perfect in the whole work, both a complete rounding off of form and harmony and in the most searching and poetic way in which it presents itself a musical true perception.

Berlioz does not yet know the principle of the organic co-operation of poetic and of musical creative activity. He was the one side too much a Frenchman, especially too much a French romanticist, with whom a very active imagination constitutes overgrows that plastic faculty of shaping things which strict Art criticism requires, and he on the other side he is too much of a specific musician to [illegible] the strong tendency of his poetry musical feeling in behalf of any such solitary co-operation of both factors in the more modern sense. Hence the disproportions between poetical ideas and musical representations, which here and there appears in Berlioz; now we perceive a purely musical conception, where the poetic sense finds full expression, while the music unfolds its elementary power in all its breadth, as in the first Allegro; and now the music is not entirely intelligible, sounds bald and needs a programme to explain it, and a portion of the meaning remains unexpressed. The latter is the case in the "[illegible]," a piece of music otherwise [illegible] [illegible] the structure of the movement after the genuine Beethoven model. But when one has fully taken in the contents of the programme so that he can fancy as he listens, one cannot resist taking part in the [illegible] of the work, [illegible] only all that the composer wanted to express, but a great deal more and almost everywhere a warm and living tone" (Schumann).

Next to the "March to the place of execution," the ball scene makes the most immediate effect upon an unprepared public. As for the last movement, it was [illegible] to shock the orthodox professionals [illegible] talked [illegible] "[illegible] constituted" [illegible] who [illegible] confessed themselves carried away by its power. Such matter Berlioz handles without gloves, and for the first [illegible] one is inclined to accept the paradox "it is not music to be sure, but it is beautiful." Whoever will try to alter or to mitigate it will find that as the work stands there is nothing to be added nor to be taken away.—This [illegible] the Symphony especially when we think of it as the work of a young artist only 17 years old, something magnificent [illegible] unique, magnificent [illegible] "[illegible]"—[illegible] will allow that no [illegible] word can be applicable to his columns—[illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] should be the public [illegible] the performance, the enthusiastic applause proves sufficiently that they know how to appreciate the creative deeds of genius, without [illegible] or [illegible] by their many eccentricities.

The execution of the work [illegible] Stade conducting, was masterly; each member of the orchestra seemed to have assimilated his part into his very flesh and blood; it was played with such zeal and [illegible] that it was a real pleasure only to look on.

After the powerful impression of the work of Berlioz whatever followed had a hard position. All the more highly therefore may the composer of the character-piece "Loch Lomond," Herr Thomas, prize the favorable reception that work met with. He is one of those artists who, originally standing aloof from the new efforts, has yet preserved musical [illegible] enough to make at least many of the technical acquisitions of the new lines his own. His character-piece shows everywhere the musician who makes his thorough musical culture, his [illegible] knowledge, [illegible] interesting and [illegible] and who by [illegible] [illegible], as well as by [illegible] fresh coloured instrumentation [illegible] [illegible] in the spirit of the time. Moreover the [illegible] is noble and you may recognize [illegible] [illegible] the local colouring.

Owing to the extreme heat in the hall, and the late hour, the Story by Goldmark had to be reserved for the next [illegible]. Here Schild closed the concert with an admirable delivery of three Lieder: the tender, shy, "Serenade" by Liszt, "In der Ferne" full of deep feeling by Rüfer, and the fiery "Nun [illegible] [illegible]" by Jensen. [illegible]

[Conclusion next time.]

"La Jeunesse de Goethe."

The Civil Tribunal of the Seine gave its decision on Friday last in a case which has a story worth telling.

Among the most passionate admirers of Goethe was Meyerbeer, who long cherished the idea of taking Faust as the subject of an opera. But while, with characteristic fastidiousness, he was thinking how best to set about it, Gounod occupied the ground before him. Upon this, Meyerbeer reluctantly abandoned his intention, and probably would have dropped all idea of illustrating his favorite poet, but for the following incident. Towards the end of 1860, M. Blaze de Bury wrote a piece for the Odéon, called La Jeunesse de Goethe, in the third act of which was a scene demanding music—that is, M. Bennet [illegible] then—[illegible] [illegible], and not only so, but music specially adapted to the [illegible]. "What if I speak to Meyerbeer?" said M. de Bury. The [illegible] treated [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] a joke; but [illegible] the latter called upon Meyerbeer [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for Goethe and, [illegible] perceived a promise of co-operation. The [illegible] had no sooner set to work than he [illegible] to treat the story of Faust [illegible] M. de Bury [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a consequence. The spring of 1861 came [illegible] heard from Meyerbeer, then [illegible] in Berlin, M. Bennet grew impatient [illegible] M. de Bury wrote to the composer, who [illegible] replied that he [illegible] kept his word. [illegible] passed [illegible] the music was not forthcoming, whereupon it was thought well to require from Meyerbeer a formal undertaking to complete his work by a specified time. This he gave in his own hand, and named May [illegible] 1861 as the date of first representation. In January the composer wrote to M. de Bury [illegible] the completion of his task [illegible] M. Bennet found it desirable to put off the production of La Jeunesse de Goethe till the spring of 1862. This suited Meyerbeer admirably, for two reasons [illegible] he was to keep the [illegible] himself a little longer and [illegible] [illegible] in superintending the bringing out of L'Africaine during the winter. In June 1862 M. [illegible] [illegible] to treat definitely for the piece, but Meyerbeer, who knew that the Odéon closed at the end of May, and that La Jeunesse de Goethe could have but few consecutive representations, [illegible] with reasons for a further postponement. A letter to M. de Bury, written from [illegible], urged that the music would require six weeks' rehearsal; that it was absurd to produce the work at a [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] be once stopped; that it was essential he (Meyerbeer) should be in Paris when it was performed; and finally that he could not be in Paris at the time specified. In October there was nothing decided, and M. Bennet [illegible] out of patience, [illegible] growing more to M. de Bury, [illegible] [illegible] to bring the matter to terms, and offering, moreover, to keep the Odéon open so long as the work continued to draw. This however had no effect, and so it was [illegible] that La Jeunesse de Goethe should follow the Africaine, which did not appear further effort seems to have been abandoned.

In 1864 Meyerbeer died, leaving by will certain directions as to the disposal of his manuscripts, which were thoroughly in keeping with his [illegible] [illegible] of them during life. These [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] appeal to the "piety" of the well-beloved wife and children, [illegible] effect that all his unpublished musical creations whatsoever (L'Africaine excepted) should be carefully kept and guarded as "[illegible] [illegible]" accessible to nobody. In the event of one of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] failed for music—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] were to judge [illegible] [illegible] that the [illegible] of its contents should become the whole property [illegible] [illegible] to be burnt. Not unnaturally M. Blaze de Bury [illegible] that he had a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from this fate for La Jeunesse de Goethe. The composer's family and executors, however, adhered to the letter of the instructions. [illegible] only remained for M. de Bury to assert his right in a court of law.

The plaintiff's advocate, M. Le Berquier, advanced two main arguments on behalf of his client. One was based upon Meyerbeer's evident intention to produce La Jeunesse de Goethe at some time or other, an intention often expressed towards the close of his life, and subsequent to the date of the will. The other urged the difficulty in such a case of deciding where the rights of a collaborateur begin or end; and repudiated the idea that the caprice of one can lawfully [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] benefit [illegible] [illegible] from their common work. On behalf of the Meyerbeer family M. Cremieux made a long and elaborate speech, the main points of which were echoed by the Avocat Impérial, M. Chevrier, who said there were two questions for consideration. 1st. Did Meyerbeer's directions as to the disposal of his manuscripts apply to La Jeunesse de Goethe? 2nd. Was there between Meyerbeer and M. de Bury any connection which constituted a genuine co-partnership? And in the absence of a connection, is there any superior right to which M. de Bury can appeal? As to the first, M. Chevrier held that [illegible] [illegible] exception made in favor of L'Africaine conclusively proved that no exception was intended in the case of La Jeunesse de Goethe. On the second point he expressed his belief that all the facts of the case went to show Meyerbeer's determination not the work [illegible] [illegible] as incomplete, and himself as in any [illegible] by any conventions which were to determine [illegible]. With reference to the third question, the Avocat Impérial declared the music and libretto of an opera to be distinct and divisible [illegible] [illegible] that the author of each is "the master of [illegible] [illegible]."

For these reasons the tribunal pronounced judgment against M. de Bury's claim. It did so with regret, but said M. Chevrier, "fortune is changeable, and it is perhaps prudent to spare the glory of Meyerbeer the hazard of another experiment."

The following letters of Meyerbeer's were read in court during the trial referred to above:—

No. 1.

To M. Blaze de Bury.

BERLIN, March 16, 1861.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I received your letter with double pleasure because it gave me news of you, and because I love everything that comes from your [illegible] [illegible] philosophical pen.

You appear to doubt, my dear friend, that I shall keep the word I have given you to write music for the third act of your Goethe drama, which you sent me when I left Paris. I am [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] the last when [illegible] you told me you [illegible] [illegible] to be put in rehearsal. I have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in my promises [illegible] [illegible] me [illegible] [illegible] to such a [illegible] [illegible] you that I shall do so for the first time.

You say nothing about the tragedy of Petrarque which you intended to bring out this winter [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the way connected with the theatre? You well know my [illegible] interesting you my dear friend for your [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible].

Remember me to Madame de Bury and M. and Mdme. Belot [illegible] above and [illegible] [illegible] charming [illegible] and great [illegible] Mdlle. Marie Belot and Mdlle. Rose de Bury. Tell them, at the same time, that I have [illegible] [illegible] the Hotel [illegible], at Paris, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] I have ordered my publisher to send each of them a copy.

Adieu, and a thousand compliments from your very devoted MEYERBEER.

No. 2.

To M. Blaze de Bury.

PARIS, Sept. 9, 1862.

MY DEAR [illegible],—I yield with pleasure to the desire you have shown that I should put to music the great scene which forms the third act of your drama, La Jeunesse de Goethe intended for the Théâtre Français or the Odéon, and I promise the music by the first of May next, so that the work may be represented in the course of that season. I do, however, [illegible] [illegible] conditions that the orchestra and chorus of the [illegible] be engaged for the performance, and that [illegible] [illegible] chosen by me, [illegible] parts of Margaret, Gretchen, the [illegible], and the Father.

If the piece be not played by the 15th of June, it must not be given before the 15th of September. I will explain to you by word of mouth, dear Baron, the reason of this last condition. It will be necessary for you to write me on the 10th of March, if the [illegible] an arrangement with you for the [illegible], and on the conditions mentioned in this letter. Your very devoted MEYERBEER.

No. 3.

To M. Birre de Bury.

BERLIN, Jan. [illegible], 1861.

MY DEAR FRIEND, [illegible] weeks ago I finished the music which you inspired me to compose. I now [illegible] information from you as to time and place of its production. I see by your letter that the [illegible] is likely to be the Odéon.

If you think it necessary [illegible] for the [illegible] as well as the [illegible] for the [illegible] of the third act, [illegible] regards the [illegible] which I [illegible] in a [illegible]. I think the piece is [illegible] especially with a manager like M. [illegible] Bonnet, who has a reputation for [illegible]. But you tell me that in April, when we agreed that I [illegible] give you my score, M. [illegible] Bonnet has an engagement with Madame [illegible], and that he proposes to produce the work in the spring of 1862. [illegible] a new opera will be given in the course of next winter. I therefore see no difficulty in the [illegible] present.

In my position [illegible] as the father of a family, not resident in France, I do not like to make [illegible] engagement for a [illegible]. Who knows, in the vicissitudes of [illegible] before then to keep me to [illegible]. [illegible] M. Bonnet for the following April. It will be nearly a year [illegible] and we shall not be tied for so long a [illegible]. I think, as you say, if he wishes to have the work, there is no [illegible].

Now, my dear friend, [illegible] to our piece. The scene which I [illegible] and which I proposed to you should be [illegible] of the [illegible] to Faust, [illegible] to the best of all, and I hope that you will [illegible] with it. There is only one [illegible] which [illegible], and that is [illegible] the scene of the [illegible] Kalsetz. Schubert's [illegible] popular everywhere, that the public will not accept anything [illegible] the words, and I [illegible] that I [illegible] Schubert's [illegible] words [illegible] Ave Maria [illegible] the [illegible] Schubert wrote for piano [illegible].

[illegible] along the work, [illegible] Ave Maria [illegible] the [illegible] I [illegible] From a purely musical point of view the [illegible] I will abide by your decision. [illegible] the first act [illegible] a [illegible] of the character of the [illegible] rather than [illegible] Your very devoted MEYERBEER.

No. 4.

To M. Birre de Bury.

[illegible] August [illegible] 1861.

You ought to know, dear [illegible], for I told you last year, [illegible] Paris in the month of April. We must have [illegible] great works of [illegible], and when the [illegible] [illegible] is leaving, there yet remain the [illegible] and the exceptional [illegible] from all [illegible] the [illegible], and are consequently far from the orchestra. It will be necessary to have many trials and perhaps [illegible] before [illegible].

You [illegible] the Odéon closes at the end of May. [illegible] you will not be able to have more than [illegible] representations before the [illegible]. [illegible] of your work [illegible] few representations [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible], [illegible] at the Odéon, and to produce the work in September, at which time you will have all the [illegible] and [illegible] before you. But understand, dear friend, this is a fact I throw out, not a condition. Your interest in the piece [illegible], and it ought to have more weight in any case [illegible] I have only written [illegible] of them.

You ask me, dear Baron, [illegible] Paris for a short time; my intention was to make an excursion after having completed my [illegible] with La Jeunesse de Goethe, of which I know nothing, only that which you have told me. It is of great importance for me to [illegible] of [illegible] the character of the work I have done according to the general idea of the piece which [illegible].

But my Paris excursion [illegible] ordered me [illegible] King [illegible] at Königsberg [illegible] of the royal [illegible] which will be performed at the [illegible] the return of the King from Königsberg [illegible] I was always [illegible] of a [illegible].

You [illegible] that you will [illegible]. That will be [illegible] your attention for on the [illegible] of September I [illegible] for Berlin. If you [illegible] all things [illegible] not forget to bring La Jeunesse de Goethe, that I may read it.

[illegible] my [illegible] to Madame de Bury and a thousand compliments to the charming [illegible], [illegible] I sincerely hope, retains her good [illegible] old. MEYERBEER.

London Street Music.

The more people have [illegible] good and [illegible] at their call, the more they usually [illegible] is given [illegible] good and [illegible]. [illegible] music [illegible] of harmony [illegible] the library, the studio, or the [illegible] music [illegible].

Business lately called me to London for a week. [illegible] to take up [illegible] branching [illegible] from the Strand to the river; a quiet street [illegible] street, a street [illegible] [illegible] the goods [illegible] I did not [illegible] perfectly [illegible] The [illegible] all but from the [illegible] come from the [illegible] This [illegible] being [illegible] the thought [illegible] from [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] I was informed by my landlady [illegible] of every day in the year.

Half-past Eight.—[illegible] The Times, [illegible] a sudden [illegible] of [illegible] what is the matter. [illegible] performers [illegible] They [illegible] from popular operas, [illegible] I was told that [illegible] two hours [illegible] week before the [illegible] and then [illegible] for [illegible] contributions [illegible] They do not rely upon the [illegible] upon voluntary contributions, but send round the youngest member of the party who knocks at [illegible] at the door of every house in the [illegible], but in hand, perhaps whatever suggests the servant girl or others are inclined to bestow. He appears to be successful in about one house out of three. The performances continue for about twenty minutes, and would not only be tolerable, but commendable, if they took place in one of the parks at a reasonable hour, or people were not compelled to listen to them unless they pleased.

Nine o'clock.—A bulky Savoyard, ugly as a baboon, and as dirty, with a barrel-organ. He grinds, Partant pour la Syrie, Non fur Joseph, and Champagne Charlie. His manner [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] goes to the street door and order [illegible] I [illegible] the police if he will not [illegible] He swears and [illegible] his [illegible] [illegible] in his pocket instead of [illegible].

Then [illegible] the above [illegible] with [illegible] all [illegible] in London [illegible] the [illegible] in the Southern States of America. The leader [illegible] Punch's [illegible] good [illegible] This party sings [illegible] [illegible] Windows are lifted right and left, and pence and [illegible] on the pavement. The cooks and [illegible] to be the chief patronesses of the show. The niggers stay for a quarter of an hour, and march off at a sign from [illegible]. They evidently make a good thing of it and are prime favorites.

Half-past Ten.—Two young men, ragged and [illegible], [illegible] They are not very successful, [illegible] the [illegible] Seeing [illegible] [illegible] of everybody, [illegible] and of the [illegible].

[illegible]—An old man [illegible] clad and feeble, [illegible] [illegible] an [illegible] [illegible] in a piece of paper. He [illegible] pennies [illegible] (for luck I suppose) [illegible] Poor old fellow! [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the street [illegible] of the [illegible].

Fifteen minutes past Eleven.—A drum. An abominable [illegible] It is a [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible] [illegible] the same mysterious and savage looking creature I ever beheld. [illegible] with the same [illegible] expression of countenance [illegible] [illegible] Nana Sahib, who has roused the [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] I think of [illegible] I should be rather shy of such an ugly customer.

Five minutes past Twelve.—Another brass band. [illegible] boys and lads from the "Fatherland" [illegible] the "Fatherland" [illegible] They perform for [illegible] As this [illegible].

Twenty minutes to One.—A woman grinding a barrel-organ with a baby fast asleep upon the top of it. The tune is the eternal "Partant pour la Syrie." When she ceases for a moment to collect pence the baby awakes [illegible] the [illegible] falls asleep again. She traverses the street slowly from end to end [illegible] She then [illegible] perhaps hopelessly makes her way out and [illegible] no more.

Quarter past One.—An Italian boy apparently of about fourteen years of age, with a hurdy gurdy. He wheels to it an accompaniment. [illegible] I go to the window and order him away. He stops whistling to grin at me, and removing himself to the distance of two houses, where he recommences his performance. If there be a policeman in sight, I shall [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and pursued [illegible] week!

Twenty minutes to Two.—Another Italian with a barrel organ and a monkey. The monkey looks very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] I have no means of judging.

Half past Two.—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the street beyond [illegible].

A quarter past Three.—A lad in shabby Highland costume, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] minutes to Four.—An old man playing a violin, led by a young woman—possibly [illegible] [illegible]. His tones are merely [illegible], and miserably [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to introduce [illegible] in [illegible].

[illegible] past Four.—Punch and Judy, the most popular [illegible] ever was [illegible] good thing of it."

[illegible] o'clock.—[illegible] Champagne Charlie, Not for Joseph, and [illegible].

[illegible] o'clock.—An old man with a [illegible]

Twenty minutes past Six.—A man leading a Newfoundland dog, with a monkey sitting on its back. The man beats a big drum to attract attention. Somebody rises from the dinner table, [illegible]

Seven o'clock.—Nigger minstrels [illegible]

Half past seven.—A barrel-organ. No policeman.

Eight o'clock.—A woman [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

A quarter past Eight.—A barrel-organ. Policeman [illegible]

Nine o'clock.—[illegible] [illegible]

A quarter to Ten o'clock.—[illegible] The "[illegible] dialogue" is not at all laughable, but vapid, silly, [illegible], and utterly contemptible. Compared with the vendors of such stultifying rubbish, who disturb the night by their vociferous strife, the most [illegible] organ-grinder of Italy is a respectable man and a artist. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The above is a fair and true account, and no exaggerated tale of a day's music and misery in London. The real music [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was very considerable. Is there no remedy for such wrong? Cannot a prohibitive duty be put upon Italians and Savoyards as the pest of society? Cannot music, in the matter of grade in the streets, by unauthorized performers be prevented? [illegible] most hours of the day?

character, with the single exception of the heroine, was debased and vicious. The whole country went mad over this production, and the natural result of such an exhibition of criminals and crime, was evinced in the general demoralization that ensued. Highway robbery, murder and debauchery became mere romance. [illegible] took the sentimental view of these proceedings, and [illegible] of Macheath's songs. Ladies [illegible] the praises of pickpockets and carried the words of the ballads about upon their fans. "The morals of thousands," says a contemporary writer, "were hopelessly corrupted"; and the character [illegible] Lavinia Fenton,—the original Polly [illegible] was led to the altar [illegible] by the Duke of Bolton, [illegible] of the most depraved and corrupt character.

The success of this piece sealed the fate of English opera for many years. It was followed by other burlesque operas, some of them possessing [illegible] but none of them so vilely immoral as The Beggar's Opera. Handel was neglected and forgotten. [illegible] abandoned opera forever.

In some measure Offenbach has duplicated the [illegible]. In this country where it is professed that we can appreciate and encourage [illegible] there are to-day no less than four or five [illegible] opera companies, and not one [illegible] German opera. The [illegible] of Offenbach [illegible] played [illegible] ground and [illegible] of decent people are found [illegible] by the side of which Gay's pastoral is perfectly [illegible]. [illegible] Offenbach is the [illegible]

The merit of his music has already been sufficiently discussed. [illegible] also, have none but pure suggestions to the pure mind. We look behind the details, and perceive the sublime allegories of a beautiful and poetic purpose. We can see in the actions of the heathen deities a figurative description of the operations of Nature, and we recognize in the system the evidences of the first groping of a pure primitive [illegible] religious culture and knowledge of immortality and Omnipotence.

The defenders of Offenbach can sneer at "prurient prudery" to their heart's content, but they cannot deny that he is the purveyor of bold, bold indecency, which tends to corrupt society [illegible]

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 26, 1868.

Meyerbeer's "Inspirations."

The European journals are again full of Meyerbeer. The unsuccessful suit brought by the [illegible] M. Blaze de Bury against the executors of the composer for the recovery of the [illegible] "The young days of Goethe" has not only made a good theme of gossip, but has revived the [illegible] about Meyerbeer's [illegible] "ideas," [illegible]

We have more than once expressed our inability to feel that Meyerbeer was [illegible] in an internal and material sense. And when the [illegible] shows forth his greatness to consist mainly in the art of "making up," what can it mean except precisely what we meant when we wrote: "We are of those who feel in him the power of will and talent rather than of genius. The gift of spontaneous melody was not peculiarly his; elaborately planned effects instead of inspiration. After sitting through one of his 'grand' operas, we have not felt inspired, inwardly edified and strengthened; have not gone away with lighter hearts and nobler hopes and aspirations, but excited and oppressed. How different the feeling after such works as Fidelio, &c." Very many have felt thus. Many accused Meyerbeer of the fault of want of artistic integrity," that is of self-forgetting devotion to the ideal and the true. We all know how repulsive the whole spirit of the Meyerbeerian tendency was to Mendelssohn and Schumann. The contrariety of aim and method between a composer like Beethoven and one like Meyerbeer is admirably shown in the article below. [illegible] and Wagner [illegible] Meyerbeer very sharply [illegible] but we cannot help seeing in Wagner a continuator of the same false tendency to which Meyerbeer more than any one man gave the first strong impulse. We look upon him as the one [illegible] who of all others has done the most to pervert and demoralize the art of music in our day. He is the founder and the formidable example of the whole school of "effect." Berlioz and Liszt and Wagner and Verdi [illegible] all take after this false prophet. The writer we are about to quote, however, would fain speak as an admirer of the composer whose faults and [illegible] as well points out. Hence the inconsistency in the use of the word "inspiration" in the title of the piece, which we have indicated by quotation marks. [illegible] For instance, [illegible] writer ever dreamed of such a thing as the Freyschütz Overture being "made up" entirely of Beethoven's ideas? But let him speak.

Great thinkers, as a rule, keep a commonplace book for the note of what they think and what they read. [illegible] Meyerbeer [illegible] memorandum-books. Had he been a painter or draughtsman like Raffaelle or Michael Angelo, [illegible] would have produced [illegible] of the pencil [illegible] would give forth. As embodiments of [illegible] spirit those were invaluable [illegible]. He had watched [illegible] contemporaries, he had [illegible] "posthumous works," and well knew [illegible] after days. No one knew better than he the fate of a manuscript [illegible] hands," and [illegible] the unpublished works of the departed afforded much [illegible] is engaged to Maurice Strakosch for four years from this time, and that she is under the direction of his brother Max Strakosch, for the present season in America, after which she goes abroad again for fresh triumphs.

This puts the Mapleson bordereau at rest, so far as America is concerned, this Winter—indeed, the London [illegible] that he will take his company to Dublin. He intended to come here, but rumor says that he was [illegible] by Maurice and Max Strakosch, who would at once have occupied Mapleson's [illegible] and [illegible] Italian Opera in [illegible] theatre in London, [illegible] to the [illegible]. With this prospect, Mapleson concluded, on the whole, that he had better remain in his own [illegible] having a new burden for his [illegible] home. The Academy [illegible] in this city [illegible] Mapleson cannot come.

[illegible] The Evening Bulletin says

Mr. Carl Sentz has wisely determined to [illegible] a second series of those charming [illegible] which afforded so much pleasure to [illegible] the lovers of good music. In his circular the manager says:

"The past season, 1867-68, has been regarded as one of the most [illegible] in managers and [illegible] of public amusements—[illegible] what is on the one hand generally [illegible] and on the other [illegible] upon [illegible] of [illegible] property. It is, however, with a [illegible] to art, that the success of the Orchestra [illegible], for it [illegible] that [illegible] been appreciated and approved. Whatever doubt was felt before the commencement of the series as to the [illegible] of that form of musical composition known as Symphony, was soon dispelled [illegible] of Haydn and Mozart were received by large and [illegible] all classes of society. [illegible] that the design foreshadowed in the [illegible] of last year of producing symphonies [illegible], will now be carried [illegible] to the Symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, [illegible] the [illegible] will be enriched by the First, Eighth and Fourth of Beethoven [illegible] and [illegible] of Victoria, the [illegible] Symphony of Schumann, a work of [illegible] beauty, and the [illegible] 'Reformation' Symphony of Mendelssohn, which has created a [illegible] wherever it has been performed."

The Richings English Opera Troupe commenced their [illegible] at the Arch Street Theatre on Monday night last, with the opera of Maritana. [illegible] The principal characters were sustained by Miss Bernard [illegible] as Lady Harriet, Mrs. E. Seguin as Nancy, Mr. Campbell as Plunket, Mr. [illegible] as Lionel, Mr. Seguin as Lord Tristram, and Mr. Peakes as High Sheriff, with a chorus of [illegible].

On Tuesday night Balfe's Bohemian Girl was given. Miss Abell made her appearance for the second time in that night [illegible] part of Arline, the music of which she gave with correctness and expression, though somewhat lacking in dramatic power.

On Wednesday night the fine opera of Crown Diamonds by Auber was performed well. Mrs. Bernard as La Catarina, Mr. Peakes as the Count, Mr. Campbell as Rebolledo, Mr. [illegible] as Don Enrique, and Mr. [illegible] as [illegible]. The [illegible] of the opera were observed [illegible], and it was given [illegible] admirable ensemble.

On Thursday night [illegible] was performed for the first time in this city in English, the comic opera, [illegible] The Poet and Carpenter, or Peter the Great, [illegible] founded on an interesting historical fact. Mr. [illegible] Seguin distinguished himself as the [illegible] and in the second [illegible] solo and chorus and [illegible] ballad, "The [illegible] Maiden," followed by a [illegible] of [illegible] Castle, Bernard, Seguin, Arnold and [illegible] Peakes. The [illegible] song by Mrs. Richard, [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] sung by Mrs. Bernard, and the [illegible] of the work was well [illegible]. The opera [illegible].

Hints for Young Opera Composers.

[We translate the following pithy sentences from the Signale (Leipzig) where they appear under the head "Gebote der Opernpolitik." Several of the maxims (Gebote) here laid down belong to a very different school of opera Politik from that of Wagner or of Meyerbeer.]

How extraordinarily rich in dramatic composers our times are here in Germany! Literally no week passes without performances of new operas in one place or another. The composers thereof have all achieved their great successes, and they are called out after every act,—so say the Journals. But when the year comes round those works are already buried in the places of their birth, and other theatres have not performed them. A dreadful epidemic reigns among the German operas; they all collapse and die off. Is it possible then, that only the composers take no notice of this melancholy fact, which all the world sees and feels? Everything in the world has its Politik: that is, its rules and methods whereby the goal one strives for may be the most surely reached. Here follow a few of the most essential.

Compose no texts but good ones. The time is past when an absurd stilted story can be pardoned for the sake of the good music. The first thing to make sure of is that the text (nowadays) be tedious, or offend good sense and feeling. Learn then before all things, to judge the text well, to consider whether it will please or displease.

But what is a good opera text? One which from beginning to end steadily increases in interest. "Tous les genres sont bons, hors le genre ennuyeux," says Voltaire.

But on what does dramatic interest consist? The last aphorism suggests the answer. The skilful dramatic poet shows himself above all in the choice of an effective tableau in the plan. Single pregnant scenes do not suffice, still less fine words and verses. If you would learn how a great poetic talent can utterly fail through bad choice of a story or infelicity of plan, read Boerne's criticisms on dramatic pieces, particularly those of Houwald.

Seek in the beginning no texts with pompous spectacle for the eyes. You cannot reasonably expect managers to risk their thousands on your work's long scores for scenic decorations; still Mozart's Figaro, Cherubini's Wasserträger, Méhul's Joseph and his Brothers, Rossini's Barber of Seville, Auber's Mason and Locksmith, have all been, living for a long time on the stage, without any particular attractions for the eye.

"Mythus," Magic Opera! Seek not to bewilder the eye with a great lot of marvellous, that is to say for the most part, silly stuff! The Italian operas bring before us no supernatural histories, no supernatural subjects; they take them all from real life. They have no magic trees at all; and yet they rule the stage in all musical lands. Open your eyes and ears unwearying, and learn to comprehend that the thing can go without spectacles.

When does music sound the most effective? When you shut your eyes, or hear the composition from a moderate distance for instance from the corridor of a concert hall.—What is the use then of all the spectacular display in operas, these break-neck flying machines, processions of whole zoological gardens, lovely and hideous phantoms, heaven-storming legions, deserts, shattering storms, volcanoes, powder explosions, and what not else that set the eyes wide open and close up the ear? Is not the sensible enjoyment of music more and more scared away by such means? All this rubbish has once had its day in Italy, and yet the simple operas of Paesiello, Cimarosa and their followers in this line have there from the first given true enjoyment. Whatever there is of real musical effect in the new spectacle operas, is always to be found in the simple, natural slow lines and passages of real feeling. The musical accompaniments to eruptions of Vesuvius, blown-up houses, &c. are no loss. And such delight of hearing, as you feel at a performance of Fidelio, which has only two quite ordinary scenes, a year the power of all the Meyerbeers, &c., to afford you.

The more that exciting objects strike and occupy the eye, the more does the ear's power of attention to the phenomena of tone fall into the background. You cannot serve two masters. Though Liszt blame I play,—if a troop of half naked girls dance round his piano at the same time, many will not hear him at all and the others only half. This rests upon the fact, that our consciousness can only take in one point at a time, while at the best the other things can only be seen as felt or noticed as in a dream. Accordingly that opera music is the most easily apprehended, which demands the least cooperation of the eye, and that the most deeply where the motley objects of the outward world continually claim its attention.

Mark what Goethe says! "While the grand French Opera through half of the last century with an immense amount of apparatus, unsuccessfully tried to sustain itself and ours, the Italians had made the fortunate discovery, that a few persons, with all manner of sort of surrounding by melodious song, by very clear appropriate delivery, could produce a far livelier effect."

What was possible then, is so to-day. The public preserves the same peculiarities.

In every profession the artist must begin with the easy and more simple tasks, and educate himself gradually through such experience to the higher ones. And can the natural course be unnecessary only in the opera the most difficult of all musical creations? Is one qualified and justified for such work, when one has produced some tolerable songs and piano music pieces?

Begin first with smaller comic operas. They are the easiest to get performed, and in them you can acquire experience for future greater works. Without dramatic experience even genius does not at once achieve anything important. All the French composers have begun so and do begin so to this day. Therefore no nation has so many successful opera composers to point to as the French. Read in Otto Jahn's Biography of Mozart how many operas that master from his youth up had to write in order to be able to create Don Juan.

If you have a dramatic situation to describe, do not think of its theatrical presentation on the stage, but represent it to yourself as it is out in reality. Be the character yourself! That is the way Mozart did it. Therefore his music is more true and natural than his poets.

Do not try to express every mood, every period, every word with equal significance. We earth-dwellers cannot bear absolute perfection. Eternal sunshine becomes as burdensome as eternal rain.

We need contrast, light and shade in works of Art, as in all things. Look into any good opera score you please, you will find passages of more and passages of less importance. The masters have not made the latter in their dull hours, but on purpose: the lesser parts relieve the more significant and give them new significance. The same, whole pieces, kept in the background, is what the master of effect means to do.

Contrasts there should be, but no crude ones, without motive: these are rub-catching at effect. If you have depicted an impassioned situation with the whole stormy roar of the orchestra, and you now accompany the melody of a gentle scene immediately following only with a single instrument, that is a true thought, and therefore motiveless, false contrast, a mere straining at effect.

Do not listen to the system makers. But listen to the counsel of great masters. Try to do what Goethe requires of an artist:

> "Thou must,
> Seek in bygone plenty dull,
> Seek in masters here with joy."

Strange, that what we demand before all of every musical work is novelty, and yet we listen to a Beethoven Symphony or a Don Juan again and again with undiminished rapture: works so old and so well known to everybody, that not a single note in them can still be new.

What is there original in those passages? These are the commonest and most hackneyed figures! And yet the most beautiful, the most extraordinary effect! Reflect on it, why is it?

New figures! The single figures in a piece of music are but the single words are in a speech or a poem. No single word is in itself new, original; every one has been used a hundred thousand times.

Seek soon to know the kind and the degree of your own talent. All cannot do all things. If you can do nothing in the lofty tragic style, try the lowly comic vein. "Tout genre est bon, excepté l'ennuyeux," says Voltaire. And Goethe: "No kind is to be despised; every kind is edifying the moment a great talent has reached the highest point in it."

Respect the singer! The finest instrument is the singing voice, the most infallible means of effect is beautiful singing. Learn therefore to write what shall be grateful to the singer. Are you for example a virtuoso of the violin: will you not write your Concertos in such a way as to put all possible facility and art of expression into your own solo parts? Will you as a concert player step before the public with the execution of a second ripieno part in a Symphony? That is what is expected of the singer in many an opera.

Let the singers all have grateful parts to sing, and then your opera will be most sure to come upon the stage, and will sustain itself there the longest. The strongest proof is the Italian operas.

(From Our Own Reporter.)

FOURTH DAY.

The fifth and last of the grand concerts took place on Wednesday the 23rd at 6 o'clock, in the Brüderkirche. It was mainly devoted to the more prominent works for male chorus with orchestra performed by the Leipzig University singing society (the Pauliner) under the University musical director, Dr. Langer.

The concert opened with Liszt's festival ode "To the Artists," a creation continually the most imposing, full of the power of expression of the genius, which is by Schiller. At the same time as an artistic embodiment of that spirit long ago leading to a high goal, it is also striking that here a greeting to him in that case, is a Farewell. ... numerous gathering of artists from far and near members of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein.

The Violin Chaconne by Vitali, which followed, was finely adapted to show the performance of Concertmeister Jacobsohn of Bremen in its full splendor. He has often won honorable mention by his interpretations of classical works.

Herr Wallenreiter took a deep hold on the audience by the power of expression with which he sang an Aria from Schubert's Tenor Cantata "Lazarus." The somewhat emaciated orchestral introduction as well as the recitative that precedes them give a palpable suggestion of the mouldering scent of the surrounding graves and of the deep pangs of the lingering tomb, while in the aria itself the grand description of the situation reaches its climax in the thrilling cries of the sufferer.

*Translated and abridged from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (Leipzig).

An Andante from an Orchestral Suite by C. Hübner of Bremen, which ended the first part, showed talent for the judicious and characteristic use of the instrumental means, so that the author deserves encouragement to further deeper studies that he may acquire a corresponding mastery of form and power of invention.

The second part opened with a Hymn for male voices (soli, chorus and orchestra) by W. Stade, which in respect of noble keeping, understanding and sure routine of technical means, made on the whole a very favorable impression.

In the rendering of one of Marcello's Psalms, with 'cello obbligato, Frl. Clara Martini made no small sacrifice, since she was seriously indisposed: and did the piece nevertheless afford a brilliant opportunity to the singer. But the excellent qualities of that distinguished singer, especially her noble, soulful, discreet management of her beautiful organ, still told to good advantage.

Richard Wagner's "Liebesmahl der Apostel" (The Last Supper) formed a mighty keystone to the whole series of five grand performances. The merits of this work have been set forth in length in former years of the Neue Zeitschrift; we have only now to say, therefore, that owing to the universal and highly successful execution, the impression on the again overcrowded audience was truly grand and often overpowering. Some of the earlier performances of the famous Pauliner choir were perhaps open to the charge of want of finish or sufficient elasticism here and there; this time, on the contrary, the highly complicated and spacious and textural structure of this work, particularly in the great middle movement for three choirs, came out with such true power of clearness. To such places ... that the prejudices against the work on the part of many who had never clearly understood it, were completely routed and left the field to joyful appreciation. Even a passage at two-fifths to be tedious in the song of the Apostles only served this time to heighten the effect of the glorious climax which then gradually unfolds itself with the coming in of the orchestra.

[The writer winds up his report of the day with the wish that the Pauliner-Verein may soon repeat both the Wagner and the Liszt works in Leipzig, and with a compliment to Herr Thiel for his Organ accompaniment.]

On Thursday the 24th, there was an extra performance, serving as a concert Matinée of Chamber Music to allow a hearing of some compositions postponed on account of the length of the preceding concerts and the excursion to Rudolstadt. Herrmann's Octet which having had a fair chance in the first Matinée, was repeated. The Suite in E major for piano and violin by C. Goldmark of Vienna, made a very favorable impression by its thoroughly poetic design, at the same time satisfying the demands of the formal. The engaging first movement, carried out in thoroughly romantic style, is followed by a noble Andante, only weakened by one or two dull places, and then again by a sparkling, pleasing Scherzo. A rather short elegiac movement forms an advantageous contrast with the last, while the Finale of the whole sounds with less depth and for the most part in a homophonous, but yet a fresh and lively manner. The whole work offered brilliant opportunity for virtuoso powers, and was executed by Herren C. Kohl of Zwickau and E. Hirt of Vienna in such perfection and excellence that the every movement was received with lively applause, and the work was on the next day performed again in the palace at the Duke's private request. The brothers Thern also contributed two performances, which were very thankfully received; and the court opera singer Wallenreiter, who had already won applause, sang a good song by Lassen, besides the "Widmung" and "Ich grolle nicht" of Schumann, with such acceptance that he was obliged to repeat them.

So ended this extraordinary series of seven concerts, namely four of sacred music, one of choral works with orchestra, and two of chamber music.

Bernhard Vogel.

"Old Lauriger."

The most charming of college songs, both for tune and words, is the one on "Lauriger Horatius." Mr. James A. Morgan, of New York, writes to the College Courant of Yale an interesting letter about it, of which the following is the substance:

One and two of your correspondents tell me who was the author of that most widely known and admired of our college songs, "Lauriger Horatius"? Also of the origin of the tune, which was so often heard appropriated during the war to that "My Maryland"?

"Whatever were its first words or the true origin of the Marseillaise, the Flaming Brand I never wrote its authorship has been hid more successfully. Its own mandate, that it is born not of Academicus, ... sparkling and hopeful in a glass of Rudy best. ... I have been told that in his terrible ... Marshals an officer sang it ... grace of ... and his ... men, in a ... singing "Lauriger Horatius." Soon there were lying two of their wounded comrades, waiting for the surgeon; who were long coming ... and then ... every thicket. And how, my wounded men —one of them ... ... were merely refreshed ... ... bound to merry ... when ... followed, they having drowned their ... ... as the ... ... was upon them. And I can well fancy that like as in that group under the Cedar:

"Something came like a sweet breath Through the ... of ..."

in the brave hearts fresh on the long ago.

The following translation was ... I believe, by an army officer in his camp, during the late rebellion:

"LAURIGER HORATIUS."

I.

"Poet of the laurel wreath,

Another lesser known version of the chorus is

"[illegible]

Mr. Morgan gives the following as a perfect copy of the song, of which the numerous versions show many various readings:

"LAURIGER HORATIUS.

Spohr and the Conductor's Baton.

"Amongst other things"—says Spohr, speaking in 1820—"it was my lot on one occasion to conduct a concert of the Philharmonic Society, where I had almost as much difficulty as at my solo performance. It was, at that time, the custom at the Philharmonic when symphonies or overtures were performed, for the pianoforte player to have the score before him—not for the purpose of conducting from, but that he might look at it, and now and then play a note, which, when it was heard, made a very bad effect. The real Conductor of the concert was the leader of the violins, who gave the time of each movement, and now and then, if he found the orchestra getting unsteady, beat a bar or two with his bow. So far an orchestra so arranged and so loosely spread, as that of the Philharmonic, to go accurately together and to work as one this was impossible and, however in spite of the ability of the individual players, the general effect was much worse [illegible]. I had made a resolution [illegible] I had to direct a concert in London, I would make an attempt to remedy this condition of things. For as fortunate for me that the day I conducted, Ries was at the piano, since he willingly consented to give up the score to me. I placed myself with it at a separate desk in front of the orchestra, and taking my baton from my pocket, gave the sign to begin rehearse. Some of the directors who were present were quite frightened at this innovation, and protested against it; but I quieted them and at last was allowed to proceed with my experiment. The symphonies and overtures which we had to rehearse were well known to me, [illegible] I had also conducted them at home. I was therefore, able to give the tempo without hesitation, and to signal to the wind instruments when to come in which gave them a confidence they had not before possessed. When the performance did not please me, I made bold to say so, very courteously as I could though also quite in earnest, all which then at my request translated to the band.

Being thus roused to more than attention, and having the beat more clearly before them, they played with a fire and a correctness which I had never before heard. So much did it encourage them, that at the end of the first movement of the Symphony they each expressed their satisfaction in the new method and thereby gave way to all further opposition on the part of the directors. In the vocal music, also, I had conducted, as Ries suggested, a probable in [illegible] [illegible] the success of my baton, and I received many thanks from the singers for the exactness with which they were accompanied.

"So much for the rehearsal. In the evening the success was even greater than I had dared to hope. True, the audience made at first and shook their heads at the innovation, but when the music began and the orchestra played the well-known symphony with unwonted force and precision, the general introduction expressed itself by long-loud applause at the end of the first movement. The victory of the baton was won, and from that time forward no one ever sat at the piano during a symphony or an overture.

"On this same evening the concert-overture which I had written before leaving Frankfort, was played for the first time. As I was to conduct [illegible] Philharmonic Society chose it as the composition which, according to my contract, I had to furnish them."

Spohr must have had a great deal with his wife, Dorette, who played the harp, and was, indeed, the most remarkable harp-player of her day. This made Spohr write Concertante [illegible], and sometimes a half a wish an odd adventure on a [illegible] character. Here is Spohr's account of one of the latter. It was not very long after Napoleon's fall and the return of the Bourbons—which is necessary to explain one or two of the allusions.

"At Brussels we found another pair of travellers who, like ourselves, played the harp and the violin—Mons. Alexandre Boucher, of Paris and his wife. I had heard a great deal about him and was very desirous to make his personal acquaintance. Boucher had the reputation of being as much an extraordinary player as a great original. He was very much like the Emperor Napoleon, had in fact and I may a resemblance which he did everything in his power to turn to account. He had procured the Emperor's way of wearing his hat, and [illegible] until he had them quite to perfection. When he was at one of his artistic tours and came to a town where he was not known, he used to present himself in [illegible] fashion on the public promenade or in the theatre, to make people look at him and get himself talked about; indeed, he went so far as to pretend a regret that he was persecuted by the authorities and driven out of the country on account of his likeness to Napoleon, and 'because he kept their beloved Emperor before the eyes of the people.' At any rate, I was told that in Lille he announced his last concert in these words: 'An Unfortunate Resemblance forces me to expatriate myself. I shall, therefore, before quitting my beloved country, give one farewell concert.' The same announcement contains the following [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of which I am called in Paris 'The Alexander of the Violin.'

"I was on the point of calling on Mons. Boucher, when he anticipated me by himself calling. He began with a great deal of complaint about the strictness of my criticisms and with a [illegible] for his success, behaved himself in a very pleasant way. He introduced us to several musical families, who invited us to their parties, by which we had the opportunity of hearing the Bouchers. Their wife displayed a great deal of [illegible] but the [illegible], without exception, poor, [illegible] and [illegible] of Boucher's own composition though his execution excellent. At the beginning he played a quartet of Haydn, but introduced into it such a quantity of inappropriate and [illegible] ornamentation as to destroy all my pleasure.

[illegible] to me how he allowed his wife to [illegible] upon him. When he and I were at the violin [illegible] she asked [illegible] for the key of the fiddle case. [illegible] brought it [illegible] fiddle then went back, for the bow rubbed it with the rosin, put out the music on the desk and last of all, sat down by [illegible]. On the other hand, when we were asked to play, the process was [illegible] the evening, for I had only finished [illegible] concert, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] brought him to the [illegible] where the music was to be, and stood still—all while in the other case, was doing Mme. Boucher. The reason why I moved the harp was not only [illegible] with the intention that [illegible] It had perfectly [illegible] which every [illegible] [illegible] way. We played one of my duets [illegible] and got [illegible]. Boucher seemed particularly [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Baron d'Angevier, of Lille, and with the Baron afterwards showed me as a curiosity in spite of my [illegible] follows [illegible], if I am nothing [illegible] Napoleon of the violin, Mr. Spohr is [illegible] [illegible]."

From Brussels the Spohrs went to Lille where their success was no less gratifying.

"After my concert I went to to Mons. Vogel, who had been well [illegible] as the best violin-player of Lille and the [illegible] of the [illegible] Concerts. He was not at home when I called, but Mme. Vogel received me very kindly. As soon as I mentioned my name [illegible] and she asked eagerly [illegible] the composer of the [illegible] [illegible] one of the subjects. I laughed and said I was, on which she fell on my neck, [illegible] I was [illegible] [illegible] her [illegible] of my husband will be, for he is quite mad about your duets. I had hardly got back to the hotel when Vogel himself appeared, with boisterous [illegible] and embraced me as an old friend. In the course of those [illegible] people we passed, [illegible] who gave a concert with [illegible] of the [illegible] Boucher [illegible] Vogel arranged for us, and where, after Mr. Boucher's last concert, his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] whole of the [illegible] The [illegible] [illegible] unlike performance, was an [illegible] [illegible] and there on the first day [illegible] second concert. Some musical people from the [illegible] town of Douay who had come over for the concert invited us there in the name of the musical society of Douay and guaranteed [illegible] sale of 400 tickets at 5 francs each. We played [illegible] every day at some [illegible] party or other, where there was an excellent opportunity of performing all my quartets and quintets, as well as my compositions for the harp in a circle of enthusiastic amateurs. At these [illegible] we were sure to have some good [illegible] with [illegible] about Boucher. [illegible] occasion [illegible] playing a quartet, and [illegible] a second [illegible] him to [illegible] on which he [illegible] a [illegible] and, walking [illegible] the bass one of the other players, began [illegible] the passage [illegible] saying to himself, 'That was not right, [illegible] Boucher, once more!' The conclusion of the second concert was also extremely funny. The last piece of the programme was a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] placed by [illegible], at the end of which there was a [illegible] general silence. At the rehearsal he [illegible] to come to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the audience, when he should give the signal by stamping with his foot. The concert, however, was long, and it was very late before the [illegible] came on, so that the amateurs were, probably, in want of their suppers. Boucher put forth all his strength at the cadence, and as a second as if it were never going to end, some of the players put their instruments into the cases and left the room. This was irresistible, and in a few minutes there was not a man left in the orchestra. Boucher was too much occupied to notice what was going on, as at the beginning of the shakes he lifted his foot to give the promised stamp. When he came to the end of them, and his foot descended, he was [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and the applause of the audience. Imagine his astonishment when he heard nothing but the noise of his own footfall. He looked wildly round and saw he deserted Lobby. But the audience who had been all along watching for this moment, burst into peals of laughter, in which, whether he liked it or not, Boucher had no alternative but to join."

Heinrich Schütz.

This eminent musician was born in the year 1585 at Köstritz, a village on the river Elster in Voigtland. His growth his was a pretty [illegible] and his industry in [illegible] of Freiburg. In 1609 he was introduced to the Court [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] court of Hesse-Cassel, and [illegible] [illegible] of this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] he was admitted, at [illegible] and Marburg, [illegible] [illegible]. In to be made [illegible] proficiency [illegible] his parents, [illegible] that he [illegible] favourable [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] offered to take him from the [illegible] and to his [illegible] to place him under the tuition of Johannes Gabrieli, the then most celebrated musician at Venice. Schütz accordingly went to Venice and continued there till the death of his master in 1612. He then returned to Hesse-Cassel where the Count [illegible] settled on [illegible] an annual pension of two hundred gulden. In 1615 having a desire to revisit Italy, he obtained permission for that purpose, and [illegible] his return to [illegible], on the year following, he published a collection of masses. He then went to reside at Copenhagen, and in 1633 was made director of the music to the King of Denmark, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible] to 1672. He composed and published many noble works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of sacred music for voices. He introduced in many of them, the new [illegible] of song via the recitative and the duet and trio, as well as an independent [illegible] [illegible] accompaniment. He also invented the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] in Germany. There [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] as follows: "The History of our Lord's Resurrection," "The seven words of our Saviour [illegible]," and "The Passion according to the Four Evangelists." This [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Schütz's only secular piece was his opera "Daphne," the first in Germany, performed in 1627 on the occasion of a princely wedding at Torgau. It was composed to Opitz's translation of Rinuccini's poem. The Autograph of Handel's "Messiah."

We take the following from an article by Mr. Joseph Bennett, in the August number of Macmillan's Magazine:

"This Messiah score is an apparently unpretending volume, quiet, in a [illegible] [illegible] from the [illegible] and interest, and [illegible] from the difficulty of [illegible] which first [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by speculating as to where and [illegible] [illegible] circumstances Handel got through the work of writing [illegible] two hundred and seventy pages in twenty-three days. On these points, unhappily history says but little. Still more unhappily [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible], or admiring friend like [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] character's [illegible]. Hence the [illegible] [illegible] be [illegible] of connection and biographers have worried each other over [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. I am not going to [illegible] the view of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Let me confess, I [illegible] to a fondness for believing that the Messiah was written in the quiet [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] the gallant lives of persons could the peace and repose of the country [illegible] at his prose [illegible] the whole [illegible] happy a change would awake. Under such circumstances, one can half understand the sustained mental and physical exertion which alone rendered his 'twenty-three days' labor possible. To imagine that, broken in spirit, and worn in body and mind, he wrote the Messiah in his London lodging, amid the interruptions and distractions of town, is to [illegible] pages. I prefer to see, in the MS. before me [illegible] of Handel's [illegible] in that memorable [illegible] of 1741.

"But wherever the masterpiece was written, its subsequent history is plain enough. On his deathbed Handel seems to have had a [illegible] of its [illegible] upon leaving all his manuscripts in charge of the University of Oxford. This is, however, [illegible] to his favorite pupil Smith, who refused £3,000 rather than [illegible] the dying composer from his bed. Into [illegible] hands then accordingly passed [illegible] of George III. thus becoming [illegible] the finest [illegible] of the English Crown. [illegible] at Buckingham Palace [illegible] in the MSS. [illegible] M. Victor [illegible] were the Queen [illegible] and I should [illegible] of Sacred and [illegible] Music [illegible] of the English Crown. M. Schoelcher's dream has not yet been even distantly realized. The work of private effort was [illegible] the other day [illegible] It is too much to hope that Her Majesty the Queen [illegible] the Sacred [illegible] Handel's [illegible] volumes in the safe custody of [illegible]!

"It is easy to gain some insight into Handel's character from the volume [illegible] 'The Messiah' [illegible] advantage of Handel's personal acquaintance. The [illegible] of the composer, for example, is [illegible] in the manuscript. At one [illegible] At another [illegible] manuscript [illegible] No less [illegible] According [illegible] it is impossible [illegible] Handel [illegible] a [illegible] manuscript [illegible] Moreover [illegible] of his physical personality can be gathered from [illegible] It must have been a heavy hand [illegible] It reflects his physique no less faithfully than the splendor of his genius.

"Interesting as it is to observe all this, and more that remains to dwell upon here, the attraction of the volume lies in the fact that it shows us the Messiah as that immortal work first sprang from its composer's brain. Conscious of the importance of his sacred oratorio, Handel expended upon it a great deal of loving care; touching and retouching in long or supplying several deficiencies. By help of the facsimile before us, every change thus made can now be traced; we are admitted into the presence of the mighty musician, and can learn the processes by which the results were produced. [illegible] Handel [illegible] a necessary [illegible] ideas [illegible] material. After [illegible] on the hand the work [illegible] remains a memorable example of perfection [illegible] and more than anything else deserves to be called the 'Tower of Music.'"

The remainder of the article is devoted to showing, by help of illustrations in music type, how far the Messiah of Handel's first thoughts differed from the Messiah of his second.

Musical Correspondence

GLOUCESTER, ENGLAND, Sept. 11.—Before giving an account of the "Gloucester Musical Festival" which closed to-day, I will furnish your readers with a brief sketch of its origin and object, and [illegible] I quote the following paragraph from the Committee's programme of general arrangements:

"These Triennial Meetings were originally established to raise Funds for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans of Poorer Clergy within the Dioceses of Gloucester, Worcester and Hereford, aided by [illegible] Charities, the proceeds have, in late years, averaged [illegible] Widows [illegible] Twenty Pounds, and [illegible] Orphans Fifteen. That such [illegible] assistance is [illegible] Eighteen Orphans and Thirteen Widows [illegible] Clergy [illegible] £100 per annum."

It must not however be supposed that the funds in question are the direct result of the festivals, for the proceeds derived from the sale of admissions rarely [illegible] suffice to meet the expenses [illegible] but a sum sufficient [illegible] the deficit [illegible] is guaranteed by certain gentlemen (from 100 to [illegible]) who are called "responsible Stewards" [illegible] of donations in response to the urgent appeal which is made at the door of the Cathedral after each performance, go [illegible] to the fund.

These festivals are held annually in rotation at the towns of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, and the proceedings of the present week ([illegible] meeting of the three choirs) occupied four days, from Tuesday, September 8th, to Friday the 11th, inclusive.

The singers engaged for this occasion were as follows: Miles Tietjens [illegible] and Miss Pitt, [illegible] soprano; Mme. Sainton-Dolby and Miss [illegible] contraltos; Messrs. Sims Reeves and Vernon Rigby, tenors; with Messrs. Lewis Thomas and Santley, basses. The chorus, 250 strong, was made up of singers carefully selected from the best choirs in England, and was superintended by Mr. Sydney R. Smith. The orchestra, numbering [illegible] the chief names of the best performers in England, and no pains were spared to make the programme one of the best which could be offered.

The credit of making these arrangements belongs to Dr. Samuel Sebastian Wesley, who [illegible] not only [illegible] but [illegible] of the performances, which were held, as heretofore, at the Cathedral in the morning, and at the Shire Hall in the evening.

The Festival began on Tuesday forenoon, with special service in the Cathedral and a sermon, in aid of the Charity, by the Rev. Canon Lysons, Rural Dean. The [illegible] Service in [illegible] and [illegible] Among the Services for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday were Gibbons (in F), Travers (in F) and [illegible]

Chant Service by S. S. Wesley, with anthems by J. S. Bach, Prof. Oakley and the Elder Wesley. The morning concert began at 1.30 P.M. with selections from the "Creation," comprising the most effective choruses and airs contained in that Oratorio. The solo parts were sung by Mlle. Tietjens, with Messrs. Sims Reeves and Santley. Then came selections from S. Wesley's setting of the 111th Psalm ("Confitebor tibi") with the soli by Mme. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Vernon Rigby. Then Beethoven's Mass in C, (the first of the two written by him), with the same soloists; and lastly Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm: "As the hart pants." As I was not in Worcester until Wednesday I can give no further account of the proceedings of the first day of the Festival, except to say that the programme of the evening concert included Mendelssohn's Overture "The Hebrides" and the Finale from the first act of "Loreley."

Wednesday morning was devoted to the Elijah, an Oratorio ever dear to the hearts of Englishmen and Worcester in particular, since its first performance at Birmingham in 1847, when it was directed by the composer himself, it has never been more perfectly produced than at the present occasion. The part of the Prophet was of course allotted to the great baritone Santley, and the other parts were sustained by Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Dolby, Miss Wynne, Mlle. Liebhart, Mr. Sims Reeves and Messrs. Rigby and Thomas. I have not space to particularize, and can only say in those parts he [illegible] Mr. Reeves sang in a manner which probably could not be equaled by any other singer in the world, and that the air "O rest in the Lord" when rendered by Mme. Sainton-Dolby became a very gem.

The tenor solos, in part first, were sustained by Mr. Vernon Rigby, a young singer of great promise and ability, who acquitted himself splendidly throughout the whole Festival. The selections for the evening included Mendelssohn's "Erste Walpurgis Nacht," Spohr's Nonetto in F for string and wind instruments, Beethoven's C minor Symphony and a number of songs by Beethoven, Spohr, Sullivan, Abt, and others.

Mendelssohn's cantata here, originally composed to the words of Goethe's ballad of the "First Walpurgis Night," in February, 1831, while at Rome, but was probably dissatisfied with his effort at that time —at any rate we hear no more of it until 1842, when it was re-written at Leipzig and finally published in 1843. The overture depicting the gradual transition from Winter to Spring, is followed by a tenor solo and chorus of women's voices,—

"Now May again Breaks winter's chain,"

after which the scene changes to the Harz mountains and their wild rites of the Druids.

Spohr's Nonetto,—played so often in London—was finely performed, although owing to the length of the programme, the repeats in the first and last movements were omitted. The C minor Symphony suffered from being placed at the end of the list, and neither did performers nor the few hearers who remained in the Hall seem in the humor to enjoy it. [We should think it would have been a great relief after so much Spohr.—Ed.]

Mr. Arthur Sullivan is rapidly and deservedly acquiring a very high reputation as a composer of ballads. He seems to have caught the true secret of his art, which is to suggest much that lies beyond what he would describe; and his songs therefore, though full of tenderness and passion, are never "sentimental." Moreover, however elegant his music, in this instance, music only helps to expound with deeper meaning the thought embodied in the poem. The two ballads given on this occasion were "Oh, sweet and fair" (Mme. Sainton-Dolby) and a new song, "So 'tis, O my love, my love!" (Mr. Sims Reeves), the composer accompanying at the piano in both instances. The second is by far the better of the two songs, and Mr. Reeves, in spite of his well-known antipathy to encores, was obliged to repeat it. The words are Jean Ingelow's.

The performance of Thursday was unprecedented in length, and six consecutive hours of Oratorio were rendered the more tedious by the fact that the list was made up chiefly of excerpts and disconnected passages, from various composers, having nothing whatever in common; and it is only necessary to say that the evening concert occupied more than three hours, to enable you to admire the enduring heroism of the musicians, which was equalled only by the Spartan endurance of those hearers who remained until the last note was sounded. The programme began with a selection of pieces from Spohr's Oratorio "Des Heilands letzte Stunden" (or "Calvary") opening with the overture in C minor (as unlike Spohr as anything which can well be imagined) followed by that beautiful and restful chorus "Gentle night, O descend!" The other pieces were the aria "Jesus beneath thy [illegible]" sung by Mlle. Tietjens, Mlle. Drasdil and Mme. Sainton-Dolby (the [illegible] in the accompaniment being played with muted strings); the air with chorus, "Though all thy friends prove faithless," (solo by Miss Wynne), and one of all the Chorus, "Beloved Lord, thine eyes we close."

Then came a very long selection from Herr Joseph Rudolph Schachner's Oratorio, "Israel's return from Babylon," comprising a number of Choruses, Airs, Quartets and Duets. Herr Schachner is perhaps entitled the better. Oratorio is the least in perhaps not the most interesting of all forms of composition, and when it becomes a mere repository of hackneyed themes and threadbare motives, the effect is far from gratifying. I hope therefore that I do no act of injustice to Herr Schachner when I say that it would have been far better had his work been omitted from the list. In striking contrast to this came the wonderful "Lobgesang" of Mendelssohn, which one never hears without a regret that the composer did not live to accomplish the two other works of this kind which he had planned.

This great Symphonie Cantata, which was given without omission, gained additional beauty from the splendid manner in which it was performed. The Symphony at the beginning was played with the greatest care and spirit, while, in the vocal portions, each singer seemed to desire that not the least shade of the composer's thought should be neglected or forgotten. The solos were sung by Liebhart and Mr. Sims Reeves, whose rendering of that well known passage, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" was unapproachable.

The Overture to Handel's "Samson" followed by a selection of no less than 20 pieces from that Oratorio came next, and occupied full one hour and a half. Mr. Sims Reeves as "Samson," Mr. Santley as Manoah, and Mr. Lewis Thomas as Harapha, while Mme. Sainton-Dolby and Mlle. Tietjens respectively took the parts of Micah and "an Israelitish woman."

Notwithstanding the fatigues of the day the audience at the evening concert was very large, and they were rewarded for their zeal by an excellent programme, which I give in full.

"The D minor or 'Reformation' Symphony appears to originate in Mendelssohn's intention to set the Choral 'Ein feste Burg' for a choir and orchestra. (In the same year 1830, he composed music for 'Wir glauben all' an Einen Gott' and for others of Luther's Hymns) and, when finally took the form of a Symphony, the beauty and fine sense of self-appreciation which he possessed in an unusual degree, doubtless enabled him to discern some reason for withholding it from publication. At present, however, it bids fair to rival his A major and A minor Symphonies, in their claims to public favor. In regard to its performance, I have heard it played quite as well in America as upon this occasion.

The Master Quartet for strings was rendered with consummate skill, but it was of no avail, such was the long trying wound upon a piece so utterly vapid and soulless. The most interesting feature in the second part of the programme was the song by Mr. Sullivan "I wish to tune my quivering lyre" (from Byron's translation of Anacreon) sung by Mr. Sims Reeves with accompaniment of full orchestra, conducted by the composer. This spirited composition, as well as every other work of Mr. Sullivan's, is a most valuable addition to the repertory of the concert-room.

There was no concert on Friday evening, and the Oratorio of the "Messiah" at the Cathedral in the morning brought the Festival to a close.

The weather during the entire week was fine and the attendance good, although the donations to the charity (£[illegible]) were not so large as on previous occasions. Dr. Wesley may be highly complimented upon the success of the musical proceedings during the four days.

I had almost forgotten to say that the organ contained the newly patented electrical appliance for maintaining the connection between the keys of the keyboard which was at a considerable distance from the instrument.

CHICAGO, SEPT 19.—The first droppings of the musical season have come in the shape of Offenbach's repertoire (from one corner of an overturned [illegible]) which were admirably served to us by Bateman's troupe. Thalberg—although I don't go and don't remember positively. With all sympathy for the impresario, one cannot but be glad for the sake of the musical significance involved that the season did not pay.

Maretzek's double troupe, German and Italian, opened here last Monday evening, September 28, with Trovatore. The cast of the troupe as I send it shows it all very good, yet for the ordinance worth going. Violet: Miss Agatha States, mezzo-soprano; Collini contralto; Brignoli tenor; Orlandini, baritone; Maretzeri, (silent [illegible]); Reichardt, basso. Miss Hotter, soprano; Mme. Durand, soprano; Mr. W. Formes, basso; Hermanns, basso; Habelmann tenor, etc. Miss States has failed to impress as favorably as an actress as an expected singer. Maretzek made a nice enough. Collini has an uneven voice, but acts well. Hermanns has made admirable [illegible] as Mephisto in Faust and as Rocco in Fi- dilla, as also Valentine in Faust, and as Florestan in Fidelio.

On Tuesday night Faust was given in German, on Wednesday Ernani and Thursday Beethoven's Fidelio in German — this latter for the second time in Chicago, and what an event was! It was this writer's fortune to be accompanied by several musical persons who had never before heard this opera, and it added much pleasure to the enjoyment to congratulate and note the unfolding of the wonderful charms of the work. The cast was good, and the orchestra played excellently with Mr. Tooter as leader. Mr. Ritter, you would have been delighted at the appreciation with which this work was received. The first principal concerted piece, "Mir ist so wunderbar" was encored with an enthusiasm I have never seen excelled here. In the later parts of the opera the music seemed to take such a hold upon the feelings of the audience as to restrain them from violent applause. And was not this also a good sign? The wonderfully beautiful orchestration surpassed by far all our previous ideas of operatic perfection. The German element of course had a large representation in the audience, which was large and fashionable. To-night Don Giovanni is given. Saturday The Hunter (I think) and Martha (German). Next week's announcements are not yet out. One thing is sure, Maretzek is giving us a really enjoyable operatic season, and we are giving him good houses.

We are promised Symphony concerts this season and chamber concerts. Mr. C. H. Brittain, a young man from Boston, has lately come here to teach piano, and is likely to do well. He was a pupil of Dresel. And so we rest. Der Freischütz.

New York, Oct. 5.—Irving Hall was filled with an attentive and appreciative audience on Saturday evening upon the occasion of the opening concert of the season. It was given by Mr. Sanderson (pianist) assisted by Miss Mathilde Toedt (Violinist) Miss Kempton, and by Messrs. Hill, Davis and Colby.

Mr. Sanderson's pianism is of a kind readily appreciated by the general public, and his surprising dexterity of finger—which was especially displayed in octave passages—elicited the warmest demonstrations of applause. Indeed his second solo was three times encored. In response to the last demand he dashed off a jaunty and frothy arrangement of a popular song called "Capturing Bird of the lower meadow." This of course took immediately with a not too discriminating audience.

Miss Toedt, whose remarkable ability and talent we have frequently had occasion to mention, played two selections in a very artistic manner. Her bowing seems to be stronger than it was last winter and her tone a very clear and pure. She was recalled in each instance.

Mr. Davis who made his debut before a New York audience, was favorably received, and obtained much applause. His voice is a strong, vigorous bass, especially good in the upper and lower notes and less excellent in the intermediate ones.

Mr. Hill, Miss Kempton and Mr. Colby acquitted themselves creditably, and their efforts added to the interest of the concert.

The next musical events of interest will be Miss Kellogg's three concerts at our Academy of Music on the 11th, 14th and 16th of October, and Ole Bull's concert at Steinway on the 9th. The Philharmonic Society has not yet issued its programme and I am therefore unable to inform you of its plans for the campaign. I hope that I can make my next communication more interesting. F.

Mr. W. H. Schultze has made it known in a popular "Grave Song" by Kirchner Reicheneck. Both words and music have the right ring, and the Chief deserves it. Ditson & Co. publish it.

BOSTON, OCT. 10, 1868.

Concerts.

The welcome concert-giving phenomenon in front of the advancing lines of solid array of Symphony and Oratorio, come as announced and have passed on. Foremost, a brave figure at the head field marshal of the skirmishers, was Ole Bull. Almost dripping from the salt sea (he arrived at New York only three days before he appeared in Boston) the stalwart Norseman, Viking of the violin, gave three performances at the Music Hall.

The first was on Friday evening, Sept. 25. He looked as fresh and strait and vigorous as ever; his smile as cordial and good-boy-like, with which he acknowledged the warm greeting of a large audience for the season. The man and the music also were the same old story. Just as he leaned his cheek and ear to his instrument just as he shook that softened forelock over his eyes in the "rapt" passages, just as prolonged the agony of sentiments strained more than was necessary to satisfy the music just so divinely it is all the old quips and quirks and eyes-wide flights which are supposed to mean genius, and which with him have acquired the fatality of lifelong habit. He is a brilliant, fantastic virtuoso, an effect player, taking the crowd; the time is long past when he might be hoped to become a classic artist. His compositions are ingenious contrivances for the exhibition of these virtuoso effects. But at the same time the rare excellence of his playing still remain: that superb breadth and fullness of tone (alas, not always in good tune), that perfectly easy and decided staccato, that vigor and boldness of execution, always the rare purity and substantial tone of his high harmonics, and best of all his uncommon faculty of polyphonic playing in several parts at once, so that for a few bars sometimes you can imagine that you hear a string quartet in trio. The tone of the violin however and the personality of the man, ever most interesting, are enough for the delight of any common, not particular, musical audience.

He played that night a Concerto in A major of his own, consisting of an Allegro Maestoso, an Adagio Sentimentale and a Rondo Pastorale. The Great Organ under the hands of Mr. Eugene Thayer, with a piano (Mr. E. Lanning) did duty in the place of orchestra; some of the softer organ accompaniment making fine effects, while occasional full-organ blasts were out of all proportion big and loud. The composition was in Ole's style, freakish, dashing, sentimental almost lackadaisical by turns, showing his mastery of the violin to advantage. With this accompaniment he played his "Mother's Prayer," which always wins its encore; and, a short organ, his bravura variations on a theme of Bellini.

Mr. Lanning, a neat and facile pianist, opened the first part with a Norma fantasia by Jaell, and Mr. Thayer the second part by Variations of the Russian Hymn. Miss S. W. Barton might have made a better choice than "Ah mon fils," which always seems torn out of its dramatic connection when sung coolly in a concert room but she has a pleasing voice and sang acceptably.

Mr. G. F. Hall, with a round and telling baritone, sang more like an Italian than any Yankee we remember to have heard. An Italian Romanza, by Panseron, and an English ballad were his pieces, besides the Mozart duet "La ci darem," with Miss Barton.

Ole Bull's second concert, Saturday Afternoon was mainly for the children,—those of an older growth included, who may yet be children to come. No Concerto this time, but "Mother's Prayer" of course, and "Nightingale" "Tarantella," &c. Mr. Lanning played Gottschalk. Mr. Thayer Variations on "God save the King!" Miss Barton sang "Lascia ch' io pianga," &c., &c.

Ole Bull playing a classical work for once a Violin Concerto (in D) by Mozart, as he did that Saturday evening was a rare and curious thing to witness. Here and there passages came simply, feelingly and beautifully out; but for the most part it was strangely treated. Entering at the middle of the Allegro, for instance, we for some time thought he must be in the second (Andante) movement, so very slow the tempo that he took, and yet the structure of the piece was in the Sonata form of a first movement. Mozart never seemed to us so slow, so interminable. Then in the Andante, the player's sentimental tendency to drag out and prolong a cantabile phrase or passage like the Italian opera singers, made you lose Mozart in the subjective sentimentality and [illegible] of the player. His spasmodic accents, sudden starts and freaks in the Rondo finale were not less exceptional. Whether the piece be Mozart's, or another's, Ole Bull plays Ole Bull and nothing else. His Carnival of Venice" was the same as ever "only more so." What we most enjoyed that evening was the "Hungarian Fantasia," by Kohne. That had something in it wild and sad and simple, and the player seemed to enter truly into its spirit.— Miss Barton sang that evening a Cantilene from Il Giuramento, and "La Separazione" by Rossini. Mr. Hill "Largo al factotum" and a Romanza (new) "Non torno" by Tito Mattei. Mr. Thayer tried out his elephantine variations on "Old Hundred" on the pedals.

Mr. B. J. Lang performed an interesting programme of Piano-forte Music at the Town Hall in Milton on the afternoon of Saturday before last. Other engagements, we are sorry to say, prevented us from hearing it. It was made up as follows:

Sonata ... [illegible] ... No. 2 of the [illegible]	[illegible]
Rondo Capriccioso in E major. Op. 14	Mendelssohn
[illegible]	[illegible]
Caprice in C [illegible]	[illegible]
Caprice in B [illegible]	Liszt

Transcription of Themes from a Polonaise by Weber	Liszt

Senorita Josefina Filomeno. This young Chilian girl of fifteen, of whose remarkable talent both for the piano and the violin we have spoken before, gave concerts at Chickering Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings of last week. Here is the first programme:

Piano Solo. Grand Concerto. Op. 79. With accompaniment for Second Piano	Weber.
Senorita Filomeno.
Soprano Solo. Prayer and Barcarolle from "L'Etoile du Nord"	Meyerbeer.
[illegible]
Violin Solo. Fantasia, [illegible]	Alard.
Senorita Filomeno.
Tenor Solo. [illegible] from the opera of [illegible]
[illegible] Whitney
Duo. Soprano and Tenor. [illegible]	Bristol.
Mrs. [illegible] Smith and Mr. Whitney
Piano Solo. [illegible]	Liszt.

Ballad. "My [illegible]" .... [illegible]
Mrs. [illegible]
Song. "My Heart is my [illegible]" .... [illegible]
Mr. Jos. Whitney.
Violin Solo. "Air [illegible]" .... Vieuxtemps.

The second programme was the best of the three, in the matter of the vocal selections. It was this:

Piano Solo. First Concerto	....	Chopin.
Teresina Ferrari.
Contralto Solo. "[illegible]"	....	Schubert.
Miss Addie Ryan.
Violin Solo. [illegible]	....	De Beriot.
[illegible]
Song. "[illegible]"	....	[illegible]
Mr. [illegible]
Duo. [illegible]	....	[illegible]
Miss Addie Ryan and Mr. [illegible]
Piano Solo. [illegible]	....	[illegible]
[illegible]
Baritone Solo. [illegible]	....	[illegible]
Violin Solo. [illegible]	....	[illegible]

In the [illegible] concert, which remained [illegible] classical, the [illegible] piano pieces were Thalberg's Fantasia on the "Prayer from Moses" and one by Liszt upon Ernani. On the violin she played De Beriot's "Scene de Ballet," and a brilliant Fantasia by Alard, [illegible] Paris, on themes from Robert le Diable. Miss RYAN sang a [illegible] and Cavatina by Rossini, [illegible] "[illegible]" and in a Duet "L'Addio," by Donizetti, with Mr [illegible] a [illegible] solo pieces were from Lorenzo [illegible] and Don Juan.

But [illegible] to play pianoforte works of such [illegible] as Chopin's E minor Concerto [illegible] and Weber's Concert-Stück, with any fair degree of success as an [illegible] interpretation, [illegible] Liszt's opera transcriptions, and Thalberg's [illegible] [illegible] When the same [illegible] instruments, [illegible] and success [illegible] and freedom [illegible] of intonation [illegible] the case of both instruments,—who wonder [illegible] more than could [illegible] it? [illegible] is a question which only [illegible] There must be, one would think, at least a musical nature, a genius and an aptitude for music [illegible] in her conception, and [illegible] mechanical. [illegible] precocity [illegible] since [illegible] We may wonder [illegible] great work of Chopin or Weber [illegible] we must look to the [illegible] artist for the interpretation [illegible] the [illegible] of feeling [illegible] and spiritual experience [illegible] such a work [illegible] But there is much here [illegible] to make us well [illegible]

As we intimated before, her violin playing interests [illegible] Not [illegible] the piano [illegible] appears in the violin. Besides, this is the more interesting instrument, while its mastery [illegible] Would it not be [illegible] her attention should be concentrated [illegible] one instrument? And [illegible] the violin, because good piano playing [illegible] common [illegible] [illegible] We would say [illegible] We are [illegible] young [illegible] concert [illegible]

At the same time we fear the influence of so much public concert playing at so early an age. Juvenile virtuosity is dangerous. It necessarily makes its appeal to the wrong sort of public; the applause of those who are more [illegible] in the extraordinary than in the [illegible], is not improving, not in a high sense educating, does not inspire one to become an artist. In such constant self-exhibition a [illegible] We wish the [illegible] better success than concert triumphs and not only [illegible] Study, [illegible] is the thing, rather than exhibition of what already is acquired.

The vocal portions of the concerts were highly acceptable,—always [illegible] Miss RYAN's selections of Franz and Schubert songs were especially commendable. Mr. [illegible] [illegible] voice and showed great care and [illegible] Mr. WHITNEY sang tastefully and sweetly as ever, and Mr. [illegible] [illegible] in the European journey.

Jottings.

—Miss FANNY E. CARY, one excellent contralto, [illegible] returned [illegible] announces her [illegible] concerts and [illegible] during the winter. To [illegible] We understand she is to [illegible] coming weeks at [illegible] and Worcester. If the Handel and Haydn Society should undertake so noble and arduous a task as Bach's Passion Music, [illegible] easy to see how one of the difficult solo parts can be filled.

—Most of our musical artists and teachers who passed the summer abroad have returned. Mr. [illegible] is already engaged in the [illegible] of his "Boston Conservatory." Mr [illegible] receives his pupils again. [illegible] has had a delightful visit, brings good accounts of [illegible] and [illegible] Mr. [illegible] resumes his vocal teaching, and is [illegible]

—We find an orchestral worthy of interest a few evenings since, at Selwyn's charming theatre, while waiting for the curtain to rise upon one of [illegible] comedy [illegible] It was an Overture "In the Italian style" by Franz Schubert, one of [illegible] works of [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Koppitz has indeed a model orchestra for a theatre, and, were all his selections so [illegible] worthy of all praise. [illegible] being good solo-players, nothing suffers in the execution.

—This reminds us that the orchestra at the Boston Theatre, under Mr. [illegible] has been [illegible] Selwyn's. The [illegible] A [illegible] violinist, Mr. [illegible] made a mark here when he came from New York [illegible] and played in a single concert ([illegible]). A [illegible] too is among [illegible] new accessions. Both we are happy to say are engaged for the Symphony Concerts orchestra.

—In the last letters received from Mr. CARL ZERRAHN we were informed that he would sail from Liverpool on the 27th inst. [illegible] for Boston. Has he been good reason to think [illegible] a few weeks [illegible] that, and [illegible] in season for the first rehearsals of the Symphony Concerts. At any rate, he will be ready to resume his conductorship, and to receive his pupils by the 15th of November, if not sooner.

—In our next issue we shall be prepared to give a pretty full outline of the programmes of the Symphony Concerts, which will begin November [illegible]. The sale of season tickets will be publicly announced by the middle of this month.

—[illegible] FESTIVAL. Mr. [illegible], we suppose, will bring us an account of the late Festival at Schwerin, Mecklenburg, his native land, which was fixed to take place on the [illegible] and [illegible] At the first concert [illegible] to be performed [illegible] [illegible] Symphony in A major, and "Kyrie,"—[illegible] "[illegible]," and "[illegible]" from the Mass [illegible] The programme of the [illegible] this week. Herr A. Schmitt was to be the conductor; among the soloists were Mme. [illegible] Joachim, [illegible]

FALLS [illegible]—The members of the St. Cecilia Association will give a grand festival performance in the month of October to celebrate the [illegible] anniversary of the foundation of the Association. J. S. Bach's Mass [illegible] will be performed on the occasion.—A number of professional and non-professional admirers of [illegible] a farewell [illegible] previously to his leaving this city to enter on his engagement at the theatre, Schwerin.

"THE LEON [illegible] OF OPERA."—Upon Mr. Chorley's retirement from the Athenæum we were promised occasional contributions from his pen: a pledge redeemed in part by the appearance in the last number of the Athenæum, of a communication from Baden-Baden under the familiar initials H. F. C.

"It should first be said," writes Mr. Chorley, "that not all the care [illegible] of the opera, nor the cost expended on its performance, nor [illegible] [illegible] Herr Eckert [illegible] excellent conductor [illegible] could have [illegible] Herr Wagner's admirers [illegible] The composer [illegible] [illegible] so many great works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Wagner's [illegible] Weber and Beethoven [illegible] Herr Wagner's [illegible] German [illegible]

To speak [illegible] Lohengrin pleased me [illegible] [illegible] Liszt's [illegible] [illegible] original idea [illegible] [illegible] their own [illegible] [illegible] I would be loath to say [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] who have been used to honor their superior depth and [illegible] in their judgment of music by ensemble of all Italian and French ways, and of English pretensions to enjoy and appreciate what is best in music.

"The orchestra assembled at Baden-Baden was fairly good, and went through its hard work manfully; the chorus, brought together from many places, was less satisfactory. The best had been done in the engagement of principal artists that could be done. Mlle. Mallinger from Munich, Herr Betz from Berlin, Herr Nachbauer (who replaced Herr Niemann), are all rated as in the first rank of German opera-singers; and such effect as was produced was owing to their good will and power of lungs. The heroine, too, had the dreamy, picturesque look which suits the part of Elsa, and was wonderfully devoted. The opera was accepted with as much delight as if 'parables' cut 'Russ,' had never [illegible].

"In hearing Lohengrin at Wiesbaden I was minded to [illegible] of a great German [illegible]. If this [illegible] between the [illegible] of the [illegible] there will not be a singer capable of singing Mozart's operas. What [illegible] the [illegible] answer. They have been long enough. The [illegible] of the [illegible] was [illegible] established here in a perform[illegible] of Don Juan immediately following that of Lohengrin. I have rarely seen or heard anything so [illegible] bad. [illegible] were at [illegible] In [illegible] he [illegible] Zerlina from Vienna because of [illegible] of her self-confidence [illegible] so it appeared [illegible] before her that Don Juan was as much sinned against as [illegible] had [illegible] [illegible] a very [illegible] for a [illegible] because of her [illegible] Italian of [illegible]. The lady who is Zerlina in London would hardly have been allowed to finish her part [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] garland. [illegible] have been [illegible] had [illegible] [illegible] whose [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] Art [illegible] as well as [illegible] of the [illegible] enough to. For the moment, it is sadly evident that we are in the iron age of national opera of Germany."

Mozart and the "Requiem."—Autographic Testimony to the Story

All the world knows the story of Mozart and the mysterious stranger: how the unknown was engaged the composer to write him a requiem [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a large portion of the covenanted price; how he appeared suddenly at intervals urging the completion of the work; how the [illegible] and the weird manner in which it was [illegible] preyed upon Mozart's fragile nerves and sensitive temperament; how he came to regard his requiem as his own funeral dirge; and how he died under this impression before the work was finished.

A letter copied by Mr Young into the September number of Fraser's from the collection of Mr Old, furnishes convincing proof that there is no exaggeration in the tale. Mr Young does not know to whom it was addressed, as the superscription and envelope are missing. It is in Italian, beautifully written, in a firm, clear hand. Several years ago Mr Old allowed a facsimile of it to be made for the opening number of the Autograph Souvenir, a periodical started in London for the purpose of reproducing the most valuable and authentic autographs in private collections, but not carried on beyond a few numbers. Translated into English, these are the contents:

Most honored Sir:

I would follow your advice, but know not how. My head is troubled and I can scarcely compose. [illegible] I cannot rid my sight of the figure of this unknown person. I see him perpetually; he requests, solicits, importunes me for the work. I continue because composing fatigues me less than repose. Besides, I have no longer anything to fear. I know by my own feelings that the hour approaches and that I must shortly breathe my last. I have finished before I have enjoyed the fruits of my talents. Yet life has been so sweet and my career opened before me under such fortunate auspices. But we cannot change our destiny. No one measures his own days: we must therefore be resigned. Whatever Providence ordains will be accomplished; and now I conclude this as my funeral dirge, I ought not to leave it unfinished. MOZART.

Vienna, Sept. 1791.

It is a good thing to have a high C in one's voice. The tenor Wachtel has just purchased a handsome villa near Wiesbaden for 50,000 dollars. This gentleman is said to have been a cab-driver a few years ago.

The number of volumes of scores, ancient and modern, and miscellaneous musical compositions, printed and MS., sent to the South Kensington Museum from the Musical Union [illegible] [illegible] some three hundred.

The Brunswick library has been enriched with a curious collection of programmes of all countries—some forty thousand in number. A large quantity refer to the last century, and a series belongs to the literary theatres of German and French fame. The collector, a Major Kahlder, has been occupied [illegible] years in making this gathering.

The programme of the Theatre Italien, just out, is as follows: Prime donne: Adelina Patti, prima [illegible] [illegible]; Minnie Hauck, id.; de Manska, id.; Biroi, id.; [illegible], prima [illegible]; Krauss, prima [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Tenori: Tamberlik primo tenore; Nicolini id.; [illegible] id.; Palermi id.; [illegible] secondo tenore; Arnoldi id. Baritoni: [illegible], primo baritono; Naudin id.; [illegible] id. Agnesi, primo baritono basso [illegible]. Bassi: [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Merrarelli; Fallar [illegible] Direttore: [illegible]; Forniture, 2° direttore d'orchestra; Arrazzi, [illegible] direttore di [illegible] [illegible] direttore del canto; Mazzoli, direttore dei cori.

In the library of Wagner's new opera of "Rienzi," which M. Pasdeloup is preparing at the Theatre Lyrique, there is a scene in which the faction of the Colonna and the [illegible] cry on the one side and on the other "Viva Colonna!" and "Viva Orsini!" The [illegible] troubled [illegible] cry and of [illegible] [illegible] on the [illegible]. "The [illegible]," says the Independance Belge, "has [illegible] of the difficulty by [illegible] 'Vive l'Empereur!' for 'Viva Orsini!'" History perhaps might suffer somewhat, but the public [illegible] will not be endangered.

The Ballad Society, which at first intended to begin its publications in 1868, made its work so forward that it will not begin till 1869. It [illegible] [illegible] members may expect Part I of the Civil War Ballads, from the King's Pamphlets edited by Dr. [illegible]; and Part I of the Roxburghe Ballads, edited by Mr. William Chappell, both with [illegible] [illegible] of the original woodcuts, [illegible] by Mr. [illegible] [illegible], and engraved by Mr. J. H. Rimbault.

The Theatre-Verdi was at Busseto (the composer's native place) was [illegible] on the 15th with "Rigoletto." Verdi's bust was crowned and saluted with loud acclamations. An instrumental piece written at the age of [illegible] years was performed on the occasion. All the ladies wore green dresses, and all the gentlemen green cravats.

M. Flotow's new opera, "Les Deux Compositeurs," was announced to be brought out at Prague on the 20th ult.

Signor Verdi, it is said, intends to try his hand at comic music, by producing an opera on the story of "Falstaff."

M. Pasdeloup has engaged two conductors for the Theatre Lyrique—M. Mangin and M. Vaudry—the former being an old and tried hand who [illegible] [illegible] Puritains and [illegible].

At the [illegible] to his Opera Reminiscences of Thirty Years, Mr. Henry F. Chorley intends to [illegible] [illegible] large additions [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible].

"The Athenaeum says: "It appears from the [illegible] published in America [illegible] of the programmes of various orchestral societies, that [illegible] is more [illegible] and enterprise on the other side of the Atlantic than on this. The list of works that have been brought out by the New York Philharmonic Society [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphony 'Harold', 'Romeo' [illegible], Liszt's 'Mazeppa', Berlioz' Symphony, Episode from an Artist's Life, [illegible] in Wagner's 'Tristan' and Isolde, Liszt's Marsch [illegible] Tag from Lenau's Faust, [illegible] Volkmann's Symphony in D minor, Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet Symphony, and [illegible]'s [illegible] overture. There may be great variety of opinion about the merits of many of these compositions and several [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] the New York Philharmonic Society has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] much [illegible] in the [illegible] of public performance. In the New York Symphony Soirées, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] have been produced, while the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association [illegible] just as [illegible] and [illegible]. Do not work fast. Look at Beethoven's sketch books, above all at his Fidelio; see how many different attempts he made to find for every moment of the work the best expression.

When Racine brought to Boileau his tragedy of Alexander, he was struck that it was uncommonly easy to him to make verses. Good [illegible] answered Boileau. I will teach you to make verses with pains, and you have talent enough to learn it soon. Racine used to say that Boileau had kept his word.

THREE GREAT PIANOFORTE PLAYERS.

1. Moscheles.

(Concert on the 9th October 1836)

Difficult as it is to say anything new about a virtuoso whose fame has been so long established as that of Moscheles, yet the fact that in his latest compositions he has taken a course which cannot fail to affect his playing induces me to attempt some remarks. In his F flat Concerto and F flat Sonata he was brimming [illegible] youthful spirit; in the G minor Concerto and the Studies, he entered upon a new though [illegible] [illegible] plan; and [illegible] he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] mysterious paths, apparently careless whether he can turn to please the masses or not. The fifth Concerto shows a leaning to the romantic school, and in the last one, that idea being fully developed and established in a [illegible] [illegible] wavering between old and new. The romantic vein which runs through this Concerto is not, however as [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] Chopin [illegible] [illegible] a [illegible] of the spirit of the time; on the contrary, its course is retrograde—it is rather the romantic spirit of antiquity which one finds here in Bach, Handel and Gluck—whose works hold a place in music as that of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] literature. In this respect the compositions of Moscheles resemble those of Mendelssohn, who, however, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of youth. Few probably would trust themselves to give a decided judgment till that they heard on the evening of Mr. Moscheles' concert. The applause could hardly be characterized as [illegible]; in fact, the audience were very quiet, as if anxious rather to show their interest by the deepest attention. They did however [illegible] [illegible] enthusiasm after the Duo, which Moscheles and Mendelssohn played [illegible]. The two artists, but one from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] compared them to a pair of eagles, each in turn mounting aloft or wheeling low, and each boldly answering the other in his flight. This composition is dedicated to the memory of Handel and [illegible] [illegible] of Moscheles' most successful and original works. About the Overture to Schiller's Maid of Orleans opinions differed, even among the connoisseurs. For my part, I [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Moscheles for [illegible] judged of [illegible] by the pianoforte arrangement, which certainly sounds very poor in [illegible] to the splendid orchestra. I shall speak of it more at length on [illegible] [illegible] to-day I will only say that I could trace the shepherd-girl throughout—from the day when she first hears [illegible], till, amidst waving banners, her beautiful form is laid in the ground. The Overture has a touch of real tragedy in it.

Moscheles also played the first movement of a new "pathetic" Concerto, and the whole of a "fantastic" one—both of which might fairly be called Duets for Pianoforte and Orchestra, so independent is the part taken by the former. These two works, besides deviating entirely from the form of his earlier ones, are remarkable enough to make me impatient to play them myself, and [illegible] the deep impression which, with the exception of one or two less [illegible] parts, they produced on me throughout. As to the way Moscheles has of playing the classics [illegible] of his touch, the sound healthy [illegible] [illegible] and the [illegible] [illegible] higher range of expression—we once he has heard but one for a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The exaggeration and sympathy with the modern [illegible] and fantastic style, which colored his playing as a young man he has now renounced, and the [illegible] more than made up for by the [illegible] of power and force of character of the [illegible] man. In the improvisation, with which he finished the evening there were some fine points.

We [illegible] remember with much pleasure the treat provided for us a few days before the concert by [illegible] of three great artists, and a youth who promises to become one, in the performance of Bach's D minor Concerto for three pianos. The three were Clara Wieck, Moscheles and Mendelssohn; the fourth was Mr. Louis Rakemann from Bremen. Mendelssohn played the orchestral accompaniment on a fourth piano; and the result was truly splendid.

2. Madame Pleyel.

(At Leipzig in 1839.)

The programme of Mme. Pleyel's concert gave one a most favourable idea of her artistic intellect. It is but a short time since we heard the G minor Concerto of Mendelssohn played by the composer himself, and it was interesting to compare her reading with that of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. She took the last movement even more quickly than he; but in other points Mendelssohn could hardly have failed to be satisfied with her thoroughly musical interpretation, except perhaps in one or two parts where the melody might have been played more simply and earnestly with less exuberance. Other pianoforte players seldom venture to play an entire concerto in public, but Mme. Pleyel gave us two, the second being Weber's Concertstück, which on this particular occasion was doubly interesting because [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] seem to have inspired the fancy of the younger composer in a truly bewitching manner; what a [illegible] has [illegible], though [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], delicacy and finish. Weber's Concerto bears but poor comparison with Mendelssohn's. Mme. Pleyel performed it admirably, with the same warmth which she seems to throw into every bend of a bar and [illegible] [illegible] among her audience that genuine and hearty sympathy which can only be gained by the combination of [illegible] fine music. I wish I could [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the piece with which the enjoyable evening was brought to a close. But [illegible] the [illegible] of the composer was far [illegible] that of the performer. [illegible] [illegible] composer of [illegible] own [illegible] by Weber [illegible] which even the melodies it endured might have been arranged and worked with more taste. And yet [illegible] was just this piece which was so furiously applauded; but she was obliged to repeat it. The playing of the highly [illegible] lady [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], besides which her love for all that is noble in her art will help to make that art more generally known.

At her second concert, Mme. Pleyel's powers seemed to rise with the enthusiasm they created, in [illegible]. She had made an excellent selection: Beethoven's C minor Concerto and Hummel's Oberon. At the subscription concert yesterday we had Kalkbrenner's E minor Concerto and the Concertstück repeated. Kalkbrenner was at the same time [illegible] [illegible] which explains her choice of his Concerto; she played it off much in the same way as one repeats to oneself a piece of poetry that one learnt when a child; but all trace of the scholar was gone—lost in the finish of the great artist. The Beethoven Concerto brought out another side of her nature; she played it both well and correctly, in a thoroughly German spirit, bringing the music before one like a picture, whilst the Hummel Fantasia seemed to descend from some airy spirit-world. Weber's Concertstück excited unbounded applause, bouquets were showered upon the artist, and the public [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] being heard [illegible] [illegible] there was more poetry in this woman [illegible] [illegible]. "The longer you [illegible] [illegible]" and the [illegible] [illegible] lasting [illegible] [illegible]. Her slender, graceful figure and the [illegible] manner of [illegible] [illegible] as if she did not deserve such applause, and [illegible] [illegible] the deeper things which she unfolds [illegible] music will not easily be forgotten, and we wish her all the happiness which she has been the means of giving to so many.

3. Thalberg.

(Concert for the Musicians' Fund, February 8th, 1841.)

In his flight across Germany this great artist folded his wings here for a short time, and from them have dropped, as from those of the angel in [illegible] [illegible] rubies and precious stones, which at his special desire have fallen into the hands of those who really wanted them. To say anything new about one who has already had so much praise lavished upon him is difficult. But there is one thing which every earnest artist will be glad to hear, namely, that he has made progress since he last delighted us with his art. Indeed in the two years' [illegible] since his former visit he has increased his powers to an astonishing degree, and, impossible as it may seem, has gained in freedom, grace and force. His playing appeared to make the same impression on all, [illegible] impart that happy complacency which perhaps he himself derives from it. True artistic power is something more than mere execution and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] reflection of the art itself, and it is easy to see from Thalberg's playing that he belongs to fortune's favourites, those who [illegible] has endowed with a gift and he [illegible] [illegible]. That he began his career, thus he has continued it even since, and thus he will finish it, happy himself and shedding happiness wherever he goes. The whole of his [illegible] evening everything that he played was proof of this. The audience seemed to be there not to criticise [illegible] simply to enjoy, and to be a source of enjoyment to the artist [illegible] his art. The selections were all from a [illegible] to and [illegible] from Don Juan; a fantasia on Italian airs, a grand study and a caprice on [illegible] from the Sonnambula, all most effective paraphrases of the [illegible] melodies, which, though surrounded by a whole [illegible] of trills and arpeggios, looked out plainly upon one everywhere. Most artistic was the treatment of the airs from Don Juan, and the whole performance was [illegible] [illegible]. As a composition the most important thing seemed to me to be the Study, based on a Russian theme somewhat of the character of an Irish national melody; the [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] [illegible] will not easily be forgotten, certainly no one else Thalberg will hope to play it with such magic perfection. All honour to him for that evening for he earned for himself both as a man and as an artist, the applause and esteem of every one present.

MENDELSSOHN'S ORGAN CONCERT

(Thursday, Aug. 6, 1840, at six in the evening.)

IN AID OF THE BACH MEMORIAL AT LEIPZIG

I should like to commemorate yesterday evening's performance in letters of gold. It was for once a concert which a man might enjoy—perfect from beginning to end. It struck me afresh how [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] get at the bottom of Bach; how he always becomes deeper the more one knows him. Zelter and Marx have said much that is excellent and to the point, and yet when one comes to hear him again, one feels how utterly powerless all words are to convey any real idea of him. No! a living reproduction of his works, a performance of the music itself is the only way; and who could do this with greater truth and enthusiasm than the great artist whom we heard yesterday, who has devoted the larger part of his life to the study of Bach, who has employed all the force of his enthusiasm to revive his memory in Germany, and has now in this concert given the first impulse towards bringing the outward image more clearly before our eyes? A hundred years have elapsed without any one having attempted this, and it will perhaps be another hundred before it is accomplished. It is not my intention to make any formal appeal in favor of the Bach memorial; those of Mozart and Beethoven are still unfinished, and may possibly remain so for some time yet. But, the idea having at last been started, it might be urged upon towns like Berlin and Breslau, which have especially applied themselves to the performance of Bach's works, and in which there must be many people who know what a debt music owes to him [illegible] than a tribute to its founder. In the circular announcing [illegible] concert [illegible] up to the present time Leipzig can show no visible memorial of the greatest artist she ever possessed. The honor of a monument [illegible] Thomas [illegible], due to Bach before all others, has been already [illegible] of his successors. But at the present moment, when both his greatness and his works are reappearing with fresh force, and so many [illegible] hearts of all true lovers of music [illegible] that the project of raising a monument to him will meet with the approval and the encouragement of the inhabitants of Leipzig.

That a project of Mendelssohn's [illegible] to the extent of success is no more than was to be expected. Every one knows how thoroughly he understands [illegible] statement. Yesterday he gave us nothing but the most splendid treasures, [illegible] of variety and increasing interest to the very close. After a short introduction of his own, he played a truly magnificent Fugue of Bach's in E flat [the so-called "St. Anne's Fugue"] in three movements, constructed on and arising out of each other; then a Prelude on the Choral "Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele," one of the most precious and touching things that ever came from the heart of an artist; then a grand Prelude and Fugue in A minor, very brilliant, [illegible] for a professional player. Here there was a pause, and then followed the Passacaglia in C minor — twenty-one variations so cleverly connected together as to keep the hearer in continual astonishment — and in which the resources of the organ were admirably used. Next came a Pastorella in F, in the deepest style of which this class of music is capable. This was followed by a Toccata in A minor, with a Prelude in B flat [illegible]. The whole wound up with an extempore fantasia, and here Mendelssohn shone in all his glory. It was founded on a Choral, to the words, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," into which he afterwards introduced the name of Bach and a fugal subject, working them up in a figure, and bring up the whole [illegible] in such a manner that it might be printed right off and made a perfect work of art. The lovely [illegible] of the summer sunset was streaming through the windows, and [illegible] one's head, many a one, doubtless, felt [illegible] that there are no occasions happier in music than when one great master pays tribute to the thoughts of another. Honor and praise to them both—the old and the young—the ancient and the modern.*

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY.

I. [illegible] AFTER THE PERFORMANCE OF [illegible].

Voigt begins—I am like a blind man standing in front of Strasburg Cathedral and hearing the bells, but unable to find the entrance. Leave me in peace, my friends, for man is a mystery to me."

"But who," said Eusebius, "would blame the blind man because he can think of nothing to say as he stands before the cathedral, provided he devoutly takes off his hat, when the bells ring out from above."

"Yes," continued Florestan, after a pause, "You, love him as much as you like, and pay all honor to his never-resting moral power; but never forget that it was only after years of study that Beethoven finally attained poetic freedom. Do not search for that which is irregular in him; but go back to the basis of his creations; no need of this Symphony, however bold and marvellous may be its utterances, such as have never yet been heard, to prove his genius,—that may be done just as well by the first, or by the graceful Greek one in B flat. Never pass a rule which you have not thoroughly mastered. There is nothing so ruinous, and you run the risk of being [illegible] by persons inferior to yourself at the moment they meet you."

And when they had finished, old Raro, [illegible] said, "[illegible] and let us love that lofty genius, who looks down with such [illegible] upon his [illegible] I feel this to-day we have been brought nearer to him than before. You have a long and difficult journey before you, my lads. There is a strange glow on the sky—I know not whether it be the glow of the setting or the rising sun. Struggle for the Light!"

2. [illegible] FEBRUARY 11 [illegible].

The Ninth Symphony was yet to come. It seems that people are beginning at last to see that in this work the great man did his greatest. I never recollect [illegible] before and [illegible] pages so often as to have left myself nothing more to say. The performance was [illegible]. I observed a note the importance of which Mendelssohn had seen at a glance, though I had never before heard it so prominent: the single D in the bass trombone, which makes so astonishing effect, and gives the passage an entirely new life (see the score, page 16, bar 2, and 47 8).

"The English are not a Musical People."

BY [illegible]

I.

One of our humorists has said that a quotation is never so apt as when it is misapplied, and I invite it to prove the perfect aptitude of the quotation from common prejudice which heads these remarks, by showing [illegible].

If what is common and false be vulgar, then certainly the [illegible] of the musical incapacity of the English is a vulgar [illegible] [illegible] ears; that we have taken the [illegible] and, consequently, the word which defines them, from the French; and that is why we spell it in the French way. Well, we took Italia, or a large part of it, from the French, but do not call it [illegible].

The truth is, however, that the prejudice against which English musicianship has to contend springs from domestic mistrust, more than from foreign depreciation, of our native capacity to love and practise the art. It dates [illegible] within these last hundred and fifty years, to prove which I will adduce some pertinent facts from old periods of English history.

The great Englishman is a compound of Briton, Saxon and Dane. It would be easy to exemplify, with [illegible] the very strong musical bent and musical ability of each of these three components of our nation, and thus to prove that the [illegible] love of the English people was inherent in us from the races of which we are amalgamated. I will forbear the recitation of many of these stories, but must recount one to show that our forefathers, prior to the Conquest, had musical proficiency far above the compositions and performances of a melody to such an accompaniment as would suffice to keep the voice in tune, which was the utmost attainment in musical art of the classic Greeks and Romans and of all the North European nations until long beyond the period now under consideration. FROM HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

siasm was prodigious, and it was most fortunate for me that I had sold all my tickets beforehand, or otherwise, owing to this restriction, I might easily have made a considerable loss. My concert bills at the corners of the street were speedily covered with [illegible] placards announcing, by the name of the people, a general illumination of the town in honor of the day; and [illegible] brought word that the mob had intended to break the windows of every house in which this announcement was disobeyed. The police force and the few soldiers in town were barely sufficient to protect the royal residences against the threatened outrages, so that the adherents of the King, unable to stay the torrents, had no alternative but to nail up planks before their windows, and thus save as much glass as the time allowed. [illegible] the evening, [illegible] land Place, where the nobility [illegible] was heard the whole day [illegible] the delight of the street boys, who were not sparing of their [illegible] While we were at home preparing for the concert, the people were pouring in masses through the streets on the road to meet the Queen. She came through the city and [illegible] afterwards [illegible] the West-end was left in peace. In fact we found as we went to the concert room at half past seven, that the streets were much quieter than usual and quite free from obstructions. But in every direction people were busy preparing the illumination, so [illegible] to the order [illegible] the carriage [illegible]

By degrees the hall filled with people, and the concert began. The symphony, though already known by the band, had been carefully rehearsed [illegible] was splendidly played, and received even more applause than at the first performance.

During the [illegible] which followed I returned into the [illegible] room [illegible] my wife and to [illegible] her [illegible] I then [illegible] the room, and we took our places [illegible] begin the duet. Every one was [illegible] waiting for our first note, when suddenly a [illegible] uproar began in the street followed by a volley of [illegible] stones against the windows of the side [illegible] above were not [illegible] At the crash of the windows and chandeliers all the ladies sprang from their seats [illegible] an indescribable scene of confusion followed. The [illegible] was hastily lighted to prevent a second attack, and we [illegible] the soldiers on [illegible] the mob [illegible] the disorder [illegible] to more or our original state of quiet. [illegible] was a long time before the hall was restored [illegible] and became sufficiently [illegible] for us to [illegible] I was rather afraid [illegible] and [illegible] there might have [illegible] of my wife and [illegible] tered will [illegible] for her first [illegible] was given with all her [illegible] so that I [illegible] and [illegible] to devote all [illegible] the duet, which produced the usual effect, and was applauded at the close in an extraordinary manner. Alas! we little thought [illegible] the [illegible] would ever play the harp! As to the [illegible] of the programme, I was especially delighted with the success of the [illegible] I had already produced it at one of the Philharmonic Concerts, and was [illegible] to repeat it on this occasion; and as the performance was [illegible] in perfect, I know [illegible] could not fail of its effect. [illegible] the [illegible] were very well received. And thus the concert came happily to a close in spite of the [illegible] The promenade [illegible] the concert could not take place because of the damage to the side rooms, and so my concert had had [illegible] though the stones had destroyed some of the things on the buffet.

We were much relieved [illegible] were unable to go straight home to Portland Place [illegible] full of people; the coachman had to go by back streets and byways, and it was fully an hour before we reached home. We found the [illegible] illuminated [illegible] owing [illegible] and the [illegible] at the present [illegible] than the [illegible] up one windows [illegible] We were [illegible] the people were [illegible] in masses in the street. Music in Boston.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The Harvard Musical Association have increased the number of their concerts, for this their fourth season, to ten. This is justified, indeed demanded, by the growing interest in them on the part of a steadily increasing public, an interest which has become in the most of that audience something far deeper and more lasting than the curiosity or fashion of its outset: a real love of what is best and noblest in the great forms of instrumental music; such a love as would feel strangely bereft of a dear essential part of life without the regular return of these delightful and inspiring hours. The tone and character of the audience has become moulded, in [illegible] accordance with such music; never were more better listeners, never was [illegible] a more intensely sympathetic sphere. The audience itself is one considerable attraction of these concerts, as well as the [illegible] and the refinement of the programmes; there is no confusing sense of miscellaneousness to break the spell in either.

The Orchestra has been considerably enlarged and otherwise improved. It numbers, when the whole are present, sixty-four instruments: namely 12 first violins, 10 second violins, 5 violas, 5 violoncellos, 7 double-basses, the usual pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons; 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones and tympani;—whole number: 41 strings, 23 wind instruments, 15. The fine body of first violins is strengthened by the very valuable accession of Mr. LISTEMANN, a pupil of Joachim, and his brother; and by the return of Mr. WM. SCHULTZE to his old place at the head. Mr. EICHBERG also with the first violins, will hold the office of second or vice-Conductor, to be called upon in any emergency like the absence or illness of Mr. ZERRAHN. Such a case presents itself in the first concert (November 12). Mr. Zerrahn, by last news, adheres to his plan of sailing from Liverpool on the 2nd of the present month, which will bring him to Boston just in time to hear the concert, but not to conduct it. Mr. HAMANN returns to his old position of first horn; and a good new fagottist, Mr. RYCHER, supplements Mr. ELTZ. Besides valuable accessions in other departments. [illegible] more of [illegible] than they have known before, the best good feeling reigns in the orchestra, and all seem to come with a true interest to the work. The opportunities for rehearsal are too few; but good will, with three years of such good experience, will doubtless carry the thing through more triumphantly than ever.

The announcement of the Concerts (on our first page) has been eagerly met; indeed it has been eagerly anticipated by anxious inquirers at the Music Hall for many weeks past. The sale of season tickets will exceed that of any past year, and a full hall for each and every concert may be counted certain.

The programme of most of the ten concerts are essentially made up, though circumstances unforeseen may compel changes in some few particulars. We suppose our readers are eager to know about it as we make bold to divulge the programme as it now stands, in parts only outlined, in others open to reconsideration.

ORATORIO. The Handel and Haydn Society have resumed their weekly rehearsals, Mr. Lang, in the absence of Mr. Zerrahn, conducting as well as accompanying at the piano. The numbers never before appeared in such full numbers [illegible] the early rehearsals, and they take up the work in real earnest. The oratorios now in rehearsal, for public performance on the evenings of Saturday and Sunday after Thanksgiving, are Handel's Judas Maccabæus and Mendelssohn's Elijah. The Messiah of course will be sung at Christmas. There is some thought of giving later Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" and Mr. Paine's Mass, which surely is entitled to a hearing after the praise that it won in Berlin. But a far more really likely to be done, and what, if done [illegible] would be the great musical event of the year,—as German writers say an "epoch-making" [illegible] with us,—is the production of a whole or at least a great part of Sebastian Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew. The government of the Society are in deed in earnest about it, and have taken measures to procure the most approved edition of the orchestral and vocal parts, and to have the text done into English in as close and singable a manner as possible so that both may be published here, and the study of the work begin with energy in the hope of bringing it out in Passion Week. The singers may succeed [illegible] before the novel difficulties of the music; but the Handel and Haydn Society are not so easily discouraged as they used to be, and they will no doubt succeed in mastering the choruses. May the good genius only send us or raise up among us the solo singers able to cope with its wonderful recitatives and [illegible], and to enter into the spirit of them both with heart and voice! Even to have tried in earnest, and have failed in the solo part to the Society, they will have learned and grown much by it, musically and morally; and the [illegible] of first real effort will be the pledge of rare success in that and many other such things in future.

The new Choral Union, at South Boston, having made Mr. J. C. D. Parker their Conductor, are in a promising condition. Full of fresh young life, with fresh voices [illegible], and are now engaged in the study of the beautiful 95th Psalm of Mendelssohn: "Come let us sing."

CHAMBER CONCERTS, as yet, have made their beginning only in the modest [illegible] way of concerts arranged by the teachers of the New England Conservatory for their pupils, so that [illegible] may hear and become familiar with the best compositions of that kind. The teachers play, the pupils listen and then take part [illegible] going direction. Two of these, the first [illegible] of the season, and numbered 11 and 12 consecutively from the first, have taken place this month in Chickering Hall. In the first (Oct. [illegible]) the instrumental pieces were Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30) No. 3, for piano and violoncello; Beethoven's Sonata for piano in C, op. [illegible]; Trio in F, op. 80, for piano, violin and 'cello by Schumann. Mr. [illegible] and the brothers [illegible] were the interpreters. The vocal contributions were from an opposite school: Verdi and Donizetti.—Of the last concert (Oct. 19) Weber's Concertstück formed the principal feature, the rest consisting of a Violin Fantasia upon themes by Alard, and a vocal [illegible] and romanza, both by Verdi. These quite lift the "readings," as they may be called, of classical works in the Sonata form should be good stuff for and not to lower the taste of pupils. [illegible] we should think the Italian opera pieces had better be left out as an incongruous element, or be put in its place somewhere else.

The more important series of Chamber Concerts have hardly dropped [illegible]. We trust there is much in the [illegible] and that there will be no failure of the Sextetts, of Concerts to be given at Chickering [illegible] Messrs. Kreissmann and [illegible]—and we think we have heard Mr. Kreissmann [illegible] in connection with the same connection. We all know what vocal concerts these would be, and every one would love would [illegible] to know the [illegible] in time that he may reserve an evening for them. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club will bring a a bring out of their treasures new and old soon after New Year. Their forces are more few and far between than formerly—four chamber concerts where we used to have eight or ten. They travel a great deal, they have become missionaries and [illegible] good work through the country.—Why shall we not also have a Quartette Club, so that the purest kind of instrumental music may [illegible] within our hearing? With such skilful men as the brothers Listemann, who have come to live among us, and a better chance than formerly of finding a good 'Cello [illegible]. Yes, it would seem no impracticable thing to make up really a good Quartet, and should there spring up a little rivalry between the Quintette and the Quartette, so much the better. It shows both; there would be mutual quickening; the old would gain new life, and the new would have a higher mark for competition; the listeners would be gainers in both cases, and so [illegible] Boston would have a most important element [illegible] empty category filled.

—But we have one chamber concert, which properly comes under the head of chamber music, right before us. The talented Mrs. FLORA E. CARY, the contralto singer, have arranged a Benefit for her, on next Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall. Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, Mr. LISTEMANN and Mr. LISTEMANN [illegible] assist. The two pianists will open the concert with Schumann's Variations in B flat for two pianos, and close with the "Hommage à Händel" by Moscheles. Mr. Listemann will play as violin solos the Ballade et Polonaise by Vieuxtemps and Hungarian Airs by Ernst, and the Andante and Variations from Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata with Mr. Parker. Mrs. Cary's own selections are, as usual, very choice: "Fac ut portem" from Rossini's Stabat; "Erlkönig," by Schubert, and "Wie's so ganz still" by Franz; "The Angels Call" by Parker, and "Auf dem Meer" by Franz, and Mendelssohn's [illegible], "Through the [illegible]" and "Neue Liebe." The price of admission is high, but so is the excellence which prompts the occasion.

PHILADELPHIA. The Quaker City seems to be in labor with a musical "revival," to judge from the classical programmes we have received. The Bulletin, before announcing them, says: "None of the best music [illegible] and correct the respectable societies, but much Offenbach's Belle Hélène compositions." That surely is the conclusion to be hoped.

Carl Sentz, with orchestra, has long formed a series, with Hassler's orchestra, of [illegible] of thirty concerts with programmes including the best of our Orchestral Union party classical and party light, among other things the Reformation Symphony, "Schubert's Unfinished Symphony," Beethoven's 1st and 8th and "Battle of Vittoria" Symphony (some selection also too), Wagner's "Fly[ing] Dutchman" overture and various Symphonies by Haydn and Mozart. The Germania Orchestra, having appointed Mr. W. G. Dietrich Director, in place of Mr. Schmitz who has [illegible] has changed the hour of its public afternoon Rehearsals to Wednesday. The Germania still adheres to their old plan of giving single movements of Symphonies in the middle of very miscellaneous programmes.

Mr. CARL WOLFSOHN's programme of his Matinées is before us. He begins confining himself to Beethoven's Sonatas, he has engaged Mons. Edward Colonne, first violin of [illegible] one of the finest violinists in America [illegible], and Mr. Rudolph Hennig, a leading violoncellist of New York, and offers a great variety of trios and other classic and modern music: Trios by Beethoven, Hummel, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, and Raff; Sonatas for [illegible] by Rubinstein, Beethoven, Raff, Schumann, Schubert; Piano works by Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, &c.; Violin solos by Bach, Vieuxtemps, [illegible]; Violoncello solos, &c. We wish we had room for the whole prospectus.——The [illegible] of Mr. Jarvis, also, a [illegible] (with Mr. Gärtner, violinist, and Henning, 'cello), offer six programmes very similar and in some respects identical with Mr. Wolfsohn's.

NEW YORK. The Sun reports thus independently and spicily of Miss Kellogg's first concert.

A large audience had gathered on this occasion; we have rarely seen a worse concert than was given us, have rarely heard. It was so bad that it is easier, so to point out what was good in it than what was bad. Miss Kellogg was good enough; she was poor and unworthy of herself and her and more.

In the first place, the programme was miserably made up. The orchestra played two overtures, Messrs. Lotti, Bosisi, and Ferranti sang, and a Mr. Alard played the violoncello. Now the orchestra was a poor [illegible] ill picked [illegible] played detestably. Its accompaniments were as bad as its overtures, which is saying a great deal. Mr. Toggi? the pianist of the concert played well — he is an artist, and always does what the Academy of Music is no place for a piano; it is too large, the resonance of the instrument is lost and [illegible], and the tone destroyed in the immense space to be filled. The piano is a parlor instrument, at most an instrument for a concert hall, and an instrument eminently fit for an opera house, and it is no wonder that the audience yawned through the long pieces by Liszt, and were decidedly bored, and glad when it was over. Mr. Bosisi [illegible] to have spared his men the trouble of rushing forward [after the instrument to get off the place for the [illegible] and the instrument was cleared away well. Ferranti spent [illegible] in being cut for the benefit of the audience and his own glorification. He is an instrument so many ways short when heard in his home. The piano however has given us but a solo on the violoncello. This is quite as foolish an idea as the piano solo, and passed even more trying to the patience of the audience. Who wants a [illegible] pieces on a violoncello in the Academy of Music? No one does, yet once when the violoncello was the head of a solo, much less when it is a thing of [illegible] commonplace and [illegible]. The piece fell flat, and [illegible] the audience had hardly a hand [illegible] raised in applause. Mr. Lotti then sang a solo. His voice is always sweet and pleasant in quality—a feeble insufficient voice [illegible] and we are apt to give one suddenly in such passages where you expect it to be strong, precisely singing in the high tones with vigor when you expect it to be weakly. In fact, Lotti spends as much vigor on a moderately [illegible] by cutting out many are the top notes. It's an old trick, and has been played by many singers, and such very tempered things are so [illegible] that it seldom [illegible] succeed. It is so a [illegible] Ferranti is that Lotti fortunately mighty [illegible] sole value. He is sure now to be "supporting Ilma," at a help as he prime Donna, so raises the tenor [illegible] quarter, or even the [illegible] but as for a [illegible] And now we come to the worst of all—Signor Bosisi. He [illegible] very tremulous to spoil the evening. He had a cold so bad that he could hardly move on and sang not a [illegible] in tune from the beginning to the end. Such voices as he made we never in a long experience of public opera remember to have heard. There [illegible] temperance that would [illegible] the hoarse [illegible] of a sickly [illegible] have been melody compared to it. We cannot imagine what induced Mr. Harris, so usual [illegible] and a man of sense, to come on the stage in such voice. It may have been the good nature and a desire not to disappoint, but it seemed to us without reason, and we are sure he had nose for a loss Mr. Strakosch should be held answerable.

In fact [illegible] concert was Mr. Strakosch's doing—what a concert should be [illegible] that he found out [illegible] at [illegible]. Let him consult some person who knows what he put [illegible]. Mr. Thomas or any competent musician could tell him better what to do. Miss Kellogg [illegible] who she could, redeem the evening, but not [illegible] was not sufficient in every [illegible] of her own. She tried to realize the final scene of Faust, which was given to close the concert, but found spirit of her of Faust correct with product [illegible] and produced a laugh from the audience. [illegible] sounds at that very effective. The only really charming things of the evening were Miss Kellogg's impassioned rendering of "Home, Sweet Home," and of the good old romance [illegible] "Kate of [illegible]" from "Faust." She was overwhelmed with flowers, of course. A white dove also fluttered among the bouquets. [illegible] she received and as she sang [illegible] welcomes, though we wish she could have appeared under better management. It better [illegible] than [illegible] round [illegible]. The concerts are to be continued. Whether for the sake of Miss Kellogg the public will stand the cost of the entertainment is very questionable.

Lauriger Horatius.

[The New York Evening Post of Oct. 8, has the following answer to the letter which we copied from it in our last. Many of our readers, Harvard [illegible] especial[illegible] will recognize [illegible] [illegible] associate [illegible] appended to it.]

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

In your issue of 18th of September last you give an extract of [illegible] J. M. [illegible] Morgan of New York, to the College Courant of Yale, in which he asks:

"Can any of your correspondents tell me who was the author of that most widely known and admired of our college songs, 'Lauriger Horatius?' Also, of the origin of the tune which [illegible] southern [illegible] appropriated during the war to their 'My Maryland'?"

In answer to this inquiry I beg to submit the following:

The song "Lauriger Horatius" is found in the [illegible] song-books of German students (called by them "Commers" books) without giving the name of the author; but is generally found by the side of the other old "Gaudeamus igitur."

Mihi est propositum,
In Taberna mori
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

which latter song is ascribed to "Walter Mapes," who also wrote "Confessio de Magolia," of the twelfth century.

Both songs may probably be found in a book published by E. du Méril, "Poésies populaires Latines antérieures au douzième siècle." Paris 1843.

Both songs are sung in Germany to the same melody, which is the same current here. This is an old German nursery melody known to all German children, particularly to those of North and Middle Germany to the words

"O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum!
Wie grün sind deine Blätter!
[illegible]
Nein, [illegible] Winter [illegible]."

The same melody is adopted to several other familiar German [illegible] songs sung by the students. It is a melody which, being without any [illegible] [illegible] character, may be sung to any [illegible] [illegible] corresponding to the rhythm of the [illegible], which, being so [illegible], [illegible] [illegible].

A North German gentleman of musical attainments, who resided in the South in Baltimore, and is now living here in New York, adapted the German nursery melody of the [illegible] "O Tannenbaum" to the southern [illegible] song "My Maryland."

The melody is certainly anything but inspiriting, and is more adapted to words of a [illegible] character, or to such simple songs for children as that "O Tannenbaum."

The [illegible] of the tune being simple, and the melody ranging within the compass of [illegible], it recommends itself [illegible] to everyone; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for [illegible], and is therefore well adapted to [illegible] [illegible] by these easy [illegible] [illegible].

It is well known that a melody very [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] character. Even "Yankee Doodle" has been adapted as a choral [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] slowly can be hardly recognized. The melodies of many of the college songs and [illegible] [illegible] "Captain Cuddleston [illegible] gone to Sea," or "Three Blind Mice," or "A Pie sat on a Pear Tree," [illegible] are excellent in their way and [illegible] [illegible] when all the boys are [illegible]. But I believe [illegible] [illegible] will [illegible] [illegible] as to their [illegible] musical merit. The same may in [illegible] [illegible] be said of the melody to "O Tannenbaum" [illegible] adopted to "Lauriger Horatius," "Mihi est Propositum," and "My Maryland."

Allow me to call attention to two mistakes in the lines as you [illegible] [illegible]. In the second verse [illegible] "[illegible]" instead of "[illegible]," and in the [illegible] of the third verse read "[illegible]" instead of "[illegible]."

Allow me [illegible] a few words to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Dulce Domum," [illegible] of your correspondents furnished to the Evening Post of 1st October. This song may be found in "Bowring's Popular [illegible] [illegible]" [illegible] page [illegible] where it is preceded by the following [illegible]:

"At St. Mary's College, Winton, the Dulce Domum is sung [illegible] the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays. The masters, scholars and choristers, [illegible] [illegible] by a band of music, walk in procession round the courts of the college singing it. Tradition [illegible] very remote antiquity, and its origin must be traced not to any ridiculous tradition, but to [illegible] feelings of human nature.

"A spirited translation of this song occurs in the Gentleman's Magazine for March 1796, p. 209. See the Gentleman's Magazine for December 1811, p. [illegible]."

I have not seen the music of this song, but I found that such and similar songs are general [illegible] with a certain mock solemnness and [illegible] [illegible] old Latin church-hymns of the middle ages, like "Veni Creator Spiritus," "Omni die dic Mariae."

[illegible]

An [illegible] DOCUMENT.—The Paris opera was once [illegible] by the following [illegible]—remarkable for its ingenuous and patriotic tone—which was issued by Charles IX. in 1570:—"We, Charles, by the grace of God King of France, send greeting to all men now living and to come. As we have very much at our care, after the example of King Francis, of [illegible] memory, [illegible] of good and praiseworthy memory, [illegible] [illegible] may God forgive us [illegible] [illegible] and science should flourish in our Kingdom of France and also in our town of Paris where there are great numbers of persons who devote their daily labor and study thereto; and as it is highly important [illegible] the [illegible] of a town that the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] cultivated [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] justed to certain laws and [illegible] [illegible] because that the minds of most men are formed and [illegible] by it, in such wise that where music is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] is properly regulated, [illegible] are of good morals. For these reasons, and after having seen the petition addressed to our privy council and sent [illegible] our beloved and [illegible] J. A. de Baïf and J. Thibault de Courville, [illegible] [illegible] for the last three years with great industry and perseverance, they have worked together for the improvement of the French language which may be applied both to the construction of poetry and to the nature and regulation of music, as those were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Greeks and Romans. Well [illegible] that I may [illegible] [illegible] for these [illegible] [illegible] which God has [illegible] [illegible] I hereby [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] on the model of the Ancients, an Academie ou Societé [illegible] [illegible] as well of composers, singers and performers upon musical instruments as of worthy auditors, which Academy shall not only [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] we shall [illegible] day obtain [illegible] [illegible] musicians, [illegible] which shall also profit the public.

[illegible]

DRESDEN.—A new cantata, Gudrun, has just been [illegible] by Herr L. Meinardus, who intends to produce it here shortly.—On the 20th September a performance of Weber's "Jubel Overture" was given [illegible] to celebrate the [illegible] anniversary of its performance at the Royal Opera House. It was composed in honor of the fiftieth anniversary, 20th September, 1818, of the accession of Frederick Augustus to the throne of Saxony. This [illegible] was written by Weber [illegible] in very bad health, between the 2d and 11th September 1818 at [illegible], on his return from Hosterwitz, where he had been staying for some time. The entire Jubel Cantata was, by [illegible] [illegible] of the opposition of German music, prevented from being included in the programme of the Gala Concert in the Royal Opera House; though Weber had written it expressly for the occasion. The overture alone was performed, and we still [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the brilliant and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] been ever since. [illegible] it [illegible] to believe [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] now [illegible] the [illegible] of the Italians, who then formed the "[illegible]" of the [illegible] of Der Freischütz! Besides the "Jubel Overture" the programme of the grand concert on the 20th September, 1818, contained: airs from Rossini, Morlacchi, Violin Concerto, Polledro, Duet, Nicolini, &c.—all [illegible] that have grown pale before Weber's fame.

[illegible]

NOT A [illegible].—The celebrated composer Jommelli was proposed by his friends to Cardinal Alessandro Albani as chapelmaster of St. Peter's. As, however, he had devoted but [illegible] [illegible] to the Palestrina style, as it [illegible] be decided that [illegible] [illegible] examination he should have to undergo in it, and betook [illegible] to the famous Father Martini at Bologna, under whom, by great industry and application, he soon [illegible] [illegible] the knowledge he wanted. He soon returned to Rome, and signified [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the examination; but no one [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. After [illegible] his two examinations he would be [illegible] to examine [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible], [illegible] does not appear so very [illegible], [illegible] such [illegible] effect [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that, the next day, they forwarded him his appointment without a word about any examination [illegible].

The Voice, the Ear and Music.*

[We propose to make lost for our readers some considerable portions of the very clear and popular exposition of the discoveries of the acoustic researches of [illegible] book * [illegible] by Auguste Laugel.† These discoveries are the basis of much that has been found new and bound [illegible] in Tyndall's "Lectures on Sound," and we are at [illegible] of [illegible] just now in the practical application of them in the volume of "The Voice in Singing" brought out by Mme. Emma Seiler.—Ed.]

I.

ANALYSIS OF SOUND.

The pleasures of science are austere; but they have something perfect, durable, achieved which every other pleasure wants. We must surely pity those who are incapable of experiencing the delight of seeing [illegible] unrolled before their eyes, in some truth, a law of universal nature, or in observing how by ingenious and continual metamorphoses, one and the same principle engenders a well-ordered series of unexpected consequences. Never for my part have I better felt these keen and subtle emotions of the mind than in studying the recent discoveries of Helmholtz in Acoustics. After so many labors, researches and discoveries on the nervous system, on physiological Optics, on the great question of the transformation of forces, the indefatigable Heidelberg professor has attacked Acoustics, and, one may say, has made a new science of it. Newton, Euler, Laplace, Poisson had laid the foundations of the theory of sonorous vibrations; but their high analysis had never stooped to the concrete world of [illegible]. By the aid of their superb formulas, Acoustics registered experiences more or less [illegible]; after the great theorists it had its humble workers, but it [illegible]. In all these efforts, Cagniard de la Tour, Savart, himself, were hardly more than clever mechanicians.

The strangest thing about it is, that no strong bridge had ever been thrown across between Acoustics and Music; the [illegible] remained sterile, the art stayed merely the [illegible] of [illegible] instinct. Some great minds, Pythagoras, Kepler, Rameau, d'Alembert had no doubt divined a secret family relationship between these things; but these vague [illegible] had never come out upon facts. The most learned treatises on Harmony are a mere collection of empirical rules sanctioned by the experience of ages.

But now all these detached phenomena assume their place in an admirable synthesis. The physical philosopher of Heidelberg is not one of those experimenters who, groping in the domain of facts, stumble accidentally upon unknown truth. Armed with the torch of high mathematical analysis, he marches with an assured step; he does not [illegible] the cracked phenomena. On the other hand penetrated with the fruitful principles of modern dynamics, he sees in the world only force and movement; and the laws of rational mechanics guide him in the study of all the manifestations of matter.

Considering sound as one particular mode of molecular movements, he has known how to draw from the study of these movements all the consequences which the mathematics had, so to say, left there in the embryonic state, and he has [illegible] instruments, apparatus, by which these consequences, visible for the mind, become so for the senses. No more vague pretty [illegible], no more approximations, no more [illegible] reductions; all is held fast, all is enchained in the vast system, and we are led on from the most elementary phenomena of the vibrations of sonorous bodies to the last (but yesterday profoundly mysterious) of harmony and of the combinations of sounds. We discover the so recently impenetrable secret of the strange property, the timbre or quality of sounds, we comprehend whereby the most natural [illegible] different instruments. Rameau, who might be called the Malebranche of French music, had long ago divined that musical sounds are formed of several simple sounds, as light is composed of different rays; but Helmholtz has found the means of decomposing the most complex sound, and of thus discovering, even in the noisiest concert, the most [illegible] simple notes: a discovery so strange as it is fruitful, since in nature there are no simple notes, and all her sounds are [illegible] concerts, accords. In explaining the timbre Helmholtz has at the same time shown what distinguishes and characterizes the vowels; the physiologist, succeeding to the physicist, has explained how the human ear analyzes the sonorous perceptions, and in what way multiple impressions there determine the unity of sensation. To day the musician has brought out one by one from the very analysis of sounds the complex and hitherto wholly empirical laws of harmony.

Thus enlarged, Acoustics is no longer that dry and hackneyed science whose rudiments are still found set forth without art in all the treatises on Physics. It becomes a branch of universal Dynamics, and of Æsthetics at the same time. It is no longer a mere chapter of the history of bodies, it is a sort of musical grammar. Of course it is not offered to the common melodist, any more than an ordinary grammar furnishes a writer with ideas; but it teaches him how to write correctly in music, it gives laws, not genius, but style.

If there were need of proofs to show that matter is not continuous, but is composed of parts, it would suffice to cite the phenomena of sound. In a sonorous body whether solid, liquid or gaseous, all the molecules displace one another and enter into vibration. If these movements are confused, unequal in duration and intensity, we only hear a noise. If they are rhythmical and for some time like each other, we perceive a sound. The molecule, in executing its invisible dance, may have been drawn more or less away from its original place: hence a sound more or less loud. The amplitude of the movement regulates the intensity of the sound; the rapidity of periodic vibrations determines its pitch, its place upon the general scale. The grave notes result from a slow vibration, the acute ones from a more rapid, more precipitate movement. The molecule, free and complaisant, lends itself equally to degrees of quickness; but the human ear only perceives with ease and pleasure the vibrations confined within certain limits.* The ear can seize a sound which responds to 38,000 vibrations; but then the sensation becomes painful, and at these extreme rates of quickness the notes are no longer clearly distinguishable from one another.

The scale of vibrations of a piano-forte of seven octaves runs from 33 to 4,000, and the difference of these figures bears a close relation to the small elasticity of our auditory apparatus, and to the rule in number of consonances which exert so great effect in harmony.†

The study of the vibratory movements made by Galileo, Newton, Euler and Daniel Bernoulli, had long since furnished all the elements for the knowledge of sounds as regards intensity and tonality; but there is a second [illegible] quality, the timbre, which when [illegible] approached the examination of it, had defied all the efforts of the physicists. The timbre does not need to be defined; we all know how to distinguish a note of the piano from the same note played upon a violin. In the same way we recognize the a, the e, the [illegible] by the same singer and upon the same note; the vowels, so to speak, are only particular and changing timbres of the human voice. Yet what is this particular quality of sound which depends neither upon height nor upon intensity?

The physical geometers had no answer to this question. In the sonorous body they said, every molecule is in motion and describes an invisible orbit. The rapidity of the curve described determines the tonality; but the form itself of the curve cannot be without influence; behold the element which must determine the timbre.‡ Thus, we must confess, is one of those explanations which explain nothing, it gives only a deceptive satisfaction to the mind. We may admit in a vague way that the inflections more or less rapid, the [illegible] more or less acute, the curvatures more or less inflamed of the sonorous wave have an influence on the quality of the sound; but where is the direct relationship between the geo-

* The lowest note of an orchestra is the lower C of the double bass, which corresponds to 33 vibrations per second; the highest note is the upper [illegible] of the piccolo flute, which [illegible] 4,752 vibrations per second.

† In some organs [illegible] continuous pipes which have only 16 vibrations per second. [illegible] the notes, like the highest, produce very [illegible] effects upon the ear; they should be employed but rarely and as auxiliary of the higher octaves.

‡ We know that to represent the vibratory movements of the air we figure them by [illegible] curves like those formed in the surface of the water by successive waves. The height of the wave depicts the intensity of the sound; the length of the wave, of amplitude of vibration, and consequently its tonality. Finally, the form of the wave, infinitely variable, will represent the timbre.

country and the impressions which different [illegible] produce upon us? I want to know why the sight of the oboe differ from the tremors of the violin; the bursts of the trumpets, the gentle sounds of the horn, the nasal sweetness of the bassoon; I would fain comprehend in what the different stops of the organ differ; why its harmonies can [illegible] from roaring [illegible] to sounds as soft as seraphs' wings; why its breath [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] only offer [illegible] in which all forms of waves are figured. It does not miss the bond between such a cause and such effects.

The Musical Festival at Schwerin.

Mr. Chorley writes to his old paper, the London Athenæum, [Oct. 3] the following account of the late Festival in the capital of Mecklenburg.

Great of such a locality as Schwerin, and such glowing accounts [illegible] as we have been enjoying this year few circumstances [illegible] imagined more healthy, pleasant to a German [illegible] ill, if only an account of this rare or one [illegible] the local [illegible] with which its carried through. [illegible] could a [illegible] point of view to be able [illegible] to [illegible] one of those assemblages which have become celebrations of the kind, which exercise an important [illegible] in the progress of Art.

[illegible] I was in the year [illegible] German [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the palace [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of French [illegible] Chambord has been happily adopted [illegible] service [illegible] [illegible] important [illegible] [illegible]. No [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the place [illegible] Birmingham, Bradford and the [illegible] of Leicester. On the other hand [illegible] glories [illegible] [illegible] showers and hailing of their own, apart from their artistic value [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] School is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sufficiently handsome and comfortable [illegible] [illegible] arrangement [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of an organ in the orchestra [illegible] Handel [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of a European [illegible]. Herr Schmitt [illegible] son of Aloys Schmitt, of Frankfort, like his father obviously an excellent and able musician.

The orchestra [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] by the [illegible] of Messrs. Wiener [illegible] Neu-Strelitz [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] were wrought out in the true German fashion of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The solo singers were Mme. Harriers-Wippern (soprano) and Mme. Joachim (alto) [illegible] [illegible] Krause [illegible] (bass). Herr Joachim was the solo violinist. Concerning the merits of the two ladies, there is no need to write to London. Among the [illegible] Herr Krause [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] evident. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] English [illegible] [illegible].

The first day's performance was devoted to Handel's "Saul." It is no light praise to say, that the most difficult portions of the oratorio were the best; in particular, the execution of the chorus, "The people shall hear," deserved to be specified. In other of the numbers of this grand oratorio, a slight want of the solidity of tone (I know not better how to express it), which is essential to the right execution of Handel's music, might have been objected to by a hypercritical listener. The fact, easily ascribable to the composer's reception and direction of his own works in England, cannot be gainsaid, that the traditions of their execution are more firmly established [illegible] country than elsewhere. This was especially to be [illegible] to the solo portion of the oratorio, where not one of the [illegible] singers engaged (Herr Krause excepted) was [illegible].

The second day's concert had [illegible] but more interesting programme. The first act was made up of scenes from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in Aulis." After [illegible] according to German usage, Beethoven's Symphony, in A major, was most admirably given. Of his instrumental works [illegible] I have [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the German [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] an afternoon [illegible]. That again [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven's "Missa Solennis" [illegible] [illegible] the concert. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Kyrie" could not have been more [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of the "Sanctus" and "Benedictus," and of the "Gloria" was [illegible]. The [illegible] the two [illegible] numbers [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] the "Benedictus" could not have been more perfectly [illegible] than by Herr Joachim. What may be called the [illegible] of [illegible] the Roman Catholic rite were brought out with an effect of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But I [illegible] again an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to surrender myself to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of music which cannot be averted [illegible] [illegible] in this Mass [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Choral Symphony.

The same exception may be taken, in yet stronger degree, to many passages in the "Gloria," and the [illegible] of its final fugue. There the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] and sympathy [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Schwerin [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] large company of young German musicians have taken their departure as regards [illegible] and [illegible] effect.

In the last day's performance—a miscellaneous concert—the playing of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, by Herr Joachim, is superior to [illegible]. H. F. C.

II.

We come now to the period of the Restoration. Whether the exile of Charles II. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] foreign [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "four-and-twenty fiddlers" of whom John Banister was the leader, [illegible] [illegible] "Grande [illegible]" of Louis XIV. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Lully [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] England [illegible] the days of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Further, though some foreign musicians were attracted hither by the King's welcome, they made no stand against the brilliant constellation of native artists who still give lustre to the age in which their genius swayed the [illegible] of fashion. French biographers assert that Cambert came to London after his reverses at home, represented one of his operas, and died here; but no traces of his presence has been found in English annals. Unquestionably Grabut was in England, and composed the allegorical opera of "Albion and Albanius" to Dryden's verses. We also know that Draghi and [illegible] spent some years in England. But what of this knowledge? What of the certainty that a more French [illegible] [illegible] were among us, who failed to reach the heart of the people? [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Lawes, whose brother [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] fallen at the siege of Chester [illegible] Charles I. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Henry Lawes, [illegible] Compare them next with that of Matthew Locke who, though his music he lost which he composed for "Macbeth," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Psyche" [illegible] [illegible] Lully [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] works for the stage [illegible] [illegible] Chapel [illegible] [illegible] the Queen, [illegible] [illegible] and instrumental music for the [illegible] and [illegible] for the people. Compare these names with that of Pelham Humphreys, whom Pepys [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the "Tempest," and therein proved that the lyrical art of our stage [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Compare these names with that of Henry Purcell who was the greatest musician of his [illegible] Charles's foreign predilections upon the national lyrical music.

A brief allusion must suffice to the institution of public concerts, which were first given during this reign. Banister [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] paid for admission. These were held at a large room near the [illegible] the Temple, in Whitefriars, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the public, who paid at least [illegible] "Mitre Tavern," near the west front of the Cathedral and elsewhere. [illegible] Britton, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Charles's [illegible] to the public.

The musical faith of England—and I use the word "faith" in its deepest and fullest sense—which the zeal of the Protectorate could not crush, and the [illegible] of the Restoration could not dissipate, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Queen Anne's reign and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] good lady's [illegible] [illegible]. sence of a fine tenor voice, sang with good understanding a song, which received merited applause. Mr. F. S. Davenport followed with an organ solo, which was well performed, with the exception of a want of confidence in the arrangement of the stops; but as he is really a fine musician, we think it must have been owing to the impossibility of using the organ for practice during the week. Mrs. Harwood gave a selection well adapted to her voice and style, "The Lord's Own Day," by [illegible], and Mrs. H. M. Smith made her first appearance in the midst of great applause, singing Schubert's "Serenade [illegible]" with her usual delicacy and sweetness. In the evening the audience was a good one, but the rain deterred the attendance considerably. Those who braved the storm were well paid, for it proved one of the finest concerts ever given in this city. In point of chorus singing it surpassed any previous performance here, owing mainly to the fact that the chorus was formed of experienced, reliable singers, who with the rare aid of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club felt confident of success, and won it. Mr. Tuckerman opened the programme with Bach's Pastorale in F. [illegible], with noble success, bringing out the grand themes with remarkable clearness and strength. The second selection was the Adagio from Mendelssohn's 3d Sonata; [illegible]. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club were [illegible] welcomed, and played the overture to "La Fille du Régiment" and a arrangement for quintette of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony [illegible]. Miss Smith sang "[illegible]," [illegible] which admirably displayed her wonderful sacred [illegible] and sweetness of tone. The [illegible] was encored [illegible]. Miss Cary [illegible] "Ave Maria" [illegible] "Stabat Mater" [illegible]. Mr. Gilbert sang "[illegible]" [illegible] and Miss Hayes and Mr. Whitney sang [illegible]. Stabat Mater was produced [illegible] good effect. The chorus [illegible] the support of the Quintette Club [illegible] and the organ (Mr. F. [illegible]) [illegible] (Mr. Davenport) [illegible]. It was a [illegible] chorus that Worcester [illegible], and the performance was marked by [illegible] and promptness. The solo [illegible]. "Quis est homo," was deliciously sung by Mesdames Smith and Cary. Messrs. Whitney and Gi[illegible] were [illegible], the latter singing [illegible]. His Pro Peccatis [illegible]. The chorus "Quando Corpus" was extremely [illegible]. It was a [illegible] performance by a [illegible] singers. The concert closed with the [illegible] Inflammatus solo and chorus, which was grand in its effect. The concert was a perfect success and one long to be remembered.

Friday afternoon [illegible] Concert by the Orchestral Union at Boston [illegible] Music Hall [illegible]. The Symphony [illegible] Haydn's [illegible] in C, which charmed the great audience last Fast afternoon. [illegible]. Of course the whole programme was finely performed, [illegible]. Mrs. Smith, Miss Hayes and Mr. Whitney were the vocalists, Mr. [illegible] the pianist, Mr. B. F. [illegible] accompanist [illegible]. The concert closed with Haydn's Creation. The large chorus, the orchestra and the great organ, [illegible] made a grand finale to the musical week.—Palladium, Oct. 28.

A Word to Musical Novelists.

It is [illegible] to find that you have been complimented as author or composer on the strength of another man's work. "I mean you, Jones, it's the best thing you ever did!" "Yes" replies Jones, "but it isn't mine; that fellow Smith wrote it." Novelists and authors generally—but especially novelists—are fond of praising Weber for the melody known as "Weber's Last Thought," which, Weber being dead, does not, perhaps, matter very much as far as he, personally, is concerned. Nevertheless, "Weber's Last Thought" was not composed by Weber, but by his friend Reissiger. Weber liked the melody, and often asked Reissiger to play it to him; but that was all; and it was enough and more than enough for the speculative publisher by whom "Weber's Last Thought" was engraved and brought out. We are reminded of these facts, which ought to be better known, by a passage in Henry Mürger's posthumous novel, "Le Roman de Capucine," in which the heroine, after praising Verdi, and observing that one of his phrases "recalls the manner of Weber," adds that the latter's "Dernière Pensée" is "worth all the melodies of the Italian masters," &c. This is hard upon poor Verdi, who, inexorably inferior as he may be, would no doubt be, to Weber, at least ranks a little higher than Reissiger.

Alexander Dumas, who admits somewhere that he neither knows nor cares anything about music,—he says, indeed, that it is "the most disagreeable form of noise that he is acquainted with,"—does not, by the way, [illegible] and states their absurdities. [illegible]. Thus, in "Le Fils de [illegible]," [illegible] makes Hoffmann play the [illegible] known in France as "Le Désir" (Sehnsuchtswalzer) [illegible] Beethoven just as Mürger's attributes Reissiger's music to Weber. The truth about the [illegible] played by Alexandre Dumas's Hoffmann is [illegible]. The print [illegible] Schubert [illegible] "Sehnsuchtswalzer" [illegible] Alexandre Dumas [illegible] in England. It was given [illegible] Theodore Hook, who [illegible] Beethoven [illegible]. [illegible] Carpani [illegible] Berlioz's [illegible] "Beyle" is said [illegible].

To return to our subject: [illegible] of musical confusion [illegible] the "Adieu" [illegible] Schubert's [illegible]. Beethoven [illegible] making the young woman [illegible] Schubert's "A[illegible]," which is [illegible] Schubert's waltz, [illegible] "Sehnsuchtswalzer" [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] Weber's Last Thought," by [illegible] Schubert's name [illegible]. Beethoven's waltz [illegible]. The real composer of Schubert's Adieu was [illegible] the author of "[illegible]" [illegible] a German, a Weyrauch, [illegible] in the year 1830. The person to which he gave the melody was not called the "Adieu" [illegible] music publisher's [illegible] "Nach Osten." A Russian amateur singer introduced the air to the Musical Society of Paris, and being asked who wrote it, replied "Schubert," either because he knew no better (Signor Marie who sang the "Adieu" last [illegible] at a concert, Mr. Benedict accompanying him, still [illegible] it by Schubert) or, as the Gazzetta Letteraria suggests, "because he thought the Parisians would be much obliged to him for sparing them the difficulty of pronouncing one more German name."

If "books have their fates," it is at least not often the fate of a book to get ascribed, through the carelessness or stupidity of a publisher, to an author who would never have thought of claiming it. It is otherwise with musical compositions, and M. de Weyrauch's "Nach Osten" having been published, sold, and generally adopted as "Schubert's Adieu," will to all appearance, continue to be so known until it is forgotten altogether. The same sort of thing has often taken place with dramas, but then dramatists are often deliberately dishonest. Authors, as a rule, are honest. Composers are unfortunate.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, OCT. 28.—The Kellogg concerts three in number, and quite as successful [illegible] and [illegible] that Mr. Strakosch has [illegible] decided to give one Kellogg opera matinée. The performances are to take place at the Academy of Music this evening and on Wednesday evening. Miss Kellogg was assisted at each of her concerts by Signori Lotti, Petrelli, Susini, Mme. Abel (violin) and Mr. Tapp (pianist). The general impression seems [illegible] be [illegible] that she sings [illegible] well as she used, while a manner she has not improved. She seems to be more self-conscious [illegible] than of [illegible] to have lost that charming freshness and unassuming [illegible] which were once her attractive characteristics. All this [illegible] general impression, for the truth of which I am [illegible] able to vouch from personal knowledge.

Steinway Hall was opened to the public with a grand orchestral concert under the direction of Theo. Thomas, on Saturday evening. The hall during the summer recess has been remodelled and decorated in an elegant and tasteful style, the important task having been confided to the care of Mr. Henry Roth [illegible] European architect who was engaged expressly for the purpose.

"The old Orchestral platform has been converted into a large and [illegible] stage, enclosed on either side by elegant Proscenium boxes, from which [illegible] small balcony is supported by [illegible] [illegible] the 14th Street doors. The left of these boxes serves as [illegible] for the organ (necessarily placed in that corner of the hall) while that on the right is intended for ordinary occupation. The [illegible] of the proscenium is [illegible] by a large [illegible] which is [illegible] and [illegible] bust of Beethoven, the corresponding one on the opposite side being occupied by one of Mozart. [illegible] of the [illegible] larger than life size [illegible] being symbolical of Poetry—that on the left of Music. These [illegible] are imported from [illegible] and are remarkable for their graceful beauty of design and [illegible], and also from the fact that [illegible] other copy of these statues. There are many improvements in the interior construction of the hall in the shape of minor details tending to the comfort of the audience and the performers, among them are large additional and improved methods of ventilation.

All these improvements occupied many weeks of weary labor, and were made at an aggregate cost of $60,000. The Messrs. Steinway [illegible] for their [illegible] in the admiring appreciation of the public and the very evident fact that this is one of the most elegant Music Halls in this city, perhaps [illegible]. I certainly [illegible] anything which I have seen in Paris or London.

To return to Mr. Thomas's concert on Saturday evening. The attractions were an orchestra of 45, Mr. S. B. Mills, Mme. La Grange, Mr. F. Bergner and (last but not least) the new English dramatic reader, Mrs. Scott Siddons. The programme included the following old favorites:

5th Symphony, C minor .... Beethoven.
5th Concerto, E minor .... Chopin.
Mr. Mills.
Overture, "Melusina" .... Mendelssohn.

The orchestra, after a little weak in the last movement of the Symphony, played remarkably well. Mr. Mills was less excellent in the Concerto than might be wished, and his new composition (called for some mysterious reason "Fairy Fingers") is rather trash. Mme. La Grange sang an aria from Don Giovanni in a style which was so thoroughly good that would I am bound far better if she still possessed even a moment of her formerly magnificent voice. Mr. Bergner played a 'cello solo with his excellence. Mrs. Scott-Siddons, who is a grand-daughter of the famous Mrs. Siddons, read the first part of Tennyson's greatly over-rated "May Queen," and the sleep-walking scene from "Macbeth." Mrs. S. is a lady of a little more than medium height, with a positively beautiful face and a form of grace and elegance. Her reading is something wonderful and she needs only a deeper and richer voice to be superb. Her conception of the two selections so widely different in character, and something of positive genius and was entirely novel. Her reception was most warm and earnest and was a farewell augury of her professional success on this side of the Atlantic.

The Philharmonic Society will give its first concert on Saturday evening, November 28th. There will be six in the series (instead of three as heretofore) and they will occur in the months of November, January, February, March, April and May. One of the attractions offered is "Manfred" with Schumann's Overture and other music, the text being declaimed by Edwin Booth. Will give further particulars in my next letter.

I regret to say that, apparently, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society has come to grief, at least the concerts are "suspended" during the present season, on account of the lack of adequate pecuniary encouragement in the shape of subscriptions. One of the Brooklyn papers of a recent date has a long article upon the subject in which the writer deplores "the situation" and gives the Brooklynites a sound social castigation. I quote a paragraph:

"We are going to lose one of our best institutions (which has done no more good than half the churches in Brooklyn) merely perish because we will not pay ten dollars apiece to keep it up."

Rather more truth than poetry in this bit. B.

CINCINNATI, OCT. 27.—I enclose the programme of the first concert of the season given by the Cecilia Society last evening. It embraces several fine compositions rendered here for the first time, and it is due the Society to say that with regard to choice programmes they rank foremost in this city.

Chorus from the Oratorio, "St. Paul" .... Mendelssohn.
Aria for Soprano from the Christmas Oratorio .... Bach.
Miss Fanny Hadstock.
Nocturne for Piano, in ...., Opus 37 .... Chopin.
Miss Emily Werner.
"Oh, weep for those," from the Hebrew Songs of Lord Byron, for Chorus and Solo .... Hiller.
Chorus—Andante, Soprano Solo and Chorus, Chorus and Solo ... Mendelssohn.
"The Crusaders." A dramatical poem by Carl Anderson, for Chorus and Solo .... Gade.
Third Scene . . In the Desert."
Rinaldo—Baritone and Women.
Lady Armida—Soprano Solo.
Rinaldo—Tenor Solo and Chorus.—"Song of the Crusaders."
Peter Hermit—Bass Solo and Chorus—"Prayer."
"Theme Russe" for Piano .... L. de Meyer.
Miss Emily Werner.
Two Quartettes for Soprano, Alto, Tenor and Bass.
Mendelssohn.
a. Evening Song.
b. Scottish National Song.
Chorus from "Elijah" .... Mendelssohn.

The Chorus is not so large as might be desired for the sake of a more extensive cultivation of a high standard of Music; but the execution of the choral works is fine, prompt and expressive. The leader, Mr. Jos. Schneider, is an artist of fine taste. The Society recently issued a circular, stating that they will give five concerts this winter. Among the list of new compositions announced I notice several works which probably have never been performed in this country, viz.: "The Crusaders" by Gade, "Oh weep for them," from the Hebrew Songs of Lord Byron, by Ferd. Hiller, very effectively performed at this concert; "Hero and Leander" by Vierling and the latest sensation in Germany, "A German Requiem" by Brahms, which by reliable critics is pronounced to be a highly important composition.

The Harmonic Choir Society with Mr. Andres as leader gave a fine concert some weeks ago. The Mendelssohn Society has not been heard from yet this season. Z.

NEW ORLEANS.—Having been for years a constant reader of your Journal it has been a source of pure enjoyment to witness your settled policy of counteracting the mania of clearly trash, and a rigid thorough disapprobation of "clap-trap" and the musical humbugs of these "latter days." Hence it occurred to me that some account of the Musical Fest all conducted by the C. F. Mansfield, which was held on the 11th, 12 and 13th of October might interest you and your readers.

The Festival was ushered in by the rendering of the 42nd Psalm (Mendelssohn) with a carefully trained chorus of say 150 voices, the Recitatives and Arias being rendered by professional talent from Boston. Afterwards the beautiful Choral, "Sleepers, Wake!" was most effectively given, and also "Inflammatus, from "Stabat Mater."

On Thursday evening were presented selections from "Elijah," also Chorus "How lovely are the messengers" (St. Paul), and Chorus "The Glory of the Lord," from the "Messiah."

Friday morning the Mendelssohn Quintette Club gave another concert of a purely classical character. The programme included Quintet in C minor (Mozart) Scherzo from the "Reformation Symphony," Andante and Scherzo from Quartet in E, op. 44, (Mendelssohn) and Sinfonia, Duet and Chorus from Romeo and Juliet (Gounod). A large and intelligent audience greeted these gems of Chamber music with appreciative demonstration.

On Friday evening Mr. Mansfield presented the Creation, assisted with the same chorus as above and a chorus of 150 voices. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Julia L. Houston, Mme. Adèle Hess, Mr. Wm. Wright, Mr. H. C. Barnabee, Mr. John F. Winch, and Mr. Howard M. Dow at the Grand Piano. On the evening of the Creation the Orchestra consisted of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, assisted by August Hamann (Contra Bass).

The several programmes were interspersed with lighter music without pandering to a vitiated taste.

The festival passed off pleasantly and was well attended.

It may not be improper to express my high appreciation of Mr. Mansfield's irreproachable and thorough character as a hard student of the old masters, a superior organist to these, one who is earnest to a high degree that "music first" is necessary to "emulate" will succeed. Lovers of pure music cannot withhold the meed required to be certainly deserved.

Music at Home

The fortnight past, like those before it, offers little matter for our Concert record,—some good things to be sure, but scattering and mere lunches. But now at length one of the all-absorbing crises of the national life is past: the great election is decided: we breathe freely again: we shall have peace. Thank God! the brutal element is not to have the upper hand in shaping the destinies of this great nation; the temples of Art are not to be overthrown, new temples will be built, the worship in them become more sincere and pure. Now we have hopes for Music; the musical "season" will begin.—The musical occasions claiming mention since our last report are soon disposed of.

SIGNORITA FILOMENO'S "Grand Sacred Concert," at the Music Hall, on Sunday evening, Oct. 25, was well attended. The programme contained good things, besides others that were trite and in no sense "sacred;" but the pieces were too long, too many and too miscellaneous, while the audience was too much of that so common, excessive kind which, thinking more of the person than of the music, more of the moment's pleasure in a single piece (or single phrase or note sometimes) than of the concert as a whole, goes on recklessly lengthening out what was already too long and pulling it all out of symmetry, —gorging itself with sweetmeats at the very beginning of a long bill of fare.—These remarks do not apply to that particular concert alone, but more or less to all miscellaneous concerts purposely addressed to a miscellaneous audience. And so far the uniform experience of musical culture, that the more deeply and truly musical any one becomes, the more one will recoil at the very thought of a miscellaneous concert, in any concert where the programme is not determined by purely artistic instead of personal motives of display or business. And none the less because there may be good things in the programme: the good things never sound quite right brought into such false relations. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, for example, in a great medley so-called "popular" Concert though played by Camilla Urso herself, as we have sometimes heard it, sounds no longer like itself, but takes a certain character of unreality from the heterogeneous companionship and seems strangely thrown out and disappointing. A musical masterwork must be heard among master works, at least amid congenial surroundings.—We make no apology for this digression (as it may seem it were) upon the much neglected art of programme making.

That Mendelssohn Concerto was the principal piece chosen by the young Chilian maiden for the exhibition of her virtuosity as a violinist. No one could but feel a wonder at the correct, even, almost easy manner in which she went through the whole three difficult long movements, without mistake or faltering, always in good time, and entirely from memory. This was a rare achievement, and as such had to be admired. But admiration of the achievement did not necessarily carry with it the musical enjoyment proper to that noble composition. A child's interpretation of a work of which a mature artist never feels that he has quite brought out all its meaning, cannot well satisfy the musical desire in such; nor can it be the child's own interpretation, at most in a great measure have been learned mechanically from others. You are not brought into live contact with the music after all: you do not realize it, you perceive an adroit manufacture only and curiously wonder at the imitation. Indeed it was not the right task for a child: nor could any more greater source of unconsciousness make it so. One great drawback was the want of power: the tone was often feeble, so that the ear had to take on credit from the eyes many a rapid phrase or passage which it could not half hear; parts of the picture though I was doubtless all there were most faintly pencilled. But this, we are convinced, was much the fault of a poor instrument, such a talent certainly deserved a good one. In the second part the young lady played Variations by Alard, her French teacher, on Anna Bolena themes. For a Piano solo she played again the first movement of Chopin's E-minor Concerto, and played it, we thought, better than we have heard her do before.

Next in interest,—chief no doubt with many—was the first public appearance since her return from studies with the great French tenor Duprez of Miss ANNA GRANGER, one of our Boston sopranos, who sang a French version of the well-known Scena and Prayer from Der Freyschütz, a Scene Herse (rather commonplace) by Faure—the French baritone, we suppose, whom we remember as the best Don Giovanni that we ever heard,—and in the Quando corpus Quartet by Rossini. Her voice, like her face and whole appearance, is bright and pensoned, clear and brilliant rather than particularly sympathetic, though pleasing and of good volume, evenly developed through a large compass, finely delivered and gracefully managed. The singing has been characterized rightly no doubt as of the French school, which has its merits, chiefly those of sharp outline and a certain self-keeping and abandon and freedom. It brings out the voice effectively but is apt to treat the music rather wrongly; thus, what sense or reason was there in dragging and displaying with such force and cadences, backward and appassionata, out of keeping with the style of Weber, a melody so peculiarly his own, so perfect as itself? The latter part was brilliantly executed; and the other pieces, gave more mighty showed the singer to good advantage. Miss Granger must take high rank among our sopranos.

Other vocal pieces in this concert were "Fac ut portem" from Rossini's Stabat Mater, sung with the same contralto and pure style and feeling of Mrs. CARY; the tenor solo "If with all your hearts," from Elijah delicately rendered by Mr. WHITNEY; Handel's "Why do the nations rage" by Mr. RUDOLPHSEN; and "Quando corpus" by the four. The great Organ opened each part, played by Mr. THAYER.

A novelty in this concert was the appearance of an Orchestra, of some 30 musicians, all said to be of Boston, yet whose faces on that stage we had not seen before. They were under the direction of Mr. D. C. HALL, well known as the leader of one of our best bands. It was rather a green orchestra, to be sure, and yet did not get along so badly; we have heard worse performances from bands more experienced and having reputation. The not very "sacred" overture to "The Poet and Peasant" by Suppé and the accompaniments to the Mendelssohn Concerto were played at least in tune and in good time; and one of their number, Mr. O. A. WHITTEMORE, showed himself a supreme solo player on the clarinet. But what makes that first appearance noteworthy is the proof it furnishes that there are music are enough in Boston outside of those who hitherto have done all the orchestral work and (what is better still) outside of all "Protective Unions," pledged to mutual tyranny of rules regarding prices, &c. to make up another orchestra small indeed but with all the usual departments represented. Here then we see at least the possibility of two orchestras, as well as the means of supplementing the great orchestra. For so the quiet little beginning of a new movement we may read the presage of something good in due time, if it be wisely directed and conducted not in the spirit of opposition, but simply in the spirit of freedom and improvement.

MISS TERESA E. CARY. The Benefit in Chickering's arranged for the estimable lady and true artist by her friends took place on Tuesday evening, Oct. 27. The audience was of the best and numerous, though it did not entirely fill the hall. The selections, as we have shown before, were choice, and so were the performers. The concert was opened and closed by pieces for two piano played, with rare artistic union and aplomb, by Messrs. [illegible] LEONHARD and J. C. D. PARKER, namely Schumann's lovely Theme and Variations in B flat and the Hommage Händel by Moscheles, which is always interesting, Moscheles in some parts, in others just as unlike as possible, with quite striking melody.

The Violin-playing of Mr. EICHBERG was admirable in all the points of execution and full of fire and feeling. He works an every artistic line figurative passage with sure ambition and Bravourism the outline is never blurred or distorted, the light and shade finely graduated, the tone pure and true and musical, though of a thinner quality than we should have expected from a pupil of Joachim. The tout and the playing make an impression of refinement, genuine and from within, assuring you that the still fire of a true enthusiasm burns there. We have rarely heard the Andante and Variations of the "Kreutzer" Sonata, all his played with Mr. Parker so satisfactorily rendered. We should think Mr. Eichberg would lead a Quartet well. His solo pieces, the Ballade et Polonaise by Vieuxtemps and Hungarian airs by Ernst, were more wonderful in the performance than interesting in themselves,—particularly the latter, which was full of extravagance and not to keeping with its quiet and sincere programme.

The singing was all by Mrs. CARY herself, and that was all the listeners desired. She never was in better voice, and seemed heartily and happily into the spirit of the gems of song which she had chosen. Chief of these was Mozart's "Dal cend" from Figaro, with its ardentony Recitative,—a piece which always calls her at so nobly. The two songs by Franz, so opposite in character "E mir schwimmt" and "Auf dem Meer"; the two by Mendelssohn "Though far away" and "Neue Liebe" the romantic little Weser spring song of Hermann called "Kaltenwind" (Zuckung), well as well remained, accompaniment and Mr. Parker's Angel's Call—all awakened a desire to hear them over again.

The two Conservatories have each given a Chamber Concert during the past week to their pupils and friends, at Chickering Hall. That of Mr. Eichberg's Boston Conservatory had for programme: Sonata in F, for Violin and Piano, Beethoven. Song from Handel's "Jephtha." Andante from Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, arranged for violin, piano and cabinet organ. Largo, from a Sonata by Bach for Violin with Organ. Song. March from Athalie, Mendelssohn.

The programme for the "New England" Conservatory (Mr. TOURJÉE's) last Tuesday consisted, Fantasie by M. [illegible] Chopin; Song by Franz; Ballade et Polonaise, for Violin, Vieuxtemps; Elsa's Dream (Lohengrin), for Thalberg; Rondo from Sonnambula; Ave Maria, violin, Ernst. The violinist was Herr Listemann.

NEXT IN ORDER, we note, first the two concerts of Miss LOUISA KELLOGG in the Music Hall on Friday and Saturday evenings of this week,—one of them past ere this appears. Of course the same have all been taken by crowds eager to hear and see the American prima donna fresh from her London triumphs. Miss CARY, the pianist, adds a great attraction; and also there are Sig. LOTTI, the tenor, and PETRILLI, baritone, who as well as Herr WERNER HOFFA, the violinist, make their first appearance here.

The first SYMPHONY CONCERT of the Harvard Musical Association comes on Thursday next, and it is said the Music Hall will undoubtedly be filled—although it is very far from true, as has been so currently and positively reported, that all the seats are taken for the season. The Hall has 2 ticket sellers [illegible], a good third part of which are open still to purchasers. Mr. ZERRAHN, who should reach home to-day or to-morrow, having been away during the rehearsals, the first programme has been studied under Mr. EICHBERG, who will accordingly conduct the concert and who holds the place of Vice-Conductor. Three or four of the promised musicians having disappointed us at the last moment, the number of the Orchestra may be more safely reckoned at fifty instead of sixty as stated in our last. The programme is a stately opening, as becomes the beginning of such a series of concerts; the first part consisting of two grand works of Beethoven: the Dedication Overture op. 124, in C, and the "Eroica" Symphony. In the second part Miss ALIDE TOPP will play Chopin's first Concerto, in E minor; and the Overture to Oberon with its magic fire bow brings all to end of the whole.

PHILADELPHIA. We have already alluded to the feasts of chamber music announced by Mr. Carl Wolfsohn and by Mr. Charles H. Jarvis. Here are the programmes in full. Mr. Wolfsohn, assisted by Mons. Celeste, violinist, and Mr. Rudolph Hennig, violoncellist, spreads out one tempting bills of fare, as follows:

1. Matinee, Dec. 20.

NEW YORK. The Weekly Review makes favorable report of the first concert of the Liederkranz.

The programme was very fine, deserving more [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] from the music and [illegible] to the society, and [illegible] we will not omit to mention the orchestra composed of [illegible]. Considering the fact they had [illegible] than the performance of [illegible] of Beethoven [illegible] highly creditable to [illegible] of the society, Mr. A. Paur. The next performance, including Schumann's cantata "Page and King's Daughter," were also [illegible] though the [illegible] that offered [illegible] orchestral difficulties as well as [illegible] of conception and style. The "Page and King's Daughter" [illegible] of Schumann's [illegible] of the master [illegible] was by no means a happy one. The impression produced by the work [illegible] whole unfavorable, but the [illegible] fact that the orchestral accompaniment was applauded by some for the pieces. To [illegible] such [illegible] laid down in these few pieces by [illegible] the [illegible] coloring is [illegible]. The soloists, the [illegible] Mrs. Zimmermann, Miss [illegible], Miss [illegible] and Messrs. Lord, [illegible] and Wernal [illegible] [illegible] their [illegible] appearance before a New York audience. He is one of the [illegible] from Germany and [illegible] [illegible]. In fact he already [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible]. He has a [illegible] of solid [illegible] which he uses with art and [illegible]. His [illegible] is good and can produce varied shades of expression. His [illegible] is [illegible], and [illegible], he gives abundant proof that at no distant day he will do so.

The Bergé Choral Union, formed and conducted by the distinguished organist Mr. William Bergé, announces that the rehearsals for the season have commenced and are held for the present on the Tuesday evenings of each week in the Sunday school rooms in the basement of St. Ann's Church, for [illegible], No. [illegible] West [illegible] street. An [illegible] choral [illegible] where [illegible] to be found [illegible] of the finest [illegible] will be presented this season. For the season of [illegible] four concerts will be given at Irving's [illegible] Hall, [illegible]. The first concert took place [illegible] Mr. Bergé's Mass, No. 5, Mendelssohn's [illegible], "[illegible] Prayer" and Mr. Bergé's Jubilate No. 1 were performed. The second concert [illegible] Beethoven's "King Stephen," [illegible]'s "The [illegible]," and baritone solo and chorus [illegible] third, Mercadante's "Seven Last Words" [illegible] [illegible] opus 60, Fantasia for chorus, orchestra and piano (solo pianist, [illegible]) and the fourth, Clapp's cantata, "Job."—Ibid.

The London Athenæum says:

We drew attention some weeks ago to the wide range of music performed during the past three or four years by some of the American societies. It is a good sign for the future that the Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association are to be increased in number this winter. The people of Boston have been so thoroughly familiarized with the great masters that there is now comparatively little classical novelty to be brought before them for the first time. But it appears that Haydn's genial compositions have lately been shouldered out of the way by the more imposing creations of Beethoven, only three or four specimens of the genius of the earlier [illegible] of large orchestral works having been brought out in as many years. The Harvard Association cannot do better than give their subscribers copious draughts of Haydn, [illegible] antidote to the unwholesome influence[?] of Schumann and his followers.

The Handel and Haydn Society of the same city [illegible] very extensive, the project of giving Mr. Benedict's [illegible] a "Woman of Samaria," while the best chamber music will be brought to a hearing by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. All this speaks well for the musical cultivation of our Transatlantic brethren.

The plot of M. Flotow's new opera, "The Two Composers," appears from a short sketch given in several of the French papers to be of the very slightest. A [illegible] Haydn-[illegible] [illegible] to some German principles, is so jealous of rivals that it is the object of his life to keep all other composers at a distance. But he is tricked by his daughter so as to take the measure of a young musician of talent, and he ends by bringing out the rival's opera, and giving his daughter to a [illegible] [illegible]. It is said that the librettist, M. [illegible], has had a hand in the composition of the music, in order that the title of the piece may be doubly justified. Surely this is [illegible] trifling.

Abbé Liszt has completed a Requiem for male voices with organ accompaniment, and M. Gade is engaged on a new work for chorus and orchestra.

LEIPZIG. The first Gewandhaus concert took place on the 5th ult., Carl Reinecke conducting. The selections were: Cherubini's Anacreon Overture, Recit. and Aria from Spohr's Faust, sung by Frau Peschka-Leutner; Violin Concerto op. 26, by Max Bruch, played by Concertmeister David (first time); Recit. and Aria from Weber's Oberon; Concert piece for violin (op. 20) by Camille Saint-Saëns — Pure Sound. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — [illegible] friend. Zarembo was probably a listener:—Bruch's Concerto is spoken of as a work of "great artistic solidness." It is dedicated to Joachim.

In the second concert M. Saint-Saëns from Paris, where [illegible] a piano composition of his own [illegible] [illegible] of the royal opera at Munich, was [illegible] and the orchestral pieces were Mendelssohn's Hebrides Overture, and the first Symphony (B flat) of Schumann. Joachim was promised for the third concert (Oct. 29) and a new Symphony by Bruch.

OPERA IN GERMANY. The pieces performed in some of the chief cities during the first half of October were as follows:

BERLIN. Marschner's Templer and Jüdin; Auber's Fra Diavolo; Beethoven's Fidelio; Kreutzer's Nachtlager von Granada; Meyerbeer's Africaine; Robert; Boieldieu's Jean de Paris; Meyerbeer's Prophète.

VIENNA. Donizetti's Lucia and Lucrezia Borgia; Gounod's Romeo and Juliet; Faust; Wagner's Lohengrin; Meyerbeer's Africaine; Verdi's Ballo in Maschera and Trovatore.

MUNICH. Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur; Weber's Oberon; Auber's Le Maçon; Spohr's Jessonda; Meyerbeer's Robert; Verdi's Stradella.

DRESDEN. Lohengrin; Mozart's Seraglio; Verdi's Trovatore; Wagner's Flying Dutchman; Gluck's Orpheus.

LEIPZIG. Robert le Diable; Fille du Régiment; Offenbach's La Belle Hélène (?); Weber's Oberon; Mozart's Zauberflöte; Gounod's Faust; Auber's Maçon; Boieldieu's La Dame Blanche.

CASSEL. Stradella; Huguenots; Der Freyschütz; La Dame Blanche; Auber's [illegible]; Trovatore; [illegible] Zauberflöte; William Tell; Fidelio.

I.

[illegible] OF SOUNDS.

Professor Helmholtz has sought the explanation of the timbre or quality of sounds in a phenomenon which had long been known but which no one before him had sufficiently fathomed. Suppose a vibrating string of a piano for example tuned to a certain note, and let us call this the fundamental sound. Now listen closely (not every one easily makes the experiment) to the sound given out by the string while it is in full vibration; with a little attention you will soon hear two or three notes much higher, much feebler, which seem like faint echoes of the fundamental note. It seems as if the vibration of the visible string caused invisible strings to vibrate sympathetically, of these invisible strings the first, as if it were smaller by one half, vibrates twice as fast; the second, three times smaller, vibrates three times as fast; another four times smaller four times as fast, and so on. To the principal voice respond distant voices, fainter and fainter, higher and higher in pitch. By exercising the ear well one comes to hear always above each sonorous note the chain of harmonic notes, such is the name given by the physicist to those sounds, which correspond to numbers of vibrations two, three, four times greater than that of the fundamental sound.

These invisible strings, as we have learned, are but a pure hypothesis; in reality it is the material vibrating string itself which [illegible] spontaneously divides itself into two, three, four parts, after having produced the fundamental sound under the first impulse which has set it vibrating in its whole length. The parts continuing to vibrate like distinct strings, give the series of harmonic sounds.* All these undulations are superposed one upon another without contradicting each other at all; if it is a little complicated, there is no need of citing the beautiful theorem of Fourier on what the geometricians call the superposition of little movements; we have only to think of a buoy floating on the water, which docilely yields to whatever motions, lifts itself at the will of every wave, of every wind; in the same way the minute molecule obeys at the same time several undulations, some slow, others rapid; the total movement which results from it may be represented as an indefinite sum of distinct movements.

* "La Voix, L'Oreille et la Musique." Par Auguste Laugel. Paris, 1867.

* The series of harmonics comprises the octave above, the fifth of the octave [illegible] [illegible] the double octave, the major third and the fifth of the double octave. After these the notes diverge [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The phenomenon which I have just described is only a particular case of a general phenomenon. Every body becomes, which surrounds the centre of several independent systems of sonorous waves, in each of which corresponds a note. Still it would be a great error to suppose that the higher notes (overtones) which add themselves to the fundamental note always form with it a chord agreeable to the ear. Nature does not trouble herself about our sensibility; it has no regard to consonance or discords. The secondary notes which form the complement of a sound have been called harmonics because they have been observed first in the case of vibrating strings, and in that case the name is almost appropriate: the first harmonics, it is true, fill the places of the perfect chord (keynote, third and fifth); but the seventh and the ninth note above no longer belong to the musical consonances which our hearing sanctions. Most sonorous bodies make us hear, besides the fundamental sound, certain partial notes absolutely discordant and not entitled to the name of harmonics.

It is none the less true that we should consider every sound in general as accompanied by a cortège, a chain of upper notes, more or less faint and obscure. The ear receives a total impression in which the effect of the tonic necessarily predominates. It decomposes, it is true, the complex vibration which it perceives into its simple components, each of which corresponds to a particular note; but the impression of the sound remains ... [illegible] ... as soon as the clavier or keyboard of the auditory apparatus has received all these vibrations, which are produced and involved in one and the same undulatory movement, the synthesis is re-made in the nervous centre in which the acoustic nerve terminates, and the multiplex impressions are blended in one sole sensation.

The ear, in spite of its sensibility, or rather on the very account of that sensibility, is not the apparatus best adapted to the systematic analysis of sounds; it can not detect with certainty, nor especially all the component notes in a complex sound. Hardly can physical science trust to the direct observations of the senses; it has to find some apparatus whereby the phenomenon may be amplified, so that the elements which constitute them may be studied one by one.

If the physicist wishes to effect the decomposition of all sounds at will, he must have at his command an apparatus which fulfils two essential conditions: He must admit, at need, let him hear a simple note; and it must not allow him to hear any of the notes which make up it or dominate in the compound sound. The delicate problem Helmholtz has solved, and in this manner.

All sounds, he says, are not equally rich in elementary notes. If vibrating strings are extraordinarily fruitful in harmonics, most bodies render much less complex sounds. To this number belong stretched membranes, metallic rods, tuning forks. Their acoustic poverty can be utilized by making them vibrate by putting them in communication with a hollow box whose own proper resonance swells out a single note till its superior of the others.

Everybody knows that the fundamental sound of a diapason (tuning fork) is swelled and the concordant notes smothered by placing it on a resonance-chest of suitable dimensions. In these conditions, only one elementary note of the diapason disengaged from every parasitic note is audible. A membrane stretched over a drum acts in the same manner. The resonance of the drum has the effect to swell one note and smother the others, an apparatus of that sort may enable us to detect by the echo that it yields, the meagre and always simple note which it produces of itself; it will begin to be strongly agitated the moment that the air brings to it the movement that belongs to it; for nothing is more contagious and more sympathetic than sonorous movement. That in these circumstances a membrane or a tuning fork vibrates spontaneously is a fact of almost vulgar experience. Apply the bow to a string and the flex of the wall near it will move; it will be [illegible] [illegible] string situated in unison. Raise the dampers of a piano-forte and sing a note with force, the piano will respond. Singers they say have broken glasses by holding out with force for a long time the note which answers to their natural vibration. Two tuning forks mounted upon sounding boards are in unison. Let one be set in motion, the other will move; but if let but a drop of oil or wax fall upon one of them, the molecular harmony will be broken; the other will not respond. A membrane stretched over a sounding box or drum, then, will betray in the midst of an exterior cacophony the only one that responds to its own proper vibration; it will be like a man who, deaf to all other sounds, has an ear for one alone.

Helmholtz has availed himself of the properties of membranes in making of them true analysers of sounds. Cut a bottle horizontally at about the middle of its height, take the top part which has been cut off, stretch a skin over its largest opening, and you will have the singular acoustic apparatus which Helmholtz calls a resonator. The air penetrates the bottle by the neck; but, whatever noise may traverse it, the membrane will not trouble itself about them, simply with the noise on tone whereof which one harmonises with its natural vibration: one note, always the same, will set it in motion; all others, whatever their intensity, will leave it motionless.

The coarse resonator, however, is not the one which Helmholtz has employed in his experiments. As a membrane he takes the tympanum of the ear itself, and he applies there hollow globes of glass or copper which serve for the sonorous bottle or resonator. These globes, of variable size, all have a pointed part, like the queue of a pear which penetrates into the ear; on the opposite end of the pear a circular orifice is opened for the entrance of the air.

The membrane of the tympanum closes the delicate point of the resonator when it is applied to the ear; now, each of these great hollow years possesses its own fundamental note, according to the dimensions of the ball and to the size of the aperture. When you introduce the point of one of these years into one ear, taking care to stop the other, you are condemned to hear one single note alone; each one resonator is like a new ear constructed only for one sound. In the midst of the loudest concert, all other notes seem smothered, while the note of the resonator leaps out with force each time that it occurs in the harmony which there [illegible] for it and fall it is the vaguest and most indistinct of noises in the whistling of the wind, in the tumult of a crowd, in the murmur and the babble of the running waters. The resonator is a veritable analyser, which always detects the sound that properly belongs to it; and so it allows those phenomena, whose tones are the least sensitive to the musical shades, to make a ambitude of [illegible] ments which formerly were unrelated to those [illegible] the most delicate acoustic within reach of the hardest ears. Such is the sensibility of the instrument that it not only begins to vibrate when a neighboring body sings its fundamental note, it is set in vibration also by a deeper sound accompanied by a harmonic with which its own note may accord. This ingenious instrument lends itself thus admirably to the study of the harmonic notes; faint as they may be, it finds them, draws them out from the accurate medium in which they are drowned.

With a series of these resonators, differently tuned, Helmholtz succeeded in analysing all sounds, just as light is decomposed by mechanical means, prisms of glass for instance. He has divided sounds by appearing to these resonators differing in form and size. The sounds of most musical instruments are composed of partial notes of various intensity; these compound notes are blended in the ordinary sensation, which spontaneously forms their synthesis; but one can isolate them, one picks them out in a manner by using these artificial ears adapted each to only one vibration.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music as a Part of Education.

Long before King David soothed the infirmity of Saul with his harp, or Miriam sang to her timbrel, the power of music was acknowledged. Indeed so this faculty seems inherent in human nature, it must have been coeval with man. No age or has as yet that has not delighted in sound. The savage tribes of Africa and the Arctic borders make night hideous with their barbaric instruments, take great enjoyment in their discords. It is music to them and a positive sense of happiness.

It is a remarkable fact that Homer, the oracle of the arts, produced among that was truly valuable in music, although such as it was it gave pleasure was an accomplishment very much in fashion and served as an accompaniment to give greater effect to the recitation of their poets. In the kindred art of dancing there was very great variety but "Music," honestly said "was young," too young to be scientific.

Some progress had been made in the art before the age of Alexander.

Terpander the father of Greek music who lived three hundred years prior to that era increased the compass and power of the lyre by the addition of three strings.

The much vexed question of the merits of Greek music, one upon which so many critics have brought all their learning to bear with no satisfactory results, will we suppose never be answered. Dr. Burney, one of the best readers, authorities, writes: "All I can say is, that no pains have been spared to place the Greek melodies in the most favorable point of view; but, with all the light that can be thrown on them, they have a rude and inelegant appearance." To a modern ear the Greek airs are tame and monotonous, and as harmony was not understood, the effect is bald and bare. The other fine arts attained a wonderful perfection, but no Apollo, Phidias or [illegible] was found to develop music.

After counterpoint was invented, the true music in a swaddling clothes and grew thus maturity, but did not develop into a goddess until fostered by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Beethoven and Mozart. Opera had no being until the sixteenth century when Ferdinand I., Grand Duke of Tuscany with the aid of some gentlemen of his court warmed into life and cherished in its infancy this product of the refinement of ages. Instrumentation, of which we have such solid examples in the works of Beethoven and such brilliant ones in those of Rossini, has now reached a climax of excellence.

Although our proficiency in the arts does not warrant us in making a comparison with their condition in Greece, there is a slight analogy in the inferiority of our music until lately with our sculpture and painting. Thirty years since American sculptors took the lead in Europe and our painters were on a par with the continental artists, Allston indeed surpassing all his contemporaries. Music then was in a puerile condition. A friend who is a composer having lived for many years in Italy, on his return not long since found himself at the representation of Mendelssohn's Oratorio of "St. Paul." He was strongly surprised at the improvement in the power of rendering music and the public appreciation of this composition.

I think the public are not sufficiently aware that we have been living for the last thirty years in a great musical revolution. Before that time there were comparatively few opportunities of hearing celebrated singers and singers and at rare intervals the opera visited us. Concerts were meagre and poor performed. Through the zeal of a few public spirited gentlemen the symphonies of Beethoven found a home in America. Church music was generally speaking in an inferior condition. Even in our large cities the only dependence often was on amateur performers, and we all remember well as the [illegible] seen in violin and flute [those unmodest and looking instruments] used to be seen in the choir. Now all this is changed. No longer a leader stands in a conspicuous situation, striving his hands and sometimes having recourse to a pitch pipe for the note the shrill sound of which was a signal for irreverent laughter. Great attention is paid to sacred music and our trained organists and choirs improve the public taste and render the services very attractive.

The introduction of music into our public schools is most important, as it influences our home living and refining. Let any one go into a school and watch the children when they begin singing, and how I appreciate what I feel and remember how have affected them. The scholars, weary of their books shut them and join with all their hearts in the song. The power of making a noise is dearly prized by children, and a harmonious voice they enjoy. On the love passage where they can give full play to their lungs, their enjoyment is plainly seen in cheeks and brightness their eyes wear tears. It may appear and after this refreshing process the return to study is not unwelcome. The interval has given repose to their brains and made the hard task of keeping still, easier. How much more attractive music makes the homes of the poor and what a pleasure it is to hear young voices singing in the streets! Even now as I write the singing of part music by two young servant girls, brought up in an asylum, reaches me, showing great correctness in time and tune. There was nothing of this formerly.

Another very pleasant feature in our musical progress is the training of voices for the chorus singing in oratorios. This privilege now is widely granted, and many of our respectable mechanics, shop girls and trades people, when their daily work is over, can not only listen to masterpieces of the best composers, but can take part in giving effect to them. If we reflect upon the time which must be spent in neighboring meetings for practising and regular rehearsals, we shall see that many evenings are redeemed from idleness and dissipation by this comparatively new source of enjoyment.

Conservatories of Music have lately sprung up and serve to spread still more widely the knowledge of music. From these Conservatories go forth teachers to all parts of the Union.

We still have much to learn. There is an antagonism between the light and severe schools of music, which is harmful and unnecessary. The Puritan sees her nothing but merely a sacred music, while the Catholic enjoys only a theatrical melodies. Some are in favor of German music exclusively while others are strong at the shrine of Italian opera. It is the part of education to give a taste for all that is good in different styles. As well a person to go only one age buy of pictures refuse to enjoy the works of Titian because they preferred the severe drawing of Michael Angelo, or deny any merit to the Dutch school because they had an exclusive admiration for Raphael's Madonnas. [If Germany uses a hair more of the head in it, Italian has more of the heart.] One who really understands music will make some slight find excellence in both. All nationalities have their musical characteristics which are as distinct as their languages. The melancholy Russian airs, the spirited Hungarian, and weird Polish melodies, gay French songs and stately Spanish measures, each good of their kind, give pleasure to the cultivated ear.

Some musical critics find discouragement in the fact that the mass of the people prefer frivolous music. Offenbach's affections a wonderful delight them. The tendency no doubt at present is to the sensational. This is only for a season. We have really made so much progress the travelling still for a taste and even retrograding in it [illegible] naturally expect so.

So long as we have music in schools (even should we be flooded with new compilations of old music, like tunes from Mozart, Handel &c. vamped up with new names and fitted to words which they suit as ill as a tight robe does beggars), we shall improve.

We may have too many Conservatories and some of them may be pure money making affairs, still good will be derived from them.

One-sided Germanism may prevail, but the seeds of harmony are now broadcast and we are reaping and shall continue to reap in abundance a musical harvest which will afford food for our imagination, serving to correct the effects of too great devotion to business and the engrossing cares of every-day life.

We live in a remarkable century. Steam and electricity have lessened the labor of man. Stereotyping has increased the number of our books and newspapers. Even matter goes not tranquillizes suffering while our material comforts increase yearly. The crowning scene of part of education may be considered its unrevelling glory.

Mr Emerson's New Course of Lectures.

Boston, November 4th, 1868.

The readers of the Nation, who are reminded of all good things, will perhaps like to hear a word of Mr. Emerson's new course of lectures now going on in Boston. [illegible]

[illegible]

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, OCT. 31.—The musical season [illegible] may be said, [illegible] last Sunday with the first of a series of eight classical concerts, which will be given once each week, at the Cirque [illegible]. The name of M. Pasdeloup appears in the programme only as director of the Orchestra, [illegible]

If the programme on this occasion is a foretaste of what we may expect in future, we have indeed much good music [illegible].

[illegible]

The [illegible] Symphony in A, [illegible] perhaps the greatest ever composed. [illegible]

[illegible]

Afterwards, [illegible] Haydn, [illegible]

The Ruy Blas Overture, or as Mendelssohn jestingly called it, "the Overture to the Theatrical Pension fund," [illegible]

With all due respect to the composer of the Overture to "Tannhäuser" and the prelude to "Lohengrin," I may safely say that it has never been my misfortune to hear [illegible] "Marche Champêtre," which was here publicly performed for the first time. [illegible] To describe it is impossible. [illegible]

At the conclusion of the performance M. Pasdeloup was unanimously recalled; an ovation was due him for the manner in which the Symphony and Haydn's Minuet was executed.

At his concerts to succeed according as to a course of Gluck, Spontini, Mozart, Cimarosa, &c., &c., of which I will write at a future date. At the Opera, L'Africaine and Hamlet are the attractions. At the Théâtre Italien we have Mme. Adelina Patti (as people will call her) and the young debutante Signorina Harri.

Concert.—The second of the Cirque Napoléon yesterday (the second of the popular series) was hardly less interesting than that of last week. The selections were as follows:

Struensée, tragédie de Michael Beer, musique de Meyerbeer.

Ouverture.
1. Il Sbirro de Villiers.
2. Il 1re de Prepareré.
3. Ville Sancini.
La Bénédiction.—Scènes ...
Beethoven.—Symphonie Pastorale ... Lindpaintner Prière.
Le Catéchisme des Grenadiers du temps de la Révolution.—Romance la suppliante.
Symphonie en la ... Mozart
1. Septuor. 2. Scherzo. 3. Menuet. 4. Finale.
Ouverture des Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg ... R. Wagner.
Fragments du Septuor ... Beethoven.
Thème et variations, Scherzo, Finale.
Entr'acte par 36 Violons, Violoncelles, Contrebasses, Bassons, Harpe et Cor de basset.

It will be remembered that Meyerbeer's Struensée overture (one part of it) was performed at one Musical Festival in New York last May. However much one may be inclined to dispute Meyerbeer's claims to the name of a great genius, no one I am sure will deny that this Overture, Entr' Marche, Choeur, Polonaise, are full of beauty and interest. The vocal parts were not given on this occasion.

Very different from the great Beethoven Symphony in A is that of Mozart in C minor, and yet great as is the former, the latter on Feu Soire, the complete one in more than a quiet Lowlands landscape would suffer from being compared with one of our own White Mountain scenes.

The Scherzo &c. from Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" merits another hearing.

The "Meditation" from "Les Maîtres Chanteurs" served to confirm and more than confirm the opinion based upon a hearing of the Leopold or New York and of the [Boston] "Prophete," given at M. Pasdeloup's first concert, an opinion which I have already expressed. From this interesting and refreshing change in the Beethoven Septuor, in which a theme of the broader and old point description is repeated to many a one without growing wearisome. Just as certain little words may be said thus over three and in a thousand different ways, without losing their charm.

At the conclusion of the concert M. Pasdeloup was recalled to the platform and received a hearty round of applause.

A. A. C.

Nov. 4.—Already the interest in the Cirque Napoléon are become an institution, and the dense throng filling the house from floor to ceiling, the familiar faces of the Orchestra and the cheerful figure of M. Pasdeloup with his ticket for a bâton (which he knows how to use so well that it is a real pleasure to see him recalled to the platform, as he invariably is at the close of each performance), are things to be looked forward to from week to week. Among the hearers, too, one becomes acquainted, in seeing day by day the same faces, and there is a grateful sense of companionship in this. And here pleasant and interested the hearers are! Long before the preliminary tap of the bâton there is a silence so perfect that one might hear the folding of a lady's pocket-handkerchief, and a thin rustling, a commotion known as a whisper tolerated.

The selections for the third concert were as follows:

Ouverture de Lodoïska ... V. Weber.
Suite d'orchestre, op. 101, 1re audition ... Joachim Raff.
Allegretto du jeune aphide ... Mendelssohn.
Menuet ... Haydn.
Pour cordes, les instruments à vent.
Symphonie en la mineur ... Beethoven.

In listening to the Lodoïska overture one thinks of the sad life of the composer, of his fruitless journey to Paris, and of his death in poverty and obscurity.

The new Suite by Raff is a noble work, for which one hearing is by no means sufficient; it was applauded, but not so enthusiastically as it should have been. Perhaps they were impatient for the Allegretto of Mendelssohn, which was received with so much warmth that it had to be repeated entire, despite the length of the programme.

The idea of executing movements of chamber music by a full orchestra, causing the tones as the flowers are trained in the garden at Kew, is said to have originated with Habeneck, the founder of the society des concerts du Conservatoire. In this case the selection was a happy one and the Hymn of Haydn sounded well, but I think that in most instances a quartet or quintet will sound best when executed according to the intention of its composer.

The Symphony of Beethoven was well rendered. A short time since I heard this Symphony in England beneath very different circumstances; there the orchestra was weary and dispirited, and, with this added to the chilling influence of a provincial audience (worse, if possible, in England than in America) I could hardly recognize the same great work. But now how grand it sounded,—from the Adagio, which Berlioz has compared to the sufferings of a great soul which has become a prey to despair,—through the profound sadness of the Adagio, to the Triumphal march at the finale, when the soul of the poet-musician seems to cast off the chains wherewith we are darkly bound" and to ascend to the heavens.

New York, Nov. 9.—In my last letter I promised to give—in the second—further particulars with regard to the concert-campaign of our Philharmonic Society. Ole Bull (yes) in Fine, S. B. Mills, Richard Hoffman, Mme. La Grange, Mme. Parepa will be among the soloists, while the Symphonies to be played will be Beethoven's 4th and 5th (Eroica), Schumann's and Mendelssohn's 5th (Reformation), one by Haydn and two movements from one of Schubert's posthumous and unfinished works. The only novelties will be Liszt's "Symphonic poem" called "On the Mountain," the Overture and Scherzo by Gade, and the Overture to Rosamunde by Cherubini, and Hiller's Ferdinand Piano-forte Concerto in A.

The N. Y. Citizen, whose reliable musical editor in a recent issue of that journal I find the following paragraph having reference to Theo. Thomas and his concerts at Central Park Garden: "Mr. Thomas designs a new Handel night and a Liszt night; why will he not give us a 'Chopin night'?" The writer would scarcely have exhibited himself in this way if he had been aware of the fact that [with the exception of the mazurkas &c.] Chopin wrote no orchestral music. Verily the Citizen goes to a hard school.

It is with great regret that I announce the death—which occurred a few days ago—of Edmund Remack, a well known and able journalist. He had for some time been editor of the N. Y. Abend Zeitung, and had contributed largely to other journals both here and in Europe. His musical criticisms were always careful, good, temperately written and even excellingly sound and kind. As a man he was beloved by a large circle of friends, to whom he had endeared himself by the unfailing genial and admirable social qualities which were in a marked degree his characteristics. By those and by the many others I know, who deem him highly an amiable man by his loss will be sincerely mourned. Mr. R. was about 35 years of age, and the immediate cause of his demise was physical exhaustion brought on by excessive literary labor.

It is announced that Pike's Opera House has been sold to the Erie R. R. Co. for the trifling sum of $850,000. If this be indeed true, the days of Opera Bouffe are numbered, so far as that locality is concerned, and Mr. Bateman will be compelled to pitch his tent elsewhere. Just now, however, he shows no intention of moving, and "La Belle Hélène," which has been brought out with great splendor, is having a fine run. As you may be aware, another of Offenbach's operas, "Geneviève de Brabant," is in full blast at the Théâtre Français, while Italian opera is as dead as a door nail, and our "Academy of Music" stands a desolate looking monument to the decline of the management. It is however reported that Max Strakosch means to try his hand there at a short season with Mme. La Grange, Miss Kellogg, Miss McCulloch, Mrs. Brignoli and Antonucci, so that Irving Place will be galvanized into life for a short time.

Mr. F. L. Ritter our well-known composer, is to give a concert in Steinway Hall on the evening of Nov. 24th. The programme will be chiefly composed of his own productions and will include the Symphony which was played at our Musical Festival last Spring, and which made such a favorable impression in musical circles here.

F.

Nov. 16.—Rumors that rumor had whispered the name of the manager of the short season of Italian Opera which will commence this evening. Max Maretzek—the old war horse—is the man, and not Max Strakosch, as Mr. Hopkins's pepinian told. The season opens with "Il Trovatore" this evening, to be followed by "Fidelio" on Tuesday and "Robert le Diable" on Wednesday. Mme. de La Grange Brignoli and Mme. ... are the principal stars, while there are rumors of Miss Kellogg, here in the west. Reason perforce over and some later in the campaign.

Mr. Theo. Thomas commences his Symphony Soirées on Dec. 5th. Last winter these Soirées were given at a loss. I am told of something like $500.

"Oh it is pitiful
In a whole city full
Friends there'd none."

Or at least there is not enough to enable Mr. T. to pay his expenses. Notwithstanding this fact, he goes nobly on in his good work and merits the thanks and money of all lovers of true Art.

Mr. J. F. Huber assisted by Mme. La Grange, W. J. Hill, H. W. Morgan, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Colby, gave a concert on Thursday evening in Steinway Hall. Mr. H. is an "American pianist" who has been studying in Europe for some years.

Mr. H. was affected with that peculiar condition of nervousness which only shows at stage fright, and consequently did not, probably, do himself justice. He has, nevertheless, and such a vocal grace of that, as I possibly in light achieve notable results. As it is, however, his playing is somewhat crude and boring, and his touch is not excellent. His chosen pieces, as compositions which exhibited no particular originality, and did manifest that composition is no ... forte. The assisting artists added something to the interest of the concert, and Mr. Morgan, of course, gave at the last table "Wm. Tell."

The Arion Society gave a musical entertainment at its new hall on Saturday. I quote the principal numbers of the excellent programme:

Overture, Hebrides	Gungl.
Allegro for Concert	Dussek.
W. Kopta.
Six Psalms ...	F. Schubert.
Polonaise, op. 53	Chopin.
S. J. Mills.
Overture, Leonore.	Beethoven.

Mr. Kopta played the attractive Allegro in a very easy classic style and did double note passages with artistically done. His tone is, unfortunately, a little thin, but his execution and expression are artistic and praiseworthy.

Mr. Mills was at his best in the superb Polonaise and his charming treatment of the Andante [illegible] was most enjoyable. Just enough abandon, just enough expression, everything accurately balanced and the whole ably executed. I have never heard the Andante so well played, and I desire to record the fact that Mr. M.'s playing moved me for almost the first time. My head almost always admires his ability, but my heart is rarely touched. The Chopin Polonaise was played by Mr. Mills—not—Mr. Mills played the Chopin Polonaise. Mr. M.'s individuality was—as it should not have been—subordinated to that of the composer.

The orchestra played fairly, except in the short prelude to the Polonaise, and that was shocking.

The Gewandhaus Concerts—The Singers and Conductors—New Works—The Music Hall, &c.

[Correspondence of the Evening Post.]

Leipzig, October 18, 1868.

The event of the last week in musical circles was the opening of the Gewandhaus concerts. It seems needless to say anything in praise of an orchestra whose reputation is already world-wide. To say that every piece was rendered with a precision and delicacy which left nothing to be wished for will give to one who was not so fortunate as to be a listener but a slight idea of the wonderful beauty of the whole performance. The [illegible] and variety of shading of the violins has exceeded anything that I had imagined possible—partly owing, I am told, to the fact that the leader was Concertmeister David, whose presence has a wonderful influence upon the violinists.

The concert opened with Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon." This overture, though belonging to a [illegible] in the old school of music, will be one of the last to be put in the shade to make room for younger ones. All true lovers of the art will always rejoice in his sound pure style, as did Beethoven himself in his time. The other orchestral piece was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which was loudly applauded, as owing that he will ever be the favorite with an appreciative public. At different periods the tempo of this symphony were changed by the conductor [illegible] [illegible] is permitted to require the rendering of it. The theme of the first movement was played a little more slowly under Capellmeister Reinecke's direction than I have hitherto heard it, and I thought it was owing to this change that so many new beauties were revealed in a composition which I had always considered before as perfect.

Madame Pauline Lucca delighted the audience with two arias that we seldom have the good fortune to hear: Ihr edle Reich [illegible], from Spohr's "Faust," and Er [illegible] er hart und mude from Weber's "Sylvana." It seems to be rather from the [illegible] time of these operas, than from want of beauty in the music, that they have come from becoming [illegible] with the public. At its first production in Berlin, 1810, "Sylvana" failed to meet with any favor.

The text of "Faust" has little in common with Goethe's poem except the main features of the characters. The very [illegible] character of the libretto has more than [illegible] the Germans to the pleasing character of the music and it is very widely [illegible].

Madame Lucca is a great favorite with the Leipzig opera-going public, and they are already lamenting that she is so soon to be lost to them. It will be difficult to find a Germany another singer who unites so much artistic feeling with such perfect execution. She must have felt that the one pleasing fresh laurels on Thursday evening to take with her as souvenirs of the appreciation of the public here when she met with such a warm reception, and was so generously applauded and recalled at the Gewandhaus by probably the most critical audience in all Germany.

Concertmeister David, so long celebrated as leader, composer and virtuoso, and so intimately associated for years with Mendelssohn, rendered a new [illegible] [illegible], p. 26, by Max Bruch, and Concertstück for violin, op. 20, by Camille Saint-Saëns.

Max Bruch (Capellmeister at Sondershausen), though still very young, is acknowledged as one of the best composers in Germany, and his "Loreley" and other works have awakened a lively interest among artists here. In this concerto he shows an independence of conception, great clearness of expression and exquisite instrumentation. Although the composition of Saint-Saëns exhibits hardly as much interest as the concerto just spoken of, it is full of good harmonic combination, and artists here consider that he is destined to take a high rank as composer.

It is indeed a gratifying recognition of talent, that here a one-word [illegible] as [illegible] considered the composition worthy of being brought out in the Gewandhaus. This building, which has been made famous by the concerts, was built in 1743, by Schmiedlein. It is always spoken of as the old Gewandhaus, but since being here, where so many buildings have been rebuilding for fine new [illegible] [illegible], this one seems to belong among the [illegible] ones. It is situated on the [illegible], the Universitäts street, and is four stories high, with its [illegible] black walls, and all the lower windows covered with iron grating. It might easily be mistaken for a prison, and certainly does not suggest anything connected with the fine arts. Nevertheless, the memories are [illegible] of uniting the artistic with the practical, and here a little convert room in the upper part of it. The merchant [illegible] was the leader in establishing the concerts, which have been in existence since 1743 and have been the most favored principally in the production of history [illegible] classical music. There was more enthusiasm with regard to them in some, and the music in general in Leipzig under Mendelssohn's [illegible] than at any other time.

This hall will seat about six hundred persons, and two thousand more, in boxes, each for the privilege of a seat, and with [illegible]. These seats are held by families, and considered hereditary property and are so jealously guarded by their owners that it is [illegible] give up the right to seats for a stranger; the tickets [illegible] bear this [illegible]. Several concerts are obliged for the steady permanence with which the members cling to this old hall, instead of building one that shall meet the demands of the community.

A friend tells me that they are unwilling to give up the hall, because what orchestra should take it, and with it the name of Gewandhaus and the present orchestra and a portion of its prestige. Another consolation I [illegible] is that in this hall the acoustic properties are so good, but certainly so skilful an [illegible] can be found now as lived a century ago.

These concerts are the fashionable reunions of Leipzig and the ladies appear in full evening costume. Their toilettes would make you, in the stalls, those in the dress circle of our New York Academy.

Adjoining the hall communicating through a small door is an ante-room containing a limited number of more seats, where "we outsiders" are allowed to listen to this music without even a distant sight of the orchestra or the privileged audience, the little door being filled with the happy few who secured the pleasure of standing here by being present on the instant the doors were opened.

The audience [illegible] with breathless attention. Such [illegible] silence as long continued was remarkable. It [illegible] [illegible] the charm of life in Germany. It is very difficult to be always tolerant of the [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] which exist here, and in this instance I almost lost my temper in the absence of comfort in the arrangements.

The Conservatorium building is connected with the Gewandhaus, and opened the [illegible]. Lessons for the new year began on the 12th, and the students number one hundred and seventy. There have never been so many in any time since Mendelssohn founded the institution, in 1843. A new professor is added to the list for piano and harmony. Dr. Paul, an artist of very high position here. The vacancy [illegible] by [illegible] has some been regularly filled until now when his classes are given to Richter.

The expense of living here is so much less than in America, that I am astonished more students of music do not seek the town. Besides the instructions offered, every opportunity is afforded for hearing the best music, and from time to time the most renowned artists, so that any one with the slightest aptitude for music cannot fail to profit by a sojourn here.

Crystal Palace Concerts. The Times (Oct. 31) gives the following report of the first five concerts:

That Mr. Manns's orchestra plays better than any other concert orchestra in England is by this time sufficiently notorious, and—allowing for the advantages the constant presence of the members of the Crystal Palace orchestra [illegible] which they be heard practising symphonies, overtures, &c., every day of the week, inseparably gives him—the credit is mainly his.

Even writing about these concerts we have heard much that is old and good, with much that is new if not uniformly good. We have heard, for example, the Eroica, perhaps, without excepting even the [illegible] "No. 1," the weightiest of Beethoven's symphonies; we have had the two movements from Schubert's projected Symphony in B minor (a Crystal Palace discovery) which the oftener they are given the more deep become the regret that a work so rich in promise should have been left unfinished; we have had the fiery overture which Mendelssohn wrote off currente calamo, for Victor Hugo's play of Ruy Blas, and the more delicate and thoroughly [illegible] overture which (in 1848) [illegible] with an overture upon the same story by Cornelius Kreutzer he composed for the "Fair Melusine;" and we have had Beethoven's incomparable Coriolan—better fitted for the play of Shakespeare than for the [illegible] of H. J. von Collin. These were among the old things and are good. Among the new things must be reckoned the [illegible] in the procession of the "Meistersinger," from Herr Wagner's "comic" opera, recently brought out in Munich; a rehearsal ("The Sailor's Bride") by Hans Johannes Hager, composer of an oratorio called John the Baptist which created anything rather than a lively sensation when introduced by Mr. Hullah some eight years ago, at what was then St. Martin's Hall—one of the curiosities from The [illegible] an opera composed by Herr Reinecke, actual leader of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig; a new part-song ("Echoes") by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and yet [illegible] fragments from Mendelssohn's Loreley, which was combined with the most deeply known (including the exquisite "Ave Maria") from that unhappily incomplete opera. Mr. [illegible]'s part-song which is [illegible] and worthy of neighbors so [illegible]. The "Vintagers' chorus" from Loreley, [illegible] with grandeur melody and characteristic [illegible], was [illegible] called for again; and the result would have been, even happier had it been possible to divide the singers into two departments on either side the orchestra, so as to realize the full and [illegible] the good by the composer. It is consoling by the way to know that there exist here Mendelssohn's intended opera still [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] of his own [illegible] for a speedy hearing of which we may safely look to those who direct musical matters at the Crystal Palace. The pieces we have enumerated were all included in the programmes of the second and third concerts and here must we may finally say, as in every way remarkable, the performances of Beethoven's Eroica, the two movements from Schubert's unfinished symphony, and the overture to Coriolan. The Melusina of Mendelssohn (perhaps the most difficult of all overtures to play with the requisite finish) we have heard still better given by the Crystal Palace orchestra. There was also singing, more or less attractive, by Mlle. [illegible], who did her utmost for Herr Hager's song from [illegible] who, though [illegible] we asked for her on account of its [illegible], gave great effect to the [illegible] in Loreley. Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Nelson Varley—besides a very admirable performance of [illegible] from Rossini's Otello, by one young and gifted English violinist, Mr. Carrodus.

The programme of the fourth concert, which, in spite of the unpropitious weather, drew a large audience on Saturday was as follows:

Overture, "Le Nozze di Figaro"	Mozart.
Symphony, No. 7, in A flat, Op. 92	Beethoven.
Aria, "La [illegible] [illegible]"	Mozart.
[illegible]	[illegible]
Romance, [illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Haydn.
Lied, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
[illegible], "Romeo and Juliet"	Gounod.
Ballad, "The [illegible]"	[illegible]
Overture, "[illegible]"	Auber.

Though in all probability Mozart never heard his very [illegible] overture played so fast, it is no less probable that he never heard it played so well. Every delicate nuance—as the French express it more pointedly than we can—was attained in a [illegible] and the crescendo here and there [illegible] so much [illegible] [illegible] passage, were managed to perfection. Indeed if the Crystal Palace orchestra does anything in particular better than any other orchestra, with which we are acquainted, it is the crescendo, or gradual increase from soft to loud, and the diminuendo or gradual decrease from loud to soft. Of these peculiarities of execution however and more especially of the last, the overture of Mozart (which was extraordinarily executed, and performs, repeated, presents few examples [illegible] compared with the Symphony of Beethoven, which, as Mr. Mahler seems to [illegible], seems in a great degree made up of them. That extraordinary work, and extraordinary in every sense, was now heard for the first time at the Crystal Palace, though by no means for the first time in England. It appears to us, in some respects, the best, and, in others, the least, admirable of the four symphonies which the aspiring composer gave to the art. The first movement ("Lebhaft"...) is, perhaps, on the whole, fuller of beautiful, yet only half-expressed ideas than any movement from his pen; the second ("Scherzo"), which, like the last, was meant by Schumann to assume a popular character, ... At the concert to-day we are promised, among other items, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, ... [illegible] ... Symphony by Schubert (No. 10, in C major) ... [illegible]

Rossini.

The greatest musical genius, and, in his way, the greatest composer of modern Italy has passed away at last. As a creative artist he has been dead a quarter of a century. During that time he has lived at Bologna and Paris, the theme of countless anecdotes, some true, some silly, some too good not to be true ... [illegible] ... pleased with himself ... Music at Home.

than the concert of Thursday Afternoon, Nov. 12, could hardly have been desired. Expectation, nourished and excited by these steadily improving concerts, was at its height. Very nearly 1200 season tickets to the ten concerts had been eagerly taken; to 1300 at last winter. All were punctually in their seats, and the Music Hall revealed few empty places. Nor does interest of numbers seem at all to be drawn [illegible] the tone of musical good behavior; it is still the best listening crowd that can be found. [illegible] well up in concert [illegible]; "[illegible]" everywhere [illegible] before [illegible]. On the other hand the orchestra appeared in fuller proportions and [illegible]. [illegible] has done its work there, [illegible] pride and pleasure [illegible] noble [illegible] than. There were just [illegible] instruments. [illegible], headed by Schultze, including the brothers [illegible]—a great accession; [illegible] second violins; [illegible] violas; [illegible] violoncellos; [illegible] double basses; [illegible] wind instruments.

The very first strong chords of Beethoven's grand and really religious Overture, in C, op. [illegible], called the "Dedication of the House," made the [illegible] of the full orchestra [illegible]. And throughout the concert the ensemble was satisfying beyond any past experience here except the great Festival in May. That overture, though written for the opening of a theatre, was truly a sublime and [illegible] (we may use the abused word for once) [illegible] of concerts of so high an aim. The two excellent bassoons did their running passage [illegible] the beginning finely, and were not so usual quite obscured by the [illegible] of trumpets: the horns and all the wind band [illegible] more as nice and true as one could hope; the violins [illegible], fine and smooth [illegible] the middle strings warm and rich; the basses round and manly; the intentions of the [illegible] were at the same brought out [illegible] both stately and [illegible], deep and tender; here this recalled the Eroica, and [illegible] Handel's fugue [illegible] the whole work throughout [illegible] high pitch of [illegible]. It was certainly [illegible] of Mr. Eichberg, [illegible] considering the very short time he had had in which [illegible] understanding between himself and the musicians against [illegible] the musical routine and therefore some nervousness; but he [illegible] more [illegible] and still more in the Symphony a [illegible] musical perception, [illegible] and [illegible] feeling of the music.

We can truly say and we believe it was the general feeling, that never before have we enjoyed the Eroica so keenly. For the first time, that only one of the Beethoven Symphonies really [illegible] in Boston. The whole audience felt [illegible] and grandeur, felt the [illegible] of its great thoughts and rhythm. The rendering was unequal to be sure. In the finale of the Marcia funebre, despite the [illegible] harp-like [illegible] of the Conductor, some of the instruments [illegible] and the unsteady chords were [illegible]. But the [illegible] of [illegible] of the Scherzo, [illegible] on the eve of a glorious [illegible] and the [illegible] proclamations of the four horns in the Trio [illegible]. Best of all, the last movement, with its variations,—(we heard it [illegible] on the dropping of a few seeds in the ground—the theme—and see springing up and spreading [illegible]) [illegible] was indeed superbly played.

After this stately introduction a short intermission, and then the radiant face and form of Miss Alice Topp gave then the [illegible] welcome [illegible] appeared upon the stage. The [illegible] was hardly as happy in the accompaniment of Chopin's E minor Concerto, as the purely orchestral pieces,—[illegible] was the [illegible] but she played it wonderfully well [illegible] the beginning passage from [illegible] to her musical feeling, [illegible]. The delicate Romanza was exquisitely breathed upon the canvas, and that most bright, vivacious, piquant, thoroughly healthy Rondo finale was irresistible. Chopin is sometimes sickly, but not here; a glorious composition from first to last, so interesting at every point that you scarcely think of its [illegible], [illegible] to the first [illegible] we have had of it within a twelve month!—The ever-welcome Overture to Oberon closed the concert with great spirit.

The second concert will be next Friday, Thursday being Thanksgiving. Then Mr. Zerrahn will be welcomed back to his Conductor's post. His arrival [illegible]. The programme stands thus: Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony (second time in Boston); the great soprano Scena and Aria from "Fidelio," in which Miss Anna S. Whitten will make her first public appearance since her studies abroad; Sterndale Bennett's Overture: "The Wood Nymph" [illegible] the "Naiads"; [illegible] Part II. Haydn's Military Symphony (first time here for many years); Songs by Mozart and Mendelssohn. Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

The two Kellogg Concerts, a fortnight ago, were generally failures, for the young prima donna always had her [illegible], [illegible] elsewhere, and the reports of her successes in the London opera have [illegible] her [illegible] to great [illegible] high in their estimation. We heard the first concert, which had all the faults of concerts in which the person [illegible] all, the music [illegible] a secondary matter. That is [illegible] was of [illegible] (aggregations, rather) [illegible] there were [illegible] and [illegible] still more [illegible] concert [illegible] there were [illegible] [illegible] concert [illegible], a round of clapping and encoring of [illegible] admiration. "Sweet Home," for instance, [illegible] a great Queen of Song [illegible] an audience, [illegible] for an absolute [illegible] can condescend to send it [illegible] with the dear people [illegible] Kellogg, [illegible] [illegible] Napoleon [illegible] German of Jenny [illegible] a [illegible] sung [illegible]. And [illegible] song, where the little [illegible] and [illegible] all the audience [illegible].

Miss Kellogg returns [illegible] to the scene [illegible], only [illegible] in appearance, [illegible] encouragement [illegible] and [illegible] formed a [illegible] she so had so [illegible] of that [illegible], which [illegible]. The sprightliness of manner has drawn all [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] charm in it. [illegible]. The [illegible] humour [illegible] and her [illegible] graceful [illegible] perhaps [illegible]. She is full of [illegible] question. A very [illegible] though it [illegible] seems to be [illegible] became a [illegible]. Her best effort [illegible]. The duet from Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, with its baritone Sig. Petrilli was [illegible] and the Romeo and Juliet waltz of Gounod [illegible] in character.

Refreshing [illegible] natural and charming, both in form and look and manner, was the appearance of Miss Topp, [illegible] Liszt. [illegible] Paganini's Campanella [illegible] "Gnomenreigen" [illegible] and the first Hungarian Rhapsody in the [illegible]. Herr Wenzel Kopta showed [illegible] of the violin [illegible] by Vieuxtemps and Pagan[ini] [illegible] but pure [illegible] of [illegible] arrangement. Herr Lotti [illegible] tenor solos, sang Adelaide [illegible] part, besides a song and duo from Martha. Sig. Petrilli [illegible] baritone [illegible] with the familiar [illegible] from Verdi's Attila.

Mr. [illegible] with the same assistants, to give two more concerts in the Music Hall, tonight and to-morrow night.

Oratorio begins next week. In successive [illegible] the Symphony Concert, we are to have Judas Maccabæus on Sunday [illegible] Elijah on Sunday [illegible] in succession, and the Handel and Haydn [illegible] numbers, [illegible] will be [illegible] by Mr. Lang, who [illegible] at the Organ. Several new singers will lend [illegible]. In Judas Miss Anna Whitten, who [illegible]

[illegible] the soprano solo with Miss Houston, Mrs. C. A. Barry [illegible] Mrs. Cary, takes the contralto, Mr. James Whitney the tenor, and Mr. H. Wilde [illegible] the bass. In Elijah, besides Miss Houston, Mrs. [illegible] will make a first appearance as soprano; contralto, Mrs. Barry; tenor, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, who is said to have greatly improved; basso, Mr. J. F. Winch, for the first time as Elijah, and Mr. H. Wilde. A full orchestra of course.

Mrs. Rous, whose card appears in this paper, is an English lady of character and culture, the widow of a distinguished professor and man of science in [illegible]. [illegible] unquestioned talent, and [illegible] both [illegible] organist [illegible] in the English service and as a teacher of the piano forte.

Baltimore.—The Messrs. Chickering & Sons, with [illegible] liberality and public [illegible] musical culture, have presented one of their noble Grand Pianos to the Academy of Music of the Peabody Institute of the city [illegible], [illegible] of which our [illegible] Mr. Southard, has been called to preside. The Baltimore American which publishes the correspondence between the donors, Chickering and the Trustees of the Academy, also speaks well of the [illegible] Mr. Southard has already made [illegible] an orchestra for the winter concerts.

Philadelphia.—We have already alluded to the awakening interest in classical music in the old Quaker city. Not content with all these fine Chamber Concerts and the Orchestral entertainments [illegible] half popular, the music lovers there have set to work to [illegible] establish something solid and permanent, like our own Symphony Concerts. The Bulletin [illegible]:

We have alluded already to the fact that a movement was on foot to establish a Philharmonic Society in this city, and we are glad to announce that the efforts of our best [illegible] in this direction have been crowned with success.

The Philharmonic Society has been inaugurated in accordance with the oft-expressed wishes of leading [illegible] and professors for the establishment of a Musical Association similar to that of the same name in New York and London. Its primary object will be the dissemination of pure taste, through stated performances of the highest order of compositions, vocal and instrumental. [illegible] for the formation of [illegible] never be [illegible]. [illegible] prepared to [illegible] the public with four concerts [illegible] three rehearsals before each concert, at Horticultural Hall, with a highly drilled and well appointed orchestra of not less than fifty performers on the stage, elsewhere not [illegible] and to intersperse the concerted music with brilliant solos by first class artists, both vocal and instrumental.

The first concert will be given on the evening of Saturday, January 16, 1864, with the following programme:

Symphony in A, Op. 92. Four movements. Beethoven. Orchestra.

Overture, "Lurline" . . . . . . W. V. Wallace.

Concerto, [illegible] in E minor (First movement) . . . Mendelssohn. Orchestral [illegible] [illegible]

Concerto, [illegible] Larghetto and [illegible] . . . Chopin. Mr. C. [illegible] Jarvis.

Overture, "Jubilee" . . . . . . Von Weber.

Conductor: Mr. W. G. Dietrich.

The first Public Rehearsal will take place on Friday, January 1st, 1864, at 3 o'clock p. m. at Horticultural Hall.

The following gentlemen are officers of the society: Chas. R. Dodworth, President; [illegible] Von Amsberg, Vice-President; Ludwig A. [illegible], Treas.; C. A. Brown, Librarian; Directors—Charles H. Jarvis, [illegible] H. Cross, R. L. Albrecht, Carl Wolfsohn, C. Master, C. Plagemann.

The third orchestral matinée of Messrs. Kemp & Hassler gave the Philadelphians a fine hearing of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," which appears to have received [illegible] and [illegible] admiration, and [illegible] a repetition. It was preceded by Nicolai's overture to Joseph; Gounod's Elegie played by W. Stoll [illegible] and a Serenade for Horn and Flute [illegible]. The two movements of Schubert's unfinished Symphony [illegible] in a [illegible] first [illegible] for a [illegible] concert. Mozart's Jupiter Symphony was the [illegible] feature of its fourth matinée, followed by a [illegible] Waltz, a [illegible] dance and march, [illegible] the [illegible] of which the [illegible]

The most attractive of these afterpieces was the violoncello solo by Mr. Frederick Hennig, who made his first [illegible] Philadelphia at this concert. Mr. Hennig played with much elegance, grace and feeling, and [illegible] his audience. He is destined to be very popular, and he richly deserves to be. His execution is without an equal in this city, and no musician who has ever had a superior [illegible]. His playing is characterized by breadth and strength of tone, by unusual power of expression, by delicacy and finish, and by a depth of passionate feeling, which belongs only to a genuine, devoted artist. Mr. Hennig will play at Mr. Wolfsohn's concerts during the winter.

Another of these concerts began with Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," but as if ashamed of its own boldness, proceeded to sing songs to Catherine in the shape of a Cornet solo, a quadrille from La Grande Duchesse, [illegible].

NEW YORK.—The Philharmonic Society gave its first public rehearsal on the [illegible], when Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," and Gade's [illegible] were performed—the latter for the first time in America.

During the coming season six concerts will be given, each preceded by the usual three preliminary public rehearsals. The following orchestral works will be performed under the direction of Mr. Bergmann.

The following soloists have been engaged [illegible] at the [illegible] concerts: Mme. La Grange, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Miss Adelaide Phillips, [illegible], Herr Ole Bull and Mr. [illegible].

Mr. Edwin Booth, the distinguished tragedian, has consented to deliver the soliloquy of "Manfred" from Byron's poem, and the choral parts will be performed by the Liederkranz Society.

For the rest, I would state that Offenbach has it all his own way in New York; this last vulgar fashion not only is in the channel of its own opera, but keeps all other music in abeyance. Thus, the Evening Post says:

It is confessed in musical circles that the season just opened will hardly be as brilliant as some of its predecessors. The genius of concert [illegible] public. Fate proves that the public prefer the glittering gaiety of the Opera Bouffe to the more serious attractions of the concert room. The management books of the [illegible] show that they cannot [illegible].

Of the concerts thus announced a majority are by local musicians and are less pretentious, [illegible] depend for patronage upon their personal friends. Their offer programmes, however, [illegible]. At Mr. Mason's concert at [illegible] Hall, [illegible] Mme. La Grange and Mr. W. J. Hill [illegible], Mr. Kopta will play the violin, and Mr. Mosenthal will play the organ, besides the pianoforte performance of the beneficiary.

On Saturday night the Arion Vocal Society will give their annual concert at Steinway Hall [illegible] and an orchestra [illegible] under Carl Bergmann. [illegible] the [illegible] of the society [illegible] Kopta will be the solo violinist, and Mills the pianist.

On the evening of Wednesday the 14th there will be a concert at Steinway Hall, for the benefit of Miss Henrietta Markstein, a little girl pianist [illegible] whose [illegible] will marvellous as we are told. She will be supported by other performers of ability.

Next Sunday night Ignaz Pollak, a baritone who has been frequently heard in the concert room, will give a concert at Steinway's, where, indeed [illegible] are [illegible] of vocalists of voice—excepting the Philharmonic Concerts—will take place. He has secured the assistance of [illegible] to sing. Here to play the violin and Mendelssohn the German tragedian [illegible] recitations. The combination is a good one, and will probably bring out our Teutonic citizens in large force.

A concert is talked of for the evening of the [illegible], for the benefit of the family of the late [illegible]. Theodore Thomas gave a concert last night with two orchestras, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and announces a similar concert in Steinway next Tuesday night.

It is expected that the Harmonic Society will give the usual Christmas performance of the "Messiah" this year, though no special arrangements have yet been made. Brooklyn [illegible] at its Academy of Music a performance of the "Creation." Miss [illegible], Mr. Simpson and J. R. Thomas having been engaged as the leading singers.

As yet Mr. Harrison has made no announcements as to the expected series of oratorio performances at Steinway Hall, but probably later in the season Mr. Harrison's oratorio will speak. In the meantime, there are signs of renewed vitality in the two leading choral societies of this city—the Harmonic and the Mendelssohn; but there is no apparent possibility of the fusion of these two respectable but limited associations into one choral society which would be worthy of the metropolis.

Mr. Maretzek's plans for a brief opera season of [illegible] would lead a foreign reader to suppose that New York was a provincial town, as [illegible] operatic artists. His company, with the exception of the prima donna Cellini, whose [illegible] array of fourteen lyric performers, who will attract audiences through their [illegible] rather than their novelty. It is rumored that Mme. Kellogg [illegible] the season will be prolonged, and that Auber's latest opera, "Un Jour de Bonheur," will be produced, together with something new from Flotow's pen. Next week Verdi, Beethoven and Meyerbeer will be the singing composers, and an opera will be given on afternoon night in Italian and German all [illegible]. Mme. Rosa, whose powerful [illegible] favorable [illegible] the opening season at Pike's Opera House will have [illegible] place of [illegible] here by Eugene [illegible]. Harrison [illegible] Maretzek's troupe, and it would be unreasonable to ask for [illegible]. We wish for Maretzek every possible victory in his forthcoming [illegible] battlefield.

In the line of French Bouffe there is little to say that is new. At the French Theatre Mr. Grau finds that "Geneviève" is drawing crowded houses, and that among the singers who have been less widely [illegible] the leading names. Mlle. Desclauzas attracting special attention [illegible] the purity of her [illegible] and the charming quality of her voice. This lady is the wife of [illegible] the violinist, and it is a measure that adds greatly to the success of "Geneviève." The [illegible] has become a popular favorite, and with the [illegible] quartet and the Tyrolean trio, is the most admired part of the opera.

Mr. Bateman's troupe are [illegible] this week the "Belle Hélène" at Pike's Opera House, Tuesday night [illegible] a double success [illegible] Mme. Sapo. Next week the "Barbe Bleue" will be revived, with Irma and Aujac in their original [illegible]. Offenbach's "Perichole" is promised to that establishment. The opera bouffe will remain at [illegible] the change of programme up to the middle of [illegible]. Talking of opera bouffe, we may add here that [illegible] [illegible] an English translation of "Barbe Bleue" at the New York Theatre.

CHARLESTOWN, MASS. The Advertiser of our neighbor city tells us, what hosts of musical friends [illegible] will be glad to know, that

The Concert in Union Hall [illegible] evening, complimentary to Miss Nagle, the leader of [illegible] the [illegible] Boston, was a great success, the hall being crowded—the audience being composed principally of Boston [illegible]—and the gentlemen and ladies whose names appeared on the programme [illegible] their parts in a satisfactory manner. The ladies who appeared were Miss Addie S. Ryan and Mrs. D. C. Hall, and Messrs. Barnabee, W. W. [illegible], G. Carr, J. W. Cheney, T. P. Ryder and Professor Walluch.

I.

CREATION OF SOUND (Completed).

It is necessary to distinguish between the impression and the sensation of sound. The impression results from the communication of a material movement to a part of the nervous system: the sensation refers this movement to the presence of an external object. The first is entirely passive, the second can become an education more or less complete, can become blunted or refined by force of will. In the midst of a concert what are we interested to distinguish? The different instruments, violin, flute, clarinet, bass, &c.; like we soon learn to do. In every conversation it is important to us to refer the voices to persons: habit renders this labor easy to us. But if it is absolutely necessary to us to recognize sounds of different origin, it is of no use to analyze a particular sound into all its component notes: such analysis would only bring trouble into our sensibility. If we had by force of attention acquired the privilege of decomposing all sounds, the perpetual illusion would prevent our perceiving the phenomena of the outward world so easily as we do by hearing.

The manifold impressions made upon the nervous system by a note escorted by its harmonic partials (overtones) are thereby blended in a single sensation. To the analysis of the mixture we must bring a very great attention, a certain power and tenacity of abstraction to detect in it the different impressions that compose it. This can be done, however, and the experiment is interesting to the philosopher and to the physicist. Strike, for example, Do on a piano where the hammers have been raised so as to give the strings full freedom. Listen attentively: you will not be slow to hear two upper notes, scarcely perceptible at first, but soon growing more distinct (namely, the Sol of the octave above and the Mi of the double octave). These notes, which one would say were echoes, answer to vibrations three and five times more rapid than those of the fundamental Do. The vibrations of double and quadruple rapidity, answering to the octave and the double octave, are much more difficult to follow. To make the experiment more easy you need put into the ear beforehand, by playing it separately, the harmonic note which you are seeking to hear.

One might believe, since one hears best that which he wishes to hear, that there is some mental illusion in this phenomenon; but such incredulity is easily undeceived. Take a fine metallic string: in vibrating it will spontaneously divide itself into two, three, four, five parts, to give all its harmonics: the points of division are called nodes and remain immovable in the relative movement. Between two nodes is placed what is called a belly, the last point where the vibratory force draws the string as far as possible out of its primitive position. This being understood, let us suppose the string in full vibration, so as to give all its harmonics (and it can be made to yield as many as sixteen at a time); it will be easy to suppress certain ones of them: it will do by lightly touching with the finger or with a pencil those points of the string where theory has already told us that the bellies corresponding to those harmonics must be found. If I touch the middle of the string, all the harmonics of the odd numbers disappear; if it be touched at one third of its length, the numbers 3, 6, 9 will fall. One can vary and modify the experiment in infinitum: one presses more or less lightly upon that point of the string which he wishes to smother; one can make the sound pass by insensible gradations from the fullest timbre to the thinnest one; and in this experiment the ear follows all these metamorphoses with docility. It no longer perceives the harmonics after they have ceased to sound: these therefore have an absolute reality quite independent of the subjective sensibility of the observer.

The stringed instruments are the richest in harmonics: at most of the wind instruments, and above all in the human voice, it would seem difficult to hear them. Yet Rameau had already very clearly detected them in the voice of man.* He had remarked that the fundamental sound is escorted by two acute notes, the fifth of the octave and the major third of the double octave. Indeed it is to that great musician that we owe the expressions fundamental sound and harmonic sounds. He endeavored to base the whole theory of music upon this phenomenon of multiple resonance and to deduce from it the formation of the gamut and even the principal rules of harmony. His work unfortunately was destined to remain imperfect: for, without mechanical means for analyzing sounds, he drew too little of harmonics and, in the lack of reserve, was obliged to grope his way in the darkness where his profound genius and rare delicacy of perception urged him. Helmholtz has completed the imperfect work of the French musician: the instruments furnished him now guides to harmony: the analysis of sounds becomes now as easy as precise as it was before vague and difficult.

Organ builders for a long time had felt the necessity of swelling the harmonics of the fundamental notes. Organ pipes by nature are compared only poor in overtones: so when it is desired to give a good deal of brilliancy and power to a note, they reinforce it with a special accompaniment composed of from three to seven pipes often tuned to the unison of the harmonic consonances, that is to say, an octave or a fifth apart (so likely they also use the third). This ensemble of pipes which sound together is called a furniture, in mixture, and is employed in the full organ. It gives to the ear the sensation of a single note, the lowest one of the assemblage: the acute harmonics or overtones only have the effect of furnishing, sweetening the sound of fullness and brilliancy. Up to this day the theory of the furniture had remained an enigma for the physicists as well as for the organ builders. It is very well explained since Helmholtz has demonstrated experimentally that every musical sound is analogous to the sound of a furniture or mixed stop in an organ.

The knowledge of the overtones necessarily remained sterile so long as they were taken for fleeting echoes, irregular so faint that the ear need not concern itself about them. We now know that they play a preponderating part in the phenomena of sound; that they give it quality, what may be called color. One makes but a grey and colorless sound (musique grise) with instruments which only give a fundamental sound, as membranes, tuning forks, strings whose are dampened in their movement, large stopped organ pipes; but we get colored music from reeds freely vibrating, from organ pipes reinforced by mixtures. Each sound then is full of harmonies, and the impressions come in a crowd upon the auditory apparatus.

One is surprised, when he sets to work to study the overtones, to find them numerous so numerous; one must not doubt them, because we hear some difficulty in distinguishing them, for the difficulty arises due to the weakness of the vibrations than it a phenomenon at once physiological and psychological. We hear no difficulty in referring different sounds to different instruments: but it is not enough to say that experience has permitted us to distinguish them: we must also consider that a secondary material circumstance aids us there necessarily. On different instruments, the same note has variable phases of intensity: it leaps out and slowly dies away on a piano; it sends a swell out in a wind instrument; on the violin especially when the music is melodious, a series of little interruptions add a certain nasal quality. Each instrument and each voice moreover follows a particular rhythm in the notes, here rapid, light and airy, there slow and solemn. The intervals differ also: sometimes the notes leap boldly, sometimes they mount and descend deliberately. In short, in every instrument the production of sound is accompanied with little characteristic noises. The bow of the violin frets and scrapes; the air whistles round the apertures of wind instruments; the dry noise of the keys of a piano mingles with the vibrations of the strings. Our sensibility is habituated to all these shades, and these circumstances explain why we hardly fully distinguish their sounds, even in unison. But let the finest harmony be two notes produced in physical conditions absolutely identical, at an octave apart from one another for example, and the ear usually will think it hears only the lowest sound: the upper note will be lost, swallowed up in the lower note.* The natural ear has little aptitude for separating the harmonic notes; so it constantly disagrees with the best musicians in the decision by an octave. The famous violinist Tartini, who had pushed the theory of music very far, has carried too high by an octave a great many tones which spring from the concurrence of two sounds.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony."

In 1830 Protestant Germany was preparing to celebrate the tercentenary of the "Confession of Faith" presented by Luther and Melancthon to the Emperor Charles V at Augsburg. It was almost inevitable that Mendelssohn, then but twenty-one years of age, should take advantage of such an opportunity for conspicuously employing his talents and extending his fame. At all events he set about writing a symphony intended for performance at Leipsic on the occasion of the festival. The work was finished in good time, except at Weimar (where Mendelssohn was staying on a visit to Goethe just before starting for Italy) and—there is no reason to doubt—sent to Leipsic [illegible]. But [illegible] the composer to alter his plans. The proposed rejoicings greatly irritated the Catholic section of the population, and to such a height did party spirit rise that disturbances took place in several of the principal cities. These eventuated in a general forbidding that the fête should be allowed to take place quietly, and therefore no one knows what [illegible]. Mendelssohn withdrew his symphony that it could be heard under more auspicious circumstances. Nearly two years and a half passed by, however, before a favorable opportunity presented itself. In the meantime the work had been rehearsed at the Paris Conservatoire, and for two months the composer waited in expectation of an immediate performance. To this suspense the advent of the cholera put an effectual [illegible], and the honor of first playing the Reformation symphony eventually fell to the lot of Berlin, where it was given in November 1832 at a concert for the Orchestral Widows' Fund. Immediately after being produced with so much difficulty it was withdrawn for reasons that can at this time of day only be guessed. The balance of probability is clearly in favor of Mendelssohn's dissatisfaction with himself and his consequent [illegible] never found [illegible]. But [illegible] the composer refused to publish the symphony, the conduct of those [illegible] in keeping it back for twenty years is far more inexplicable. In the one case there is a choice of [illegible], in the other, so far as the public can see there are no reasons at all.

Seldom has a symphony been sketched under more favorable conditions than those Mendelssohn enjoyed in the present instance. Designed to commemorate a leading event in a great religious revolution, the scope and plan of the work were too obvious to be mistaken. There could be no plan of [illegible] fulfilling the intention than by depicting the downfall of the old and the rise of the new faith. But this was not all. Each faith had its representative music, which supplied the composer with a fine amount of expression. On the one hand were the ancient and [illegible] melodies of the Catholic Church; on the other the vigorous and stirring [illegible] which the text of Luther wonderfully turned to account. Here were materials ready for use not likely to be overlooked by any writer of a "Reformation" symphony, much less by Mendelssohn, whose [illegible] was on a par with his musical genius. The work, it need hardly be said, is precisely what these considerations would suggest. It depicts the rise, progress and final success of rebellion against the ancient faith, personifying both the old and new order of things by help of distinctive melodies clearly contrasted with each. Hence it follows that the meaning of the symphony is far more clear than is usual in cases where it has been left unexpressed in words. Only one movement, as will presently be seen, is at all ambiguous, and even that is susceptible of an interpretation having probability obviously on its side. [illegible] interest with which the work is heard we need not stop to show.

The symphony is divided into three parts and subdivided into seven movements, of which two belong to the first part, one to the second, and four to the last. It opens with a short Andante (in D major) written so as to resemble [illegible] the character of its construction. By this Mendelssohn [illegible] to depict [illegible] as yet undisturbed by doubt or agitated by conflict. What then follows [illegible] very soon makes clear, for the [illegible] an ancient Catholic response [illegible] breaks in upon the otherwise [illegible] harmony of the strings with striking effect. The phrase thus used in symbolizing the old religion is thoroughly characteristic, and once heard can hardly be forgotten. Its announcement, however, does not disturb the peaceful progress of the Andante, which [illegible] as calmly as it began. But it [illegible] only an ominous quiet before the coming storm; for the opening bars of the second movement (an Allegro con fuoco in D minor) [illegible]. It is hardly possible to mistake the [illegible] to which the subject has been treated by the composer. Listening to the music one [illegible] to some extent in the [illegible] of the struggle, while the ever-recurring Catholic response [illegible] above the din and turmoil sounds like the war-cry of a host. The first and second subjects of this movement are finely contrasted, and [illegible] of the most masterly order, but [illegible] of the ancient faith. Heard [illegible] suggested throughout, it becomes more and more vigorous towards the close, so that it would command peace with the [illegible] of authority. But the effect is altogether the reverse. The "coda" of the movement is the climax of a struggle, and one of the most stirring "crescendos" in the whole realm of music brings the Allegro to a passionate close, leaving the result in doubt as to what the final result will be.

The second part of the symphony—an Scherzo in B flat with Trio in G—has been variously interpreted. But if there be room for dispute as to its meaning there is none as to its beauty. [illegible] a little child that [illegible] understand and appreciate them as [illegible]. In the simple [illegible] might be found [illegible] the composer's meaning. It [illegible] to look upon the fields and flowers, and to listen to the songs of birds [illegible] the peace and rest denied elsewhere. But whatever may have been Mendelssohn's [illegible], the Scherzo will be popular as much for the welcome contrast it affords as for its own inherent charms. Both at the Crystal palace and St. James's Hall it was received with every mark of approval.

The last part of the symphony opens with an Andante in G minor, which seems to embody a prayer for supreme guidance in the midst of much doubt and many trials. The theme—broadly phrased and wonderfully expressive—is given to the violins, and forms a very striking feature in the work. No more [illegible] music was ever written, even by Mendelssohn himself. [illegible] it to be a prayer, the answer is not long [illegible] reference to the second subject of the Allegro, the reason of which is not very obvious, the [illegible] solo gives out (in G major) the representative melody of the Reformation,—the well known Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott. (It may be worth while to note here that the composer has adopted the original form of the chorale, and not that made familiar by Bach and Meyerbeer). The grand old air, thus heard alone, and on one instrument, comes like a response from the skies, and its introduction is perhaps the most impressive that could be conceived. Presently the wood wind join in harmony, followed by a portion of the strings, which thenceforward accompany the progress of the melody. At its close an Allegro vivace commences (also in G major), having the theme of the chorale for its subject. The musical embodiment of a power faith is broken up in this short movement, and distributed among the instruments, snatches of it being given out now here now there, while the violins keep up an agitated movement. At last the [illegible] the Finale,—an Allegro maestoso in D major of such a character [illegible] one can with difficulty believe it to be the work of a mere youth. In this movement Mendelssohn evidently designed to [illegible] the triumph of the Reformation over all obstacles. These we may take to be represented by the first subject, a fugue on a capital theme, the appearance of [illegible] by another subject full of the confidence of victory. At the [illegible] of the latter Ein' feste Burg reappears, and thenceforward constantly asserts itself. Occasionally it seems to be lost in [illegible] again with [illegible]. This result is never long doubtful, not even when the fugue enters a second time in a more elaborate guise than before, for the chorale triumphantly [illegible]. The advance of the fugue like the charge of the "Old Guard" is the last [illegible] of the old faith and the [illegible] at once begins. Grandly and with ever-increasing interest, it is worked up till at length the [illegible] orchestra joins in delivering the opening bars of the Lutheran tune, and thus proclaims the success of the reformed belief.

Church versus Stage.

BY [illegible]

Many of your readers who have a predilection for theatre going were probably considerably startled upon reading in the newspapers of a few days since the report of a meeting of a "Ministers' Union" at Chicago. The reverend gentlemen composing this assemblage made a sweeping attack on the opera and the drama, as the very hot-beds of sin, where the devil had spread his most splendid lures to tempt the eye and ear and [illegible] of men; and where his infernal servant [illegible] his [illegible] from a [illegible] or gambling hell. They presented a terrible picture of the [illegible] of speech and actions encouraged on the public stage, of [illegible] restaurants [illegible] lives of those who follow the profession. One gentleman stated that he was very fond of music and enjoyed hearing an opera, but was compelled by these serious considerations to forego the pleasure; another denounced in no measured terms the modern drama [illegible] certain plays as wholly unfit for Christian eyes [illegible] and concluded by making an appeal to the [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] generation of future exhibitions of a like character.

Now these terrible charges, if wholly sustained, may well cause thinking people [illegible] to refrain from countenancing the drama by their presence and support; but if false, then have these gentlemen deliberately [illegible] wickedly inflicted an injury on the thousands who [illegible] by the [illegible] of the dramatic profession, besides awakening the doubts of professing Christians, and provoking anew the strife of "narrow-mindedness" and "bigotry" from those being without the fold of the church.

It seems certain that the charges are partially true, because it cannot be imagined that reverend gentlemen would denounce certain dramatic entertainments by name, to the manifest injury in reputation and purse of all therein interested, unless fortified by actual surety. Let us then admit a priori that these charges are partially proven, which we can the more readily concede in the cases particularized, by the concurrent testimony of the most respectable of the laity, and proceed to examine whether there is sufficient warrant for their general denunciation.

Here some of you [illegible] may be inclined [illegible] the sentiment pervading this paper, thinking that "ever since its origin, intolerance and old-fogyism have been the bane of the church, and consequently warnings like the Chicago manifesto have long since ceased to have weight with people of liberal minds; that the clergy with few exceptions, have ever opposed obstinately every progressive movement in the world of thought and knowledge; that, almost invariably, arrayed as they are [illegible] about [illegible] and ceremonies, their [illegible] the world at large." Now this [illegible] the language and belief of a large number of people, and it may perhaps [illegible] just as much [illegible] against the drama [illegible] at all [illegible] since the charges have been preferred against the [illegible] it behooves us to consider them soberly and endeavor to ascertain the nature and extent of the evil and then to apply the remedy.

We must for the sake of having [illegible] that amusement, if innocent, is good for man, [illegible] conducive to his happiness; that the precious capacity for happiness has been bestowed on man by his Creator, and that consequently innocent amusement has Divine sanction.

Now no one can say that he has not frequently heard old [illegible] upon the stage, and applauded by people who could be [illegible] class [illegible] and who would be ashamed to [illegible] but no one will, on [illegible] charge [illegible] connection [illegible] when he considers that [illegible] simply [illegible] to the walls of that [illegible] the performers are tempted [illegible] the audience to the tempter. On the hypothesis that the drama is not inherently evil, the remedy for [illegible] is a plain one, and if those Christian people should make it [illegible] entertainments [illegible] the [illegible] of public morality.

Those very persons, clergymen and [illegible] who [illegible] from attending theatres and upon [illegible] are generally persons of great moral and social weight in the community; their countenance and support would [illegible] a healthy reaction in the tone of theatrical performances and in the taste of theatre-going people. [illegible] if we pay the actor as well for being decent as he is paid for being scurrilous, then [illegible] perhaps we [illegible] has been incapable of understanding and [illegible] the great populace from the evil ways which the Chicago [illegible] denounces.

Are the lives of singers or actors so [illegible] disreputable? We can answer [illegible] many of those who consider the theatre a place to be shunned that such is by no means the case; that there are many bright examples of [illegible] of the first order joined to every christian and social virtue—that even many of those [illegible] and gentlemen are professing christians, supporters of [illegible] and foremost in every good deed. And we may truly [illegible] them while we [illegible] more than condemn. Only less steadfast fellow professionals, when we recollect the [illegible] with which we have [illegible] them, and especially that instead of extending to them the hand of sympathy and friendship, we coldly exclude them from the social circle; or, if we admit them to our homes, is it with a reservation—as a dainty gathering in of skirts from contact with an unclean thing—that is far more galling than utter neglect.

Since, then, there are actors of respectability, let our reverend clergy at Chicago and elsewhere by way of experiment, countenance instead of denouncing them, and they will be surprised at the [illegible] with which good as well as evil example will spread among singers and actors, as well as among other classes of the community.

Is the influence of the drama[*] necessarily evil? To this it may be answered that besides the hundreds of [illegible] who have written plays in which are found only the most ennobling and [illegible] language, over three hundred English clergymen, divines, have engaged in dramatic composition. It may be urged further that it is well [illegible] the clergy of the [illegible] of theatrical appliances in [illegible] the hollow emotions of the human heart [illegible] and have availed themselves of [illegible] the [illegible] word of God which they preach with the gorgeous framework of architectural display, paintings, statuary, sublime music and solemn ceremonial; that they rehearse their discourses and practice the arts of elocution and gesticulation. Even more, from the dawn of [illegible] Greece religious dramas have always formed a portion of public worship, and in our own day [illegible] the Roman Catholic church has not disdained to avail itself of the drama as a means of depicting more vividly and impressively scenes in the life of our Lord, than could be accomplished by the aid of mere speech.

Thus, then, the drama is recognized as a great power that [illegible] and [illegible] frequently does exercise a malign influence upon mankind, but which can be diverted to the very best purposes!

That the drama and especially the opera as an amusement, often [illegible] that in the [illegible] great [illegible] raise the question whether [illegible] of Chicago are any less [illegible] any other result, than that following Don Quixote's [illegible] Why Mr. John Bartlett's book of "Familiar Quotations," shows [illegible] of phrases in common use among the people—expressions which for good or bad have reached their hearts and brains, and are influencing their thoughts and actions—Shakespeare has furnished nearly three times as many as the Bible.

Now are the representations of [illegible] opera [illegible] or [illegible] of them good influence? The latter by those who attend the theatres (and they only can testify) will be claimed [illegible] Who has not [illegible] "Macbeth" that the terrible punishment of remorse which crime entails is conveyed far more vividly in the tragedy than pulpit eloquence could portray it?—who has not wept and felt [illegible] by the touching picture of [illegible] in "Lear"? Who has not felt [illegible] during the grand prayer in the last scene of "Faust"?

——"Ah!" says the clergyman, "that is a point against the drama. Prayers are sung and spoken by actors for money [illegible] what they are saying, save the desire to express and please their audience. It is simply blasphemy to pray in such a place."

To this it may be answered, that God is everywhere; that all places are alike sanctified unto Him; that the clergyman alike with the actor, rehearses his prayer and is paid for its delivery; that any petition to God, or indeed any use of His name, in other than a reverential sense and for a good purpose is blasphemy, but it is no worse in the theatre than in the pulpit, in the walks of daily life or in our literature. And in judging of this matter, we cannot perceive the material difference between the moral novel, in which the hero or heroine is allowed to pray with the full concurrence and hearty commendation of both clergy and laity, and the dramatic representation of the same story, except that the latter must increase the wholesome effect which is supposed to emanate from the former. In many dramas prayers are introduced upon occasions when the [illegible] or moral of the story does not justify them, and such [illegible] ought to be shunned and condemned by all christians—both [illegible] and actors; but there are on the other hand notable instances where prayer especially when clothed in solemn music, has [illegible] in the theatre. Let those who doubt this, watch the [illegible] depicted on the faces of an [illegible] audience during the delivery of Marguerite's prayer in the last [illegible] of "Faust." But the present tendency of the stage is at any rate towards [illegible] degenerating. We have [illegible] of that [illegible] style [illegible] of the [illegible] effect—[illegible] as "Dixie," [illegible] "Not for Joseph" [illegible] together with [illegible] people go, and [illegible] of feeble resolution they yield to the [illegible] of advertisements and go again "just to see what [illegible] play is like," and each time that [illegible] they go and return disgusted, yet each time [illegible] and their presence contributes to the success of the vile thing.

If the people who in despite the warnings of your own and of other independent and respectable journals have persisted in going to see the "Devil's Auction," "[illegible] Life," "White Fawn," or the "Black Crook"—if these people, I say, had not put their money into the coffers of the managers, "just to see for themselves whether it was as bad as represented," [illegible] of the recent disgraceful [illegible] of plays could have kept the stage long enough to repay the expense of their production; and if people would refuse to hear in French [illegible] to hear in English, the whole [illegible] of opera [illegible] would be swept out of existence!

Though [illegible] people and people with a predilection for [illegible] go to see these plays [illegible] purpose to correct the [illegible] merely by [illegible] the theatre altogether—thereby yielding the victory to their adversaries. If the [illegible] had remained around the person of Louis XVI instead of seeking safety in disgraceful flight, the horrors of the French revolution would have been avoided!

Here then is the chance for our Chicago friends and their brethren to work real good—to correct the abuses of which they complain. They have only to charge gallantly [illegible] see the "Black Crook" or La Belle Hélène [illegible] possibly [illegible] "Faust" or "Macbeth." Or why should they not [illegible] congregations, as [illegible] New York [illegible] has done

* Whenever we use the word drama, we [illegible] as well as [illegible] plays.

What a contrast [illegible]

"It is good to have pleasure, if it be harmless! Let us enjoy the sweet music of 'Fra Diavolo,' or 'Masaniello' or 'Crown Diamonds,' or 'Martha.' Let us laugh at 'Crispino' or the 'Barber.' Let us have reproduced before us in the semblance of reality the tragic story of 'Marie Antoinette,' the wily statesmanship of 'Richelieu,' the homely Knickerbocker legend of 'Rip Van Winkle'!"

The conclusion which we have endeavored to establish by our arguments is this:—

That the drama, and especially the opera, has an immense influence on the people and [illegible] the people make [illegible]. The influence is so great that opposition [illegible] is perfectly [illegible]. Its present tendency is bad [illegible] be made effective for good ends, and the only way to make this change is to remove the [illegible] in the place in the community [illegible] the theatre [illegible] the clergyman, the doctor and the teacher [illegible]. Trust [illegible] christian gentleman should be trusted, and he will [illegible] prove his title to the position. For the rest—Support enthusiastically all good plays and condemn unreservedly all bad ones.

Rossini.

[From the London Daily Telegraph, November 16.]

"It will be poor Rossini's turn next," [illegible] Auber's remark when he learned that Meyerbeer was dead. The Frenchman [illegible] healthy [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] the [illegible] of the German Meyerbeer, [illegible] four years ago [illegible] Rossini was [illegible] older and Auber [illegible]. Although Berlin was the natural head-quarters of the Prussian General Music Director, he was so frequently attracted to Paris and lingered there so long [illegible] preparations to bring out his long expected "Africaine"—when he was [illegible] Queen [illegible] upon the stage—that he [illegible] in Meyerbeer a second [illegible]. The words of Auber were verified at last; and while he himself was still hale and hearty, the great [illegible] fell upon his friend; on Saturday night it came to be "poor Rossini's turn."

Rossini's life has been to all appearance so happy as it was long. Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, Nov. 8.—The following are the [illegible] performed to-day at the Cirque Napoléon:

Symphonie en ut majeur	Mozart
[illegible]	[illegible]
Ouverture de Concert, op. 71 [illegible]	J. Rietz
[illegible] "Lohengrin" [illegible]	Meyerbeer
[illegible]	Mendelssohn
Ouverture.—Allegro appassionato [illegible]	[illegible]

It is a noteworthy fact that Mozart's three finest symphonies seem to have been composed in one year (1788). They are those in E flat, and G minor, and the above mentioned in C major which (and particularly the finale) is written in the happiest vein.

Had M. Pasdeloup wished to offer a practical demonstration of the difference between genius and talent, he could have done no better than to place the Rubinstein Adagio as it was placed—immediately after this Symphony.—

The prelude to the last act of [illegible] is the finest piece of orchestral composition contained in that work. It was encored,—as it almost always is at the Opera.

The Midsummer Night's Dream music is too well known to need description and I will merely say that, whereas an American audience would have encored the Overture or the Wedding March, the Parisians only payed this tribute to the Scherzo, which is by all odds the finest part of the music.

The most important musical event which I have to record is the re-opening of the Théâtre Lyrique, which took place a short time since. I have in a former letter stated that M. Pasdeloup would have admittance in the public; counter-current against the operetta, but it remains to give the details. We are to have here [or soon] Mozart's Idomeneo, Gluck's Armide, Wagner's Rienzi and Schubert's Four Nuits-also Gluck's Euryanthe, &c.; also Sig. Grisar's Les Porcherons de Pressac, &c. That Cherubini's Deux Journées, Gluck's Iphigénie, Halevy's Fée aux Roses, Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto, Weber's Oberon; and some of the novelties.

Among the artists of the troupe are Mons. Schroeder and Monjauze, with Mmes. Miolan, Montrichy, Trey and Mallie.

Nov. 18.—On the facade of the new opera house, between the busts of Auber and Rossini, stands that of Rossini. The inscription underneath is preceded by the date of the composer's birth (1792) and is followed by a blank space.

This blank may now be filled, for the illustrious Maestro died on Friday the 13th inst. at Passy.

For several years past his health has visibly declined, and during the present autumn it became such as to prevent his coming to Paris according to his usual custom. During the past fortnight, his illness became such as to occasion the gravest doubt of his recovery—so that the announcement of his death gives rise to sadness, rather than to surprise.

It is not always that a composer lives to reap the reward of his genius—but assuredly this has been the case with the author of Guillaume Tell and Il Barbiere di Siviglia—names familiar to our mouths as household words.

In fact most of the works on which he rests his renown were written and famous forty or more years ago—and during the latter half of his life he produced (excepting the Opera Tell) little that may be deemed worthy of the hand which penned the immortal "Barber."

Within the past few weeks the Opera has certainly has been on the boards both at the Théâtre Italien and at the Théâtre Lyrique.

At the Grand Opera we have had "Hamlet"—"Herculaneum" and last, but not least, the reprise of the Huguenots, which took place on the 9th. The representation was by no means a brilliant success. Madame Lovello, the Valentine, sang tolerably. And the tenor Villaret, being unable to appear the role of Raoul was, at the eleventh hour, taken by another singer M. Colin—who, however, acquitted himself well. Mme. Sasse too was admirable as Valentine.

The programme of M. Pasdeloup's 5th Popular Concert is fully occupied: two Symphonies. Haydn's in D and that of Schumann in B flat.

The B flat Symphony is the best of Schumann's works. It cannot be heard and comprehended without the reflection that the true rank of the composer is not yet justly recognized, not only by the public but by musicians and critics.

This must not be by no means uncommon; and has its parallel in the fact that the greatest of poets is, to-day comparatively unread and unknown in his own country. But happily the greatness of Robert Browning and of Robert Schumann are established facts—which in their own good time will not fail to assert themselves.

It does seem strange however that, notwithstanding all the noble things which Schumann said and wrote in Beethoven's favor, the followers of the latter composer should be foremost in opposing the success of the former—yet such is too often the case—as though every word added to Schumann's fame were a detraction from that of Beethoven! I am glad to learn that Boston will during the coming season follow up its good beginning by presenting to the public Schumann's Symphonies in D flat and E flat.

New York, Nov. 30.—On Wednesday evening 18th, Miss Christine Markstein, a young pianiste of some eleven years made her debut in Steinway Hall. She was assisted by M. Wenzel Kopta (violin), Mme. De Lussan and an orchestra of 25 under the direction of Carl Bergmann.

Miss Markstein, who exhibited a commendable self-possession and nonchalance, belongs to the long list of prodigies, and they are to be deprecated. The system of forcing immature talent upon public attention is unwise, in that it is unsatisfactory to the listener and very injurious to the performer. The young lady however showed some ability in execution which future application will of course develop more fully. This was a portion of her programme:

Overture "Oberon,"	Von Weber.
Capriccio, brillante op. 22	Mendelssohn.
Prelude; "Sérénade, Fughetta, Sonate	Mendelssohn.
Grand Fantasie (Piano) Lucia	Tongroth.
Rhapsodie Hongroise	Liszt.

Miss Markstein's strong point is force; her weakness are slow playing and an indiscriminate use of the pedals. In the Capriccio—which was of course her most ambitious solo—she displayed remarkable accuracy in keeping with the orchestra, and her self-composure was of great service in her. Each of her selections was heartily encored by the large audience.

Mr. Kopta played two solos with his usual excellence. One of these "The Witches' Dance," seems to be revived as a concert attraction, for Mr. McGuffin had been playing it at a concert in Irving Hall on the same evening and Camilla Urso was to do likewise on Sunday evening. This may—I suppose—be regarded as a legitimate result of the Ole Bull mania which raged so fiercely last winter.

On Saturday evening a "Memorial Concert," to the late Edmund Remack took place in Steinway Hall. The attractions of the programme were ushered in all forms; there were piano solos, violin, and organ solos, harmonium duets, recitations and a little operetta by Offenbach (I think "Lischen and Fritzchen,") in which Mlle. Tuarie and M. Dardignac were the artists. The programme opened with the Marcia Funebre from the Eroica Symphony and terminated with the organ solo from G. W. Morgan and some I should prefer not to tell. Madame Agatha States, Mme. Lesley, Sig. Errani, Sigs. Randolphi and Pollak, Messrs. Mills and Phillips, pianists, a part of Theo Thomas' orchestra, and the Mendelssohn Union contributed, in their several capacities to the success of the entertainment, which must have resulted in pecuniary benefit to the family of Mr. Remack. I had nearly forgotten to say that two little children—Jennie and Willie Henry—played in very neat and pretty style a duo for piano and violin, which was received with unbounded applause.

The short season of Italian Opera which was commenced on Monday evening last will be continued during the present week. Thus far the works represented have been Il Trovatore, Fidelio, Faust, Der Freischütz, Stabat Vespri and Ernani.

Mr. Thomas has issued the prospectus for his Symphony Soirées and the scheme includes many novelties besides works by the better established authors; there will be much music of the "future" school—or as "Marcellus" calls it, in playful reference to the prominence therein given to the triangle—the geometrical school.

Nov. 30.—On Thursday evening (Thanksgiving) Mr. F. L. Ritter gave a concert in Steinway Hall; the programme was selected entirely from his own compositions and he was assisted by Mr. Kreissmann (of your city) the N. Y. Harmonic Society, Mr. R. J. Connolly and an orchestra of about 40. I quote the programme:—

1st. Symphony in A major.
2. Six "Songs" (from the Persian).
Scene and Aria.
Overture to Othello.
3. "Sufi" Songs (from the Persian).
95th Psalm.

The Symphony was first publicly produced on Saturday evening, May and during our Musical Festival, and impressed me most favorably upon that occasion. this impression was confirmed by hearing it a second time and I can only repeat my opinion—given in my letter of May 16th—that "it was unquestionably the most thoroughly fine symphonic composition which has ever been written on this side of the Atlantic." Its excellencies are musician-like treatment, careful instrumentation and some fine harmonic changes. Its faults are an occasional lack of continuity, a tendency to Mendelssohn ideas (particularly in the Minuet and Trio), and the impression that the closing movement has nothing whatever to do with the rest. Drop in its faults the Symphony is enjoyable and well worth hearing.

The Songs were well sung by Mr. Kreissmann and some of these are very beautiful in construction and form they are modeled after those of Schumann and Franz, but are at the same time original: one of them—called "Ich denke dein"—has a charming accompaniment which was gracefully played by Mr. Connolly.

The "Othello" Overture—performed at the 3d Philharmonic concert last season—seemed most effective this time and was played in very good style.

The 95th Psalm—first produced some two years ago—is as nice musical and effective, but its performance was not sure last, and it was evident that the chorus had not been sufficiently drilled and why will the tenors of the Harmonic Society persist in falsetto in such an atrocious way? Can nothing be done to tone down their vocal obstreperousness? I would suggest a reform in that direction.

Mr. Ritter's audience numbered perhaps 1000 and was I know attentive, and I hope, appreciative.

On Saturday evening occurred the 1st Philharmonic Concert with this programme:—

Symphony in E flat, "Eroica"	Beethoven.
Aria, "Lascia ch'io pianga"	Handel.
Miss Adelaide Phillips.
Overture "Hamlet"	N. W. Gade.
Song, "Che faro senza Euridice"	Gluck.
Miss Phillips.
Symphonie Fantastique (1 parte)	Berlioz.

The Eroica, with its interminable Marcia Funebre, was well done by the immense orchestra, and the Scherzo was quite above praise; the crescendos and diminuendos were carefully graduated and the general effect excellent.

The "Hamlet" Overture opens with a subdued march in C minor and subsequently is succeeded by a strong vigorous Allegro in the same key: a lovely episode in A flat is soon introduced and this seemingly reappears in E flat: there is also an ominous little fragment in D major—taken by the wind instruments—but the same disappears and again comes the Allegro, which is worked up to a climacteric conclusion, and then—after a pause—comes the slow subdued march which terminates with a long roll of drums and an immense crescendo, and thus ends the Overture.

The Handel Aria—which Miss Phillips sang at the 4th Brooklyn Philharmonic last winter and also at Mr. Morgan's concert—depends for its effect upon well sustained tones and correct expression: and Miss Phillips—need I say—sang it most admirably and also Gluck's charming "Che faro." Miss P. deserves to be complimented for her wisdom in having selected solos devoid of the vocal opportunities for vocal gymnastics, and dependent upon the voice and not the execution of the vocalist.

The Academy was crammed with people and the audience heard—for a Philharmonic one—with unsound decorum: again must I enter my protest against the abominable chandelier in the centre of the building; by its numerous flaring gas jets incalculable injury is done to one's eyes.

At the 3d Concert—on Jan. 30, 1869—will be given a Symphony in E flat by Father Haydn, Overture to Rosamunde by Catel, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem "On the Mountain." Camilla Urso and S. B. Mills will also appear.

Theo. Thomas commenced—last evening—a series of Sunday evening Concerts, to be given in Steinway Hall. I append a portion of the first programme:

Overture, Euryanthe	Von Weber.
Andante from "Surprise" Symphony	Haydn.
Scherzo, Sonq "[illegible]"	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	Mozart.
Overture, [illegible]	Wagner.
Marche Triomphale "Robert"	Meyerbeer.

Miss Cummings sang twice and the Dale Hess Brothers—who made their début at the Second concert—played three fine solos [illegible], while Master Willie Hess executed a violin solo in promising style.

The instrumental selections were—as will be seen—very attractive and were played with the vigor, earnestness, and perfection of detail so eminently characteristic of Mr. Thomas's well trained orchestra.

The short season of Italian Opera closed on Saturday with a matinée; the works performed during the week were Don Giovanni, Il Trovatore, Ballo in Maschera, Robert le Diable, La Traviata and "Sicilian Vespers." It will be observed that during the fortnight's campaign six of Verdi's works were performed, while only one of Mozart's had that honor.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 29.—To our already numerous musical societies, we have recently had another addition by a split in the old "Maennerchor" Society. They have separated into a new "Maennerchor" with Mr. Andres as leader, and, the "Orpheus" with their old leader, Mr. Barus, at the helm. Both of these Societies have recently appeared in concerts with better programmes than in old times, following in this respect in the van of our Caecilia Society. Last night the "Orpheus" gave a concert with a chorus of some sixty members, an Orchestra, and Mr. Barus as leader. The programme, which I subjoin, was quite promising.

Overture to [illegible]	Rich. Wagner.
Nachtlied	[illegible]
The Soprano sung by Madame Marie Smith [illegible] by the [illegible] and Messrs. [illegible] and R. J. Gerick.
Ad Saxo Vino	Mendelssohn.
Sung by Mr. Adolph [illegible].
Fair Ellen	Max Bruch.
The Solo parts sung by Mme. Henriette [illegible] and Mr. Max Bruch.
Overture to Euryanthe	C. M. v. Weber.
Air from Faust	Gounod.
Sung by Mme. Henriette B. [illegible].
Scene and Finale from Lohengrin	Wagner.
The Solo parts sung by Mme. [illegible], Miss Mary [illegible] and Messrs. [illegible], Max Bruch, R. J. Gerick and B. Krom.

The execution, I last mentioned [illegible], was, exceedingly poor. We all have, unfortunately, here been made accustomed to incorrectness in many of our most pretentious home concerts: but this last performance really capped that sort of experience and was apt to make a quiet well meaning listener somewhat rebellious. Mr. Barus generally receives so much praise that he can afford to be told that, if he continues in such a way he will entirely jeopardize his musical reputation. Neither can it be said, that there is any excuse in this instance, for the old everlasting apology, that "Orchestra rehearsals cost so much money" will certainly not hold good—for in any case where high Art is involved—unless the want of sufficient rehearsals produces a slovenly performance almost from beginning to end. Better a thousand times to hear no Orchestra, and instead pianoforte and character in the performance.

I mention these things here because I suppose them to be of general application, and that Cincinnati is not the only city where such experiences are had.

The Concert given by the new "Maenner Chor" Society some weeks ago, was a pleasant contrast to the above performance, or rather mis-performance of their old brethren. Mr. Andres had insisted upon good, thorough rehearsals, and had chosen fine compositions of a simpler kind, and the result was a really satisfactory and enjoyable concert.

The Harmonic Society promise a concert in January. They have a fine chorus, and it is only to be hoped, that it will be more thoroughly drilled than is their wont. The fact is, amateurs need to be reminded all the time, that a chorus of the largest size, and the finest voices "in the world," without precision in the performance, produces a very poor artistic result.

Second Symphony Concert.

(Friday Afternoon, Nov. 27).

Reformation Symphony, in D minor, (Posthumous)	Mendelssohn.
Andante and Lagrima—Scherzo—Andante—Andante and Allegro: On Luther's Choral.
Scherzo and Aria—"[illegible]" from "Fidelio," Beethoven.
Overture, "[illegible]"
Military Symphony, in G	Haydn.
Adagio and Allegro—Allegretto—Minuet and Trio—Presto.
Songs:
a. "Lato da sei"	Mozart.
b. "Wanderlied"	Schumann.
Miss Annie Wilson.
Ladies' Overture	Weber.
[illegible]

These concerts do not begin to lose their hold upon the truly music-loving public; and that public still shows increase in numbers and interest. The Music Hall was almost crowded. Our principal Conductor fresh and strong from his successful European tour was very warmly welcomed as he came upon the platform and resumed his baton. The orchestra, slightly reduced in the string department for a couple of concerts by the absence of the Quintette Club, was yet in good force and discipline, so that few passages in the first programme suffered in the treatment. It cannot be said yet, to be sure, that all the wind instruments are irreproachable, which few they are in any orchestra, even at the Gewandhaus ("we heard it with our ears") the horns do sometimes announce and sound coarse; but we may certainly congratulate ourselves upon a marked improvement in the wind especially in the bassoons, which one can single out and follow with delight, and in the wood reeds generally.

The Reformation Symphony was clearly rendered and, on the whole, made more impression than it did in the Festival last May, when it was played from for the first time. Still in spite of all the London eulogy and the elaborate and for the most part clear and sensible synopses of its ideal plan and course of thought which lead our critics there have written (several of these we printed in January and May last, and we give another to-day) we find ourselves confirmed in the opinion that these critics greatly overestimate the work, and that it cannot take rank as an equal with the other Symphonies of Mendelssohn. No doubt he knew what he was about when he withheld it from publication. The fact that it had been in performance once, in Berlin, two years after its composition; that little or nothing is known of the impression made there or is there is any record of any kind during the author's life, who was then only twenty-three, and that he forbade the publication, would seem to be strong proof that he did not regard it a success. The subject was a great one, the possible plan a happy one and clearly traceable as these London interpreters have shown; but the musical consistency and clearness and felicity is less apparent, more in parts. The musical would seem rather to contain than to embody the poetic thought; the musical would be an after-thought, not vital with and one with the poetic thought, as body with the soul, produced by one creative act. The young genius of twenty-one had written the Fairy Overture and the Hebrides, and other fine imaginative creations, but was he equal yet to such a task as this? The ambition was noble, the interest in the theme sincere; perhaps if he had waited until after he had composed the Psalm and the Hymn of Praise, he would have been ripe and fully furnished to essay a theme so great as this. This we can imagine to have been his own reflection afterwards.

Still the Symphony is interesting, and one much that music in it, as it could but have. What we find most unsatisfying is the peculiarly symphonic portion, the first movement. It seems to us confused, uncertain somewhat in its sentiment, lacking musical decision and straightness, with an almost sickly wavering between major and minor, and so hung such a murky cloud over the conflict which it describes, that you account it doubt and dimness entirely, see no throughout (more than an instant) feel no quickening thrill as heavenly lift of a great hope beyond—the far off dawn of the same day that shines and glows throughout the darkest struggle in the Joy prophet Beethoven.

The Symphony describes the conflict of the old faith and the new: the old is typified by an old Catholic response, pure and imperative in spirit, of "Thus saith the Lord"), which rings through the first movement; the new by the Lutheran Chorale: "Ein feste Burg," which triumphs in the Finale. But nowhere are the two themes brought together face to face; nowhere in the one movement is there if we so assert farness of the types giving to the other, which is perhaps a not insignificant comment on the enthusiastic unity of the work.

In the short Andante prelude, however, we have the whole situation sketched, only with a somewhat puzzling lack of musical continuity or development as from a germ. First five bars of shadowy antique organ counterpoint; then suddenly you wonder what it has to do with it, a more hostile outburst of all the reeds and brass in full chords, also for four bars;—perhaps this means the dawn of the new, soon swallowed up in clouds and hypocrisy. Again the organ strain and trumpet strain, on another key, and soon, with burning of parts in harsh discord the old Response clashes into the midst of the more hopeful stream; then gets the whole lead and proclaims itself in thunder tones, once, twice, in so many such time followed by a sweet prayerful strain of the strings ending pianissimo on the dominant. The Allegro, now in D minor with its stern repressive main theme, against which all the turbulent elements murmur and rebel and are more loud and shameful second theme, which somehow does not seem to tell enough—and heard all through the din, one high note from one in this movement, one that, the indefatigable tones of the old Response like the shout of the despotic leader is certainly striking and suggestive; a tremendous struggle; but as we said before, it is too confused, too gloomy to be in enlivening edifying; and it appears to end with the crushing out of hope, after a too lengthy back to a *d*e saive recurrentary drowning of peace (the little strain that ends the prelude).

The charming piece of all, a perfect little poem in itself though out of all obvious connection with the rest, is the Scherzo, which is happy and fresh as any Minuet and Trio of Haydn,—came as delightful ecstasies when played so nicely as it was that day. Perhaps sufficient explanation is found in the turning away of the weary mind from hopeless battle of opinion and disorder to the sweet scenes of nature, of a simple unambitious rural life.

The short Andante, which preludes to the Finale, has been well termed a prayer. But it is a very wintry sigh and prayer: another Song without Words, and not much unlike many in Mendelssohn, is what the melody is sung by the violins, and nearly all the accompaniment is done by strings. With just a hint of the cheerful second theme of the Allegro, here made to enter in D major, the sub-bass holding on while a high Horn hint the, sings the first notes of the Choral, the reeds soon joining and making harmony. How this goes on and takes possession of the whole, how an angelic Horn solo and fragments of the old tune passed from instrument to instrument; how splendidly the Allegro Maestoso leads into grandly ablaze over the tutti so we can well be preëxemplified therein. I see a fugue theme sets in (you may know it by modernity with the first verse of "Though shadows be longest" (Ein' feste Burg) and struggles with the Choral until that was the field and finds at length is better said than we could do it in the articles to which we have alluded.

It comes to us, and this is all we have to add, that this Symphony must be regarded as wholly unequal in form, and as consisting really of only two parts, with a gap refreshing interlude between. The first part, in which the foe of the old faith predominates, includes the Allegro with its short Andante prelude. The second part, the triumph of the New, with its Lutheran Choral, has likewise its short Andante prelude, the song without words, whose prayer for peace is answered. Suppose the curtain dropped between the two, while for interlude and recreation we are vouchsafed that happy Scherzo.

The new thing of the programme was the romantic Overture by Bennett (Op. 20), of which Schumann wrote, when it first appeared in 1839: "The only unfortunate thing about it, as it seems to me, is the name Die Waldnymphe. I knew one could wound a composer more than by criticizing his child's name. In truth I began to regret it: I now feel what he was after and we may suppose that he hit upon the name Wood Nymph in case of making a companion piece to his earlier overture 'The Naiads.' But the title is by no means so thoroughly appropriate or favorable to the work. I would have preferred the general name of Overture pastorale as according of the rest. Bennett's consideration seems, 'the Overture is his wondrous delicacy of slender articulation like he is the thorough enough about at one of his dimes, breathes ever purest, clearest poet life." Bennett is a piano player par excellence and, however skilfully with the orchestra, he knows also how to deal with various instruments; and his favorite instruments always looks out from his orchestral compositions."

"The Overture is charming; in fact, Spohr and Mendelssohn excepted, I know no living composer who so nearly and fully possesses of coloring, has the pencil so at his command as Bennett. Even the fact that he has reworked and not this much from those 'we see, especially forgotten in view of the masterliness of the whole, and it seems to me that never before has he so given himself up to himself, as in this work. One by one measure by measure, when I see him work from beginning to end! Instead of those harmless happy sensations in the productions of others, how closely, to every all is knit and how finely worked! Yet the Overture has been reproached with its great breadth; it is the most more so than with all of of Bennett's compositions; in he is a way the Andante down to the end in detail. Moreover its frequently repeats the same thing, and even note for note after the middle of the movement. But try to all it with one remark: it will not get it: it so pays to be benefited by advice when he has thought stands fast and wants to be pushed aside."

To us the overture, so well rendered as it was with its many niceties and difficulties, appeared to justify the good things here said of it. It is indeed a full core tone-poem, and romantic in the best sense. Yet as it has not the qualities that strike and take by storm, its just beauties may not have been so generally appreciated as they would be upon more acquaintance.

The quaint and homely old Haydn Symphony (Oxford?) years ago has come familiar here than it has been of late, must have been enjoyed for its hearty healthiness, as well as its perfect grace and naturalness, the art concealing art; the easy, elegant, fine and complete finish of its phrasing with a few words in another tongue. Why called "military" we do not know, but if he has in mind to to the in those barracks of the military pleasures of the camp could he have done it better? The formal prelude; then the first allegro theme, as if a Melody sharpened by a high octave by the flute pair of oboes, and the gay and humorous second theme; those with all their wheelings and counter-marches, shall into a form and their imitations, so labyrinthine and so clear the same figures ever repeated and yet ever with a difference, all imply an so brisk and busy are not gentle—you can almost see the trim little heroes with their gay uniforms and cheery faces. Here the arts of counterpoint and its quiet become spontaneous natural form; and there are happy surprises, sudden changes of key the to at wide a the fantastic shade. More sportive gayety and social abandon reign in the Minuet and Trio and the Finale presto; while the marvellous second movement is full of military pomp and warfare. Musing of the din of battle as a whole a trumpet signal. How much Haydn does with happy little thoughts, never labored, and very simple means! The very qualities, which in a long work like the "Cremona" grow monotonous and wearisome to us, while the moderate forms of such a Symphony never cease to fascinate.—The three theme: lightly colored scoring. Weber overture after it, was so laid at once the difference between the older and the more modern instruments art, the former so intense and sensuous, the latter so much more highly spiced, with borrowing new means to enhance effect, and therefore having a great advantage in the last appeal to a miscellaneous appetite, as young audiences. Yet Weber had also ready its groove, and the Jubilee Overture is a grand work, closing a concert fitly some nearly two hours these. As we grow older we somewhat bluest music lovers we come back with a fresh, sweet joy to Father Haydn.

Mrs. WESTON made an excellent impression verifying all that we had heard of her fine culture and her (?) all of the good repute to which she had been mounting abroad. She was fairer than the faulty her quiet manner, lady-like demeanor, her womanly simplicity of dress, her unaffected, earnest and absorption in her music. In the Recita from Fidelio she had a most crowning task before her. Not without some trembling did she carry the first notes. But we were soon reassured that she had voice, sweet, plentiful and sympathetic, a mezzo soprano, of good compass, and of power enough for the delivery of such grave scenes. And she had well earned, he not of the the, she had and the style were admirable. It was honest, noble and expressive singing, womanly and full of feeling. In refreshing contrast with the false pathos by which so many public singers court success from and arouse us it, so-few. It was expression without exaggeration, prompted from within. It was musical in the sincere sense, and all were pleased to find there an artist real as a singer, one who sings for music, who will sing for us on good occasions, and whom the cheap successes of Italian opera will not be likely to ever lure us. For plainly her direction is that of pure, high Art, and her tone is of good sense. We dare to say she rendered in that piece all the power she will need. There was the drawback of natural timidity at the start; we could also feel her voice at the full not after a week or two of interruptions, which may account for her telling one or two of the highest among tones with some little difficulty; nor were the low tones quite so clear and positive as the rest. Moreover there was enough commanding in the very first of here pure of her command of the consciously any singer. Yet all this passed for its undeniable a joy as a performance the impression of which as a whole was so genuine. Her singing of the solo 'with Mozart melody went to a Pace in, and the Psalm song of Mendelssohn had equally its characteristic treatment.

ORATORIO.—The Handel and Haydn Society opened their season with two of the noble work, the same as we last Saturday and Sunday evenings, on a supplementary special Thanksgiving. The former's Handel choral Judas Maccabaeus. We are of those who do, and find it among the most, welcome of Handel's Oratorios. It is so heroic, fresh, fibrous and genuine; such hearty contagious movement of the tenses to the thought with each; richness vividly, and doing the old tongue so finely. It's triumph is a happy tone and is noted itself and its well brief exhaustive treatment. Few oratorios where so little trial yet more and it fail and so much alive and formal, and old fashioned! It is the heroic oratorio par excellence. It ought to be words, and we often wondered why it was not sung more, being the Master's favorite.

The performance on Saturday was hardly of average excellence. Some of the singers, notwithstanding, were steady and good in but in, where, voices hesitated to ring, so is the now a middle pace of "Sound an alarm," "Father of Heav'n," &c. We were struck now by some slackness and a lo high soprano passages, and comment in the tenors, compared with any recollection of the Festival chorus. The overture was well played but too often the orchestra were rough and overloud. Perhaps it was much owing to the fact that Mr. ZERRAHN, who was so welcomed back as he before, bore his bad health and the long voyage so that he hardly be in that which brought him back to us, had not had the rehearsing of the work.

The solos were more fortunate. Miss HOUSTON is uncommonly good voice (much more so than we thought she had gained more in power than sensation, gave each of the women's recitatives with true dramatic character and force, and sang the Air "From mighty kings" well greatness. Miss RYAN has not changed her warm, sonorous voice, nor her artistic style and change of course. She excelled in a tone the part of the Air "Father of Heaven," which opens the third part, then other deep melody of pure chaste beauty, we had to see told appreciated. And the Duet, "O lovely Peace" was received so has.

Miss ADDIE GRANT, on here fresh, bright, one tingling voice, as we have said before on this more to say of her brilliant things like in its one or other of deep can rise in. She is a good singer in her way, executing all smooth ly firmly and distinctly, giving the tones well and firmly one a note, her slighting one, though she is rather careful a manner. She had in Judas a number of pieces suited to her, that is "Sound the alarm," she conveys the Toccata with an enthusiasm exuberant and freedom than any of here, her Largo like voice seems sincere, and indeed, in Mr. WHITNEY brings and renders it (?) powerful when he may do so greatly the same parts being: the guests was a pie so letter is so tender. In that air "Sound an alarm," it was a great victory. Mr. WINCH, as Simon, sang with a fine has had a good between his bass voice and so the tones delivery.

Elijah went much better in the chorus: some of which seemed never more superb, though the of the fiery chariot, I say at superior yet, too here was a nowhere the usual lack of safety shading. The orchestra again rough and noisy. Miss L. M. GATES shared the soprano solos with Miss HOUSTON and in "Hear ye Israel" gave proof of a fine fire the voice of large range more now, and may I see later on. This she up seem is more deep, we hear in of (?) we can hardly say. Miss HOUSTON and Mr. RUDOLPH, both sang well, of passionate note and fervor. Mr. J. F. WINCH made the first time the part of Elijah, such of a new so accurately, with a fine low bass tone but lacking a style throughout was M. Rudolphsen. Mr. WM. J. WINCH has large voice, an undoubted success. His voice and manner were so proper for the tenor solos in Elijah. He must have credit in a considerable amount after, with no air of pretence.

CHARITY CONCERT.—In aid of a charming Concert given by the Orpheus Club with Mrs. KEMPTON, Mr. AREY, and Mr. LANGDON at Chickering's Hall, of an excellent charity, the Temporary Asylum for Discharged Female Prisoners. Next time

Our correspondent, in another column, tells us of the concert given by that earnest and accomplished musician and composer, Mr. F. L. RITTER. The Weekly Review pays the following tribute to his "Hafis" songs, and to the way in which they were sung:

Great interest was felt by the audience in the Hafis songs, as well as in their delivery by Mr. August Kreissmann from Boston. These songs are written in the true vein of Robert Franz, and perhaps show more of the real talent of the composer than anything else he has written. The words are most beautiful specimens of Persian poetry, once made famous in Germany by Daumer's translations, of which most likely Mr. Ritter availed himself. The composer shows in his illustration poetical sentiment, true adherence to the meaning of words, and yet a fine appreciation of what is due to form. They are by no means easy as to execution, but Mr. Kreissmann showed himself the true artist in overcoming the difficulties of conception as well as in conveying the meaning of the poet and composer. He was entirely successful with the audience; so much so to such extent that an encore of one of the songs was demanded and partly responded to by him.

As to the Philharmonic concert, instead of calling Beethoven's Eroica funèbre "incomparable," as our correspondent does, most of the critics ascribe this impression to a more likely cause. Thus the Sun says:

Different ideas prevail as to the time in which the dead march that forms the second movement should be taken. There are those who think that a lighter expression can be given to the idea by retarding the time as that the sentiment of the movement is changed, and instead of being a march it becomes a sort of dirge — rendered "In Memoriam." Mr. Bergmann is evidently of this way of thinking, and led it accordingly with excessive slowness. The movement is marked for the metronome at 80. It may possibly have been led in that tempo, though we doubt it. Certainly it lost in force by being taken so very slowly, and the theme was almost as it were frayed out, so inherently did the notes follow each other. In the middle fugued passage the effect was especially noticeable, and one felt a nervousness as to how the voices would come out, and an inner consciousness that it must absolutely have been intended to be played faster.

The same writer speaks thus plainly of the "programme Symphony" by Berlioz:

This is a work so full of eccentricity, so utterly defiant of precedent, so extravagant and grotesque, and the composer of it is so persistently lauded as a great genius, that we give it more than a passing notice. Without an explanatory key it would be impossible to understand. The composer has furnished us this key in the story of a young musician who, being in love and lost in despair, seeks to poison himself with opium. He takes an under-dose and instead of dying has visions, and these visions form the subject of this symphony.

This singular jumble of volcanic passion, delirious anguish, jealous fury and religious consolation, shepherds' songs, thunder and funeral march, is sufficiently extravagant when considered in plain prose; when it comes to be represented by a large orchestra, the effect becomes truly startling to the American mind. Frenchmen have got used to it. Lamartine, Rousseau, George Sand, Eugène Sue, and their novels, have quite accustomed them to it.

For our own part we like neither the thing expressed nor the manner of its expression. The ideas lack continuity and grace and well defined form, in the first place. In the second the orchestra is not well kept together and bizarre combinations of instruments are made, the effect of which is far from agreeable. It would be very easy to go into detail in regard to this, but we only instance the case of the duet between the oboe and the kettledrums as illustrating what we mean. The effect of the whole piece is fragmentary, and while it is exceedingly interesting as a study of curious tone color, of which Berlioz is a wonderful master, we fervently hope that this school of composition will ever prevail to any great extent. The march to execution, however, was full of fine somber orchestral color, and the mystical figures sinister and melodious which yoke one as we say that there was something a little sepulchral in having three funeral marches in one evening — that in Beethoven's symphony, another occurring incidentally in the overture to Hamlet, and the third by Berlioz, just referred to.

BALTIMORE.—The Academy of Music of the Peabody Institute, under the directorship of Mr. L. H. Southard, had its first Orchestral Concert on the 6th ult. It was given in a hall described as being much like the old Boston Melodeon in size and general effect. Mr. Southard had the hearty cooperation of all the best musicians of the various theatres, &c., of the city, and seems to have succeeded in organizing out of these materials a permanent orchestra of 40 instruments (11 violins, 4 violas, 4 'cellos, 4 double basses and a full complement of wood and brass). The Concert was considered a complete success, the fruits of thorough rehearsal showing in the execution of the following programme:

Symphony in C minor, Op. [illegible]	N. W. Gade.
Overture to Der Freischütz.	Weber.
Pastorale and Allegro Scherzo. Op. 61.	Mendelssohn.
The Tenor part by F. [illegible] Student of the Academy.
Concert Aria, Ah perfido! Sung by Mrs. Holland.	Beethoven.
Overture to Semiramide.	Rossini.

The second concert, to-night, offers Symphony in B flat by Haydn, Overtures to Freyschütz and Le Siège de Corinth, &c.

PHILADELPHIA.—On receipt of the news of Rossini's death the Germania Orchestra changed its programme and gave a Rossini Matinée, of which the Bulletin says:

The programme was well arranged to exhibit the lamented composer's various styles. The overtures to the Italiani in Algeri and La Gazza Ladra gave the graceful, dainty ideas of his youth, while the overture to William Tell showed the mature brain of manhood engaged upon work that was at once heroic and majestic. Selections from the Stabat Mater, Semiramide and the romance from William Tell as a cornet solo for Mr. C. Harr, made up the rest of the Rossini selections, and thanks to Messrs. Wm. Stoll and C. [illegible] the great delight they afforded in the duo from Semiramide on the clarinet and bassoon. The noble Funeral March from Beethoven's Eroica symphony was happily introduced in the programme and well played by the orchestra which was, throughout, well directed by Mr. Wm. G. Dietrich.

BUFFALO, N. Y.—Mr. James M. Tracy, pianist, and the "Tracy Quartette" of Rochester gave a Soirée lately at St. Cecilian Hall. The piano pieces were Weber's Concert-Stück, Beethoven's Sonata, op. 26 (that of the marches with Variations — the Marcia funebre &c.) and a Sonata in C by Weber. The quartets were vocal, from the familiar German part-song collections.

Rossini.

[Among all the [illegible] notices, whether of the French or English press, we have seen nothing better, probably shall see nothing better, than these few words in the London Musical World, evidently from the heart and pen of its editor, Mr. J. W. Davison.]

On Friday week Gioacchino Rossini died, aged 76.

"Neither the sun nor death," said Rochefoucauld, "can be looked at steadily;" and while the grave has hardly closed upon his prey, we are as much as unwilling to write [illegible]. Generally [illegible] that a [illegible] come. Meanwhile [illegible] more [illegible] may be suggested by the [illegible] which has taken away the Pesarese man.

The giants of music are almost extinct. One by one those who made the first half of the century forever famous have departed, and now Auber stands alone [illegible] of his race. Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Schumann, Meyerbeer and Rossini have successively been stricken down by the enemy which comes equally to all. It would be bad philosophy to assert, even as Swift, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] death," but these [illegible] of [illegible] leave a blank behind. They do not, however, affect us alike. Of the composers just named some were called away in the midst of work, having to lay down the pen and leave the task unfinished at the bidding of a needless fate. In these cases submission is hard. We think of what might have been had Mendelssohn or Schubert lived on through twenty years, how he would have enriched the world by many a beautiful and imperishable creation. To our mind premature is [illegible] and [illegible] to many [illegible] by a [illegible] in the ordering of things [illegible] by very few. But in other cases we can be more reconciled. "After labor cometh rest," and there is [illegible] which analogy everywhere makes us recognize in the falling asleep of an old man whose life's task has been accomplished. So, now that Rossini having lived six years beyond the "three score years and ten," and done all the work he had to do, rests from his [illegible] [illegible] — we had almost said as happy — [illegible] [illegible]. Such [illegible] in the quaint language of Jeremy Taylor — "[illegible] sweet and [illegible] [illegible] from a pleasant and [illegible] tree." Thoughts of this kind, however, do [illegible] to qualify [illegible] sense of the great gap which Friday week's event has made. While stay Rossini was [illegible] between us and an heroic epoch, a hero who played the part of a hero. More than that, his presence was a glory to the generation that has lost him. He stood among the contemporaries of his later years like a grand old oak among a crowd of saplings, or like Jupiter among the minor gods. Auber apart, there is nothing now but saplings, and the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to themselves.

We can look with complacency at the long life just terminated. It was an example of the unbroken sunshine in which some favored mortals bask. Almost without effort Rossini became famous. From the time when he wrote his first opera to the day when Guillaume Tell consummated his work and he retired, he trod an easy and flower-strewn path. Content with the success that attended it, he lived in lifelong enjoyment of whatever it brought, the centre of a circle which included all that is famous in literature and art. A career such as his excites no strong emotions, and possesses no absorbing interest. It can be looked at as one looks at a pastoral landscape, or at the summer sea. The harmony but the charm of [illegible] such a companion are afforded. Personal [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible], are [illegible], but Rossini's life [illegible] upon the ideal. Most other men who achieve greatness have trodden a thorny path now and then to fall, and at any [illegible] [illegible] of many. In such a case the [illegible] in proportion to the power the more of [illegible] to the [illegible] of victory. But of experience like this Rossini had little or none. There were few obstacles to his way, and those he encountered fell down before him like the walls of Jericho before the [illegible] of trumpets.

Happily in keeping with his history are the works which will perpetuate Rossini's memory, generally throughout all his career. His music reflects the joyousness of the life he led. Bright, sparkling, even a [illegible] [illegible] the grief of a child behind which laughter [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] all always be the case, as is the [illegible] of happiness. Such harmony between a composer's works and his temperament is [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] of Haydn, of Beethoven and of Mendelssohn, for example, stands out a study in their respective creations. Art is the better for this, because served by many minds, it can but acquire variety of [illegible] and becomes as universal as is humanity itself. Leave us to others [illegible] grave and serious thoughts. Rossini [illegible] because he could not help it, as some are [illegible] [illegible] music. Let those who [illegible] highly of him [illegible] that account, think [illegible] also of the [illegible] which has made laughter as [illegible] as tears, and far more pleasant.

The great old master is dead, but not his influence. They sang a Requiem over his body on Thursday in the Madeleine, pleading in accents [illegible] by himself for "eternal rest." In one sense however, there can be no rest, except as other [illegible] Rossini. Ages to come, the composer who has just disappeared from our midst, will exert an active influence over the minds of men. They sang a [illegible] "[illegible]" on his tomb, [illegible] on his works.

Rossini.

The death of a man who has influenced his art and his times like Gioacchino Antonio Rossini cannot be passed over with merely a passing record of the fact. The illustrious musician departed this life on Friday night the 13th inst., at his apartments in the Rue de [illegible] d'Antin.

The biography of Rossini has been written over and over again, although no really valuable life of him, accompanied by a judicious critical survey of his works, can be said to exist. The latest and most comprehensive — Rossini, sa vie et ses œuvres, by M. Azevedo — which originally appeared in a French musical journal called Le Ménestrel, and has since been published in a volume by the proprietors of the journal, for the benefit of the "[illegible] des Artistes Musiciens" in France, [illegible] has a sort of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] which over [illegible] [illegible] to Rossini, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible], however, [illegible] to [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] panegyric. [illegible] of his [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] the dazzle with the [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible].

Rossini was born on the 29th of February, 1792, at Pesaro, formerly belonging to the Papal States, now a part of the kingdom of Italy, and consequently had in his 77th year. We shall hardly be expected to give a critical [illegible] of his life and works, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] early [illegible] [illegible] before his commencing his [illegible] [illegible] career [illegible] [illegible] of Armida's [illegible], which [illegible] with a better opportunity. Rossini's [illegible] and [illegible] was [illegible] [illegible] — [illegible] favorite pupil of the famous Padre Mattei. His first opera La Cambiale di Matrimonio, produced at Venice in 1810, is now forgotten, while [illegible] [illegible] than a quarter and the [illegible] [illegible] of M. [illegible] — Demetrio e Polibio — given at Rome a year later. Nor have more than a very few pieces from [illegible] seven operas (including L'Inganno Felice and Pietra del Paragone) escaped oblivion. These works, which were composed in [illegible] 1812, or thereabouts, and [illegible] [illegible] no solid representation almost beyond [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of production. [illegible] of his first [illegible] his fortune was Tancredi, brought out during the Carnival of [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] in 1813, and this was followed some months [illegible] by L'Italiana in Algeri, at [illegible] [illegible] theatre, in the same city and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. By these two works [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] had shown himself equally a master of opera seria and opera buffa. His style was now thoroughly matured and what has ever since been recognized as the school of Rossini — a school which has found many disciples, good, bad, and indifferent, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Tancredi and L'Italiana in Algeri [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible], [illegible] fresh and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Aureliano in Palmira [illegible] [illegible] — which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] the famous [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Il Turco in Italia [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. I Turco was followed by an opera seria called Sigismondo (Venice, 1814), [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Madame Pasta in another [illegible], has survived, and Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra (Naples, 1815), which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] little affection for the Italian school, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Rossini's best music. [illegible] [illegible] Elisabetta had an enormous success, and is specially [illegible] [illegible] as the opera in which Rossini did not [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] or [illegible] by the [illegible] themselves. That overture [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from Aureliano in Palmira to the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Il Barbiere di Siviglia, the original overture to which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Among the singers in Elisabetta were Manuel García, the famous Spanish tenor, the father of Malibran, and Isabella Colbran, who afterwards became Rossini's wife. The Don Carlo [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Elisabetta was followed by Torvaldo e Dorliska (Rome, 1815), an opera [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Torvaldo e Dorliska by Il Barbiere di Siviglia (Rome, [illegible]) — the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] opera buffa, which was hopelessly condemned on the first night, but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] perhaps the most popular of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mozart's Don Giovanni. The history of Il Barbiere and its first performance, when on a [illegible] of the second act could be heard [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] opposition made by the friends of Paisiello [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] themselves in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Il Barbiere [illegible] [illegible] followed by La Gazzetta (Naples, 1816 — Teatro de' Fiorentini), Otello (Naples, 1816), Cenerentola (Rome, 1817), and La Gazza Ladra (Milan, 1817 — La Scala). Here [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. To these succeeded Armida (Naples), Adelaide di Borgogna (Rome), Mosè in Egitto (Naples), Adina, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], Ricciardo e Zoraide (Naples), Ermione (Naples), Edoardo e Cristina (Venice), La Donna del Lago (Naples, 1819), Bianca e Faliero (Milan), Maometto Secondo (Naples), Matilde di Shabran (Rome), Zelmira (Naples) and Semiramide. Among the foregoing some two or three are wholly unknown in England. Mosè was subsequently became Le Siège de Corinthe, and Mosè became Moïse—both re-written and greatly extended for the Grand Opera in Paris. Mosè afforded the first idea of that florid [illegible] style afterwards brought to perfection in [illegible]. Semiramide itself, popular to this day, and the last of Rossini's purely Italian operas (the last indeed, composed in Italy), was first played at the Fenice in Venice, February 23, 1823, with anything but the success that has subsequently attended it there.

[illegible] of Beethoven, who was [illegible] his [illegible] he [illegible] In 1824, Rossini visited London. How a [illegible] who sang and played [illegible] as well as he [illegible] was everywhere welcomed and [illegible] capital, may be remembered [illegible] his his career as [illegible] of the Opera Italien in Paris, where, after [illegible] opposition [illegible] his music had acquired extraordinary popularity, where he composed the charming little opera of Il Viaggio a Reims (for the fêtes du Sacre of Charles X.—June, 1825) which was [illegible] developed [illegible] Le Comte Ory, while in Le Siège de Corinthe and Moïse he had given colossal dimensions to two [illegible] Italian works, and where on the 3d of August, 1829, he crowned the edifice of his glory with the immortal masterpiece Guillaume Tell, so often, partly [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] one word about the [illegible] popular Stabat Mater, [illegible] his [illegible] from the production of Guillaume Tell [illegible] the day of his death Rossini [illegible] that he [illegible] more [illegible] years a great [illegible] of [illegible] triumph [illegible] the [illegible] Stabat (1832) [illegible] and [illegible] "petite messe" of which every one speaks as [illegible] to be published, [illegible] What were the [illegible] reasons for [illegible] [illegible] his [illegible] friends [illegible] to explain [illegible] speak [illegible] on [illegible] subject. In that city, when [illegible] he was placed under the [illegible] of the Abbé Mattei, who taught [illegible] the principles of harmony and composition [illegible] use of the general rule, refused to allow him any [illegible]. Instead of working on first principles, and [illegible] [illegible] from [illegible] foundation, Mattei [illegible] before his pupil the best masterpieces of the great masters, taught him to analyze them, and explained the various steps by which they had been constructed. His youthful pupil burst the trammels of scholastic discipline. "Do I now know enough to compose an opera?" asked the impatient student; and a reluctant [illegible] given, young Rossini set to work, and [illegible] of his professor's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] when [illegible] [illegible] without [illegible] [illegible] was [illegible] supply the [illegible] of [illegible] audiences. miration. He stayed for five months, and on his departure carried away a substantial proof of the English love of his art. In that short period he received for lessons and concerts no less a sum than £10,000. From London Rossini went to Paris. For the Grand Opera there, on the occasion of the [illegible] of Charles X., he produced a pièce d'occasion, entitled "Il Viaggio a Reims." Two years later he wrote, as stated, the "Moïse," and produced The Siege of Corinth; then followed the "Comte Ory," and in 1829 was produced the final and crowning triumph of the composer, "William Tell."

His reception in England was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Ebers [illegible] [illegible] of the King's Theatre [illegible] [illegible] with "Zelmira." tion. Rossini succeeded with a cavatina from "Zelmira," and then the maestro wrought the enthusiasm of the assembly to a climax by singing, with his wife, the admirable duet from "Armida," "Cara, per te quest' anima." He intended that the delicious accents of the duet should close the soirée, and attempted to retire amid the applause which followed it. His intention being perceived, however, the cries of "Bravo!" were changed for others of "Vivat! Vive l'Maestro!" and he was obliged to advance to the border of the balcony and bow his acknowledgments to the excited multitude. A cry of "Rossini! Coppola!" [illegible] singing a [illegible] popular melody from "Il Barbiere" — Figaro qua, Figaro là. This would be rendering the maestro carried far enough and [illegible] the [illegible] that he [illegible] to be closed and the lights upon the balcony put out. But though Rossini had had enough of it, the crowd had not; and when it perceived that there was no hope of the encore being obtained, it became enraged beyond all bounds at the disappointment, and gave vent to fury by throwing brickbats at the windows of the house, to whose [illegible] a few moments before [illegible] attracted so enormous an orchestra. Had it not been for the intervention of the police, it is probable the outrage would have been carried to a serious extent. He had illustration of the favor of a mob.

Since the production of "William Tell," Rossini has given little to the music-dramatic world; beyond the cantata here and there, a couple of masses, and a rechauffé of an old opera under the name of "Robert Bruce," nothing of interest came from his pen, save the Stabat Mater, written at long interval between 1832 and 1841. The thirty-nine years have been devoted to gourmandise, or the cultivation of the muse and the [illegible] of [illegible]. In 1855 he settled down in Paris, and up to his death became the centre of an adoring circle. He loved Paris; [illegible] in the cracking of jokes and the inventing of dishes. Something of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] his early pique the curiously Paris was hard to obliterate the memory of his strong. He assumed the homage of a sovereign. He was dubbed Maître, his [illegible] traits and sublime witticisms were chronicled in the newspapers with an ardor, and an [illegible] of which only French journalists are capable. He wrote exaggerated compliments to the singers of every city opera, and Rossini lived in his domestic world and wishes and flatteries and stories, until he caught that attack of bronchitis which on Saturday, November the 14th, put an end to his life and plunged Paris into mourning. The Sunday art papers in their rapt of esteem one with a black edge and contained the most effusive expressions of regret. In the language of one of them, "Death has opened to Rossini the way to that Empyrean where the Greeks placed that demigods. Paris is becoming to [illegible] to the dead a funeral, which can only be an apotheosis and the preface of immortality."

But compliments apart, no one denies to Rossini the respect due to his vast worth. The testimony of one late even that Mendelssohn may be recorded among the cloud of witnesses who confess Rossini's geniality and greatness. In a letter from Frankfort, in July, 1836, Mendelssohn writes: "Early yesterday I went to see Ferdinand Hiller, and whom should I find sitting there but Rossini, as large as life, in his best and most amiable mood. I really know few men who can be so amusing and witty as he when he chooses. He kept us laughing incessantly the whole time. I promised that the St. Cecilia Association should sing for him the B minor Mass and some other things of Sebastian Bach's. It will be quite too charming to see Rossini obliged to admire Sebastian Bach. He thinks, however, 'different countries, different customs,' and is resolved to howl with the wolves. He is enthusiastic about Germany, and when he once gets the list of wines on the Rhine, in the evening the waiter is obliged to show him his room, or he could never manage to find it. He relates the most laughable and amusing things about Paris and all the musicians there, as well as of himself and his compositions, and entertains the most profound respect for all the men of the present day, so that you might really believe him if you had no eyes to see his sarcastic face. Intellect and animation and wit sparkle in all his features and in every word; and those who do not consider him a genius ought to hear him expatiating in this way, and they would change their opinion."

Rossini's illness for the two days before his death was a slow agony, and he suffered a real martyrdom. His body was [illegible], so greatly did the inflammation consume him. From [illegible] he seemed not—"I'm [illegible], let I" and this was really given [illegible] to say. He sometimes took the hand of his wife, who never left his bedside and covered it with kisses. Together with the name of Mme. Rossini, which he was almost always invoking, that which he most frequently pronounced was Jean, an old attendant who had shown great devotedness to his master. Moments some friends never ceased succeeding each other in waiting on him; namely, MM. Vaucorbeil, Michotte, Tommy Jacomé, Tamburini, and Dr. Nicolas. Mme. Rossini, wishing for his devotion, had allowed the Abbé of S. Roch to have access to the dying man, who confessed to him. On Friday, at two, the Curé of Passy administered extreme unction, and half an hour after the patient lost consciousness. A [illegible] something akin to [illegible] of [illegible] is concerned. At ten at night he [illegible] his wife's name, and that was the last word he spoke. As soon as he was thought to be dead, a [illegible] light was passed close to his [illegible], but the upper lip appeared. A little after midnight he expired.

Gioacchino Rossini.

The last man of genius but one who belonged to the greatest musical period that Europe has yet seen—the contemporary of Beethoven, Weber, Spohr, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Paer, Mayer, Zingarelli, Donizetti, Pacini, Bellini, Auber, Paganini, Mercadante, Hérold, Marschner, Lindpaintner, Chopin, Mlle. Lind, Thalberg, and a score of other artists, whose place there is small present chance of being filled—Rossini, it may be said, is the greatest man of genius in the [illegible] list—Rossini—born at Pesaro on the 29th of February, 1792, died on the 13th of this month, at Passy. He had [illegible] been [illegible] for some time past. His mortal illness, as [illegible], we are told, was terribly painful. Everything that science and devoted kindness could do to alleviate his sufferings and to prolong his existence was done, but in vain.

For the moment, it is impossible to do more than group together a few facts and characteristics regarding the [illegible] works of one of the most original artists in every sense of the word who ever enriched the art he practised. There is no want of anecdotic correspondence, of personal recollections, which ever [illegible], and as will make a comprehensive and [illegible] biography of Rossini one day, [illegible]. At present, [illegible] is to attempt, in a few words, to assemble a few of the known facts of the brilliant and singular career. This much is most safe to state that Rossini was a [illegible] of Pesaro; one of a family of obscure musicians, the son of a very beautiful woman, doomed to struggle into life and celebrity under the conditions of penury and strange [illegible]. His first master, he told Ferdinand Hiller, was one Prinetti. But he seems to have mastered the secrets of music almost by instinct. His processes of composition, according to a [illegible] [illegible], correspond well in beautiful economy of "[illegible] and [illegible]." In apparent contempt of thought and labor. The tale goes that, after having taken some dozen lessons in counterpoint from Padre Mattei, he asked his professor whether he had learnt enough to enable him to write operas, and, on receiving an answer in the affirmative, flung down his exercise book, and betook himself boldly to work for the stage. This, however, is possibly an exaggeration of the facts. There are persons born so richly organized that they can dispense with the study which is necessary to most of genius of the second order. He was at his own [illegible] by [illegible] Mendelssohn, whose amazing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a man of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the Italiano though he commenced at Bologna, [illegible] young man, while he was yet a [illegible]. Hiller? again [illegible] contempt without carrying to order the Abbé Vogler. The fact that these examples have been abused and pleaded in the arrogant and the lazy has nothing to do with the honoured truth.

Rossini, at all events, had no scruples in stealing the theatre of his country at a very early age. There were [illegible] in those days, and the boy being an acquisition [illegible] was [illegible] to let his genius run. In vocal portion of his operatic works—an [illegible]—not very scrupulous as to literary [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] the early operas, "La Scala di Seta," and "Il Pietra del Paragone," were [illegible] belonging to [illegible] were accessible to him [illegible] enough. There are no [illegible] for one so generous, so abundant in melody as he was, so ready so [illegible], to meditate new combinations. And yet there is nothing in the industrial sense of any country more provocative, more original, more [illegible] than the [illegible] of Rossini's [illegible] for instance, those in "Il Turco," "La Gazza," "Il Barbiere," "Tancredi," "Cenerentola," "La Donna," "Semiramide," "Le Siège de Corinthe," [illegible] "Guillaume Tell." It is the first quality which every creation should possess this of commanding attention from the very first strokes of the bar; then [illegible] equalled [illegible], by the overtures of Weber. As to certain common [illegible], Rossini's [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] probably in [illegible], became [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—he [illegible] [illegible] and cut no more. Many [illegible] of the florid embellishments which are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which the singers [illegible] have been [illegible] with the original [illegible] were [illegible] by himself in order to [illegible] the [illegible] of their right of [illegible] judgment. It is certain that the ornamental passages and cadenzas noted in Rossini's music have a style which nothing can supersede, nor replace without certain loss.

It is impossible, for the moment, to range accordingly [illegible] the [illegible] of the Italian operas poured forth during a period less than twenty years in duration. Among those were "Il Barbiere," with its [illegible] "Tancredi," [illegible] and [illegible] florid "Pensa alla Patria," "Di tanti palpiti" with its [illegible] finale and its quartet, [illegible] "Cruda sorte," [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] by the finale [illegible] to "Mosè" [illegible] for the [illegible] "Tancredi" with [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Italian's [illegible] [illegible]—and in two [illegible] "Il Barbiere," the comedy of Beaumarchais, which will be the most [illegible] of [illegible], as the most perfect of dramatic farces, will never die, so long as voices can [illegible] the [illegible] of a stage, as the [illegible] lover in the [illegible] of one of the most [illegible] of the Italian theatre. This "Barbiere," by the way, had at first a [illegible] success. This claim on [illegible] the same story being then in possession of Paisiello. But after [illegible] [illegible] work had won its place, and such a [illegible] and [illegible] for its [illegible] so soon in [illegible] [illegible] Paisiello [illegible] had altogether [illegible]. Rossini's early works were poorly paid, for rights of authors [illegible] were [illegible] in Italy, and managers could do such unheard of [illegible] as [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] by publishing a copy of a score. But they produced [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the young Prussians. He became at once the favorite of his countrymen, and many of his countrywomen. Besides being a great genius and having a ready wit, such as few have commanded (which it [illegible] excellence [illegible]) he was singularly handsome, and successful in a [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible]. To the last (it may be remarked in passing) Rossini kept his wonderful freshness and piquancy of repartee—his charming [illegible] courtesy of manner, and that pair of eyes, at once clear, tender and searching, which [illegible] in the heyday of his youth have been found [illegible] by the [illegible] ladies of his own country.

[illegible] Some of those the best known may be grouped with their reference to chronology. Among comic operas, "La Cenerentola," with its [illegible] and its finale [illegible], and "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," [illegible] Among semi-serious operas, "La Gazza" [illegible] "Guillaume Tell" and "La Gazza." Among works of a higher light—"Semiramide" and "Desdemona," and [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] expression of the [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] which we have referred and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] How wonderfully was it rendered by Pasta and Malibran! [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] deeply and death agony of the scene. [illegible] the [illegible] pieces of dramatic composition where [illegible] is combined with a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] harshness or of Wagner [illegible] [illegible] singing and acting handled out.

He died in easy circumstances. He was twice married—the first time to Madame Colbran, a renowned singer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] some [illegible] The [illegible] lady [illegible] [illegible] and she accompanied him to England, when Prince Leopold's Concerts, at Marlborough House, were [illegible] [illegible] world of fashion, when Almack's was in full glory. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] probably [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] brilliant society of [illegible] the world—Lady Jersey, then Lady Cowper. The stories of Rossini's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of England are countless. Who has not heard of his speech to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the Duke of Wellington—"Madame, how [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] greatest men in Europe"? [illegible] at those Marlborough House Concerts [illegible] [illegible] was a second [illegible] married to Madame Pelissier [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The great maestro is to be interred to-day, by his own request, the music in the sanctuary [illegible] of La Madeleine. It would be needless and premature to speak of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the loss to, since the [illegible] [illegible] for recollection and anecdote are [illegible] [illegible]

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.—Perhaps the most interesting event in the highest musical sense which has occurred in Germany of late, was the "Fiftieth Year Jubilee of the Cecilia Society," held in the last week of October. The "Cecilia" is the choral society of which Mendelssohn was so fond, and of which he speaks in his Letters. It is probably the most earnest and high toned musical society in the world, though not the largest, and its chorus singing the best that can be heard anywhere. We may congratulate our friend Dresel on finding such a pleasure in store for him, the first thing on his welcome among his relatives and so many old musical friends as the Jubilee had drawn together. We translate from the Signale:

"Two days full of festal jubilee and poetic joy are be behind us,—two days which could not have flowed by more beautiful and more assembled. The festival began on Wednesday morning (Oct. 21) with some novel pieces of Mozart, Bach, and the two [illegible] Choruses of the Cecilia, Schelble and Messer, in the [illegible] hall of the Saalbau. The Festival address was made by Dr. Eckhard, president of the Society, who reviewed the different phases through which the Society had passed. Then came the presentation of gifts to the Jubilar (for example, a splendid Bechstein grand piano on the part of another musical society the Museum) of large [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Some 30 honorary guests were present; we observed, among others: Ferd. Hiller, [illegible] Lachner, Goltermann, Brambach, Kessler, Wüllner, Scholz, Reinecke, [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Lux, Schlösser, Marx, [illegible] Vogt. For the grand evening concert they had selected Bach's B minor Mass, as [illegible] of the direction to which the Cecilia most faithfully dedicates itself. And indeed it may well be proud of this achievement; a more perfect performance [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] hardly be imagined. The enormous difficulties with which the work abounds were overcome with the ease of play; the light and shade was admirable, the sound of the whole chorus, alike in forte and piano, ravishing. Of the solo singers (Mmes. [illegible] and Joachim, Herren [illegible] and Schulze) we must mention Frau Joachim and Kön Otto; Master Joachim played the violin solo ([illegible]) which occurs in the Mass. Add to this our excellent orchestra, which played that evening with [illegible] fervor, and you must admit that we [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] sense of the word, a model performance, for which we cannot be grateful enough to Carl Müller, the director. Thursday assembled the Society, its guests and many friends in the great Hall at a banquet, in which 300 persons took part. The festival concluded with a ball, and you may form an idea of its [illegible] when I tell you that nearly 2,000 people were present in the Saalbau."

The second "Museum" concert presented a brilliant [illegible] of a Haydn Symphony in D, Beethoven's [illegible] Symphony and the Hebrides overture. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Loreley [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The second Quartet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Quartet of Schumann, the [illegible] Trio of Schubert and Mozart's Quartet in F.

Joachim and his wife, the distinguished concert singer, took part in the third Museum concert (Violin [illegible] by Bach and Schubert; Schubert's great piano-forte Duo, [illegible] symphony [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] arranged for orchestra by Joachim, &c.) [illegible] Herr Joachim and Fr. Lachner took part in a chamber concert. (Violin Concerto by Gade; Schumann's Concerto [illegible] Concerto by Marcello, &c.)

CRYSTAL PALACE. At the concert on Saturday afternoon the chief feature was an unknown Symphony of Schubert—No. 6, in C major—for the first production of which in England (and it has been played nowhere else) we are indebted to the [illegible] of research which induced the Crystal Palace Directors to send one of their most zealous servants to Vienna in order to examine the MSS. of the now so greatly sought Viennese composer and obtain possession of some [illegible] The Symphony in C is of genuine musical interest, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] composition of Schubert's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It was, moreover, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] cheerful character from beginning to end. How it was performed by the admirable orchestra which Mr. Manns directs so well we need hardly say. The [illegible] symphony, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] was rapturously applauded, and will be doubtless heard again very shortly. The overture to Guillaume Tell and Lenore, which respectively began and terminated the concert, were both played to perfection, and the first was tremendously applauded. A young pianist, Miss Hanson Reed (pupil of Mr. W. H. Cusins), produced a marked impression by her extremely neat, careful, and wholly unaffected performance of Mendelssohn's very difficult Capriccio Brillante in B minor (with orchestral accompaniment), a well-known Gavotte from one of the Suites of J. S. Bach, and a Scherzo from a MS. sonata of her own composition. Mus. World, Nov. 28.

These Crystal Palace programmes certainly exhibit great variety. To one No. Organ was employed by [illegible] Bach Fugue and Mendelssohn Sonata figuring in the same company with a Beethoven Symphony (in B flat), Handel's Songs of [illegible] [illegible] Mendelssohn's Hebrides overture, arias from Mendelssohn, Handel, Spohr, Meyerbeer &c. The Times this is the organ experiment entirely successful, thanks to the admirable playing of Mr. [illegible]

In another (Nov. 21), the overture to Euryanthe, Mozart's Turkish Symphony, the Dvorak [illegible] Song, Beethoven's Choral Fantasia [illegible] [illegible] for piano), Handel's "Angel ever bright" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a part song by [illegible], and piano solos by Handel and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Schubert's "Song of Miriam" for solo and chorus. The Cantata was a novelty in London, though it has been long years known here in Boston, and the entire music published in this Journal. We are glad to see it so highly appreciated. The Times critic says:

Schubert's cantata we knew apart from its interpretation [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the Crystal Palace Choir and, therefore, [illegible] possible to speak [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The words [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Grillparzer and the music was written in 1828 [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] charming [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Schubert left [illegible] [illegible] but his friend Franz Lachner has supplied the orchestral [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] Everybody knows that Handel treated the story of Israel's deliverance [illegible] the Viennese master. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Therefore, if any Schubert [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Song of Miriam" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] First of all comes an Allegro [illegible] in C major [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "The trumpet shall sound" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Allegretto in F major, "Out of Egypt" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The graceful [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of this movement is admirably in contrast with an episode on the words:—

[illegible]

These selections were a long, varied and presented the genius of Mr. Hiller in many different aspects. The Symphony in A [illegible] and noble work. The [illegible]

[illegible]

The Psalm abounds in noble effects, from the melody and calm beauty of the solo; "There is a river," to the striking imitation of the double chorus, "The heathen raged." It was finely sung by Mme. Rotter, and the Harmonic Society provided the chorus, supported by an orchestra, and Mr. E. J. Connolly, organist. The effect of the chorus was injured by a harshness of tone and unsteadiness in the voices, as also by that disregard of the more delicate shades of forte and piano, against which our oratorio directors, everywhere, struggle vainly. The orchestra played for the most part well, though we must except the extraordinary misunderstanding at the close of the first Aria in the Psalm, which, but for Mme. Rotter's aplomb and steadiness would have entirely spoiled its effect. We would also give Mr. Connolly credit for a sympathetic pianoforte accompaniment to the Bible Songs.

Such was Mr. Ritter's concert, and we regret to have been in New York to hear it. P. S. J.

To the Editor of Dwight's Journal.

Sir,—In giving the programme of my recent concert, your N. Y. correspondent "F" having most singularly but no doubt, unintentionally omitted the name of Mme. Ritter, who so ably assisted, while at the same time mentioning all the other persons concerned, allow me to record here that my ... [illegible] ... not only the Scena ed Aria (set to words adapted by her from Alfieri's "Antonio e Cleopatra") with orchestral accompaniment, and the solos in the 46th Psalm, but also that I composed these works expressly for her voice and vocal resources.

I am, Sir, yours truly, F. L. Ritter.

New York, Dec 14.—On Saturday evening Mr. Thomas gave his 1st Symphony Soirée, with Harry von Loew (pianist), the Mendelssohn Union, and orchestra of fifty.

Overture, "Semiramide"	Catel.
[illegible]	Schubert.
4th P. F. Concerto, G, op. 58	Beethoven.
23d Psalm, op. [illegible]	Schubert.
3d Symphony, E flat, op. 97	Schumann.

The Semiramide Overture is now in rehearsal by the Philharmonic Society for 2nd concert and is, in my opinion, a mediocre production unworthy of a place in Mr. Thomas's programme.

The 23d Psalm was performed for the first time in the concert of the Arion Society, and of course was sung in that time by male voices, whereas in the present instance a female chorus was substituted. It is a delightful composition and the instrumentation is peculiarly attractive.

Mr. Von Loew, who played the charming Beethoven Concerto from memory, exhibited great composure, an excellent technique and a thoroughly artistic spirit; but he lacks force, and his hands seem less capable of accomplishing that which his heart and head so evidently feel and understand.

The concert closed with the very beautiful Schumann Symphony in E flat. I gladly take my position among the admirers of Schumann, and can say with truth that to me his music seems more than doubly that of any [illegible] other author. If the most significant symbol of ... [illegible] ... perhaps because I do not care to listen to the Symphony of ... [illegible] Symphony without ... [illegible] ... and feeling that Schumann stands in the very foremost rank of the brotherhood of genius, then I can only say that from my heart I am sorry for him.

Of the general performance I am reluctant to speak, for I can say but little in praise. The wind instruments were occasionally and unreservedly faulty, as likely to hit a wrong note as right one. The strings were infinitely better. As for the singing, the Mendelssohn went moderately well; but in the 23d Psalm the female chorus was hope only "sloppy" and uncertain as to the proper volume of voice. The audience numbered some 1200 and was mainly a curious, lively and correctly attentive one.

Here is the programme of Mr. Thomas's 3d Sunday evening concert, (Dec. 1).

Overture to Schöne, op. 52	Schumann.
Nocturne, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Grand Fantasia, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner.
Overture, "Robespierre"	Litolff.
Ballet de la "Reine de Saba"	Gounod.
March Hongroise, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz.

Mme. Carmaigo and the little Hess children again appeared and were cordially received. Master Willie plays the violin with an aplomb which would do credit to many an artist of greater age and experience, and his tone is wonderfully strong and clear.

On Sunday evening Mr. Thomas gave his 2d Sunday concert, with the following orchestral selections:

[illegible] from [illegible] Symphony	Schubert.
Overture, [illegible]	Weber.
Grande [illegible], "Robert"	Meyerbeer.
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini.
Allegretto, 7th Symphony	Beethoven.
Hand of Liberty	Liszt.

The soloists were the same as at the last concert, and were greeted with the usual favor. The two movements from the Schubert Symphony are very charming and were very popular here last season; for they were given at one of the Brooklyn Philharmonics, at one of Mr. Thomas's Symphony Soirées, and also at several of the Saturday Evening Concerts. This season they are to be played at one of the N. Y. Philharmonics.

Paris, Nov 25.—The attraction at the Théâtre Lyrique during the past week has been the ever delightful "Il Barbiere"; but this from all the light and warmth and music the mind would wander to that many scenes of the Madeleine, where the body of the composer was laid prior to interment. On Friday the remains of the master were removed to the church of the Trinity where on Saturday the 21st inst., the obsequies took place. The music performed in the church was as follows:

Marche funèbre ... Rossini.
Sung by Tamburini, Gardoni, Mlles. Nilsson and Alboni.
Dies Irae ...
Messe à [illegible] and the Marquise de [illegible].
Pro peccatis (Song by Faure).
Lacrymosa ... Mozart.
Prière de Rossini. (Sung by Mlle. Nilsson.)
Pie Jesu ... Rossini.
Sung by [illegible] accompanied by Messrs. [illegible], Gounod, Membrée.
Prière de Moïse.
Sung by Messrs. [illegible], Faure, Nilsson and others.

Three hundred [illegible] pupils of the Conservatoire, artists and celebrities, took part in these exercises.

At the Père la Chaise the funeral orations were pronounced by Camille Doucet, Amb. Thomas D'Anvers, Pacini St. Georges, and E. [illegible].

One of the journals in commenting upon the ceremony says: "Mlle. Nilsson's chanted the Stabat de Pergolese, some one said plainly [illegible]." Not badly said, especially although the expression is [illegible] in the [illegible] is not new.

At the Cirque Napoléon to-day we had the Eroica Symphony, Weber's Euryanthe Overture, Overture to William Tell, Andante religioso (Mendelssohn) and Marche Hongroise (Berlioz). The playing of this orchestra is not always unexceptionable, but the Tell Overture was performed in a manner which I have never heard equalled.

At the Théâtre Lyrique this evening we are to have "Il Barbiere," the overture to Semiramide, &c.

"William Tell" was announced for to-day at the Grand Opera, but owing to the illness of one of the singers, it is postponed. A. A. C.

Paris, Nov 28.—The musical events of the week past have been as follows. At the Grand Opera two representations of the Huguenots with Mme. Hamakers (Valentine) as [illegible] and on the 20th inst. a representation "extraordinaire" of "Guillaume Tell," an additional benefit of Rossini occurred with appropriate [illegible] brought forward and great applause. At the Italian Opera, where Patti reigns, we have had a reprise of Semiramide and a performance of [illegible]. Chanson [illegible] in the Théâtre Lyrique, Rossini's Il Barbiere, and Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris have been given as tributes. A propos of the work last mentioned, the following words of Berlioz, written many years ago, are not without their significance at the present day. In speaking of Spontini's Vestale he says: "The proper rendering of such a work requires singers who know how to sing and to act; a powerful orchestra; a body of great ability to conduct and animate them; and above all it demands that the execution shall be penetrated by the sentiment of expression; a sentiment which is, to-day, almost extinct in Europe, when the most monstrous absurdities become wonderfully popular, and where the style which is the most trivial and false is the one which has in its the best chance of success."

The testament of Rossini contains the following clause:

"I request that after my decease and that of my wife there shall be founded at Paris—and exclusively for the French—two prizes of 3000 francs each, to be given annually, the one to the composer of the best musical work—religious or lyrical—in which melody so neglected to-day is to be adhered to; and the other to the author of the words prose or verse to which the composer shall be applied: these must be perfectly adapted to the music and must be in accordance with the laws of morality to which writers do not always pay sufficient attention."

At M. Pasdeloup's popular concert to-day the Reformation Symphony of Mendelssohn and Mozart's E-flat Symphony were performed. A. A. C.

Harvard Musical Association. The third Symphony Concert (Dec 10) had the usual numerous sympathetic audience and appeared to give even more than usual pleasure. This was the programme:

Overture, "Coriolanus" ... Beethoven.
Aria: "[illegible]" with Trio obbligato, from the Passion Music according to St. Matthew ... Bach.
Mrs. C. A. Barry and Bernhard Listemann.
Violin Concerto, "[illegible]" in [illegible] Minor ... Vieux-temps. [illegible] ... Listemann.
Bernhard Listemann.
Overture to "Genoveva" ... Schumann.
Songs, a. "[illegible]" ... Franz.
b. "Song of Spring" ... Mendelssohn.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
Symphony in C (No. 9, Ed. of Breitkopf and Härtel.) ... Haydn.

The "Coriolanus" Overture, brief as it is, one of the greatest works of genius, a gleam to the very core with concentrated thought and passion, concise, swift, fatal as Macbeth, was more successfully rendered than we have heard it here before. The shock of the abrupt, fiery chords came with clearer suddenness and precision, the gloomy agitation of the leading theme and the unspeakably tender beauty of the episodical motive had the fine accent and the light and shade they needed. In the time that one could speak of the ... of a tale of its beast ... touches of genius, the brief swift, marvellous event so has gone by: and if one chance of any a listener, attentive he may have been and spell-bound, has had time enough to remember how this or that tender phrase of a good instrument or horn, stealing so naturally into the midst of the scene, stole with a subtle and delicious warmth to his heart. The overture was composed for a drama of a poor German play-wright; yet it is Shakespeare's Coriolanus none the less, and as the angry chords grow fainter and more fitful at the end, till they die out amid murmured fragments of the fond of first theme, you feel the type of a strong, proud, wilful life storming itself away and falling spent, annihilated, in the struggle with the higher powers.

Fitly after these implacable chords, followed the glorious strain in the Bach aria "Erbarme dich." Mrs. Barry sang it at these concerts two years ago, but now for the first time with the proper accompaniments, namely the quartet of strings as Bach wrote it, and his organ part (incongruously replaced before by the piano) written out by Robert Franz for a pair of clarinets and bassoons. These accompaniments were smoothly played, much better than before, and yet not quite subdued enough for the contralto voice, which, kept in the same range of tones, does not easily stand out in full relief against the instruments, or, rather, figure as an independent instrument among the rest, unless it be one of exceptional weight and strength, which Mrs. Barry's voice is not. Sweetness, purity, a certain sincere, soulful quality constitute the charm of her tones and her singing; it is more refined than powerful, more genuine than (in the common sense) effective. She sang the broad sustained flowing melody so tender and elevated, with great sincere beauty and expression: and if some hearers could not at once find themselves at home in music so long kept [illegible] from them, there were many among those hearers it did [illegible] deeply and was visibly, quietly enjoyed. The effect was only slightly troubled by just a shade of difference in pitch, chiefly noticeable at the close, which we think must have been owing to some overwrought and anxious intensity on the part of the violin obligato, forcing the tone up a trifle. Still the part was beautifully played by Mr. LISTEMANN; a little nervous he might well be, any one might be, on the eve of his own solo, a formidable task indeed, besides that it was really his debut here before a classical, exacting audience.

The Concerto by the great violinist Joachim, "in the Hungarian manner," of which we heard now for the first time the first and principal movement only (the whole would have occupied an hour) proved a very interesting work. To all the technical difficulties and [illegible] of a piece calculated to show all that modern virtuosity can do, it unites true originality, deep feeling and unbroken logical consistency through all its apparent freedom of form. There is a long orchestral prelude, in a wild and melancholy vein, relieved by a [illegible] foreshadowing the two principal themes,—one purely Hungarian and sad, the other cheerful and serene and very lovely,—which the solo violin takes up and varies and develops with inexhaustible energy and wealth of fancy. Like a swift mountain stream it now smoothly glides, now shoots a prospect, now foams and frets over the rocks and pebbles, but keeps up over the continuous flow; the surprises are as natural and graceful as they are unexpected, and [illegible] figure seems to unfold of necessity from a [illegible] before, and all from the first germ. The orchestration, too, is rich and elaborate, charmingly often employing very modern combinations and effects, without being at all far-fetched or meretricious. Mr. LISTEMANN was fully equal to the interpretation of it. All he lacks is that largeness of tone which distinguished the master (the composer himself) that power from and [illegible] penetrating tone we never hear. His execution in every kind of passage is of consummate [illegible], purity of outline, and fine intonation of accent. He plays with remarkable energy and fire, wholly absorbed in the music. Whether in the eloquent and feeling statement of the main theme, or in the lovely episode so thrills and melts, or in the rapid runs and fioriture, or in the large and accompanying passages, especially the very significant and interesting cadenzas, all was masterly and riveted the general attention. The orchestral task, too, by no means easy, was happily achieved. Mr. Listemann was enthusiastically recalled. We hope there may yet be a chance to hear the whole of this noble Concerto.

Schumann's overture to his one opera, Genoveva, deep, subtle, tender, almost mystical in feeling, yet refreshed with breezy bare passages, has been given each year in these concerts, and still [illegible] upon acquaintance. It is surely one of the best of romantic overtures, and the time was remarkably well played.

The songs with piano (Mr. J. C. D. PARKER) were beautiful in themselves, and very sweetly sung by Mrs. BARRY; especially the quiet, tender melodies from one of the song sets by Robert Franz. The beauty of the accompaniment, however, is of so subtle [illegible] a kind that it would be more appreciated in a smaller room. Dussek is to publish it with English words. The "Song of Spring," one of the last composed by Mendelssohn, being more buoyant and [illegible], actually told more on the audience, coming as it did so after so many serious pieces [illegible] a new hope. But it was not the best piece for the singer, and it lost some of its brightness by being set down from the original key of A.

A perfect recreation after that intense programme was Haydn's genial and delightful Symphony in D, one of the twelve composed for Salomon in London. From beginning to end it is full of exquisite felicities, and they [illegible], as usual, with Haydn, in the art of making the most of a few simple happy thoughts, by reflecting, multiplying, and lying them [illegible] and [illegible] and inversion. But here is [illegible] and absolute [illegible] whereas the Symphony is all alive and human. How every instrument gives back the word with its own coloring and characteristic comment; how alternately the theme is passed from voice to voice; how the melodic figure [illegible] the slow horns, horns, [illegible] so that each gets his share and figures in the foreground of the discourse; and yet without the slightest [illegible]. This old Symphony was, once many years ago, familiar in Boston; but we knew how rich and beautiful it was. [illegible] Few seasons before was it played, [illegible] an orchestra, never with such delicacy and light and shade, and spirit. Mr. ZERRAHN's careful rehearsal had recovered all the fine and [illegible] from the old picture and restored it in its fresh and glowing colors, its clear perfect outline. It was most heartily enjoyed. Truly the art of Symphony was as perfect in the first great symphonist as it has ever been. His wit, harmony, childlike [illegible] makes him enjoyable even after Beethoven and Schubert. The revival of Haydn's Symphonies in these concerts, among other good fruits has had the effect to create a demand at the music stores for four-hand and eight-hand piano arrangements of them. They are played and studied together in many homes, and thus a the very best sort of musical culture our young pianoforte players. In this connection, too, we may allude to the excellent service which Mr. LANG has been doing now for the third season in assembling a hundred or two of his pupils on the afternoon of the Thursday preceding that of each concert and with the aid of a brother pianist (Mr. PARKER) playing over the entire programme to them with historical and analytic explanations. Such is the educational influence of the Symphony Concerts.

MISS ANNA DE PINTARDO, who has but a short time to stay with us, having accepted an operatic engagement for some years abroad, gave a concert at the Music Hall last Saturday evening, which was one of the best of the kind, the [illegible]. The "gems" of song and instrumental solo, chief among [illegible] the many, were given with an uncommonly good setting, an orchestra conducted by Mr. B. J. LANG, which opened the concert with the first movement of the "Italian Symphony," and closed it with Beethoven's early and gay overture to the Ballet "The Men of Prometheus," which it was a treat to hear after many years. Both works were nicely played, and with spirit; so were the accompaniments to solos. Our noble Contralto never was in better voice, and was richly enjoyable in Rossini's Di tanti palpiti and the duet from Semiramide, interesting selections just now, and suited to her best voice and manner. The recitative to the favorite piece was nobly delivered. There was much serious beauty and pathos in her opening piece, "Adieu de Marie Stuart," by Niedermeyer. Each of these efforts called forth enthusiastic applause, followed by that fatal bait of encores, English ballads, which sound better elsewhere than in a public concert room. Miss GREGORY's fresh, bright true voice, fresh and blooming, without a taint of the [illegible] affectation thereof, excelled greatly in the French Nightingale air from Le Noces de Jeannette, and bore its part well in the Semiramide Duet. Mr. HAZELDEN sang a Romanza from Ruy Blas with good taste and [illegible]; and Mr. MACDONALD, whose sweet and sweet, showed more power and spirit than he had before seemed capable of [illegible] as by Arditi. Miss ALICE DUTTON played Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro gioioso (piano with orchestral accompaniment) with good taste and truly [illegible] force. Both [illegible] with ease. [illegible] played from memory and with sure memory. Her [illegible] simple manners prepossessed all in her favor. Mr. LISTEMANN's violin playing was wonderful, but the selection hardly worthy of so fine an artist. That [illegible] Fantasia with Variations [illegible] had a little congruous tone [illegible] but there were enough [illegible] in a double Bass solo "The Fenelle Ambrosia" by Bottesini, Roberto Fenlon was who were [illegible] to the encore [illegible] Mr. ARBUCKLE played an ornate Theme and Variations by De Bériot on his cornet in [illegible] a good tone and expression, and [illegible]. But it was too long, all the [illegible] evening which sought to [illegible] the whole time of the concert with such [illegible].

[illegible] MUSICAL SOCIETY. The approaching [illegible] concert, given at Chickering's, Nov. 19th [illegible] of the "Trumpeter [illegible] for [illegible] Princess," had a good deal [illegible]. The part-songs, all well sung, were Mendelssohn's "Türkisches Schenkenlied" and "Wanderlied," Kreutzer's "Der Tag des Herrn" and two by Gade, new ones here, the first "Der Mai" (The Mai) with a companion of [illegible] well [illegible] working of [illegible] the second a [illegible] one, "The Reader's" [illegible] sang Schubert's "Wanderer" and a couple of [illegible] songs by Franz. [illegible] very acceptably. Mr. [illegible] the still [illegible] of the Club, was [illegible] were [illegible] a couple of Franz songs: "Die Rose, die Lilie" and "Wenn ich Frühling auf die Berge." [illegible] "[illegible] Devil?" Rest of [illegible] Mr. [illegible] who with [illegible] of the [illegible] Franz songs and a true feeling [illegible] a [illegible] Sonata of Beethoven (the "Moonlight") a movement from Schumann's Op. 12 and a Mazurka by Chopin, entering fully into the spirit of each and with full power to [illegible].

CHRISTMAS WEEK will not want a [illegible] recognition, and of the highest kind. On Thursday Afternoon (Christmas Eve) a Symphony Concert, when will be given a new Haydn Symphony in B-flat, one of his best, the Mozart Concerto for two Pianos (Messrs. LANG and PARKER),—for the first part. Part II. Beethoven's second Symphony, and the new romance [illegible] Haydn and Mozart; [illegible] Cradle Song from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and the [illegible] Aria, "Frohlocke, Ihr Herr" [illegible] by Mr. [illegible] and the [illegible] overture "Il Seraglio" [illegible]. Besides its Christmas [illegible] of [illegible], the programme has the interest of [illegible] historical [illegible] in [illegible] compositions: Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn.

On Saturday evening the Handel and Haydn Society gives the "Messiah," with the welcome aid of Miss [illegible] and Miss HOUSTON, and on Sunday evening "Elijah."

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club [illegible] is to [illegible] helped in the Symphony Concert and will [illegible] Chamber Concerts at Chickering's Hall on the 5th of January (Tuesday evening).

[illegible]	Robert Franz.
Trio and Chorus. [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Four Part Songs.	Mendelssohn.

WORCESTER, MASS.—We had a couple of Symphony Concerts, of which the Palladium reports [illegible]:

Worcester is greatly indebted to the Grand Army organization for the two splendid concerts which [illegible]. [illegible] kept the [illegible] at home, but the house was [illegible] for a richer feast of orchestral music Worcester [illegible]. The attendance at the [illegible] concert was small, only [illegible] they were all true lovers of music, [illegible] they would have been great losers by allowing [illegible] in company them [illegible] programme [illegible] the Harvard Musical Association, [illegible] under the guidance of Mr. Zerrahn [illegible] power in the orchestral world. The two movements of Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor were [illegible] the great May Festival [illegible] Schubert's great [illegible]. [illegible] Military Symphony [illegible] Haydn [illegible]. Miss Anna [illegible] Whitten was the [illegible] in the last concerts [illegible] of one of the finest voices given to the public for a long time [illegible] and of great sympathetic quality [illegible] under [illegible] control. [illegible] She is [illegible] deserving [illegible] in every way a [illegible].

Evening brought Beethoven's Fifth Symphony [illegible] Worcester [illegible] the greater part of the audience [illegible].

PROVIDENCE CONN.—Mr. Karl Klauser and Mr. [illegible] still pursue their steady quiet work, as they have done for years in the [illegible] Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School. For years [illegible] the classic programmes of classical Chamber music [illegible] best artists of New York and other cities. And now we have those of the 53d and 54th Soirées and Matinées, given on the 2nd and 3d of this month:

I.

Trio, C. [illegible]	Haydn.
Messrs. [illegible], Matzka and Bergner.
Sonata, Piano and Violoncello, A, op. 69.	Beethoven.
Messrs. Van Inten and Bergner.
[illegible]
[illegible]	Chopin.
Mr. Ferdinand Van Inten.
Trio, D minor, op. 49.	Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Van Inten, Matzka and Bergner.

II.

Trio, [illegible]	Mozart.
Sonata, Piano and Violin, [illegible]	[illegible]
Sonata, [illegible]	Beethoven.
Trio, [illegible]	Schumann.

Of the interpreters Messrs. Matzka and Bergner of New York are well known. The pianist, Mr. Van Inten, is new and, we are told, acquitted himself admirably [illegible] the pianist [illegible] chamber music. Besides the pieces in the programmes, he played [illegible] of Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, &c., "gracefully, tenderly and very [illegible]."

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.—A "Classical Rehearsal" (the fourth) was held at Cottage Hill Seminary on the [illegible] The selections were Beethoven's E-flat Trio op. 70 for piano, violin and cello, played by Messrs. L. Meyer, Brandt and E. Goerdeler; "[illegible]" by Miss [illegible]; Schubert's Serenade, transcribed for violoncello; Beethoven's Romance for Violin; a Song by [illegible] with cello obligato; and a couple of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words, played by Mr. Goerdeler. The Trio was [illegible], and the whole of the rest of the programme [illegible].

VASSAR COLLEGE. The lady teachers, under the direction of Prof. F. L. Ritter and with the aid of Messrs. Matzka (violin) and Bergner (cello) gave a soirée on the [illegible] in which the following pieces were played [illegible]: Trio in C minor, op. 1 (piano, violin and 'cello), Beethoven. Two-part Song, "The May Bells," Mendelssohn. Romanza for piano and violin, Mozart. Air, [illegible]. Handel. Sonata in D, op. 58 (piano and 'cello) Mendelssohn. Duet, "[illegible]" from Nozze di Figaro, Mozart. Trio in B flat, Mozart.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB win wonderful encomiums "out West." A Cleveland critic says they "have long been acknowledged as having reached the acme of musical culture in this country," "the members of the Club are above criticism from ordinary mortals." [illegible] that the Club and their [illegible] are meeting great and deserved success everywhere on their tour. [illegible] It is to be hoped that "the acme" of perfection [illegible] by any mortal, ordinary or extraordinary. It is well to have a good many [illegible] to be worth living for.

Beethoven's Last Moments.

The Gratzer Tagespost contains a letter by the hand of the famous composer Anselm Hüttenbrenner [illegible] Colonel [illegible], which [illegible] in [illegible] Thayer in Vienna, [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] the different biographies. The following form the principal portion of this most interesting epistle:

"When on the 26th of March 1827, about three o'clock in the afternoon, I entered Beethoven's bedroom, I found there Herbert [illegible] and Mrs. van Beethoven, the wife of Johann van Beethoven, landed proprietor and apothecary of Linz, and besides, my friend, the portrait painter Joseph Teltscher. I believe that Professor [illegible] was also present. These gentlemen, after a while left the composer, [illegible] had little hopes of finding him yet alive on their return. During the last moments of Beethoven there was no one in the room except Mrs. van Beethoven and myself. After Beethoven had lain from three o'clock in the afternoon [illegible] in his agonies yet without consciousness [illegible] a flash of lightning, accompanied by a violent clap of thunder, came down [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] After this unexpected phenomenon, Beethoven opened his eyes, lifted up his right hand and for several seconds looked upwards, [illegible] clenched and with a very serious, threatening countenance, [illegible] I only once [illegible] I [illegible] Almost God [illegible] raised hand fell back upon his bed, his eyes half closed. My right hand lay under his head, [illegible] rested on his chin. No more breath, no more beating of the heart! [illegible] Beethoven to take the dying sacraments, [illegible] the request of the wife of the late [illegible] publisher, Thomas [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] the most delicate manner [illegible] Mrs. van Beethoven to testify [illegible] by the taking of the Lord's Supper. The [illegible] 1827 [illegible] the words: 'Plaudite amici, comoedia finita est,' [illegible] Not all Beethoven's [illegible] straightforward character [illegible]. On the other hand [illegible] Mrs. van Beethoven [illegible] on the dying day of her brother-in-law, that after he had taken the Viaticum, he had said to the priest: 'I thank you, Reverence, you have brought me comfort.'"

IV. THE INSTRUMENTS OF MUSIC.

From what precedes we may conclude that musical timbre results from the fusion of acute notes more or less numerous, more or less intense, with a fundamental sound. This important discovery gives the means of characterizing the timbre of the various musical instruments, and of establishing between sort the harmonic hierarchy among them. I begin with instruments whose sonority is not only poor but even locked up in perpetual discords. Bells, tuning-forks, triangles, drums and tambourines offer few resources and but a perilous employment to musicians. The sounds drawn from them are accompanied by super-acute partials in discord with the fundamental note. I have told how this defect may be corrected in the tuning-fork (diapason), by placing it before a sound-board. Thus it gives but one vibration, one simple sound, always the same, and it has in the orchestra but one perfectly well-known kind of utility.

It would not be so easy to annul the dissonances of a bell: all the art of founders is applied to finding empirically a form such that the upper notes shall not jar too much with the fundamental note. Meanwhile an accurate ear finds little pleasure in the clamor of which certain bells are so proud. There mount a false and these perpetual dissonances, whose perpetual return brings out their harshness in still stronger relief, torture a sensitive ear at all delicate. The bell, like the tam-tam, has been employed in operas to produce certain dramatic effects; but there at best like to part when it throws a sort of inexorable confusion into the whole orchestra.

Membranes offer few resources for harmony. Yet modern composers have strangely abused the kettle drums, and frequently their roll is heard entirely out of place. The ordinary drum serves to vigorously mark the rhythm of a march; the tambourine accentuates the measure of a rapid dance; but these, I must be confessed, are instruments of savages, and musical science can dispose them.

The most docile instruments to harmony will always be the vibrating strings: with a few violins, Mozart, Beethoven lift the human soul to the loftiest heights of musical emotion; nothing thrills one sooner being so profoundly soothing. Impetuous impulse, as also to fall to noble as the rich and powerful accords of an orchestra of stringed instruments. Hence the lyre is still the symbol of good harmony, of that which combines sounds and our voices, that which has a soul in fact; hence the violin, the viol, the harp are with it, the only attributes which painters give to music. For the same reason Domenichino, in a celebrated picture, has not hesitated to show us Saint Cecilia playing the double bass. The stringed instruments are divided into two families: in the first the strings are pinched or struck; in the second they are rubbed (frotted) with a bow. To the first, we belong the piano, the harp, the guitar, the lyre, and the violin when played pizzicato. The strings pinched or struck give out a sound very rich in harmonics (overtones): the number and intensity of these depend upon the way in which the string is agitated, the point at which it is agitated, and finally upon its rigidity, its stiffness and its subtlety. On the harp and the guitar it is pinched with the finger; on the lyre they use a ring or plectrum. On the piano the string receives a sharp blow from a hammer. The greater is shock the more does the live force impressed upon the string tend to multiply harmonic undulations there. Hence there is advantage on the piano in employing heavy and very elastic hammers which rebound with force. The makers know that the composition of these hammers has the most direct influence on the timbre of the instrument. With a good piano, one easily hears the first six harmonics of each note; the more harmonics be heard, because the makers suppose it by choosing a convenient point where the hammer may strike the string.

As we hear still we have only to suppress a vibration to determine a node at one of the points where these vibrations would accentuate a belly. Touch for example the middle of the string and it will not be able to vibrate in its whole length, nor by thirds, nor by fifths, &c. On the piano, the hammers are so placed that they strike the strings at points placed somewhere between the seventh and the ninth part of their length. The experience of two centuries has led the makers to adopt this empirical rule, and theory demonstrates that it has precisely the effect of suppressing or at least considerably weakening the seventh and the ninth harmonic, both of which are in dissonance with the tonic. In the high octaves the strings are very short and very stiff and they are struck still nearer to the end, so as to leave more liberty to the development of harmonics and give brilliancy to the sound. On these upper parts of the instrument the harmonics are generated with difficulty on account of the extreme tension of the strings; but in the middle and lower parts, it happens that certain harmonics are more intense than the fundamental sound itself. The touch has a marked influence on this phenomenon: hence there is no instrument whose timbre is so variable, so supple, so personal as that of the piano. Under skilful fingers, it lends itself to the most different effects, and seems to assume different voices at the artist's will.

The contact of the bow on strings determines vibrations whose theory is not so simple as is that of a simple shock. The harmonic notes spring forth always with facility under the gentle torsion of the bow. The fundamental note thus obtained is relatively more powerful than that of a piano or a guitar; the first six harmonics remain more feeble; but on the other hand the more acute, from the sixth to the tenth, are very distinct which gives a more piercing brilliancy to the total sound. Everybody knows that the strength of the violin communicate their vibrations to a sonorous box, made of thin and elastic wood, which plays the part of a resonator. The quality of the violin's sounds depends not only on the stroke of the bow but also on the more or less perfect elasticity of the sonorous chest, on the most delicate manner of its curves. A bad player will scratch but dry and gritty sounds from one of those violins which art so venerate and dispute the possession of; a good violinist will easily succeed in drawing from a mediocre instrument sounds less dry rich and delicate.

Let us turn to another order of instruments, the wind instruments. In some, the current of air breathes against a sharp edge; in others, it puts in vibration a sort of elastic tongue which is called a reed. To the first class belong the flute and a numerous category of organ pipes. In the flute the mouth of the player launches a current of air upon the sharp edge of an orifice in a cylindrical tube. In organs, in ... square pipes of wood open at the top, or cylindrical tubes of tin which are closed; these great columns of air are set in vibration by the jet of wind against a sharp wedge. The air receives a series of shocks upon this wedge and produces a sound which is the confused mixture of a multitude of notes. The column of the ... fills the office of a resonator appropriates and swells out those notes, among the rest whose vibrations agree with its own. In developing themselves these notes soon silence the ... noises about the orifice, and then one only hears from a distance especially the powerful harmony of its dominant. The timbre of the pipe depends then on the number and the intensity of the harmonics which it is fitted to produce. The slenderer the tubes are the more easily can the imprisoned column charge itself with vibrations; on the contrary the more they are enlarged, the more difficulty has the column in subdividing itself and the more predominance is given to the fundamental note alone. Hence the registers composed of fine and slender cylinders represent, so to speak, the stringed instruments in the majestic orchestra of the organ: such registers are called the violin principal, the violoncello, the bass, the viola. They furnish a rich and colored sound, in which one may distinguish as many as six overtones. In the largest pipes the overtones vanish; in what are called the principals or diapasons, whose timbre is the essentially characterizes the organ, the fundamental note predominates, grave, soft, yet powerful; and the overtones are reduced to a secondary role. In registers of wooden pipes you hear only the octave with a trace of the high fifth; all the rest has disappeared.

The particular character of wind instruments depends upon the reaction of the pipe on which ... direct action on the fundamental note: by launching the wind more and more swiftly we obtain not more or less intensity of the same note, but a succession of harmonics. Hence it will not do to count upon the wind to obtain the shades of piano and forte; to swell or diminish the sound, there is no other means but to change the registers, to employ now the most resounding, the most richly timbred, now the more soft and the more veiled. The organist, then, meets with special difficulties in expressive playing; he cannot modify the accent except by discontinuous jerks. Thus the organ is not suited, like the stringed instruments, to a certain impassioned music, which moves the mental sensibility, enveloped in supple and, as it were, live embraces. On the other hand, what majesty there is given to its play by the plenitude of notes, which, so long as they are held, preserve the same power! How awful those sustained, resolute, patient voices, in all of which you never feel a human emotion, nor an earnest muse, which seeks to affect only in learned combinations of harmony! The impersonal character of the organ makes it the religious instrument par excellence. [illegible] more applicable to its sonorous individuality than to that of an ordinary orchestra, and in its severest and most perfect melodies one often finds a strange serenity, a strange detachment from human passion; the trouble becomes terror, the pleasure ecstasy. Raphael, wishing to paint sacred Music, shows us Saint Cecilia offering to heaven a little set of organ pipes which she holds in her hands; at her feet lie in disorder and half broken in pieces, instruments of profane music: viols without strings, tambourines, triangles, &c.

In the reed instruments, the vibrations are produced by a thin tongue, which trembles under the current of air coming from a bellows or the lungs. The means is used in certain registers of the organ, in the harmonium, in the clarinet, the oboe, the bassoon. The human lips themselves perform the function of a membranous reed upon the horn, the trombone, the ophicleid, and the brass instruments in general. What characterizes the sound of these last instruments is the intensity of the resonant harmonics; hence this hard, vibrating, piercing timbre. One might call the brass the instruments of dissonance; hence they should be used only in an orchestra; they are condemned to an accessory part, and we must beware how we allow that part to predominate.

To sum up the whole matter. Does the musician want a soft sound, without force, pure in its accents, he has the flute. Does he want sounds full, but clear and yet softened, he has the part of the open organ pipes, certain notes of the horn. Does he want a hollow sound, such as results from the isolation of the odd harmonics (3, 5, 7), he has the stopped pipes of the organ. Does he want a nasal sound, where there are also none but odd harmonics, but where the most acute predominate, he has the clarinet. Does he want sounds expressive, penetrating, rich, he has the stringed instruments, the hautboy, the bassoon. Finally, does he want sounds shrill, hard and overwhelming, he has but to choose among the instruments of brass.

Robert Schumann.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

There are some analogies between the history of Schumann's music in England and that of his own life. The composer whose genius has battled so long for recognition made a weary search before he found out where his strength lay. As the schoolboy of Zwickau, devoting spare hours to the piano; as the law-student of Leipzig and Heidelberg, mixing up music and jurisprudence; and as the pupil of Friedrich Wieck, injuring at the key-board so hard as to disable a finger, Schumann was groping his way into the light, with confused ideas of its whereabouts. But when there had opened up to him the entire field of musical expression, the light was found, and Schumann saw himself the prophet of a new artistic faith. In modern times poets establish [illegible], and by means of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik the young composer founded a propaganda which is working still, because the world is not yet converted. He preached down forms and used-up ideals; he demanded that music should be liberated from the trammels of precedent, and be free as his own fantastic imagination. Schumann was desperately earnest, and tried hard to reduce his theory to practice. But he found this more difficult than either its conception or its advocacy. Nevertheless, he worked on through what was really a [illegible] period of painful devotion. His earlier compositions show how necessary were the ideas on which he hoped to base the canons of art, and of what mental [illegible] he had to get rid. For the [illegible] in his young enthusiasm Schumann set himself to preach, though in part [illegible], was a passive part [illegible]. His intensely poetic temperament demanded a complete [illegible] that which after all has largely to do with [illegible]. He could not bear to see the genius of [illegible] restrained like a hobbled Pegasus. By so much did Schumann's passion get the better of his reason. He mistook music for a branch of metaphysics.

It was not surprising that even an earnest [illegible] admission of an exaggerated truth should come to see its real proportions, for Schumann was, above all, conscientious. As the [illegible] of youth abated his [illegible] grew clearer; moreover the charm of Mendelssohn's purity and [illegible] began to work upon his mind. It may be, also, that the influence of a gifted wife had something to do with the manifest difference between the first and second periods of his career. At any rate, the first of his symphonies (1841) marked the beginning of a series of works which, though strongly [illegible] conception and treatment, shows the composer had made a compromise with the [illegible] he would [illegible]. The old [illegible] was still [illegible] but not even now Schumann had come to look upon the older masters as other than prophets of an effete dispensation. In the [illegible] of highly [illegible] with acknowledged modes of expression, which marks his second period, lies Schumann's strength, and [illegible] between the three of his first and fourth symphonies, will discover on the place he must definitely hold. Earlier he was a dreaming enthusiast, later a hypochondriac.

We mentioned at the outset that there is an analogy between Schumann's career and the history of his music in England. Such a case could not arise without drawing to herself a few disciples, between whose active enthusiasm on the one side and the passive unbelief of the great majority on the other a long contest would naturally take place. In the [illegible] Schumann stands alone. Haydn and Mozart with their [illegible] melody and transparent [illegible]; Mendelssohn [illegible] his genius though [illegible] [illegible] every heart [illegible] simply by [illegible] grandeur, were promptly welcomed by the English public. Beethoven was only rejected for a time when he entered the "dark [illegible]" to which [illegible] a key. Schumann, on the contrary, has had to fight for every step towards public favor, and the conflict is not half over yet. We charge nobody with [illegible] or prejudice in this matter. The fault, if fault there be, lies with Schumann himself, who chose, or was compelled, to write, caring less for the beauty of his work than for its faithfully reflecting certain trains of thought or emotional conditions. He [illegible] no more certain means of ensuring a desperate disgust, if not dislike. The sticklers for form would have nothing to do with one who made form subservient, while those who wished to be pleased without effort of their own turned away from music the meaning of which—if it had any—required patient seeking out. The results of Schumann's creations, under circumstances like these, is no argument in their favor. That cannot be an insignificant thing, about which the entire musical world has contended for years, and still contends with unabated earnestness. But this may legitimately mean something more to the composer's disciples. They may take it as an earnest of final success. [illegible] such movement in infancy [illegible] the chances of maturity are favorable. Twenty years have passed since Schumann wrote the works upon which his fame will rest. That these works are not only living now, but exciting more attention than ever, warrants a hope as to the future bright enough to satisfy the most exacting admirer.

It is a [illegible] that Schumann has been [illegible] up not [illegible] English friends of late. Some who stood aloof at first, and demanded to know the [illegible] before they trusted him, have permitted friendship to take the place of suspicion. Others, who formerly objected to him [illegible] considered faults, have since discovered merits on account of which they more than [illegible]. And others again—a far larger number—who merely echoed the cry of the hour, begin to waver in their [illegible]. Most of this result is owing to the Crystal Palace Concerts, at which Schumann has been [illegible] through evil and good report with a constancy that deserves success. Happily for the composer Messrs. Grove and Manns—each in his way so great an enthusiast as ever [illegible]—possess exceptional resources, and are able to do their work in the most perfect manner. For example, the performance [illegible] of the Symphony in E flat was worth a hundred essays upon its composer's genius, and made an impression not likely to be soon effaced. Schumann's admirers may well be proud of the work in question, but a [illegible] example which goes far to establish their case. Of its character and purport the master himself has told [illegible]. The Rhine and Cologne [illegible] had [illegible] part in suggesting the [illegible] movements composing it, these being due to the national [illegible] and [illegible] to the religious [illegible]. Schumann gave the former a popular cast, and [illegible] more successfully proved the [illegible] of his powers. Both the opening Vivace and the [illegible] Allegro, not less than the quasi Scherzo, strongly reflect the composer's individuality, yet they are at once straightforward and intelligible [illegible] by Schumann [illegible] the popular [illegible] of the masses. It is [illegible] which might suggest the [illegible] of Rhenish grape-gatherers. The other movements are hardly so satisfactory. The [illegible] memory of one who [illegible] through a Gothic cathedral is apparent in the Andante, while the Religioso though here and there [illegible] conveys the notion of a man struggling with ideas beyond his power of expression. But, these things notwithstanding, [illegible] work [illegible] fitted to make [illegible] judgment of its composer. The [illegible] able to write the Symphony in E flat must not be refused a thorough [illegible] hearing.

The domain of music is a wide one, and affords ample room for Robert Schumann. Even if there were not so, room should be made for one who comes with [illegible] independent thought and original expression. It may have to remain outside [illegible] to the manufacturers of music after other men's patterns, of whom we have enough and to spare. But the [illegible] of Schumann's four symphonies,—of his Pianoforte Concerto [illegible] and [illegible]—should be [illegible] about who speaks, because having something new to say. His speech may be strange, but that of itself is no reason for rejection or even doubt.

The death of Rossini has been the European event of the week as much as, indeed, that the the spirit of Catholicism, the great king of finance, passed by almost unnoticed. The striking and universal homage rendered to genius is a public testimony of the noble emotions engendered by music, which has become, in France as well as in Germany, an art profoundly national, affecting the popular masses equally with the highest strata of society. The venerated Rossini, and the biography of Rossini, cried about the streets at five centimes a piece, found their way spontaneously among the people, while the members of the fashionable world sought for the [illegible] of the great man [illegible] on these [illegible]. The name of Rossini [illegible] all [illegible] the [illegible] same magic [illegible] which no human being can [illegible]. The [illegible] reproduced [illegible] the name and [illegible] Rossini's. The [illegible] of France [illegible] on the memories of all, and will ever remain so. They are [illegible] and [illegible]. The name of the Barbiere and of Otello will live as long as Beaumarchais and Shakspeare. But let us leave to the [illegible] the [illegible] with eloquence and with a conviction of the truth of a last [illegible], the task of sketching, with bold strokes, the portrait of that mighty musical genius. [illegible] for the words pronounced by M. Ambroise Thomas, in the name of the Academy of Fine Arts, at the tomb of the great master whose loss France deplores as deeply as Italy. J. L. B.

Oration of M. Ambroise Thomas.

My emotion is profound, and I should [illegible] to overcome this intense agitation which I now experience, were I not borne up by the thought that I am speaking in the name of the Academy of Fine Arts, of the Institute.

[illegible] the honor of entrusting to me this formidable mission of representing it in this moment. The Academy [illegible] that the expression of its regret—the public one of solemn homage—paid by it [illegible] should come from the lips of a musician [illegible] humble [illegible] fervent of Rossini's admirers.

[illegible] when we behold a man of genius [illegible] among us, when we see one of those lights [illegible], the most eloquent praise of all would be, perhaps, to be [illegible] silence.

I shall [illegible], therefore, [illegible] the works of Rossini [illegible] that [illegible], [illegible] the Academy [illegible] of the artist [illegible] upon his art.

[illegible] from the bosom of Italian school, [illegible] with a fertile imagination, and [illegible] by the most brilliant [illegible] from the very commencement of his career, with works of incomparable vigor and brilliancy.

[illegible] the appearance of [illegible] followed. The fame of [illegible] spread through all Europe, and Europe [illegible] his luminous [illegible] and welcomed the [illegible].

[illegible] by the [illegible] which he possessed, the art of [illegible] his works and by the variety of his [illegible], and, also, by the marvellous [illegible] he brought [illegible] to the best advantage [illegible] of great singers, [illegible] of his language.

[illegible] and the [illegible] over [illegible] singing [illegible] have sufficed [illegible] Rossini the great [illegible] of the world.

[illegible] rapid and prodigious success due to the [illegible] of a school [illegible] which will [illegible] escape the [illegible] of [illegible], [illegible] world, perhaps, have not endured so long [illegible] structure of [illegible] had one [illegible] behind [illegible] of [illegible] order. Dramatic life and movement, truth of character, [illegible], [illegible] harmony of proportions, elegance and charm of a [illegible] are the beauties which Rossini has scattered through his works, which he thus [illegible] with the impress of a great master.

"It is [illegible] and in comedy he has [illegible] proved himself [illegible], to what a height has he not attained when [illegible] the most serious subjects! With what [illegible] of tenderness and with [illegible] [illegible] not [illegible] the most grandiose accent! His last dramatic masterpiece, Guillaume Tell, written expressly for France, displays to full [illegible] advantage [illegible] the most admirable way the elevation of his thoughts, the [illegible] of his imagination and the majestic serenity of his style.

"From the remembrance and consideration of Rossini's works, ought we not to-day more than ever to derive a salutary lesson?

"How was it that this marvellously gifted melodist became a thinker and a great musician? It was by studying assiduously the models of every school; it was by giving his mind up more especially to Haydn and to Mozart, whom, during all his life, he [illegible] [illegible] until [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] masterpieces of [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] improbable.

"Let us not be mistaken. Under [illegible] appearance of scepticism, Rossini [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of his [illegible] to productive, [illegible] people will [illegible] who were fortunate enough [illegible] of approaching the [illegible] of his character, [illegible] what reserve he followed the movement [illegible] and how correctly he judged the [illegible] through which one art is passing.

"He looked forward [illegible] the Future, everything about him went to his [illegible], [illegible] confidence in the triumph of the immutable principles of the Beautiful.

"He had a right to reckon on the equitable judgment of posterity, [illegible] to believe, with us, in the [illegible] of his works!

"Gentlemen, one word more, one more act of homage, rendered not only to the great genius but to the [illegible] heart. [illegible] leaving a [illegible] and [illegible] to all [illegible] sympathy for France, his adopted country, Rossini [illegible] founded two prizes of three thousand francs, to be awarded every year in his name, one for a [illegible] poem, and the other for a musical composition, lyrical and religious.

"The Academy [illegible] a pious duty [illegible] this noble and generous thought. In the name of the young artists of France, who alone will be allowed to compete, [illegible] express to [illegible] feelings of lively and profound gratitude.

* * * * * *

After these last words of M. Ambroise Thomas, words greeted by prolonged marks of approbation, we will place before our readers the actual text of this double legacy bequeathed by Rossini.

THE ROSSINI PRIZE.

Testament of Rossini.

"I decide that, after my decease and that of my wife, there shall be founded, at Paris, and exclusively for Frenchmen, two prizes, of three thousand francs each, to be awarded annually, [illegible] for the composer of a piece of religious or lyric music, the composer being bound to pay particular attention to melody, so neglected at the present day; and the other to the author of the words (prose or verse) to which the music is to be wedded, the said words being perfectly appropriate to the music, and the laws of [illegible] [illegible] rigorously observed in them. These [illegible] will be submitted to the consideration of a special committee chosen from among the members of the Academy of Fine Arts, and the committee shall decide which of the competitors shall have deserved the prize, called the Prix Rossini, to be awarded at a public meeting after the performance of the piece [illegible] in the building of the Institute or of the Conservatory.

"It has been my wish, in bequeathing this legacy, to leave to France a [illegible] from which I received [illegible] a testimony of my gratitude, and of my desire for the perfection of that art to which I consecrated my life. G. ROSSINI."

We must also inform our readers that, by the same will Rossini, being equally anxious to [illegible] his [illegible] fortune [illegible] a property [illegible] the proceeds of [illegible] objets d'art, [illegible], and [illegible] to be given to France, for the purpose of founding a Conservatory which [illegible] by the [illegible] the two prizes founded by [illegible] bear his name.

[illegible] two [illegible] Rossini [illegible] by him, [illegible], to the city of Bologna, there are no particular testamentary [illegible]. He leaves his widow for her life his villa in the Bois de Boulogne together with his [illegible] fortune, and the complete collection of his manuscripts and posthumous works, which will constitute quite another fortune. His admirable Mass, composed for his friend, [illegible], would alone suffice to do so. One thing may be confidently asserted, namely, that this monumental work, scored by the hand of the master himself, will render him a second time celebrated in a department of music in which his immortal Stabat has already placed him so high.

This admirable Mass was not heard at Rossini's funeral service: the prayer from Moïse [illegible] words, fragments of the Stabat, combined with fragments from the [illegible] of Jomelli, Pergolese, and Mozart—Mozart, for whom Rossini entertained so deep an affection, and whom he used to call the master of masters—had to be [illegible] instead. Jomelli's "Libera" was selected [illegible] Rossini [illegible] for this magnificent piece at the meetings of the Academic Society for Sacred Music, founded and directed by M. Vervoitte.

Verdi and Rossini.

The following letter has appeared in the Italian journals:

"MY DEAR [illegible],—To [illegible] the memory of Rossini I should like that the most distinguished Italian composers [illegible] by Mercadante, were [illegible] a Requiem Mass [illegible]. I should like, that not only the composers, but also the performers [illegible]. [illegible] should be performed in the Cathedral of St. Petronio in the city of Bologna, which [illegible] Rossini. [illegible] to be an object [illegible] or speculation [illegible] performed [illegible] and put into the [illegible] of the [illegible] Lyceum of that city [illegible]. Examples [illegible], perhaps be made [illegible] anniversaries, [illegible] to celebrate them. If I were in the Holy Father's good graces, I should beg of him to allow, for this time at least, that women might take part in the performance of this music; but, this not being the case, a more acceptable person must be found to obtain the object. It will be well to institute a committee of intelligent men to arrange the performance, and above all, to select the composers, distribute the pieces, and superintend the general form of the work. This composition (good as the single pieces may prove) will be wanting in the necessary musical uniformity; but, if defective on this point, it will serve [illegible] the veneration for that man whose loss the whole world deplores.

Believe me, yours, [illegible]

Apropos of Miss Hauck, whose first appearance at Covent Garden [illegible] the orchestra, the great English [illegible] addressed the following letter to the Athenæum:

"I read with great interest your comment upon Miss Hauck's début at Covent Garden, that it is high time the pitch of our orchestras should be adapted to the normal [illegible] in France and Germany. This [illegible] is one which I have [illegible] and repeatedly [illegible] up to the present [illegible] I [illegible] that [illegible] your [illegible] will meet with [illegible] attention than my individual reiteration of it.

"[illegible] foreign orchestras [illegible] against, as you [illegible] the most delicate of all instruments, being sacrificed to the [illegible] by forcing up the pitch [illegible] English artists generally. And [illegible] is a half-tone higher than that of most foreign orchestras, and a whole tone higher than it was in the time of Gluck.

"So strong is my conviction upon this subject, that some time back I [illegible] to the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society my final decision [illegible] pleading [illegible] for my coming to a contrary [illegible] the [illegible] as long as the pitch of the orchestra was [illegible] at its present height, and [illegible] you suggest, '[illegible] to the normal diapason of France.'

CONCERTS.—The Orchestra, Dec. 5, furnishes the following reports:

The last Crystal Palace concert embraced the following programme:—

[illegible] in C	Mendelssohn.
[illegible] "[illegible]"	Beethoven.
Variations on "[illegible]" from the String Quartet in C	Haydn.
Song with Violin, [illegible]	Gounod.
Ballad Song, "The Legend of the Crusader"	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
Triumphal March, [illegible]	[illegible]

Though containing no absolute novelty (as is the "Moses of Oil-sea" [illegible]), the work at least possessed a legitimate source of attraction, an attraction which it [illegible]. Produced at this evening first in 1814 and [illegible] from time to time both in town and throughout the provinces, it has been neglected of late [illegible] sufficient length of time to give it all the freshness of novelty. [illegible] in [illegible] and [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] to [illegible] moved from the [illegible] of art by the [illegible] delivery of Beethoven's [illegible] self [illegible] from [illegible] The words originally [illegible] by common consent appear [illegible] third person. [illegible] on Saturday [illegible] favorable [illegible] was [illegible]. The solos were given by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. Lewis Thomas, and the [illegible] early [illegible] With a better choir the [illegible] choruses would have stood a better chance [illegible] some improvement [illegible]. Gounod's "[illegible]," sung by Mr. Thomas, and the "Legend of the Crossbill," given with advantage by Mme. Sherrington, were among the best received numbers of Saturday.

The last Monday Popular Concert was signalled by the following programme:—

Octet, in F, Op. 166	Schubert.
Song, "[illegible]"	Mozart.
Sonata, in A flat, Op. 39, pianoforte	Weber.
Andante and [illegible]	Molique.
Songs { "Through the night [illegible]"	Schubert.
"[illegible]"	Schumann.
Quartet in C major, Op. 59, No. 3	Beethoven.

Schubert's Octet has been given before in St. James's Hall and created so good an impression as heretofore. The quintet of performers was made up by Herr Straus, who reappeared in the part of the violin and was warmly welcomed. Herr Pauer gave a spirited rendering of Weber's [illegible] A flat, and Signor Piatti did equally well in the [illegible] from Molique's [illegible] arranged with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Vernon Rigby was the vocalist.

From the same, Dec. 19.

The Crystal Palace followed on Saturday the example of other musical bodies in devoting a performance to the memory of Rossini. The programme, which was headed with an explanation on the part of Mr. Manns that the want of completeness in the selection as a representation of the genius of the [illegible] composer was a[illegible] of the programme's [illegible] with [illegible] Saturday's concert and the reconstruction of the [illegible]—was executed as follows:—

Overture, "Tancredi"	Rossini.
Air, "[illegible]" ("Stabat Mater")	"
Air, "Cujus animam" ("Stabat Mater")	"
Overture, "[illegible]"	"
[illegible]	"
[illegible]	"
Overture, "Guillaume Tell"	"
Ballet Airs, "Guillaume Tell"	"
Overture, "Semiramide"	"

[illegible] and two numbers in addition, which, however, could not be [illegible] Mr. George Perren and Herr Wallace [illegible]. Mr. Perren, nevertheless, though suffering from the effects of the weather, did sing "Cujus Animam." It will be noticed that the disposition of the pieces in the programme, though lacking the effect of chronological sequence, was well calculated to afford variety and contrast. Mlle. Sinico [illegible] in the "Non più mesta" [illegible], in which she [illegible] voice [illegible] the florid passages. Mlle. [illegible] the [illegible] song from "Otello" with [illegible], and the quartet from the "Stabat" received full justice from all the singers. The four overtures and the ballet music from "William Tell" received every assistance from Mr. Manns's experienced band.

The following was the selection given at the last Monday Popular Concert:

Septet in E flat, Op. 20	Beethoven.
Song, "[illegible]" ("[illegible]")	Handel.
Sonata, in E major, Op. 109, pianoforte	Beethoven.
Sonata, in A major, for violin	Handel.
Songs, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Quartet in D, [illegible]	Haydn.

The occasion was the hundredth birthday, and a large audience assembled, attracted probably by Beethoven's splendid septet in E flat, a work which however has been illustrated in these concerts more often. Mr. J. F. Barnett made his first appearance as pianist, choosing for performance that sonata of Beethoven's dedicated to Count Waldstein and dating from 1805. The execution of the young composer, being brilliant, and full of spirit, was deservedly well received. At times his enthusiasm betrayed his judgment, and the piano became a trumpet; but on the whole Mr. Barnett may be here said to be well satisfied with both the performance and its reception. The instrumentalists—Messrs. Straus, H. Blagrove, Piatti, Reynolds, Lazarus, Harper, and Winterbottom—were in each case so full a part whether the E flat septet, Haydn's [illegible] quartet, or Gounod's or Corelli's artistic sonata was the subject in hand. The last was executed by Herr Straus in admirable fashion, and ably accompanied by Mr. Benedict. Mme. Sainton-Dolby sang.

With a little more precision on the part of the chorus the performance of Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" at the National Choral Society on Wednesday would have been more satisfactory. As regards the principal vocalists, the efforts of Miss Anna Jewell, Miss Lucy Franklein, Messrs. George Perren and Lewis Thomas deserve [illegible] mention. Miss Franklein obtained an encore after her singing, "O Lord, Thou hast [illegible] me out." Another [illegible] was awarded to the unaccompanied quartet, "God [illegible]." A [illegible] chorus from "Acis" and the "First Walpurgis Night," by Mendelssohn, followed; the tenor [illegible], the vocalists being the same. The hall was full.

(From the Musical World, Dec. 12.)

The Sacred Harmonic Society in Exeter Hall has given a performance of "Israel in Egypt," under Mr. Costa's direction, in which no more falls than Handel's choral masterpiece is concerned; the choruses were magnificent [illegible] throughout. The [illegible]—allotted to Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Robertine Henderson, Mme. [illegible], Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Santley and [illegible]—were without exception well sustained. The duet for basses, "The Lord is a man of war," (Messrs. Santley and Foli) was encored as usual, and [illegible] upon Mr. Rigby's [illegible] and [illegible] delivery of the great tenor air, "The enemy said." Mr. Rigby however wisely adhered from submitting to the wishes of the audience—[illegible]. [illegible] the honour he had [illegible] to [illegible] the only other encore was awarded to the chorus, "He gave them hailstones," the effect of which was overpowering. This concert, like its immediate precursor (when Mr. Costa's Naaman was the oratorio), was honoured by the presence of the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia.

[illegible] was [illegible] the [illegible] concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society—a concert "in memoriam" in the honor of the late Rossini, the greatest of Italian composers. The programme was fully worthy the occasion. Handel's "Dead March" was first played, during which the audience, as well as the members of the chorus, rose and remained standing. This was followed by the late composer's Stabat Mater, and the whole concluded with Mozart's Requiem. As such pieces the leading singers were Mme. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, Mr. W. H. Cummings and Signor Tagliafico. Of the [illegible] such [illegible] would be [illegible] to [illegible] engaged—soli, chorus, orchestra and conductor (Mr. Costa) [illegible] the performance, on the whole, was one of rare excellence. There was little applause, and on such an occasion it would have been better had there been none—as expression which it must be admitted seemed very naturally to prevail. Most of the singers were in mourning, and according to a [illegible] of the great composer (from Mr. Dunstan [illegible]) was a conspicuous part in front of the orchestra just beneath the platform where the conductor stood. The whole [illegible] was so solemn and impressive as it will have been desired by the most ardent worshipper of Rossini's genius; and the hall was crowded in every part.

Dearmer Hayes Hall. The Editor of the Musical World pays the following tribute to his friend and principal assistant:

It is our painful duty to record the death of one of the oldest and most highly esteemed contributors to this journal. After a long and trying illness, Mr. Desmond Ryan died in the early morning of the [illegible] at his residence, 11 Tavistock Road, Hyde Park Gardens. Mr. Ryan first wrote for the Musical World in 1844. In 1846 he became its sub-editor, and held that post until within a few months of his decease. Those who knew him here can of course be unable to estimate his worth; and the editor of these lines [illegible] not merely to regret the loss of a valued and invaluable [illegible] but of a friend in the truest and fullest acceptation of the word. Leipzig.

The Western Musical Review (Indianapolis) has the following letter, dated Leipzig, Nov. 21, 1868:

which sums up the [illegible] in these days. (We hear various opinions, however, about the occasion in lieu of Max Bruch.)

At the third Gewandhaus Concert, Oct. 29th, the glorious Leonora overture (No. 3) by Beethoven, and a new symphony by Max Bruch (Op. 28,) were the orchestral selections, and both were played with splendid fire and precision. The symphony was performed under the personal direction of its talented composer, who studied under Ferdinand Hiller and is one of the chief of the young German composers. It is full of energy, strength, and its fine musical ideas, which are well expressed and admirably treated, are presented with an ease and brilliant instrumentation. Max Bruch is still a comparatively young man (born in Cologne, January 6, 1838,) and his great talent and energy promise noble artistic achievements.

The soloist of the occasion was Joseph Joachim, and wife. The former played the recitative, andante and allegro movements from Spohr's sixth violin concerto, and an adagio and fugue in C major by Bach. In both compositions he played with wonderful tone and sentiment, and called forth hearty applause from the delighted audience. Frau Joachim was equally successful in her interpretation of an aria from Figaro's Hochzeit by Mozart, and two beautiful songs: (a) Mondnacht, by Brahms; (b) Die Blume, by R. Schumann.

The five Euterpe concert was given October 20th, and the evening's programme opened with a splendid performance of Weber's fiery overture to Euryanthe. This was the only satisfactory orchestral performance of the evening, a [illegible] for the succeeding works—Introduction to "Tristan and Isolde," and "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, were played in a most tantalizing manner. Fräulein Held, from Coburg, sang a difficult aria from "Roberto," and an aria from Ambroise Thomas's opera, "Mignon," with considerable brilliancy of execution and fine figure. The aria from "Mignon" is simple and tasteful.

As second concert at the last mentioned hall, stood the violin virtuoso of Louis Ries from London, who played the great concerto by Beethoven, and the adagio from Spohr's ninth violin concerto, with a beauty of tone, fidelity and smoothness of execution, and warmth—the conception and interpretation which could only be excelled by Joachim.

On the 19th inst. the fourth Gewandhaus Concert brought Beethoven's festival overture (Op. 124,) and the "Reformation Symphony," by Mendelssohn to performance. Through the acoustical superiority of the Gewandhaus Hall, the latter work gained even more friends than upon the occasion of its first performance in the Leipzig Opera House, last June. The scherzo and finale were taken in a [illegible] tempo.

Herr Carl Wallenreiter from Stuttgart sang an aria from an Easter cantata, "The Resurrection of Lazarus," by Franz Schubert, and songs by Scarlatti, Storchio and Schumann. His voice is pleasant but not powerful, and he sings in a very tasteful, appreciative manner. Frl. Epstein, from Vienna, played a pianoforte concerto, in E flat, by Weber, and solo pieces by Moscheles, Chopin and Mendelssohn. She has fine execution and all-round talent, and it is to be hoped that her flattering reception at the Gewandhaus will incite her to further artistic exertions.

The fifth Gewandhaus Concert, November 5th, offered a programme in remembrance of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, who died in Leipzig, November 4, 1847. The first part of the programme was devoted to compositions by the great master, and included a choral, the adagio and scherzo [illegible] in the "Scottish Symphony," and three numbers from the unfinished "Loreley," (a) Vintagers' chorus for male voices, (b) Ave Maria for soprano-solo and female chorus, (c) finale for soprano-solo, chorus and grand orchestra.

Frau Friedrike Lautner from the Leipzig Opera House sang the splendid soprano-solo as only a true artist could, and the chorus and orchestra were as full and as admirably disciplined, that the performance fully electrified the audience. The Eroica symphony by Beethoven, with its sublime funeral march, formed an appropriate conclusion to the delightful concert.

On the following evening, the first soirée of chamber music took place in the Gewandhaus Hall, Concertmeister David, H. Röntgen, F. Hermann and E. Hegar playing the string instruments, and the pianist, Saint-Saëns from Paris, as guest. The evening performance included Schumann's strong quartet in A, No. 3, and one by F. Schubert in D minor (posthumous), both of which were splendidly played; a trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello (Op. 18) by Saint-Saëns and Mendelssohn's Op. 35 Fantasia for piano solo. The trio is a genial, interesting and noticeably developed composition, which displays both instruments—and especially the pianoforte—to [illegible] advantage, but, while it is pleasing to an audience, and a graceful task for artists, it is not a composition calculated to create lasting impressions, and the pleasure derived from listening to it is merely transient. Saint Saens' splendid virtuosity found full play in the last movement of the Scherzo (as well as in the trio), for although he took it in such rapid tempo that the thematic figure was not clearly and perfectly defined throughout, it was notwithstanding a very interesting test of strength, velocity and flexibility of fingers.

At the second Euterpe Concert, November 24th, a very good performance of Beethoven's beautiful B major symphony opened the programme. A young conservatory [illegible] George Henschel, from Breslau, sang an aria from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and we [illegible] songs "[illegible]" by Schubert, and "[illegible]" by Franz, in fine style. He [illegible] possessor of an uncommon baritone voice of fine quality, power and compass and [illegible] [illegible] energy and [illegible] he [illegible] a fine artist. The great feature of the evening, however, was the pianoforte playing of [illegible], who played Schumann's A minor concerto, for piano and orchestra and three transcriptions, by Franz Liszt: (a) G minor prelude and fugue, from Bach's [illegible]; (b) Soirée de Vienne [illegible] from F. Schubert; (c) La Campanella from Paganini. [illegible] was born in [illegible], in [illegible], and received her musical education and instruction under the especial care of Professor [illegible] of the Stuttgart Conservatorium. She made her first concert tour in 1863, visiting Leipzig, Dresden, Berlin etc. and at the early age of [illegible] founded a reputation by her superb playing. Since then she has been almost constantly engaged in artistic tours, and her appearance in every centre and public arena [illegible] interesting. Her tone is pure and [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] feminine delicacy and fairy [illegible] energy and her strength and fearlessness in trills and fingering are surprising. In the beautiful concerto and her difficult solo pieces she displayed fine artistic conception and tonal [illegible] and she received hearty and merited applause after each appearance.

The concert closed with a very good performance of [illegible] and [illegible] overture for grand orchestra, by [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] which has alternated between the grand and the [illegible] was the best feature of the work, which is written in a highly [illegible] mood, and displays too marked study of the compositions of Wagner.

The ninth Gewandhaus Concert, November 26th, offered the [illegible] concerto for string orchestra by [illegible] and Schumann's grand C major symphony. Herr [illegible] from Moscow played a difficult concerto by Paganini and [illegible] original pieces for violin and orchestra. He has a [illegible] and he plays with [illegible] execution, and [illegible] to be an artist of the very highest rank [illegible] playing is refined and [illegible] and he is always [illegible]. Frl. [illegible] from Munich sang an aria from Haydn's "Creation" and one from Spontini's "Vestale" in a pleasing style.

Carl Tausig gave a pianoforte recital in the Gewandhaus on the evening of the 18th inst., with the following programme: [1] Sonata, Op. [illegible], Beethoven. [2] Prelude, fugue and allegro, in E flat, J. S. Bach; Toccata Op. 7, Schumann. [3] Davidsbündlertänze, nineteen characteristic pieces Op. 6, Schumann. [4] Nocturne Op. [illegible] No. [illegible]; Etude, Op. 25 No. [illegible] and Scherzo, Op. [illegible], Chopin. [5] Soirées de Vienne, [illegible] Fêtes d'Espagne, Jota Aragonese, [illegible] Liszt.

This long and difficult programme was played from memory with unfailing [illegible], and all of the wonderful virtues for which Tausig is so famous, and second [illegible] [illegible] by such a series of pianoforte solos, the audience [illegible]—though it [illegible] repeated encores, to gain additional [illegible].

The last musical event up to the time of writing, was the [illegible] of chamber music which was given on the [illegible] [illegible] a crowded and intense [illegible] Haydn's D major quartet, played by Herrmann, [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible]; [illegible] Sonata by [illegible] for [illegible] piano accompaniment.) [illegible] Op. 95 No. [illegible] [illegible] and Concertmeister David) and Quartet in C major by Beethoven, (David playing first violin) [illegible] the programme, which was admirably performed throughout. Herr Röntgen [illegible] the first violin parts. He [illegible] of [illegible] has the same [illegible] David, but while his phrasing and conception were likewise thoroughly excellent, we missed the breadth and [illegible] of David's tone, and we trust his [illegible] is but a temporary one. A. H. P.

At the third concert of the Euterpe Society the orchestra performed the overture to Coriolanus [illegible]

Händel, and "Les Préludes," Liszt. Herr [illegible] displayed his talent as an [illegible] to advantage in Bruch's Violin Concerto, as well as in Bach's Prelude and Fugue, C minor. Mlle. [illegible] from Breslau, sang the cavatina, "[illegible]" from Weber's Euryanthe, and three songs by Taubert, Mendelssohn, and [illegible].—Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur has proved highly successful, and become a regular stock piece.—Dr. Franz Brendel died here on the 25th ult., aged [illegible] years. He held the post of Professor of Musical History in the Conservatory. He was known chiefly as author of his Geschichte der Musik [illegible] [illegible] as editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, founded by Robert Schumann.

BOSTON, JAN. 9, 1869.

Harvard Musical Association.

The fourth Symphony Concert came on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 24, which was Christmas Eve. Accordingly the programme, of which the idea had been simply to present a historical succession of three great masters of orchestral composition, was by an after-thought further enriched by the insertion of a couple of Arias from Bach immediately before the closing fairy Overture, whereby the tone of the concert modulated into the religious feelings and associations of the golden childlike fancies of the holy happy season:

Symphony, in B flat (No. 1 [illegible] Breitkopf and Härtel)	Haydn
[illegible] Allegro Cantabile—Minuet—Presto.
Concerto, in E flat, for two Pianos.	Mozart.
[illegible]
[illegible]	Parker.
Second Symphony, in D.	Beethoven.
Adagio, [illegible]—Larghetto—Scherzo—Finale.
a. [illegible]	Bach.
b. [illegible]	Bach.
[illegible]
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."	Mendelssohn.

The Haydn Symphony—not the more familiar one in the same key which was played in the first season of these concerts, but another which we think was never played before in Boston—proved one of the most enjoyable of them. Indeed it is one of the very best he wrote, both in felicity of ideas and complete employment of all the individualities and combinations of the orchestra in their development and treatment. In some respects it seems even to go beyond Haydn: here and there suggesting Beethoven. The modern stamp of some of its phrases, the boldness of the surprises, the sudden and yet happy changes of key, and the (more than usual in him) contrapuntal, closely wrought texture, especially of the first movement and the latter portion of the Adagio, yet without any forfeiture of the cheerful Haydn naiveté, bring him as it were farther down into our more thoughtful and self-conscious age. From beginning to end it is a delightful music; and in it Father Haydn fairly escapes the charge of sameness, which is the only plea that can be raised against hearing him continually. Anything more fresh and natural, and yet more subtly interwoven than the first Allegro (whose leading motive has first been presented in the adagio in notes of double length for a few bars, by way of solemn introduction) we may hardly find. The Adagio opens in a deep tranquil church-like manner, a prayerful melody soon interrupted by a stormy fortissimo of great majesty and breadth, which subsiding, the melody returns, in the same key, just as before, only with an organ-like figurative bass descending by delicate diatonic steps. A second variation, the bass this time in quicker steps ascending, followed by a brief résumé of the whole (a couple of bars of stretto gathering up all the characteristic phrases in a breath,—two more bars reproducing the fortissimo, two more the original theme) brings the lovely strain to a close.—The Minuet and Trio are of the happiest, and we [illegible] to see Mr. Zerrahn preserving the naïve moderate tempo of those movements with due [illegible]. The Presto Finale is all play of the most humorous graceful fascinating character. A plenty of Christmas frolic there! Only the playfellows are all [illegible] grown and [illegible] age [illegible]. How charmingly the various instruments run out and in, each in its turn now showing in full light, now slipping into the shade! How magical the changes of key and color of the scene after two or three little pauses! And how admirably it was all played with fine outline and precision! The strings showed the benefit of special drill; and it was good to have the Quintet Club back among their number in the full complement again.

The Mozart Concerto could hardly be called a representative work in the full sense that the other three selections were. But it has the characteristic charm of his instrumentation, that warm and tender coloring, that balmy summer atmosphere which all his orchestral creations breathe; while the principal part, so evenly divided between the two pianos, is full of sweet grace and beauty. The ideas are not great, to be sure; they only show the invariably musical and graceful everyday life and habit of a most [illegible] and a consummate master of his art. The last movement is decidedly interesting; the last two spend time [illegible] old-fashioned; yet it was well to hear the whole. Messrs. Lang and Parker (they played it for the first time last year) were altogether happy in the rendering of it; all was neat, clear, fluent, even; and the phrases are answered from one piano to the other with excellent precision. It was an artistic performance, and simple as the music seems, it requires artists to do it justice. The first cadenza by Moscheles is difficult and interesting, save that it is too long. The piece was evidently much enjoyed.

The old familiar second Symphony of Beethoven, which because of its familiarity had not appeared on these programmes before, is the one in which Beethoven is the most immediately related to Mozart and Haydn. (By the way, we have forgotten to remark that in historical sequence really that Mozart Concerto is an older work and of an earlier style than the Symphony of Haydn, who outlived Mozart and whose twelve "Salomon Symphonies," of which this is one, were written in his last days. Historically in that case the order should have been Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Mendelssohn; but the aesthetic balance of a programme required it otherwise.) While the Symphony in D shows the influence of Mozart and Haydn, it is yet full of a vigorous new element which is the individuality, the genius of Beethoven and no other. Here are grander thoughts and loftier aspiration, a richer depth and an earnestness of motive. A Promethean fire thrills along every nerve and fibre of it; and yet it does not count among the greatest of Beethoven's Symphonies. It is a wonderfully long stride as to originality and natural power, from this to the Eroica we heard the other day! One gift however, in which Beethoven is unsurpassed, is obvious even here: the sure instinct by which he combines his instruments so as to bring out their best collective sound, the fresh, robust, robust sonority, a sound that is always all alive, awakening to sense and soul. This time the work was admirably played, and all seemed to listen with keen satisfaction to the broad, majestic Introduction, and the impetuous Allegro with its buoyant, spring-like melodical themes; to the long, yet ever beautiful Larghetto, full of tender reverie, as before a nodding [illegible]; to the genial [illegible] of the Scherzo and Trio, and to the fiery swift Finale.

The "Cradle Song" from Bach's Christmas Oratorio (Weihnachts-Cantate) had only been sung here in small chamber concerts before, in piano accompaniment arranged by Robert Franz. Sunis as now with Bach's own instrumentation, that is, the string quartet of the orchestra, the flute, and the pairs of old instruments now gone out of use (oboi d'amore and oboi di caccia) represented by clarinets and bassoon. It is a lovely pastoral sort of Aria, the melody accompaniment and all alike, and fresh as if composed to-day. Mrs. Barry sang it with true sympathy and feeling, only the prolonged note (middle C) with which the voice leg[illegible] not stand out and tell enough against the instruments. It quite won the hearts of most listeners, and, with the repeating [illegible] was equally successful, though it had to be sung in too low a key for its full brightness, and with omission of the violin obbligato (Mr. Parker furnishing the solo accompaniment on the piano). And the Fairy Overture for a conclusion seemed to be a midwinter Christmas dream as well as for a Midsummer Night, and was played with less delicacy (at least in the tiring parts) than ever before by a Boston orchestra. It was accepted (by those who could remain so long) as a fit prelude to their Christmas Eve.

The concert exceeded the orthodox length by nearly half an hour; yet we have heard no complaint; many had to go away at some were kept away with home festival preparing; yet those who left the Hall during the music did so reluctantly, [illegible] so a way that [illegible] much to [illegible] others. There could be no more gratifying evidence that that large audience have good sense.

The Christmas Oratorios.

The annual performance of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society crowded the Music Hall, as usual, to its utmost capacity. There is no waning in the popular interest in this great religious work. On the other hand the chorus seemed not so full as usual, and the orchestra (owing to theatre engagements on a Saturday evening) was somewhat shrunk in its fair proportions, and in the second violins a [illegible] on the bassoons, the [illegible] players were replaced by others. The accompaniment, as has been too often the case of late, was careless here and there, or overloud and coarse,—sometimes out of tune. But this may be in large part due to the high pitch of the organ,—a level [illegible] which we do not, above, &c. have not been accustomed to hear. Most of the choruses went well; the great ones, like the Hallelujah, the "Wonderful," &c. superbly although we felt sometimes the want of volume. There are a few tangled and tricky ones, though fortunately brief, like "Let all the angels," "Let us break their bonds asunder," and the "Amen," in which many of the voices never do assert themselves with sure and positive precision. The singers learn best, and put their minds more into music which is easier to them and in which they do not run in grooves of lifelong habit; the way they learned Elijah, and still more St. Paul, is proof of this. We were glad to have the beautiful chorus, "And with his stripes" restored. On the other hand there were important omissions in the last part, necessitated by the great length of the Oratorio.—Mr. Zerrahn, wisely, took some movements in a more moderate tempo than hitherto.

The solo parts were, on the whole, commendably satisfactory. At least all was done in the right spirit and with taste and understanding. Miss Anna [illegible] in the contralto airs surpassed herself. Her tones were never richer, purer, or more charged with true soul and feeling. There was no false pathos, no overdone expression, but all was simple, chaste and noble; the delivery of the voice, the phrasing, the light and shade, the whole conception, revealing the artist, the artist. Very interesting too, and equally earnest and genuine and sympathetic were the soprano voice and singing of Miss Adelaide [illegible]. It was her first appearance in oratorio, and not without some slight faltering of voice in the beginning; but as she went on she won upon her listeners, and we can truly say the beauty and spirituality of the music offered fruit as her rendering, which confirmed the promise of her first public effort in a Symphony Concert.

Mr. James Whitney's voice betrayed itself less too much remote in the opening tenor solo, "Comfort ye," and elsewhere lacked the weight that is desirable. But his notes are sweet and sympathetic, and there is feeling and refinement always in his singing. The most pathetic portion, "Thy rebuke" and "Behold and see," were his best in evenly, and felt not easily effect an effort. Mr. Jesse F. Winch, with a rich and musical bass voice, intelligence, delicacy, and remarkably sure [illegible] in the roulade passages, felt the part very sensitively.

Sunday evening brought a smaller crowd of hearers, but crowded [illegible], and orchestra raised to the full complement of the Symphony Concerts, to one of the grandest performances we have yet had of the Elijah. Nearly all the choruses, double quartet, &c., went remarkably well, and there was great improvement in the instrumental setting of the noble great. Miss Phillipps [illegible] noble voice and sang in the one solo, and many have not heard "O rest in the Lord" sung with more beautiful beauty as the [illegible] part of the Queen with chorus, made so effective.

The principal soprano parts were taken by Miss Houston and the occasion derived special interest from the knowledge that it was to be her last public effort as a singer before retiring into private life. The beauty, delicacy and fervor with which she sung enhanced the feeling of the same how it be. In "Hear ye, Israel," in the august "Holy, holy" in the "Angel Trio," &c. her tones seemed [illegible] and penetrating; and seldom has the sharer so held a certainty of outline through a whole performance. She sang as if she loved it, and this would not leave it.

The smaller soprano parts—the Boy looking out for rain, and in the concerted pieces—were taken by Mrs. H. C. Hall, who proved herself the possessor of so beautiful and true a voice, so telling, and who delivered it so well, that one wondered why she never has been called upon before in this way. The Angel Trio was admirably sung by the three ladies and of course [illegible]. Mr. Rudolphsen came back to his old part of the Prophet, and as he always made effective, and this time more so than ever. His voice is a robust one; has the art of giving out his tones with a fresh, very full vibration, and renders the music in a tasteful carefully considered manner. A few bits of fine gem pronunciation marred all perceptible Mr. Whitney as "If with all your hearts," but more particularly in "Then shall the righteous shine," reached its summit so to, his best mark thus far; the last air he sang with more commanding power in addition to his usual good qualities.

Musical Correspondence.

New York, Dec. 28.—On Saturday, Dec. 19, the [illegible] children gave a matinée at Steinway Hall and were assisted by F. Bergner ('cello) Mme. Gramaglia and Julius Dace (violin). The programme was a short one and included the first movement from one of Mozart's string quartets. In it these talented children appeared to better advantage than in any other selection. Miss Jackson—[illegible] pianiste—was very accurate as regards time, and she also exhibited some taste and an example of shading. I would repeat my opinion that it is unwise to bring prodigies before the public: such a course is most more—does incalculable injury to future excellence of the [illegible] virtuoso, while the performance [illegible] reproduction of but little pleasure to the public.

On Saturday evening Mrs. Hampton had a "Testimonial Concert" at Irving Hall; she was assisted by an attractive array of artists together with Theo. Thomas' orchestra. These were the orchestral selections:—

Overture "Genoveva"	Thomé.
"Träumerei"	Schumann.
Overture "Orpheus"	Offenbach.

The audience was a very large one, and here were served was a beautiful floral testimonial presented to a beloved friend to the lady for whose benefit the entertainment was given, and also to Miss McCord and Mlle. [illegible]. Would it not be better for the audience to send their offerings to the residence of the recipients, rather than to parade them before a not particularly interested audience? Also, would it not be decorous for people to be in so My quiet when such a piece as the "Träumerei" is being performed? Portions of it were scarcely audible, owing to the confusion of tongues everywhere prevailing. I know of no reason why ordinary good breeding should be ignored in a concert room.

At the 11th Sunday Evening Concert we had the following [orchestral] programme:—

Poème Symphonique, "Les Préludes"	Liszt.
Entr'acte, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Mignon"	Ambroise Thomas.
"Träumerei"	Schumann.
Marche Triomphale, "Le Prophète"	Meyerbeer.

The soloists were Mme. Rosetti, Mme. Gramaglia, and Mr. Van [illegible]; the latter played Schumann's "Frühlingsnacht or Wien," which was performed by Mr. Mason last season. Mme. Gramaglia sang marvellously well, and although her voice is [illegible], her manner of using it is most artistic and therefore enjoyable.

The "Messiah" was given on Christmas evening at Steinway Hall, by the N. Y. Harmonic Society. The soloists were Miss Houston (Boston), Miss Adelaide Phillips (Alto), Mr. Simpson and Mr. Becker, and the performance was conducted by Mr. Ritter. Having been present—by means Unsatisfactory arising from [illegible] any one to [illegible] a musical [illegible] this impression was never before [illegible] in the city [illegible] an form excellence. [illegible] Miss Houston and Mr. Becker made a more favorable impression, while Miss Phillips and Mr. Simpson still furnishes [illegible] satisfied that [illegible] reputation.

The "Messiah" was also undertaken on Saturday evening by the Brooklyn Choral Union, with Mr. [illegible]'s orchestra, under the direction of H. M. Dunbaugh.

Mr. Thomas' 12th Sunday Concert had the following [orchestral] programme:

Overture, "Athalie"	Mendelssohn.
Abendlied	Schumann.
Minuet	Mozart.
"Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus"	Beethoven.
Grand Festival [illegible]	[illegible]
Overture, "Freischütz"	Weber.
Aria[illegible]	[illegible]
Valse, "[illegible] Sonne"	Lanner.
[illegible], No. 2, [illegible]	Meyerbeer.

In lieu of vocal and instrumental solos there were two recitations by Miss Theresa Bloch (her first appearance in this city.) F.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 22.—The second concert of the [illegible] Society given last night, had for a principal feature "The Crusaders," a rather recent choral work by Gade, rendered here for the first time. It is a work of [illegible] and of [illegible] with "Comala" and the "Erl King's Daughter" by the same composer, but as a whole I deem it you[illegible] [illegible] composition. Its weakest part is the second scene which seems too much spun out [illegible] rather [illegible] and contains a good many monotonous passages, but the greater part of the [illegible] is very [illegible]. It ends in a happy [illegible] with the Crusaders [illegible] before upon reaching Jerusalem. But the last number of [illegible] the last in the first scene, a prayer by the [illegible] and Chorus. In it there occur a few favorite passages of a truly grand expression, which seem to me more striking than anything else of that character written by the genial Danish composer.

Of the execution, the Daily Gazette of this city reports as follows:

"The voices are all pure, fresh and strong, and been evidently trained [illegible] individual [illegible]. The members have, under the direction of Mr. [illegible] learned one thing of great importance, and that is the habit of [illegible] to the piano, which with them acts as conductor. The result is that the attack was always prompt, and the close exact. In forte passages they were even excellent, yet they presented a most beautiful crescendo and pianissimo clearly proving that they could do a fast as few choral societies can without long pause.

"It is one particularly an easy matter for a conductor to have [illegible] to the top of their voices thereby producing a great deal of noise, but to have them so under his control that they can produce the most delicate pianissimo without losing their quality of tone, is one of the strongest proofs of good training."

In the second part of the concert the Chorus gave us two French People's Songs from the 11th Century, which are truly charming, and were greatly enjoyed by the audience. When these songs were first performed in a Leipzig "Gewandhaus" concert a year or two ago, they created quite a sensation there.—Here is the entire programme:

The Crusaders, a dramatic poem by Carl Andersen, [illegible] "[illegible]" for Chorus and Solo, by N. W. Gade.
Polonaise pour Piano à Quatre mains. Opus [illegible] F. Schubert.
[illegible] Schubert.
Two French People's Songs "[illegible]," from the 11th Century, for Chorus.
[illegible] for Piano, [illegible]
"Gypsies' Life," a poem by Geibel, for Solo and Chorus. Schumann.

The "Maennerchor" Society with Mr. Andres as leader have given a second public concert, the programme embracing Mozart's Symphony in G minor and two parts of Haydn's "Seasons." I was not present, but I hear the concert highly praised. From the public at large these concerts deserve a great deal more attention than they have yet received. Mr. Andres [illegible] few occasions, I am pleased to hear very [illegible] the Orchestra and it is only to be desired that he would [illegible] before the public, as [illegible] has [illegible] no [illegible] prejudices against him. He has [illegible] the Orchestra [illegible] Mr. Barus who, recently [illegible] altogether too much given to get up very [illegible] performances after one or two rehearsals and in this way is really doing harm to the cause of good music.

Mr. Barus by this means, successfully has also killed [illegible] to our regret the Orchestral Concerts in the afternoon which we have had for a course or two. These concerts commenced well enough, but, with injudicious blowing in the public prints, and praise from persons who know little about music [illegible] probably because too much [illegible] and [illegible] The [illegible] better performance [illegible] and [illegible] always depend upon real [illegible]. The [illegible] in such matters is a [illegible] to a [illegible] natural growth. X.

PARIS, DEC. 7.—The 6th Concert Populaire (the last one of the first series) took place yesterday with the following programme:

Overture of "[illegible]" Mendelssohn.
Symphony in B [illegible] Beethoven
Allegro. [illegible] Menuet. Trio.
Fragment [illegible] Franz Schubert.
[illegible] Concerto pour Violon [illegible] Rode.
par M. Heymann, [illegible] du Conservatoire [illegible]
Prélude de "Lohengrin" Wagner.
Invitation à la Valse [illegible] Weber.

The Symphony was well rendered, and so was the fragment Symphonique of Schubert, from which, by the way, Meyerbeer seems to have taken (to use a mild term) the prelude to the 4th of L'Africaine. The Rode Concerto was played by M. Heymann, who is apparently no more than 11 years of age, in a manner which elicited much applause. He has certainly much [illegible] talent and also the [illegible] of expression; but nevertheless his playing is that of a pupil rather than of an artist. His tone is very thin, and in the second part it was not always pure. The violin used by him, too, was not powerful enough, and the effect of the [illegible] be the Concerto was lost. In speaking of Rode's Concerto I am reminded of the fact that I recently heard but one of its movements played by M. Hermann Collingnon, a gentleman well known at the Conservatoire both as an artist and as a member of the Société des Concerts. M. Collingnon [illegible] reminds one forcibly of that of our Mr. Theo. Thomas; and his pure, [illegible] well sustained tone, with the absence of all false and [illegible] [illegible] bespeak the thoroughly accomplished musician.

This last Popular Concert,—to return to that subject—was remarkable for a very unpleasant contretemps which occurred in the following manner. After the performance of Wagner's [illegible] prelude to Lohengrin, a large portion of the audience [illegible] for hearing it again and M. Pasdeloup accordingly gave his signal to recommence. But no sooner was the first note sounded than there arose a storm of hisses and cries of Non! Non! from another faction which, although a minority, made more the [illegible] noise on that account. Again the orchestra began and actually played a few measures (in fact style as I could see from the evidence of their elbows), but not a note could be heard. During [illegible] did this state of affairs continue, and no less than ten times did [illegible] conductor try to repeat the accursed piece, [illegible] without success. Then none but one course to pursue; and it was announced that the "Invitation à la Valse" would be played, and that those who desired a repetition of the Wagner prelude might remain after the concert. This was accordingly done, and the "Invitation" played in such quick time that the musical effect was entirely lost. As nearly as I could judge, about three fourths of the audience remained to hear the repetition of the prelude. [illegible] to see the others as they passed out, I was struck by the [illegible] and [illegible] appearance which they sufficiently bore. Some of these had [illegible] and [illegible] evidently a prey to some secret grief! Then I understood all. They were the veterans who had heard the fragments from the "Meistersinger" played at former concerts; the result of which had been a breaking down of the constitution, and a complete shattering of the nervous system. I prophesied that no good would result of this music. Behold the proof!

At the Opera there is little new. Mme. Patti was announced to sing last week in Il Trovatore, but being indisposed she was unable to appear, and another lady was [illegible] to take her place. [illegible] the intelligent [illegible] at the bureau in [illegible] and demanded a restitution of their money, all of which was flattering to Patti, but not pleasant for the "other lady." Apropos of Mme. Patti, she will, I am told, depart for St. Petersburg on the 20th inst. and there is to be talk of a concert to be given by her previous to that date, the proceeds of which will go [illegible] towards the erection of a monument to [illegible]. The Voice, the Ear and Music.*

III. The Human Voice.

At last we come to the instrument par excellence, the Human Voice. Its study has been singularly facilitated by the laryngian mirror or laryngoscope, an instrument perfected and brought into common use by a physiologist, M. Czermak. The little apparatus allows one to see each case in the back part of the mouth, and to perceive the vibrations which accompany the word. The vocal ligaments act after the manner of two membranous lips which, closing and opening rapidly, produce a sound; the resonant chamber of the mouth merely swells the increasing by the larynx. The reed of the larynx having a marvellous ... [illegible] that of ordinary instruments the advantage of being able to give an immense variety of sounds. The characteristic movement of a reed, shutting and opening alternately the passage of the air, lends itself in a very special manner to the development of harmonics (overtones); and in the piercing sound of a freely vibrating metallic reed the ear armed with resonators can discern as many as twenty of them. A fine human voice is incredibly rich in overtones. The sound and ... of a reed instrument are necessarily modified by the column of air to which the movements of the ... tongue communicate themselves. The mass of air acts like a veritable resonator which reinforces certain notes of the reed to the injury of others. The human voice ... must be considered as a reed of variable pitch, completed by a resonator of variable resonance. The glottis is the reed, the mouth the resonator. It is impossible to imagine a more ... apparatus, or one better showing how the works of life always surpass our ... [illegible]. While the ... [illegible] upon all the tones of the musical scale, the mouth and tongue in a ... way contract, expand, hollow and mould themselves so as to make the overtones respond ... and thus give the most different timbres to the total sound. To these timbres ... quite different from those obtained by the various ... of the same musical instrument, we give the name of vowels. Each a class of harmonics ... another ..., the diphthongs ... as to pass from one vowel to another by ... gradations, are only intermediate combinations.

This theory of the vowels, which was first proposed by the English physicist, Wheatstone, and which Helmholtz has placed beyond dispute, presents at first sight a singularity which seems to clash with reason. That is because the human voice is of all sounds, the one which we are least in the habit of analyzing. It never occurs to the mind to consider an ... of the voice ... as a simple thing; we are too much accustomed to hear it with other preoccupations than ... [illegible]; for us, the voice has a symbolical, a representative value, an expressive ... which disguises its ... nature from us. Thus, in spite of the extreme harmonic complexion of the human voice, it eludes analysis more than the sounds of any other instrument, and artificial resonators are here particularly necessary. The richness of the voice, it is easily understood, depends on the state of the glottis, and above all on the more or less hermetical closing of this orifice. The slightest cold irritates the lips of the reed and impairs the quality of the sounds. To a glottis which closes badly, corresponds a hollow, dull, pale voice; when the vocal ... jostle and beat against each other the timbre becomes hard and harsh. And ... [illegible] voices to whose ... charm we owe ... enjoyment.

At the moment when the voice has birth upon the trembling lips of the glottis, it is composed of a series of vibrations adjusted to a long series of harmonics. If nothing modified it, the upper ones would gradually diminish in intensity as they grew more remote from the fundamental tone; and this is in fact just about what happens when one sings with the mouth wide open and when, consequently, the buccal resonator acts with the least efficacy. But when one lessens the orifice of the resonator and modifies the form of it, whether by the aid of the ... or of the tongue, a veritable selection is produced among the overtones; those whose vibrations can accord with the new dimensions of the resonator assert themselves strongly, the others are smothered; and it is thus the ... of the ... is modified. M. Jamin, a professor of philosophy ... [illegible] ... to move the mouth and tongue in order to pronounce the different vowels.

It is not difficult to discover what are the vibrations adapted to the human resonator in the different forms which it can take; and it was important to ascertain them in order to know what are the notes which give (if I may use the word) the color to the different vowels. Hold a tuning fork in vibration before the mouth, and it will resound more loudly when the buccal vibrations is in accord with its own. By the aid of a series of tuned forks Helmholtz has been able thus to ... the favorite notes of the buccal resonator. He deduced experimentally this result: that for each vowel, for each ..., there are in the musical scale certain privileged notes which give the sound its specific color and full ... To those employing the artifice of tuning forks, which reveal the buccal notes so well, but simply one can sing the gamut upon different vowels, and you will be surprised to find, on the same note, sometimes such beautiful sonority, sometimes such meagreness and such ... quality. To make the utmost of the vocal instrument, one should sing only certain notes on certain vowels.

As a general rule one would reserve syllables with ... (English ...) and ... for bass voices, and syllables with ... (as in follow) ... (English ...) for sopranos. Who has not remarked that, when a singer descends to her lowest note the sound of her voice ... the ... It is that hollow accent which gives a particular expression to the voice called contralto. The fine soprano voices delight in the sounds ... that is why the Italian tongue, so rich in terms ... [illegible] ... those voices. All singers know by experience the affinity of certain vowels for certain notes and know how to make the most of it upon occasion.

If this theory is exact, it is obvious that one may undertake the artificial reproduction of the vowels. This attempt had been already made by an English physicist, Willis. Taking a reed pipe of an organ, of which he could vary the length he drew from it successively, by elongating the vibrating column of air, the sounds of ..., of ..., of ..., of ... But in this experiment he did not make the true synthesis of the vowels, he only obtained effects of variable resonance upon the very complex sound emitted by the tongue of the reed. Helmholtz has effected that synthesis by variously mingling simple sounds, disengaged from harmonics. We have already said that tuning forks furnish the best means for obtaining notes of this kind. The first apparatus constructed by Helmholtz bore eight forks tuned according to the note B flat (very low, corresponding to 120 vibrations in a second) and the seven first harmonics of that note. Before each tuning fork is placed a cylindrical sounding box tuned to the note, and which opens and shuts rapidly by the aid of a movable lid: the seven lids are set in motion, like the hammers of a piano, by the play of the fingers on a keyboard. On the piano of eight notes of Helmholtz, where tuning forks take the place of strings, as soon as a given key is pressed down, the corresponding resonator opens, and the vibrations of the fork, dull and smothered till now, swell forth and make a sample note heard. The eight forks are kept constantly in vibration, because each of them is placed between the two poles of an electro-magnet which is magnetized and demagnetized 120 times per second.

Here then we have the eight instruments, tuning forks, in motion. Their vibrations remain mute so long as the keys of the keyboard remain at rest; but as soon as you press them, the resonators are uncovered and the notes are heard. They can thus be combined in every way. In playing upon this singular instrument one becomes assured that the different minglings of harmonics engender different vowels. The difference of timbres is particularly sensible at the moments when the fingers change their place, and in passing from one composite sound to another. With his eight tuning forks, Helmholtz has obtained all the ... sounds of what may be termed the ... vowels, ou, o, ..., ... The first fork of the series, singing alone, gives a dull, hollow ou, much more smothered than the voice would give by pressing the succeeding keys, the sound would resort to [illegible] to obtain something analogous to it; it was necessary to remain in the upper notes of the keyboard. In a second apparatus, very similar otherwise to the one we have just described, Helmholtz added four more acute harmonics to the preceding, and was thus enabled to rise freely to the [illegible] and the [illegible], [illegible] still escaped him, because the particular timbre of this vowel is due to a super-acute harmonic which the current does not seem to vibrate with sufficient force. The problem of the synthesis of the vowels was none the less resolved in principle. Its details henceforth only concern the construction of more [illegible] apparatus. But as one of our great scientific establishments has got constructed a [illegible] of the vowels, and as, unfortunately, a physicist is not often in a condition to make such costly machines for himself!

There is no need to believe that Helmholtz has constructed his tuning-fork pianos (pianos à diapasons) for the mere pleasure of imitating the human voice and of eliciting vowels from an instrument of wood and metal. His experiments were undertaken purely to verify the conjecture, whether the timbre depends solely on the mixture of harmonics, and whether, as has been hitherto believed, the form, the geometry of vibrations has some influence on the quality of sound. I have distinguished, in a sonorous undulation, the height of the wave, which represents the intensity; the length of the wave, which represents the tonality or pitch; finally the form of the undulatory curve. I have said that every vibration may always be considered as the resulting, the superposition of [illegible] simple harmonics; that is to say that every sound can be decomposed into simple harmonic notes. The different simple vibrations may be combined in an infinite variety of ways, because it is not necessary to suppose that they all begin at the same moment; they may impress, then, upon the vibrating molecule the greatest variety of resultant movements. For all that, will the total sound be modified? Not the least in the world!

Here is what the piano of Helmholtz permits us to verify. The mathematical theory in fact demonstrates that in displacing, more or less, the resonators, in advancing or drawing them more or less near to the tuning forks, we modify the phases of the harmonic vibrations, that is to say, for a certain system of waves we vary these elements, that we make them displace their waves relatively to one another. These displacements have a direct influence upon the resultant movement of each material molecule; they have not any upon the timbre of the sound composed by the superadded waves.

So [illegible], then, from the timbre of a sound depending on the form of the [illegible] curve described by each vibrating molecule, we may affirm, on the contrary, that there is an infinite variety of curves responding to the same timbre. In fact, all those which spring from the same periodical impulsions, whatever may be the order in which they succeed each other.

Ferdinand Hiller to Rossini.

(From the Kölnische Zeitung.)

And so you have left us, your dear Maestro, you, so fond of life and so [illegible]! gone from your joyous world of Paris, of which you had taken possession just as, in the good old times, a prince took possession of his inheritance. You have been snatched from us so many that it is not astonishing if each individual is less painfully affected at your decease than he otherwise would have been—for men like to have even their own special sorrow. There is scarcely one newspaper reader in the whole civilized world, who, on seeing the report of your death, will not have exclaimed: Oh! how sorry I am!

The world does not like to render any one famous, but if a man, despite all obstacles, no matter what, has found his way upward, and made his name a name of note, the world looks with a certain feeling of satisfaction on him. If, however, as was our case, he so that occurred to long ago as to belong to history, if a man requires a [illegible] any long time from the Present, as the efforts of the newspapers for new creations, our marks of distinction for himself personally, or for his works, more honors are showered upon him than he can well bear. How many generations received your name as a word forming part and parcel of their mother-tongue, and admired you before they had a notion of what your productions were! And then they became acquainted with the Barbiere di Seviglia, which for the last half century or has been not merely the "Battaglia della [illegible]," but of all the opera-houses in the world. Whilst you, they were delighted with the voice [illegible] a half the [illegible] had grown up, they heard the [illegible] of these [illegible] of your wit; it was [illegible]—if as he had a friendly welcome for all who sought him out; that he launched forth the most admirable and the most humorous repartees, and in his uncommon position, did not fail to be anything more (what people will more) or anything less than a musician. The world grew enthusiastic for such a being—and rightly, for he was amiable and extraordinary.

In the whole history of art is there a career like yours cherished Maestro? I doubt it. We find, it is true, geniuses who, like you required only a few years to declare themselves—but then did not be filled up their last days. Or they were men who, up to the most advanced age were as untiring in producing as the most [illegible] in [illegible] suffering. But you gave had in [illegible] years of your existence to musical art, when you gave about forty to the rest of life. Twenty years of sharp struggles and [illegible] —and then you had years filled from the [illegible] of new [illegible], as [illegible] the last tragedy by as the pleasant shade of your fame. Your art became for you a mere [illegible] you treated yourself as a man does with a little pasteboard or a hospitable and with good society. Some esteemed and others blamed you for this [illegible] of conduct, but no one was able to explain it; one you probably never disclosed the real motive of it. As a prudent conqueror in the realm of tone you do not wish, and your friends, to [illegible] by fresh hostilities the crown you owed to your former victories. Perhaps this was not [illegible] I say. I am afraid that you drank too deeply of the spring called popular favor—all you could not escape a little feeling of weariness.

But I am far from presuming to say that I have penetrated your motives. The most important man is so complicated a machine that a [illegible] machine-manufacturer alone can understand it [illegible] and very. Who, then, could comprehend so wonderfully organized a being as you were. What contradictions were united in you! The midst you as at the Bene [illegible] and the [illegible] of the eighteenth century, the desire for the most excessive enjoyment [illegible] affords, and the simplicity of a child of the people; the most [illegible] tenderness and the most wanton love of raillery. But the Rossini were your constant companions; they accompanied everything you did, and most heartily of all the [illegible] of love and earnest[illegible] your heart the with all righteous more pleasing than the halo of the muses.

The history of art [illegible] will have to record the almost mythical story of [illegible] on which you wrought, [illegible], while the history of music more especially will have to speak of your genius, as well as of the direction it took and its influence it exercised; the journals of the day will for the hundredth time collect the names of your works with the dates of their production and the success they achieved, and will, one and all, not fail to indulge in æsthetical observations. I have no intention of this kind, as I jot down these hasty lines. I would speak only of the gap which your demise leaves among us. Or does Paris, great and rich as she is, contain another spot like your little bedroom, with its pianos, and its piles of music heaped one upon the other, and its cosy state of disorder? A spot where an artist found, at almost every hour of the day, the [illegible] and the most interesting people and sympathy [illegible] of the [illegible]? On [illegible] occasion [illegible] I always came and were always good. I scarcely [illegible] requesting, and the intellectual enjoyment you afforded, that your sister should take the soul now and then as a guest in your table. And when, in addition to the [illegible], the at [illegible] of the word were offered to [illegible], [illegible] there, and the friendly feeling you manifested towards me and my and even [illegible] a [illegible] you [illegible] to many years of course, I may well be allowed to yield to the [illegible] I experience of giving utterance to sentiments of the deepest gratitude.

Farewell, then, beloved Maestro! If the number of delights in store for you on the other side the grave is equal to the happy hours you have afforded millions of men upon earth, an eternity of bliss will be yours. FERDINAND.

Rossini's Funeral.

The following account of the mournful ceremonial is from an eye-witness:—

The funeral of Rossini was solemnized this day. It was at first intended that the religious service should be celebrated at the Madeleine, but, in consequence of a ceremony having been previously fixed for the same hour, the arrangement was changed and the mass was performed in the new Church of [illegible] at the end of the Chaussée d'Antin. Special invitations had been sent out, and the total admission to the [illegible] had [illegible] the sacrament of the Church. Twelve o'clock was the hour appointed, but the crowd began to arrive at 10, and were [illegible] all the approaches so that [illegible] such as dense a [illegible] but for the intervention of numerous sergents-de-ville, it would have been impossible for those who had tickets to enter. The great nave was hung in black, and in the interior a [illegible] was raised in the centre of the nave, being [illegible]. The galleries were reserved for ladies, and the number of mourners could not have been less than five thousand. A little after twelve the rolling of muffled drums announced the approach of the hearse, which was followed from the Madeleine, where the body had been temporarily deposited, by the deputation from Pesaro and the intimate friends of Rossini. While the coffin was taken from the hearse and laid in the catafalque, the great organ played the "Tribbona," from the Semiramide. The mass opened with a chorus of Jomelli executed by the pupils of the Conservatoire and the most celebrated soli [illegible]. The sermon selected for the occasion was in the following order:—The Kyrie [illegible] by solos performed by Messrs. Nicolini, Nitti, and MM. Gardoni and Tamburini. The Lacrymosa, adapted to the [illegible] of the "Quis est Homo?" of the Stabat — [illegible] Stabat—sung by Alboni and Patti. The "Lacrymosa" of Mozart's Requiem to the choir. At the offertory "Vidit Suum" from the Stabat of Pergolese by Mlle. Nilsson. At the Elevation, "Pie Jesu," adapted to the quatuor "Quando Corpus" of Rossini's Stabat, by Mmes. Krauss, Grossi and MM. Nicolini and Agnesi. The "Agnus Dei" adapted to the Prière de Moïse (Rossini), sung by Alboni and Patti, and not less solo by MM. Bonnehée, Faure and Belval; and the "Pro Peccatis" from Rossini's Stabat, was sung by M. Faure. Nothing could give an idea of the impression produced on the assembly by such music as a period by such artists. The duo of the Stabat by Alboni and Patti was given with such deep pathos that several persons could not help melting to tears. Never had Alboni—the illustrious pupil of the dead master—sung with more beauty and more effect.

It was past two o'clock when the service was over. The cortège formed after a good deal of delay, owing to the crowd in front of the church. It proceeded slowly up the Chaussée d'Antin, the windows of the houses on both sides being filled with spectators, and [illegible] out on the [illegible]. The pall-bearers were M. [illegible], the Italian Minister; M. [illegible], Consul General of Italy; M. Camille Doucet, head of the Administration of the Theatres; and M. Ambroise Thomas, the composer of Hamlet. The Emperor was represented by M. de la Ferrière, one of his Chamberlains, who followed in one of the Court carriages. M. Vaillant, Minister of the Imperial Household and of the department of Fine Arts, was also present. Indeed, the list of celebrities in all departments who paid their last tribute to Rossini would fill a column. [illegible] preceded all [illegible] in the procession. On the coffin was deposited a crown formed of laurel and gold. It was past [illegible] when the cortege reached the cemetery where after the coffin [illegible] laid in the ground. Discourses were pronounced by M. [illegible] in the name of the Italian [illegible], and by MM. [illegible] Ambroise Thomas, St. George and others.

Another spectator [illegible] more particularly upon what took place in the church. He says: —

The interior of the church [illegible] magnificent, with great [illegible] architectural beauty [illegible] the best painted windows in Paris and splendid organ. The centre of the building from the door to the altar was [illegible] being [illegible] everything in harmony of the [illegible] words [illegible] Ladies were [illegible] The [illegible] It was a cold day [illegible] There was not a seat, in twenty minutes there was not standing room. I should say there were present at least 4,000 people. There were [illegible] I shall make no [illegible] celebrities in France was there. The Emperor was represented [illegible] the Italian Embassy were there in full uniform and all [illegible] Ambroise Thomas — the "doyen" the Academie, the Italian [illegible] — all the art and science, and most of the beauty of Paris. I have never in France seen in one assembly so many pretty faces. The throne was at the extreme end of the church [illegible] The music was [illegible].

[illegible] I never [illegible] anything so splendid as the music. [illegible] Alboni and Patti was the [illegible] voice of Alboni never [illegible] The effect was [illegible] Alboni was very much affected [illegible] friend. [illegible] "That's Alboni" said a friend of mine [illegible] In a word all sung [illegible] The ceremony was [illegible] A coffin absolutely covered with [illegible] and wreaths of [illegible] was carried [illegible] the church before [illegible] All Paris had [illegible] place of the "Swan of Pesaro," and [illegible] And so was celebrated [illegible] the funeral of the [illegible] composer of the [illegible] His own splendid melody was [illegible] and he may be said to have been wafted away in a cloud of his own harmony. Requiescat in Pace!

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

[The interest in Rossini, now that he is gone, justifies our reprinting more at length these conversations which we translated in full for this Journal in 1855.]

I had been [illegible] to Rossini when as a very young man I came to Paris. There as well as afterwards in Milan I have seen [illegible] and for [illegible] he showed himself [illegible] During the two or three weeks I spent in Trouville, I passed the greatest part of the time in his society. We walked for hours together up and down the little corner by the sea side, and the [illegible] at the most was [illegible] in a game of Dominos. Even in this [illegible] the conversation hardly ceased and [illegible] it was so [illegible] in his communications, as he was insatiable in his inquiries about those and persons of whom I could give him any information. Although I only a few times came to the point of [illegible] owing to the want of a good instrument, [illegible] of our conversation. Rossini [illegible] I had before me [illegible] knowledge of the [illegible] Hindu of works and composers [illegible] His judgment [illegible] knows how to enter into everything [illegible] That he has seen, heard and experienced [illegible] much, but it interesting, is natural [illegible] I believe I shall be giving pleasure to many [illegible] and friends of music if I [illegible] particularly interested me and added [illegible] conversation of Rossini. I shall be pardoned if I introduce myself although as little as possible, as a party to the conversation. They were so [illegible] that he [illegible] other and the [illegible] that I can only [illegible] I do [illegible] One thing I [illegible] and that is [illegible] nothing essential of my own invention into the mouth of the master.

—These journals [illegible] exclaimed Rossini, one day. Here [illegible] when I left Paris [illegible] as great an aversion to the allemand as to German music! What do they mean by that!

—That you would travel a great deal by railroad, dear maestro, were that true, I answered.

—Not only shall I love the great German masters. I have made them my especial study in my earliest youth and have let no opportunity go by to learn to know them more and more. How much delight you have already afforded me through the performance of Bach's [illegible] psalms!

—I have never played his noble piano pieces with more pleasure, than when I was able to play them before you.

—What a colossal nature, this Bach! [illegible] in this sort of composition! It is incomprehensible. What is here was hard, [illegible] was mere play to him. How is it about that [illegible] edition of his works? [illegible] I heard of [illegible] from Liszt, who [illegible] and probably through their mediation [illegible] I should like to have the following done.

—Nothing is easier. You must subscribe.

—With all my heart!

—Your name among the members of the Bach society — that would be too good!

—Bach's portrait in the first volume is splendid, remarked Rossini; there is an extraordinary intellectual power [illegible] Bach must have also been an [illegible]

—The most important composers of the present day [illegible] them as they have done! [illegible] some of his [illegible]

—The [illegible] is seldom here. Do you bring out many of his works in Germany?

—Not so many as we should — but yet a good many.

—Alas! such a thing is not possible [illegible] and [illegible] We cannot, as you do in Germany, collect great chains of amateurs. [illegible] good vocal forces in chambers and [illegible] — that was lost. Even in the Sistine chapel, since the death of [illegible] things have constantly [illegible] Apropos, how much is [illegible] about the great master of Mozart's Requiem? Have they arrived at [illegible]?

—No further than you already know.

—[illegible] Mozart [illegible] Confutatis is all so [illegible] the opening [illegible] over the beginning. That is magnificent. And [illegible] at the end. There [illegible] I always had a special [illegible] for this and [illegible] I have found it, I left the [illegible] creep down my back. — Pie Jesu Mozart — [illegible] biography [illegible] which you [illegible] that Mozart [illegible] With [illegible] which you must explain to me. [illegible] that you asked your old [illegible] Mattei a short time ago, [illegible] enough to write an opera, and that on his affirmation that you got up and walked away?

—Nothing could be more [illegible]! I had studied three years at the Lyceum in Bologna, during which time, however, I had to do my utmost, to pay for my instruction and support my parents. I succeeded; but it was in a pretty beggarly manner. I accompanied the recitatives at the pianos at the theatres, and got a position as [illegible] I had a fine voice, and sang in the churches. Also I composed, besides the [illegible] which Mattei gave me, here and there a [illegible] for a singer to introduce into an opera, or sing [illegible] Sundays, and [illegible] who paid me a [illegible] for the service. In a word, I had sailed through Counterpoint and Fugue, I asked Mattei what he would set before me next. "The Plain Chant and Canons," was the reply. How much time shall I have to spend on them? About two years. But I was not able to keep it up longer; and that I explained to the good Padre, who understood the case very well and always remained attached to me. I have [illegible] regretted, often enough, since, that I had not labored longer under his care.

—You were able to make your way through more without his canons, said I, laughing. Was Mattei a very able teacher?

—He was excellent with the pen in his hand — his corrections were exceedingly instructive. But he was [illegible] and every oral elucidation had a [illegible] from him by force. — Have you seen any of his compositions?

—I have never come upon any of his.

—If you are ever again in Bologna, do not fail to take a look into those at the Lyceum. They are only church music, and there are passages in the [illegible] but the place as we [illegible]

—I now come back to your youthful days, dear maestro. You certainly composed much before you came under the rod of Mattei?

—A whole opera, Demetrio e Polibio, which is the story of the works I have always been accused [illegible] placed Rossini because it was first publicly performed a few years [illegible] four and a years after it was written. I composed [illegible] for the Mombelli family without ever knowing that it was an opera. When I had forgot [illegible] I was [illegible] first opera [illegible] to pass I [illegible] in every bar and every so old a part gave me a [illegible] A [illegible] I recovered my [illegible].

—That was very fortunate. Had you begun already [illegible] learn music?

—I had left Pesaro in my earliest childhood. My father held the [illegible] there as the Commune of [illegible] trumpeter; he played the horn in the theatre and all [illegible] When he [illegible] My mother, who had a fine voice, enabled herself [illegible] to help [illegible] and so we left Pesaro. The poor woman! She was still [illegible] although she did not know a note. She sang on orecchiante as we call it in Italy, altogether by ear. I may say, so [illegible] the case with [illegible] out of a hundred Italian singers.

—That is incredible!

—It is strange. [illegible] one after another comes on my [illegible] but how those people go to work to learn by heart the middle parts in an [illegible] pieces, is to me quite [illegible]

—They must be either very musical or very [illegible] But [illegible] to come back to yourself, [illegible] where did you begin to learn music?

—At Bologna.

—And with whom?

—A certain Prinetti, of Novara, gave me instruction on the piano. He was a remarkable fellow. He manufactured some sort of liquor; gave a few music lessons, and so worked his way along. He owned [illegible] bed — the [illegible] sending.

—What, sending? You joke, I assume.

—It is precisely as I tell you. At night he wrapped himself up in his mantle, leaned against some arcade of the streets, and so went to sleep. The watchman knew him and did not disturb him. Then he came at a very early hour to me, pulled me out of bed, which I did not relish much, and set me to "playing." Sometimes he had not rested sufficiently and slept while I worked away upon the spinet [illegible] standing. I took all manner of the opportunity and complained [illegible] When he woke up and sought me here again he was pacified by my assurance that I had played my piece through with [illegible] His method was —A certain Angelo Tesei taught me how to play [illegible] and [illegible] accompaniment, and instructed me in singing. A music [illegible] of some note, [illegible] gave me the higher instruction in singing.

—You had a charming voice?
—I sang quite finely as a boy. At that time I went once upon the stage and performed the boy's part in the Camilla of Paer. But I did not get beyond that.
—Were any other notable artists among your schoolmates at the Lyceum? I inquired.
—The first year which I passed there was the last year of Morlacchi's studies, and my third year was the first year of Donizetti.
—I thought that Donizetti was a pupil of Simon Mayr.
—He had made all sorts of [illegible] with Mayr, but he [illegible] his real musical culture in Bologna. And there he learned something clever, we may well say.
—Certainly so. But you must tell me a little more of your studies at that time, dear maestro. I am not easily satisfied in such things.
—Another time, caro Ferdinando. There comes my wife; it is time to dine. After dinner we [illegible] together!

Rossini sang the beginning of a string Quartet by Haydn. Could a piece be commenced in a more noble manner? What an attitude and what a grace is in that motive!
—I do not believe that Haydn did the string Quartet, and it has ever been surpassed by any composer, not even by Beethoven.
—Chance made me acquainted with these Quartets, said the maestro with warmth, [illegible] of the four instruments, I [illegible] models [illegible]. All composers of consequence have [illegible], but those of Haydn always had for me a quite peculiar [illegible] charm.
—Have you already learned to know these compositions so early as I [illegible] had?
—Already in Bologna, [illegible]. I had got together a quartet of strings in which I played the Viola as well as might be. [illegible] first only a few of Haydn's works, but I kept urging him to procure more and more, and I gradually became familiar with a considerable number of them. At that time I studied Haydn with peculiar partiality. You should have been present when I directed "The Creation" at the Lyceum in Bologna! In truth I suffered no slip in any performance, excepting [illegible]. I have [illegible] to hear [illegible] "The Seasons" too I studied [illegible] leaving the Lyceum I was made director of the Philharmonic concerts.
—"The Seasons" are perhaps still [illegible] than the "Creation," said I. Certainly the text afforded more room for variety.
—It may be so, replied Rossini; but there is a certain higher feeling prevailing in "The Creation" which makes me prefer it. How splendid is the Aria [illegible]—and the chorus in B flat,—and the [illegible] Raphael. The [illegible] of all those [illegible]—and what a wonderful [illegible] composition is the Chaos. [illegible] a long time [illegible] the impression of that work. I knew in Vienna an Italian, Carpani, who [illegible] for many years had [illegible] in the society of Haydn. He was never weary of telling me of [illegible] the grandeur and modesty of the old man.
—Haydn had the greatest [illegible] for [illegible] Mozart's father. In the [illegible] words, [illegible] he esteemed him as the greatest of all composers.
—He certainly expressed his real thought, and he was right [illegible] the [illegible].
—I have never seen one of his operas, I concluded; but, strangely enough, they do not seem to be at home [illegible].
—I have read them through in Vienna, in the house of a passionate admirer of Haydn, who [illegible] all his compositions, said Rossini. They [illegible] the great composer. [illegible] He composed them all at an early age [illegible] Esterhazy and his singers. Do you know his Armida?
—I played it through once a long time ago, but I have [illegible].
—Apropos [illegible] Rinaldo [illegible] very [illegible], said Rossini, and he began [illegible].
—You really know our German masters better than I do, I exclaimed, and I begin to grow jealous of you. Are you [illegible] acquainted, then, with [illegible]?
—I have read through a great deal.

—Have you heard many of Paisiello's operas performed?
—In my young days they had nearly vanished from the Italian stage. Cimarosa, Fioravanti, Paer; but above all Simon Mayr were the order of the day.
—Do you like Paisiello?
—His music pleases agreeably by the ear, but neither as regards harmony nor melody is it distinguished, and it has never interested me particularly. The principle was, with a small motive to compose a whole piece—which [illegible] Italian dramatic expression.
—Did you know him personally?
—I saw him in Naples, after his return from Paris, where he enjoyed great favour. Napoleon liked [illegible] the great [illegible] was [illegible] fond of his music, because it did not hinder him from thinking about other things. [illegible] Nevertheless his [illegible] peculiar tone.
—Was Paisiello an interesting man?
—[illegible] was fine, powerful, almost imposing; but he was absolutely uncultivated and [illegible]. You should have read a letter of his. I spent [illegible]—I ask pardon [illegible]. Do you know any play of his?
—The Matrimonio Segreto, of course, I answered. Also I have read through "The Horatii."
—In the latter there is one [illegible]. Do [illegible] Opera [illegible] Le trame deluse, which is altogether [illegible].
—Better than the Matrimonio Segreto?
—I compare [illegible] perhaps. There is [illegible] Finale [illegible] the second act [illegible] a masterpiece. Unfortunately the libretto is [illegible] bad. I also remember [illegible], there is one passage especially which is [illegible] and dramatic [illegible] harmony. [illegible] was no great harmonist.
—[illegible] to obtain the works of those composers, said I. One must go a [illegible] and spend a [illegible]. The library of the Conservatory of Naples, especially, must contain [illegible].
—There [illegible] and Rossini, [illegible] the collection manuscripts of Cimarosa [illegible] found there. [illegible] the possession of the Card[inal] [illegible], who [illegible] for Cimarosa. [illegible] I did this [illegible] Rome, and [illegible] grateful [illegible].
—And your own manuscripts, maestro,—I fancy you must possess a [illegible] of them?
—Not a note.
—But where in the world are they?
—Heaven knows. I had the right at the end of a year to reclaim them back from the copyist, but I never made any use of it. Some of them may be in Naples, some in Paris; [illegible].
—Have you not at least preserved your [illegible] with Pellico [illegible]?
—I had those for many years—but one day when I came back to Bologna, they were no more to be found. Whether they were thrown away or stolen, or sold for waste paper I know not.
—You must perhaps be possessor of the engraved scores and piano arrangements of your operas, a complete set?
—Why should I care about them? It is years [illegible] into my house. Shall I study them?
—And the opera Ermione, which one of your biographers [illegible] you have kept [illegible]—how about that?
—[illegible] others.
—[illegible] about the score [illegible]—it is in [illegible] though.
—And very justly, said Rossini; [illegible].
—[illegible] it was very tedious.
—[illegible] thinking of all that, [illegible] always know how to [illegible] the people!
—[illegible] said the maestro, [illegible] there is [illegible] performers [illegible] declamatory [illegible] for David [illegible] had to have something to sing. This [illegible] and probably you know [illegible] the [illegible].
—[illegible] when I [illegible] taken from [illegible] opera. But here comes [illegible] [illegible] to ask him for some explanations in relation to the [illegible] biographic [illegible].

—That we will [illegible] made them perform three very [illegible] instrumental! But when shall we get to the Finale?

Music Abroad.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE. As the concert on Saturday was the twelfth and last of the first series for 1861-2 (of which [illegible] remain to be given), we subjoin the programme in extenso:

Overture [illegible]	Beethoven.
Song "[illegible]"	"
[illegible]	W. S. [illegible]
[illegible]	Handel.
[illegible]	Schubert.
Aria [illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Overture [illegible]	Wagner.

Nothing could more appropriately have succeeded the overture of that master than the song from a work written by the same composer ten years later. The music for Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus was produced in 1801 [illegible] and the famous string quintet in C [illegible] Die Ruinen von Athen belongs to 1811 [illegible]. In the Ruinen von Athen [illegible] orchestral Symphony in A (No. 7) [illegible] we find [illegible] Haydn and Mozart [illegible] of his second period. The [illegible] but be [illegible] of Beethoven.

Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's music to the Tempest of Shakespeare comes back as fresh and attractive as when it was first heard. [illegible] from its opening orchestral prelude to the end, it was pleasant to be able to feel that [illegible] of the young composer [illegible]. To deny that in writing the Tempest Mr. Sullivan was considerably influenced by Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream would serve no purpose. [illegible] plagiarism. In short, he [illegible] that he would not [illegible]. When, therefore, we add that he has produced a work which [illegible] by German composers, [illegible] A Midsummer Night's Dream [illegible] a thoroughly well-trained [illegible]. Mr. Sullivan [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] A Midsummer Night's Dream and [illegible] the Tempest [illegible] Purcell, [illegible] with Mendelssohn [illegible] of the modern orchestra [illegible] Englishman [illegible] of Germans. Apart from all these [illegible], however, the music to the Tempest is splendid from beginning to the end.

In the course of twelve concerts, the first of which was held on the 21st of October, we have had the Eroica and B-flat symphonies of Beethoven; the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn, and the "Parisian" of Mozart; the "Italian" and "Scotch" symphonies of Mendelssohn; Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, with his previously unfinished one in C major, No. 6; and Schumann's No. 3 in E flat. The "Surprise" of Haydn, the Nos. [illegible] of Schubert and the No. 3 of Schumann, in one instance have already been followed, were played for the first time at the Crystal Palace. The symphony of Haydn made every one [illegible] from the [illegible]. MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. (From the Times, Dec. [illegible]) The programme of Monday week, now one of the largest audiences of the season:

Quartet, in [illegible], Op. [illegible]	Beethoven
Song, "[illegible]"	[illegible]
Sonata [illegible]	Beethoven
Sonata [illegible]	[illegible]
Songs, [illegible]	[illegible]
Quartet, [illegible]	[illegible]

The first concert of the series [illegible] was given [illegible] held last Monday night. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] players—Messrs. Straus, M. Ries, [illegible] Lazarus, C. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and double bass [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This, [illegible] performance of the night at St. James's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

The [illegible] began with an [illegible] interesting work by Schubert—a quartet in G major, [illegible] for the first time [illegible] St. James's Hall. The quartet in G [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] one in D minor, which it [illegible], if not surpasses, in [illegible] grandeur. [illegible] [illegible] were produced in 1826, two years before the gifted composer's death. What [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that Schubert [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] than ten days [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] writing this quartet, each of the four movements of which is largely developed, and elaborately wrought out. The andante will be [illegible]—the first [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of humour and spirit as though [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], with a true [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of which it is Schubert's happiest [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and heartily appreciated [illegible] the occasion [illegible] [illegible]; but [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the allegro moderato, which opens, and the allegro [illegible] which concludes, the quartet [illegible] [illegible] increasingly familiar [illegible] [illegible] more and more [illegible]. The last in particular is a sort of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] company of themes, one more [illegible], animated and fresh than the other—a movement, by the way, that has something in common with the finale of the quartet in D minor, just referred to, to greatly certain to become popular. Such a comparison, however, as the quartet in G is not to be wholly grasped at a first hearing, and, indeed, it would hardly be what it is were so very extraordinary gains needed to study and comprehend it. It discloses [illegible] faults, and, among others, that diffuseness which appears inseparable from Schubert's more ambitious works; but always deeply thought, always melodious, always poetical and original, it has manifold beauties which, in the majority of instances, lie so [illegible] [illegible] beneath the surface. No [illegible] [illegible] of the quartet in G minor [illegible] and yet a single hearing, even with [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] examination, suffices to convince any competent judge that it is a work of [illegible] [illegible] character. We believe that we owe its introduction at the Monday Popular Concerts (and it has never before been publicly played in this country) to Herr Ludwig Straus, as whose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] doubly indebted [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a masterpiece, [illegible] for the [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] efficient manner in which he [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] that Schubert, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to his players, has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The other performers were Herr L. Ries, Mr. H. Blagrove and Signor Piatti, all of whom were well up in their parts, the last giving the part [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The first hearing of an unknown work by Schubert [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] upon an [illegible] at the Monday Popular Concerts, and the [illegible] [illegible] the present occasion was general. The success of the quartet in G was decided and Mr. Arthur Chappell has [illegible] a new occasion to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the quartets in A minor and D minor, and the two great trios, being nothing of [illegible] [illegible] for pianoforte.

The pianist at this concert was Miss Agnes Zimmermann, whose "first appearance" was no less successful than that of Mr. J. F. Barnett. Miss Zimmermann [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the early sonata of Mendelssohn in E major, Op. [illegible], the last movement of which she [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Her [illegible] was Beethoven's sonata in A [illegible] [illegible] (No. [illegible]), in which she had the advantage of being associated with Signor Piatti, who never played more magnificently.

The singer was Mademoiselle Wiesbach, who gave "Know'st thou the land," the song of Goethe's Mignon, which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] set in Beethoven's [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] corresponded. "[illegible]," in [illegible] [illegible] with her own [illegible], and in addition a [illegible] one of Mendelssohn's [illegible] and more [illegible] [illegible] songs"(Frühlingslieder), known in English as "The Chorister," in German as "Durch den Walden [illegible] geh'n." Miss Wiesbach sang both well and was accompanied in both with absolute perfection by Mr. Benedict.

The concerts [illegible] on the 6th of January, when Herr Joachim [illegible] his first appearance; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Mozart and Haydn, and [illegible] play [illegible] Miss Arabella Goddard Beethoven's [illegible] sonata in C, Op. [illegible].

CORONER. The London Musical World has a letter (Dec. [illegible]) from "Our Original" [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "Correspondent" with the long [illegible], which tells of interesting [illegible] in the city of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Ritter and Ferdinand Hiller. [illegible] [illegible] example:

Seldom during my existence have I been so deeply and [illegible] impressed as [illegible], as I was the case at the third [illegible] Concert on the [illegible] November last. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] pure and classical kind and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. I [illegible] [illegible] from Iphigenia in Aulis, by Gluck; [illegible] Suite für grosses Orchester von Franz Lachner (new, in [illegible]); first time of performance under the direction of the composer himself and [illegible] the whole [illegible] of Gluck's Orpheus.

Of Gluck's Orpheus not another word need be said beyond the [illegible] of a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]—that it is [illegible] the [illegible] in which it was delivered may be called a [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of Mme. [illegible], who sang the part of Orpheus on the occasion, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] supported by Fräulein Bettelheim, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] (Venus) and a fine [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], under the classical baton of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. [illegible] direction was very quiet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

The new Suite [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] and the violin, as well as the [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] so thoroughly upon many that the music of this great composer, who has been driven away from Munich (where he was general music director of the Royal Opera during great many years) by the Wagnerian [illegible], has most chance to become the real music of the future as the so-called "music of the future" itself. Another great musical treat was the first soirée for chamber music, when Messrs. Königslöw, Japha, Derckum and [illegible] were the performers. One of [illegible] quartets of Schumann (A minor) and one of Beethoven's ([illegible] [illegible]) we had a [illegible] quartet [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] F. Hiller, and some [illegible] pieces for piano solo from the same [illegible], played by the composer. This new quartet of Hiller [illegible] combinations. [illegible] of the first allegro and the Scherzo, which are highly effective, the andante is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The audience was exceedingly delighted to hear Hiller play once more after so long [illegible], and also [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] noblest and most [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the day [illegible] the greatest [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] other modern player [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

The [illegible] [illegible] concert, on the [illegible], however, although belonging to the category of "Gürzenich concerts," was a rather [illegible] one. The programme [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Manfred, by Schumann; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] by Herr Carl Tausig, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Aria "[illegible]" [illegible] [illegible] Stabat Mater of [illegible] [illegible] by [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphony (No. [illegible]) [illegible] of Mendelssohn; [illegible] [illegible], a [illegible] [illegible] by Schumann [illegible] [illegible] Gerdes; [illegible] [illegible] of Goethe, [illegible] by Herr F. Hiller, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "[illegible]." "The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the Flavio [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] on Don Giovanni, by Liszt, played by Tausig, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Oberon, by Weber. Herr Tausig [illegible]. By the same reason [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], he [illegible] the public [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] at the end of the [illegible] of Liszt.

DARMSTADT. Here are the programmes of two of the Symphony Concerts, which are conducted alternately by Kapellmeisters [illegible] and [illegible]:

First Concert.

Overture, [illegible]	Weber.
[illegible]	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Beethoven.

Second Concert.

Overture, [illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	Wüllner.
Sinfonia, [illegible]	Beethoven.

The members of the Singakademie in [illegible] [illegible] performance of St. Paul in [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] Mendelssohn Monument in Leipzic. The solos were sung by Messrs. [illegible] and [illegible], Messrs. Schild and [illegible]. —Herr Richard Wagner has arrived at [illegible] [illegible] the getting up of his last opera Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg.

[illegible]. The Singakademie under the [illegible] Herr von [illegible], lately gave a performance of Gluck's Orpheus. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by Mme. [illegible] and [illegible]. Third Philharmonic Concert: Overture to [illegible], Cherubini; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Mozart; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]; [illegible] Das Geschenkleine Geheimnis, Wüllner; "[illegible] Fantasie," Ernst. D-major Symphony, Beethoven.

[illegible]. After the lapse of fifteen years since the death of Friedrich [illegible], a discovery has been made, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the numerous admirers of the deceased Capellmeister. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] overture and other music for Schiller's Braut von Messina. This [illegible] was performed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] both the score and the parts being [illegible] when the theatre was burned down. A [illegible] [illegible] steps forward and declares that she possesses the original score, which was given her by the composer. On the title, [illegible] Schneider's own hand: "Finished the 10th July, [illegible]." It is to be hoped that the score will not be again lost for so long.

MUNICH. Herr Franz Lachner's Catharine Cornaro has been revived, and Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis, as arranged by Herr Richard Wagner. The Court-Musical [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. All the symphonies of the musical [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] part here are delighted, and intend to prove their delight by getting up serenades and torchlight processions in Herr [illegible]'s honor. The leaders of the New German School here, in consequence of their growing disposition and arrogance, lose whatever popularity they may once have possessed; and it is generally believed that when the question becomes "Wagner or Lachner," the former, inspite of his superiors, which is not altogether encouraging, will give way. Even Mlle. Mallinger, the great popular favorite and previous supporter of the new school has proved refractory, and declared that she will no longer sacrifice her voice, and, with it, her future prospects to the pretensions of Herr R. Wagner and his clique.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 16, 1869.

Music at Home.

Our city has been a-hold of music since the new year came in. We pity the man who undertook to hear the whole of it! It may be some one did so, on a wager, as now and then a valiant toper tucks manfully to drink all he [illegible], or some spread-eagle patriot whistles a hornpipe from Providence to Boston when his party loses the election,—but of his fate we have not heard. Better wait, if we have such an appetite for quantity and drinking the whole resource come at a draught "go on" altogether gloriously, one bandmaster Gilmore's sublime all-absorbing [illegible], over which by earthquake shocks of harmony the hearers, it is promised, will open right up into the Paradise of Columbus, where ye may live [illegible] immortal!—During the fortnight, we have had a Mendelssohn Quintette Club, a Symphony Concert, a chorus vocal Soirée of Mr. Parker's Club, a round Italian and German Opera every night and Saturday afternoon; a couple of Parepa-Rosa concerts, with the "whole round" course playing; Levy; a couple of Ole Bull concerts, without an orchestra and two more with one; besides other miscellaneous entertainments, Great Organ [illegible], Conservatory matinées of chamber music, &c.

A few notes upon some of these.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The twentieth season (can you realize it?) of these classical Chamber Concerts, to which Boston mainly owes its knowledge of the great quartets, quintets, &c. of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, &c. (with introductions to more recent men, which have not proved into such acquaintance), drew an eager and appreciative audience to the Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 5. The members only of the Club are of twenty years standing, namely WULF FRIES, our admirable 'cellist, and THOMAS RYAN, viola (and sometimes clarinet). WILLIAM SCHULTZE, 1st violin, and CARL MEISEL, second violin, have faithfully and ably served for quite a number of years. Mr. E. M. HEINDL, second viola, and flutist, unsurpassed, joined them only last year. The sight of them was pleasant, and their entrance warmly greeted. The programme was, as always, choice:

Quartet, in F. No. 15.	Haydn
Piano Solo	Chopin
Eighth Concerto in G minor, op. 25, [illegible]	Beethoven
Piano Quintet in E flat, op. 44.	Schumann

It was natural to begin with Father Haydn in this time of the revival here (and with so much interest) of his Symphonies. The Quartet in G is the one which used to be heard oftener than any others of the eighty which he wrote, but over this one has been silent here for several years. It is ever grateful to both ear and soul, a healthy, hearty, happy, genial, yet earnest work; instrumental full of delicious fancy, beginning to end; a "new created whole," all fresh and perfect. The quick movements are in Haydn's best vein, and the Adagio tranquil and deep in feeling, large and broad in harmony, with an open, round sonority, like organ music. It was played con amore, firmly and unanimously, and could not but be keenly enjoyed.

Nothing could be in greater contrast to the Haydn, while equally sincere, consistent, masterly than the [illegible] Quartet of Beethoven, which a deeper, greater, stranger in its thoughts, and opens a wondrous spiritual world it was also so true truly. We do not remember that the Club have given it since the season of 1865-6, when they first took it up and played it three times with increasing interest. We know not which of its movements to admire most, what to say of either of them: the Allegro, whose theme seems caught from a passing breath of air, a zephyr whispering into the ear and gone, but whispering so rare finely to the sensitive, imaginative ear that caught it and wove it into such subtle wealth of beauty; the Adagio, profound, brooding; the Intermezzo, fantastic rhythm of the Allegretto in the minor, in which as Scherzo the quaint Hessian Theme answers as Trio in the major, or the swift easy going through the free Mendelssohn of the Finale Presto. It is very difficult to execute, and was not rendered with perfect purity and grace in every part, and yet on the whole is better than any of Beethoven's later quartets has been before. In parts admirably, and so as to hold the audience in rapt attention. It would be good to hear it again.

The pianist was Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, who has lost nothing of his remarkable facility and strength of technique, and who played the Chopin pieces, not with so delicate and fine a treatment as we have heard them, but with [illegible] and a like brilliant power. In the grandly effective, glorious old Quintet of Schumann he had ample rule; and the whole work was given on the part of all the five, with a triumphant verve. As usual the solemn, slow march movement was the most enjoyed. The dash and splendor of the Scherzo were well kept up, only such unrelaxing strength in the piano part fatigued the sense.

The second of the four concerts (that we should be put upon so short allowance!) will take place Feb. 2.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The program at hand gives more satisfaction and realized delight than any of the [illegible] performances. The orchestra did the best they have done yet; the solo playing was of the highest order; the programme, while it contained nothing new, was very choice, and no short one was troubled by the thought of having to lose any of the whole:

Overture, "Reminiscences of Ossian"	N. W. Gade
Violin Concerto in E (First movement)	Beethoven
Miss Camilla Urso.
Symphony in D flat	Haydn
Introduction and Allegro.—Andante,—Minuet,—Finale.
Violin Solo	[illegible]
Overture "The [illegible]"	Mendelssohn

The "Ossian" Overture, earliest and most original of the works by which we have known Gade, was better played than anything of the kind that we have had before. (Only the disturbance caused by rude people in the audience made the noisy a[illegible] opening strains found their still the ahead several. It must have been anything but pleasant to Mr. ZERRAHN to have the delicate tone-picture, so carefully worked out in rehearsals, blurred and spoiled so rudely.) After the next concert, time being taken for sufficient notice, it is proposed to keep the entrance doors closed during the performance of the first piece.) It is a thoroughly romantic Northern overture; a wild imaginative northern picture, with the mists of antiquity half veiling, half revealing lovely images, while gigantic shadows of heroic forms stalk past on the clouds; and the whole winds up and thunders with the bold Viking's hymn. Gade's harp this time was replaced by a square piano.

The "Melusine" Overture was equally well played; delicately with even outline and finely blended color of reeds, &c., in the undulating, rippling watery figures of the opening, and with energy and sharpness in the heroic [illegible] episode.—The charming E flat Symphony of Haydn, too,—old friend—was more enjoyable than ever. Such compositions all, welcome with genuine need no artificial make-weight, to need popular [illegible] and new sensational means of innovation to make the Bostonian happier.

CAMILLA URSO played the first movement of the Beethoven Concerto with as perfect purity of intonation, such line and a tall quality of tone (though of course feminine and delicate rather than broad and nearly as one would wish were Joachim to be the interpreter of Beethoven) such simple and finished beauty of execution, that one longed to hear her play the other movements. But that lady is a very conscientious artist, and never undertakes to play in public what she has not time to learn by heart and possess herself of thoroughly in every sense. Cold she may seem to some, but to us she plays as if a still deep fire glowed within; and we believe most hearers drank at the spring into the spirit of the noble composition and took them with her. The only weak point was the long Cadenza which though it held the audience spell-bound by its wondrous execution was made by Vieuxtemps and obviously not at all such a fantasy as Beethoven could be supposed to have improvised upon his own theme while at the highest moment of his inspiration. Joachim no doubt has written a fitter cadenza here. As for the orchestral parts and accompaniments, so rich and stately they were remarkably happy in the rendering; the wind instruments were more perfect than usual, and so was the drum so important here in [illegible] all the theme; and our Conductor must have felt happy.—The Elegie by Ernst, which might have counted as the hackneyed concert piece some years ago when every virtuoso played it, has been little heard of late and for a sentimental work is one of the best of its kind, not without a certain nobility. At any rate the admirable manner in which Camilla [illegible] made it new and impressive.

For the sixth concert, Thursday, Jan. 21, the programme is this: Part I. Gade's other great romantic Overture "In the Highlands"; Weber's Concert-stück for piano, played by Miss ALICE DUTTON; Symphony in D, No. 4 (not the one already played) by Haydn. Part II. Cherubini's overture to Medea; Beethoven's short and rarely Symphony in F,—not the Pastoral, but No. 8.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S VOCAL CLUB. The first of the two concerts in which this rare choir of amateurs annually invite their friends took place on Monday evening, Jan. 4, at Chickering Hall, and was, as usual, repeated on the following Monday. The Club now numbers eight or ten voices on each part. In very fact as we could be found perhaps in Boston. The singers are all [illegible] and devoted, counting the Monday evening practice among their paramount engagements; and now, after some half a dozen years of careful drill together, they have attained a rare perfection in ensemble singing. We know of no organization in our city, great or small, vocal or instrumental, whose performance a most fantasy. So many clear [illegible] soprano [illegible] such a [illegible] [illegible] of rich contralto [illegible] tenors, and such a sound compact mass of mellow manly basses we do not hear elsewhere. And Mr. Parker, while he plays the other difficult accompaniments on the piano, has trained them to rare unity, precision, and observance of all points of light and shade. A finer technical precision, in most effect and in expression, has been model of good chorus and part singing.

The programme was choice, as it has always been. First came a [illegible] "And there were shepherds abiding in the field" (of wonderful expression, [illegible]) followed by a Choral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio. This was heard here for the first time, and so was the next piece. The 125th Psalm by Prof. Hill, for Tenor Solo and Chorus: "All they that trust in Thee, shall be as Mount Zion which may not be removed." "Round about Jerusalem stand the mountains: even so the Lord," &c., ending with "But peace shall be upon Israel." The idea of [illegible] accompaniment [illegible] is greatly conveyed in the first part [illegible] in the "[illegible]" a [illegible] and [illegible] the dual [illegible] of Peace is lovely music. The solos were sung in good voice and style by the younger Weiss.

A couple of well contrasted songs by Schumann, "Du bist wie eine Blume" and the impassioned "Ich [illegible] ... Alles," were sung with much beauty of voice and expression by Miss Cary, who also did [illegible] in Elijah. A couple of new four part songs by Mr. Paine: "The lily closes [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] breast" and Tennyson's "Bugle Song," were both singularly delicately [illegible] in the spirit of the verses and seem to us quite the [illegible] which [illegible] produced. The parts are [illegible] with most graceful skill, all [illegible] for the best vocal effect, which is certainly received for the little pieces were sung [illegible] had to be repeated. In the first one, at the [illegible] of "[illegible] all the west [illegible] to be [illegible], [illegible] are high soprano [illegible] with [illegible] effect. In the [illegible] the spirited, [illegible] and the repeated "echoes, dying, dying" are happily conceived.

A new Hymn by Mendelssohn, for Alto Solo (most ably and yet effectively sung, in rich tones [illegible] with feeling, by Miss [illegible]) and Chorus, a short strain of devout [illegible] and gratitude, was [illegible] by enjoyable and acceptable. Two more part-songs "[illegible]" and "Early Spring," by Mendelssohn, were sung in a [illegible]; and then a wild, grand song by Franz, "Aus Meer [illegible]" and the "Bedouin Song" (of his latest [illegible]), were given with such voice and power and fervor as only Mrs. [illegible] has.

After a pause, the [illegible] all the [illegible] ready. A Finale from the unfinished opera Loreley (Soprano Solo and Chorus), by Mendelssohn, concluded the [illegible]. Chorus of [illegible] hailing [illegible] from the Rhine, the [illegible] and [illegible] behind the [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] are marvellously [illegible] varied and [illegible] evokes the [illegible] of the deserted Leonora, and [illegible] to give her vengeance, by endowing her with fatal "beauty, grace [illegible]." Wonderfully impressive [illegible] in the passage where, when she [illegible] "Tell me, ye [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] power," they [illegible] her to [illegible]. The part of the maiden, a very exacting one, was sung in her [illegible] voice and with considerable dramatic verve and truth by Miss Anna Whitten. There is another [illegible] of the Loreley, a Chorus of Vintagers, which we hope we may hear some time.

We did hope to speak of "Fidelio," twice given lately by the German [illegible] of Mr. Grover's Opera troupe, and which with one chance of any [illegible] performance, we never mean to miss if we can help it; [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. But [illegible] has [illegible] [illegible] the present, having no room left either for that, or the miscellaneous various concerts named above.

Conservatoire. In our last speaking of the Conservatoire [illegible] [illegible] that it [illegible] copying the opposite of what we knew and meant. Not a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] paper after it was printed, so that what we had made the pitch of the Organ higher instead of lower than the common pitch of our orchestral instruments. But [illegible] Jove [illegible] nod!

Musical Correspondence

Paris, Dec. 11.—The concert season at the Conservatoire began, according, the selections performed at the first concert being as follows:

Symphony [illegible]	Gouvy.
[illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Adagio [illegible]	Beethoven.
Chorus [illegible]	Wagner.
Symphony [illegible]	Beethoven.

The performance of a Symphony by an unknown composer is an innovation almost unparalleled in the annals of the Conservatoire. In this instance, however, the merits of the composition are such as to justify the Committee in their departure from the established custom.

The Symphony is of the Mendelssohnian genre, and consists of an Allegro, Scherzo, Larghetto and Final. The subject is [illegible] treated, the instrumentation is [illegible] and we find none of the modern [illegible] [illegible] and cymbals, to which most modern composers [illegible], for the purpose of concealing a lack of ideas. The [illegible] both of Beethoven and Mendelssohn is plainly visible in the composition, and there are several passages which are worthy of either of these masters. The Larghetto is well sustained except in the scherzo, which seemed somewhat drawn, as though the composer were writing "against time."

This Symphony was coldly received by an audience which is proverbially critical and exacting. It has been very justly observed, that in order to succeed at the Conservatoire it is necessary to be dead. M. Gouvy lacks that important qualification.

The execution of the two Symphonies and of the Septet was—need it be said?—perfection. The last mentioned was played by two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons, with "tous les instruments à cordes."

The choruses were also rendered in a manner which left nothing to be desired. In the first Psalm the singers numbered (as nearly as I could judge) 80, but owing to the [illegible] proportion of the Salle, the effect was that of a [illegible] number. The "Chorus [illegible] Fileuses" was encored.

At the 1st Popular Concert of the 2nd Series, Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Weber's Oberon Overture, and Beethoven's 3d Overture to Leonore were performed.

[illegible]

New York, Jan. 1.—On Tuesday evening, Dec. 29, there was a concert of "Glees and Madrigals" at Steinway Hall. The solos and choruses were taken by some of the best professional and amateur talent in the city and the result was an entertainment of remarkable excellence and success. Mr. G. F. Warren presided at the organ, Mr. E. J. Connolly at the piano, and the whole performance was conducted by Dr. Brown.

Particularly interesting were a quintet, madrigal (?) [illegible] called "Down in a flowery vale," which was most charmingly sung in the chorus of [illegible] voices. Mendelssohn's Hymn "Hear my prayer" (Violin [illegible]) sung by Mrs. [illegible] and chorus, and a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] melody harmonized. This latter was completely done and was very earnestly encored.

Mrs. E. C. Beutelphina sang—in a quiet, unassuming and careful manner—a ballad, "My heart is ever [illegible]," and a reply in a recall, "Nothing else to do." Mrs. F. has a voice of exceptional purity and sweetness, and has the grace and natural merit of singing in tune.

Mr. S. P. Warren gave two organ solos which were partially inaudible, owing to the rudeness of the audience, which persisted in a very loud buzz and hum of talk and laughter.

Miss Hutchings did well in her solo. Her final note placing [illegible] at [illegible] that she has studied faithfully since last [illegible].

The piano accompaniments were, I regret to say, only mediocre. The audience was a very large one. The programmes, little pamphlets of eight pages, were exquisitely gotten up, and were the subject of much admiration.

Mr. Thomas's 6th Sunday Evening Concert possessed these leading points of attraction:

Overture, "Medea"	Gade.
Scherzo [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Nocturne [illegible]	Chopin.
[illegible] (F. Pardoner, and Orchestra.)
Scène de Ballet "[illegible]"	Meyerbeer.
Overture "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai.
[illegible]	Vieuxtemps.

Mrs. Farnsworth was the vocalist upon this occasion, and she sang Schubert's Ave Maria and a [illegible] from Der Freischütz in a somewhat hard and [illegible] style. In the Chopin Rondo Mr. Pardoner did not do himself justice, finding playing manage to [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] to do all that was expected of it. As regards the orchestral pieces, all were good and were quite well played. But I cannot [illegible] [illegible] pianoforte orchestras, when they are [illegible] suited for such an arrangement. I refer to the Mendelssohn Scherzo.

Cincinnati, Jan. 5.—Last night the Harmonic Society gave their first concert of the season with the following programme:

Overture to "[illegible] Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	[illegible]
a. Choral [illegible]
b. [illegible]
Prof. [illegible]
c. Chorus—"Praise the Lord."
[illegible] "Midsummer Night's Dream."	Mendelssohn.
Concert [illegible]
Mrs. [illegible]
Duet "The [illegible]"	[illegible]
Miss [illegible], Prof. [illegible] Smith.
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]
Cantata, [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Solos, by Mrs. [illegible], Miss [illegible] and [illegible]

The Chorus was not so large as in former seasons and was rather weak in the basses, who need to be very powerful with this Society. But they have over, now the materials for a very fine chorus. [illegible] of force and character which most of the choral performances of this season showed to-night, I think, is easily accounted for [illegible] more careful drilling. The last chorus in the "Hymn of Praise," which was the best and gave great satisfaction, showed what the Society [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] accomplish. But in my opinion the Directors deserve some [illegible] than blame for the poor arrangement of the first part of the concert, which left the audience in a [illegible] condition for enjoying the second part.

In the first place the selection of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture for the opening was not judicious, as the Orchestra [illegible] does not play this Overture well enough, and also because this and the following number for the Orchestra ought to have been works by different composers instead of both by Mendelssohn, both the conductor's [illegible] to combine one of the performances of the Cantata by the same composer in the second part. Next, the chorus from Messiah, "The Curse of the Lord" [illegible] very poorly adapted as an introduction, while it was a [illegible] very unmeaning in the latter part of a concert and should [illegible] by which [illegible]. The most remarkable feature was, I venture to say, the whole part of the concert by a large chorus Society with a perfectly sentimental and long-winded solo for [illegible]. For this astonishing arrangement the [illegible], I think, ought to blush and to apologize to the Society.

The second part of the concert, in one grand effort, made one forget what had passed before. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" is a most beautiful work, which it was a great treat to hear again, and which is particularly well adapted to the capacity of the [illegible] Society. X

New York, Jan. 11.—On Monday and Tuesday evenings Ole Bull gave concerts in Steinway Hall, assisted by Miss Barton (contralto) of Boston, Mr. G. F. Hall, Mr. J. N. Wilson (pianist), recently from the Leipzic Conservatory, and by an orchestra of about 40 under the direction of Carl Bergmann.

Herr Bull played a Concerto by Mozart, and did it admirably; this was well; he also played as an encore (after one of his solos) the "Arkansas Traveller," with which he discoursed so last winter; this was [illegible] and [illegible] selection was [illegible] ... [illegible] order. [illegible] Bull played the Concerto from memory. His reception, on Monday evening particularly, was very cordial.

Miss Barton sang very beautifully the Handel Aria by Handel, which [illegible] ... at the Philharmonic. Her voice is full, rich, and [illegible], and her enunciation excellent. She made a most favorable impression.

Mr. James [illegible] W[illegible] is a very fair mechanical pianist, but unfortunately [illegible] appears to have been omitted from his organization.

In [illegible] of the splendid full-toned instruments to which the habitués of Steinway Hall are accustomed, a grand piano "constructed upon entirely new principles by Mr. Ole Bull" was used. It possessed a hard, wiry tone, and the action was evidently hard and stiff.

On Friday evening Mme. Parepa-Rosa made her appearance in concert for the first time [illegible] (in New York). Her assisting talent included Carl Rosa, Brookhouse Bowler (tenor), Ferranti (baritone) and Mr. Levy, the great cornet-à-piston performer.

Mme. Parepa sang for her first solo, the Scena from Der Freischütz, and as an encore a pretty ballad "Forget me not"—both in her best [illegible]. Her voice seems to have lost none of its original freshness and purity, and a very large audience applauded her as usual to the echo.

Herr Rosa's intonation was faulty, and his double stop passages wretchedly. Evidently he had not improved [illegible] ... Mr. Levy, who accompanied Mme. Parepa to this country in 1865, achieved a great success by his marvellous [illegible] ... His principal solo was "Rode's Air with variations."

Messrs. Ferranti and Bowler acquitted themselves creditably, and Mr. Colby played the accompaniments with unusual ability. A second [illegible] ("positively the last") Parepa concert will be given next Friday evening with an entire change of programme.

On Saturday evening Jan. 9th our 2nd Philharmonic concert occurred at the Academy of Music. This was the programme:

Symphony, 1 Bet. (No. 8, [illegible] Ed.)	Haydn
3rd movement from [illegible] ...	Beethoven
Overture, "[illegible]"	Cadé
[illegible] Concerto, Op. 73, [illegible]	Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "[illegible]"	Liszt

The Haydn Symphony was a [illegible] pleasure from its spontaneity and [illegible] ... the [illegible] ... of both Haydn's and Mozart's symphonies is the apparent absence of any art, and the fact that one can almost believe it to be an easy thing for [illegible] to write in the same style.

The Cadé Overture was [illegible] at the Thomas' [illegible] Symphony Soirée and my opinion of it is that [illegible], but [illegible] ... change. The Liszt [illegible] was [illegible] placed at the end of the programme, [illegible] ... heard by comparatively few people. The "poem" possesses all [illegible] ... and [illegible] ... of [illegible] ... the lack of any form.

Mme. [illegible] rendered the first movement of Beethoven's only Violin Concerto (played by Theo. Thomas at the last concert last season) [illegible] ... own manner. Her intonation (her peculiar excellence) was almost faultless, and her execution was wonderfully clear, smooth and even. The delighted audience insisted (despite the Philharmonic rules) upon an encore, and at last, after persistent and universal applause, Mme. [illegible] re-appeared, and played most beautifully Ernst's "Elegie."

Mr. Mills played the superb Beethoven Concerto, called "The Emperor" by the Germans, in his bold and masterly style, and maintained his well established reputation as one of our very best and most reliable performers of concerted music. To excel in this line there are required accurate tone, self-possession, [illegible] ...

Then silence was at [illegible] ... during a performance [illegible] ... the talking, laughing, flirting, and [illegible] ... were simply [illegible]. I regret to say that [illegible] ... of this shocking "bought" [illegible].

Mr. Theo. Thomas gave his 5th Sunday Concert last evening. Mme. Stock (the [illegible]) made her second appearance, and Mr. J. N. Pattison played two piano solos in a style [illegible] his own. The programme (orchestral) included the Introduction to the 5th Act of King Manfred by Reinecke, and Nicolai's Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Music and Maiden.

Paraphrased from the Plat-Deutsch of Klaus Groth.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

On a heather tree,
Singing merrily,
Sits a music in the sunshine gleaming;
Sweet to hear and see!

Come, wild music, come,
Fly on airy wing
Unto where—her brow in sunshine shading—
Lindas bench is resting

Fresh and merry there,
Placing thy wing but fair;
Warble loudly, over the sea and Looks dreaming!

Merry pleasant, all
Cry to the bird sweet girl
Oh! had I other wings, and travelled Come thou see them, music!

My Recollections of Mendelssohn.

Translated for this Journal from the German of Edward Devrient.

My personal relations with Felix Mendelssohn began in January 1822. He was a boy of nearly thirteen years, and I a young man of over twenty having held for nearly three years the position of baritone singer at the Royal Opera at Berlin, and having already given stability to my life through an early betrothal.

It was six years after the removal of the Mendelssohn family from Paris to Berlin; they had lived before that time in Hamburg, where Felix was born on the 3d of February 1809. I had occasionally seen the boy. His appearance was striking, with his long brown curly hair, as he stepped vigorously along through the streets, on his great shoes, having hold of his father's hand. In the last of those years I often remarked him, on my small way to my betrothed, before the door of the grandmother's house on the new promenade, eagerly playing tag with other boys. In musical circles I had heard of the boy's extraordinary capabilities, had seen him at the Frey Abend concerts and at Zelter's Friday music meetings, had also met him at a singing tea party, where he stood among the grown people in his childish dress, the jacket cut wide, a tight jacket cut out wide about the throat, over which were the broad wide trousers. The little fellow liked to stick his hands into his side pockets, and would rock his curly head sideways to and fro, as he restlessly stepped from one foot upon the other. With eyes almost wholly closed the brown eyes flashing out between, he jerked out his answers to the curious customary questions—such as people are apt to put to wonder-children—with a stammering tongue, almost defiantly.

His piano playing I found to be of astonishing facility and musical certainty; but it was then still inferior to that of his older sister Fanny. They told, however, of compositions, even little operas, by the boy.

Meanwhile my intended bride Therese had become acquainted with Fanny at the Singakademie, and so she came to the wish in the Mendelssohn house; while the master in the year before, to sing Felix's opera compositions, and there was need of a Soprano for it. Therese was introduced there by her singing teacher Zelter, who was Director of the Singakademie and teacher of harmony at the Mendelssohn house, where he was highly esteemed and intimate. Soon it became my turn also. Felix's violin teacher Concertmeister Henning, was to have sung the bass parts, but found himself unfitted for it and proposed me for a substitute. And so I went to the rehearsals of Felix's earliest operas in the house of his parents.

Considering the wealth attributed to the father, the arrangement of the house must have appeared all scrupulously simple. Carpets and furniture were very modest, but the walls of the saloon were covered with copperplate engravings of Rafael's Loggie. The singers sat around the large dining table and near to the piano, at which upon a high cushion Felix sat and unembarrassed, earnest, serious, as if engaged in some boys' play with his comrades, directed us and played the master. The fact of so many grown persons exerting themselves for the sake of his creations seemed just as little to make him vain, as the fact that he had just written his third little opera and was engaged upon a larger one. Evidently with him the main concern was with the music and he took for granted that it was so with us too. It struck me from the first moment that self-esteem or vanity in the boy were very weak; while, on the contrary, the wish to gain experience, to learn, to test, to get onward for the sake of the thing itself was decidedly predominant. After the pieces had been tried through, he had no care but to gather the sheets of music carefully together and lay them in order; before listening to any flattering expressions, which he received politely but was glad to lead the talk back to details of execution or the way of questions or correction.

There were two one-act operas, which we rehearsed there several times: "The two Schoolmasters" (Die beiden Pädagogen) which had already been sung in the preceding winter together with his first attempt "Soldatenliebschaft"—with which I did not become acquainted—and a new one: "The travelling Virtuosos" (Die wandernden Virtuosen). The texts to these were made up from French vaudevilles by the young Doctor Caspar, who sang the tenor parts with a great deal of naivety.

The music was peculiar, steadily adhering to the natural declamation of the words, without melodic invention particularly, but making advantage of the comical moments with humor and with tact. I sought for resemblance with other composers, and was only able to find it with Dittersdorf. Prominent in effect was a duet of the second opera between a pretended and a real schoolmaster who disputed about the educational methods of Basedow and Pestalozzi. Dr. Caspar and I sang it to the great amusement of a large company at the rehearsals and performances.

From the time Therese and I were much at home in the Mendelssohn house Felix became attached to me, all of us seemed to please the parents, and Therese's relation to Fanny grew more intimate.

We made music many an evening now; we read pieces of Shakspeare, dividing the characters around; and took part actively in the musics in the Sunday music, for which the father's means enabled him to gather about him now a little orchestra from the Royal Kapelle so that Felix enjoyed the inestimable advantage of becoming even in those years of boyhood intimately acquainted with the nature of the instruments and the way of using them, and of being able to try over his own compositions at once in practical execution. The boy stood on a footstool before his note desk and there among the seated musicians, especially alongside of the gigantic contrabassist, he looked wonder-childlike enough in his boy's dress, as, shaking the long locks over his bare neck, he looked off over the room like a little field marshal, then boldly struck in with the baton and with composure and with certainty, yet always modest, listening and trying to detect a sound, directed his piece through to the end.

Of course he also produced other compositions than his own at these Sunday music parties, and both he and Fanny played Trios and other piano pieces with orchestra.

Obviously this early growing into an understanding of the orchestra and into the routine of direction, must have had great influence on Felix's development. I learned at all events to know the rich teaching apparatus, the signal combination of educative powers, which worked upon his education. The mother in the first place had discovered a talent for the piano in the two elder children which she developed by her own system. In Berlin the downright, honest, sturdy Zelter had become their teacher in harmony and the genial, warm-hearted Berger their piano teacher; with the same Henning Felix began to play the violin. The draft to Professor Rösel gave them instruction in landscape drawing; Felix learned more of him than the other children did; he learned in a later period to free himself from the manner of his master. But the young Dr. Heyse (father of the poet Paul Heyse) was the family tutor of the four children who were all endowed with extraordinary gifts of understanding. He, in his quiet, thorough way, furthered Felix's scientific development until the entrance to the university. His youngest sister Rebecca, by her gentle patience in the lessons, helped him overcome her liberal native to the study of the Greek language. The mother, a thoroughly intelligent and finely cultivated woman and a busy housekeeper, who was found constantly employed either in reading or in the hospitable work of her hands, inexorably insisted on the children being kept at industry. That activity became for Felix a habitual necessity, was perhaps due to this room. Less attractive labors he had to perform in his mother's chamber, at her feet, and at Rebecca's little table. When I visited the mother's house in the forenoon and he with his bread and butter—which gave him the right to quit the scene of labor—came into the ante-room to chat with me, longer than the bread and butter lasted, the short and sudden exclamation of the mother: "Felix, are you doing nothing?" was soon sure to scare him back again into the back chamber.

The neighbors in homes on the son's development were, clearly enough, that of the father. Abraham Mendelssohn was a remarkable man, in whose acute mind life combined itself with unusual clearness, whose thinking and feeling, study and experience had all ... to find the divine in the higher reason. To the born Jew, the son of the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, this conviction was ... in his ... standing in that period of sentimental catholicism in the church, it only by degrees became intelligible; but the very reasons by which he estimated the worth of things appeared too natural. The conviction that our life is a pledge to labor in useful deed and effort, this conviction Felix inherited from his father.

A striking phenomenon with all that wisdom, one which may have been induced by physical causes, was Abraham Mendelssohn's despotic temper which grew on him with years, and indeed became more and more ... and intolerable. Had the cause of this excitability any connection with his sudden death and may it possibly have been inherited by Felix?

When in addition to the distinguished persons who had a ... and official influence on Felix, we count in the older and younger friends of the family, the abundant ... of honored and remarkable persons, we may say that nowhere among all the contemporaries ... of our people can one point to ... example of a youth so favored.

Before the door Felix observed:

"I may as well tell you, if he gets rude I shall go. I must not have a row with him."

"Rude he will certainly be," I replied, "but I will undertake all the wrangling."

We knocked. "Tis a master called out loudly to us, in his rough a ... to come in. We found the old giant in a thick cloud of tobacco-smoke, with his pipe in his mouth, sitting at his old grand piano with its ... of keys. ... in his hand he held the quill pen with which he used to write, ... a sheet of music lay before him. He had on his short unbuttoned loose coat, a pair of drawers which, though ... below the knee, were provided ... with ... coarse woollen stockings, and shoes with ... embroidered upon them. His hair ... was brushed back and ... his face ... his ... countenance, as I ... features towards the door. On recognizing us through his spectacles, he called out in a friendly tone, and his usual broad way: "Hallo! What's this? Two such handsome young gentlemen so early! Well, to what am I indebted for this honor? Here, be seated!"

He conducted us to a corner of the room, and sat down upon a plain-looking sofa, while we fetched ourselves chairs.

I now began the speech, which I had well thought over beforehand, about the admiration felt for Bach's works with which we had first become acquainted at Zelter's Friday music-meetings, and which we had afterwards studied more thoroughly at Mendelssohn's house. I said we wished to yield to the desire universally expressed, and to make an attempt to perform the Passion in the public; and—if Zelter would give his consent and support—get up a performance of it with the help of the Singakademie.

"Yes," he said slowly and stretching ... up as was his custom when ... anything with special earnestness, "but how is the thing to be done? Such an enterprise demands greater resources than those we at present possess."

He then dilated upon what the work required and the difficulties ... he said that the ... Thomas School ... when Bach was ... and he ... that a double orchestra, also, was ... and that the violinists of the present day did not know how to treat such music. He added that the whole matter had been long and thoroughly considered, and that if the difficulties could have been so lightly overcome, the Passion Music which Bach had composed to all the four Evangelists would long since have been performed.

While speaking he had warmed up, and rising from the sofa, laid down his pipe and walked backwards and forwards in the room. We also rose, and Felix pulled me by the coat. He already gave the matter up as lost.

I replied that we—to wit, Felix—thought the difficulties very great, but none ... enough to consider them insurmountable. I observed that, thanks to him (Zelter), the Singakademie ... such Sebastian Bach as ... he had ... to chorus ... that I was capable of ... any ... that Felix had become acquainted with the work thoroughly and ... as to how it ought to be conducted. I remarked that I was burning to sing ... part of the Saviour and that we ... ourselves ... feeling the same enthusiasm which animated us would soon extend to all engaged in the enterprise, and cause it to succeed.

Zelter kept growing more and more angry. He had indulged from time to time in expressions of doubt and of disdain on hearing which Felix had ... pulled me by the coat, and gradually edged towards the door. The old man ... broke out:

"Do you expect any one to listen patiently to what you are saying? Very different people from you have been obliged to abandon all notion of undertaking that task; and now a couple of snivelling boys come and tell me it is all child's play."

He shot off this pleasing specimen of Berlin politeness with the utmost energy, and I could scarcely refrain from laughing. He, however, was a privileged person, who could be as rude as he chose; besides, for the Chorus Passion, and from ... we could well afford to put up with worse than this.

I now looked round towards Felix, who was standing at the door with the handle in his hand. His face was pale and he wore a somewhat offended expression. He made a sign for me to go, giving him to understand that we must not ... I then began boldly to argue the matter further. I observed that, young though we were, we were not so inexperienced but that our master had already ... capable of ... a difficult task; that the spirit of enterprise was especially appropriate to youth, and that ... it must be gratifying for him to see two of his own pupils attempt the most sublime composition he had ever taught them.

My arguments were evidently beginning to work; the crisis was past.

I went on to say that we desired only to make the experiment whether the project could be carried out, and begged he would allow us to do so and give us his assistance; if the experiment did not succeed, we could always, I remarked, give it up without disgrace.

"How do you mean to set about it?" he asked, standing still. "You think of nothing. First of all there is the committee, who must consent; a great many persons each with an opinion of his own—and there are a lot of women, too, remember—you will find it no such easy matter to make them all agree."

I replied that the members of the committee were favorably disposed towards us; that the principal lady members, who led the others, took part in the vocal practice at Mendelssohn's, and were ready ... to our ...; and that I hoped to obtain the use of the concert-room and the co-operation of the general body of the members.

"Oh, oh, the members!" exclaimed Zelter; "they will be the first to throw you. One day ten of them come to rehearsal, and the next day twenty stop away!"

We were able to laugh heartily at his facetious remark, for I perceived that our cause was gained. Felix now explained to the old gentleman his plan for holding the preparatory rehearsals in the small concert room, and spoke of the constitution of the orchestra, which Eduard Rietz was to conduct. As Zelter could, at last, advance no more practical objections, he said:

"Well, I will not oppose you—on the contrary, I will speak up for you when requisite. In Heaven's name, set to work; we shall see how you will get on."

We parted with grateful hearts, and as good friends, from our worthy old host.

"It's all right!" I said in the hall.

"My dear fellow," replied Felix, "you are a very devil—an arch-Jesuit!"

"It is all for the greater glory of Heaven and of Sebastian Bach," I answered, and we went on with joyous hearts into the winter air; for we had been successful in the most important portion of the business.*

Visit with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Our esteemed master Neukomm was also passing a couple of weeks in September with his friends at Trouville. He wished to see Rossini, and as he had not met him for twenty-five years, I called with him. Rossini at once recollected him—at that time, at the Duchess of Vaudemont's, Neukomm had given him some hints about the construction of an Aeolian harp, of which he had several made at the country seat of his friend Aguado. The two distinguished men conversed together in the most cordial manner. I had told Rossini much about Neukomm, especially of his incredible and really wonderful activity, which kept him prisoner in his room ... from the earliest hour of morning. Thereupon Rossini began:

"You are still ever occupied in producing, Signor Chevalier," he said to him.

—When it comes to such a pass that I can work no more, replied Neukomm, they may lay me between six boards and nail them up. I shall not care to live any more after.

—You have the passion of industry. I always have had that of laziness, replied Rossini.

—The sixty operas of your composing are not exactly a proof of that, replied Neukomm.

—That was long ago. But one should bring into the world with him nine-cords instead of seven, added he ... somewhat seriously. But let us leave that. You have travelled extensively and indeed have been for several years in Brazil?

—I had accepted the place of court-kapellmeister with Don Pedro, who was a very music-loving gentleman. He even busied himself with composition.

—I can tell you something about that, said Rossini. He had been so gracious as to send me an order. Afterwards when he came, somewhat against his will, to Paris, I thanked him for it, and as I had heard about his compositions, I asked him to allow something of them to be performed at the Italian Opera, to which he willingly consented.

—It would have been Fernand, had you wished it, interrupted Neukomm.

—Is possible! He sent me a Cavatina which I had copied out with the addition of a few trombone blasts. It was well performed at a concert at the Italian Opera, received quite a respectable applause, and Don Pedro, who was present, appeared to be great pleasure with it,—at all events he thanked me in the warmest manner.—

I must insert here by way of completion of this little anecdote, that I spoke of it in the saloon of the Countess B. I remember that as soon as he was going forth and met the Countess, Don Pedro came after the concert was the Tuileries and looked perfectly transfigured. He declared that he never in all his life experienced so great a pleasure. These enthusiastic outbursts on the part of a man who had just lost an empire, appeared strange enough.

—Perhaps it is not always the weightiest events, that give us the greatest pleasure I took the liberty of remarking.

—Another occasion I was with Rossini at Neukomm's. The latter had in his chamber a little Orgue expressif, and he contained many a preparatory and rich structure improvised by himself. With the possible sincere pardon, when Neukomm replaced all the kettle and treated Rossini to try the instrument. He sat down and played, as well as he could, a couple of dozen bars of the "Chase" from the "Creation," which was an easily very gratifying to the old scholar of Haydn. Then I played with Neukomm some movements from "The Seven Words," which he had arranged for piano and organ myself, which led to mention of the fact that Neukomm had performed the labor on a great number of the greater works of Haydn, Haydn and Mozart, of course simply for his own satisfaction and the pleasure of a few friends.

Afterwards, as we walked away together, Rossini said to me: a modest! Such industry, such genuine simple love of Art are in the highest degree honorable. No money interest comes in play there, nowhere, or at least so small a dose of it that it is not worth speaking of. I have great respect for it!

—Did your extraordinary successes ever turn your head? I asked Rossini one day. You were so young, it would have been no wonder.

—My successes very much, said the maestro, smiling in his peculiar way. But seriously speaking I have always treated my favorable guest as success, and in a fiasco likewise: and for that I thank an impression I received in my earliest youth and which I never have forgotten.

—What was that?

—Before I had yet given my first operetta, began the maestro, I was present in Venice at the last production of a new opera of Simon Mayr. Mayr, you know, at that time was the hero of the day. He had produced perhaps twenty operas in Venice with the greatest success. In spite of all this the public treated him that evening as if he were an ignorant vagabond; you can form no idea of such a rudeness. I was really shocked. Is this the way you reward a man who has provided you enjoyment for so many years? Dare you thus such liberties, because you have paid a couple of paoli entrance money! Then thought I, it is not worth while, though I do take your judgment much to heart: and on this principle I have acted ever since as much as possible.

—They have not always behaved very gently towards you, I said.

—You too! I also know how they maltreated me at the first performance of "The Barber" and that was not the only time. But once crossing the Venetians treated me. It was at the first performance of an opera, Semiramide, which made them most heartily tired. I saw by their looks, how gladly they would have hissed their applause; but they controlled themselves, kept still and let the music flow past, undisturbed. I was quite affected by this sensibility.

—I can fancy to myself a lively picture of it, said I laughing.

—To say the truth, continued Rossini in a lively tone, I was at that time the most insolent fellow in the world! I would say perhaps tenderly and rarely to the present disturbed me, such I had as far one ended as to make there no audience; see. Beyond that the devil might take off I old serenad. I was very young, I dare say; but I did not do other wise. I was so constituted.

—It was very well that it was so! Else you never would have composed "The Barber."[*] But, apropos of "The Barber" I have sometimes heard it complained that the aria of Marcellina in the second act was not yours. Is it so?

—You mean the aria di sorbetto?[*] said Rossini. I gave her the composition of that. A thin reedy one of another aria di sorbetto, which was hers enough.

—What was that?

—In an opera Ciro in Babilonia, I had a dreadful seconda donna. She was not only beyond all bounds ill-looking, but her voice too was worthless. After a most careful examination I discovered that she possessed one single tone, the B flat of the middle octave, which sounded not badly. So I wrote her an aria in which she had nothing to sing but that one tone to sing, gave all to the orchestra, and as the piece pleased and was applauded, my one-toned singer was overjoyed at her triumph.

—She was at least modest. But this Ciro? I have neither seen nor heard of it.

—It belongs with my fiascos. When I returned from an unfortunate production in Bologna I found an invitation to a picnic. I ordered at a confectioner's a big ship of march-pane whose flag bore the name "Ciro"; the mast was broken the sail hid of holes, and it lay on its side swimming in a sea of sweet cream. The merry company laughingly devoured my wrecked vessel.

—But this does not prove, said I, that your Parisian conquerors deserved his fate;—the one in particular. Your Zelmira is one of your least known operas, and yet it certainly belongs among your best.

—During my stay in Vienna, said Rossini, it had great success, but it required such an excellent ensemble of singers as I had with me there. I had recommended the tenor here.

—Was not also much with the musical arrangement that you found there? I asked.

—The whole was excellent. The orchestra, too, was very good. It only wanted power, which possibly was accidental. Did you know Weigl?

—I saw him for a moment in my earliest boyhood; he was then directing.

—Very likely. He knew that he had been described to me as one of my great enemies. To convince me of the contrary, he rehearsed Zelmira with the orchestra with a carefulness such as I had never known either in myself or others. I wanted almost one to beg him not to be so very particular about my but I had to confess that it went wonderfully. At the same time I heard several of my operas in a German translation and indeed to my greatest satisfaction. The German language adapted itself to my music much better than the French, as I was afterwards convinced. Among the singers I recollect particularly the bass, Forti, as a great talent. The Ungher and the Sontag began then to attract at that time.

—I am not surprised at what you say of the German translation of your operas. To be sure I find it excessive to the excellence of the rhythm; but one properly about had pretty well performed them and short quantities, accords much nearer to the Italian, than the French has.

—In the translations which they made of several of my operas for the Grand Opera, said Rossini, I often could not trust my notes; the substituted text seemed to me impossible, intolerable. But Nourrit, to whom I spoke of it, found it all right; I also saw that no one was disturbed by it. It would have been laughable to wish to be more severe than Frenchmen were, and so I did not press the matter; but the impression which I had of it has never changed.

—The French composers frequently are not very exact in their treatment of the text, and many foreigners have not been scrupulous in that respect. How Meyerbeer has not our German Gluck dealt and the French!

—It would have been bad if he had not done it replied the maestro, since with him the declamation was I would be fundamental of the whole.

—Do you believe maestro, that poetry and music ever can stand in equal interest to the same time?

—When the charm of the tone has once fairly seized upon the hearer, said Rossini with liveliness, the words will surely have the worst of it. But if the music has not so of what use is it? It is then unnecessary, if not superfluous, or at most annoying.

—You must tell me still more about your boyhood, maestro. I began over a game of Domino; for you were properly a boy when you began to write operas. How came it that you made your debut in Venice, of all places?

—Accident plays a great a part in our career, explained Rossini. At the age of thirteen I was engaged for the opera season in Sinigaglia as maestro al cembalo. I found there a singer who sang not badly, but was just one of the most unmusical sort. One day in an aria she made a cadenza of a harmony so extravagant, that went beyond everything. I tried to make it clear to her, but she should have more regard for the harmony held out in the orchestra, and she even seemed to see the truth of this remark to a certain degree, but at the performance she abandoned herself again to her own genius and made a cadenza, at which I could not refrain from laughing out. But the parterre also broke out into a loud laugh and the diva was furious. She complained to her special guardian, the gentleman who on the part of the city stood at the head of the opera, a very wealthy and respectable Venetian, who had large estates at Sinigaglia. He summoned me particularly of my ill conduct, maintaining that I had set the public laughing by my own behavior. I was summoned into the gentleman's presence and scarcely tolerated by him. "If you allow yourself to make fun of the first artistes, said he to me in a domineering tone, I will have you thrown into prison." He might have been able to do that, but I did not let myself be intimidated and the affair took another turn. I explained to him my harmonic scruples, convinced him of my innocence, and instead of sending me to prison, he conceived the liveliest fancy for me and told me finally that if I ever got so far as to be able to compose an opera, I must come to him and he would commission me at once.

—And did he keep his word?

—I may thank him for my first scrittura in Venice, and with a remuneration of 200 francs, which at that time seemed to be not small.

—At the theatre San Moisè, was it not?

—Yes. That theatre has now gone down, and it is a great loss for the young Italian composers. They used to give there little comic operas, for four or five persons, without chorus, without change of scenery, which could be studied in the shortest time and which cost little expense; but it be. Hence it was easy to get one's work brought out there and acquire a little experience. Many distinguished composers have made their début there. To-day if a young Italian composer wishes to make a first attempt upon the stage, and has not some thousands of francs to throw away upon it, he will hardly be able to accomplish it. In fact, quite other means are now required, such as it is hardly to be supposed an impresario would risk.

—What a pity that the Italians have so entirely forsaken the opera buffa, in which they have achieved so much that is excellent! said I.

* In Italian, a sorbetto, the favorite the piece sung by the second or third singers, while the company refreshed themselves with ice-creams, &c.

—The Neapolitans especially, replied Rossini, had a peculiar talent for it. This kind requires perhaps rather a lively feeling for the nature of the stage, than great musical gifts. But now the singers, too, for that are wanting. This daily handling of the stiletto makes them quite unfit to move with lightness and with grace.

—Do you ascribe it to political events, that such a preponderating taste for the tragic, the pathetic, rules just now in Italy?

—I do not know, said the maestro, but I have observed, that since by way of exception an opera buffa has once been taken up again, it always encounters a certain enthusiastic public, and causes a good deal of increased among the people.

—And that is something not to be despised! said I, thinking of Goethe's comment o, &c.

—One day the maestro suddenly sang the beginning of the finale from Beethoven's Septet, and then a Scherzo of the same master.—From which Symphony is that movement? he asked, turning to me.

—From the Eroica.

—Right. What an energy, what a fire dwells in that man! What treasures are contained in his pianoforte Sonatas. I am not sure that Haydn is not more happy with him than the Symphonies; there is perhaps even more inspiration in them. Did you know Beethoven?

—I had the fortune of coming to speak with him a few weeks before his death.—I answered.

—Dare say, when I went to Vienna, I was brought to him by the old Carpani; but, with his deafness and my ignorance of the German language, conversation was impossible. I regret that I have so little seen him.—But your Weber also was a capital fellow—his treatment of the orchestra, the sum of effects which he won from the [illegible] Did he write Symphonies also?

—He made one attempt, which however cannot be counted among his most felicitous. On the contrary, his Overtures, are in the concert room, are among our most favorite pieces for the orchestra.

—And justly, said the maestro, although I cannot exactly approve the practice of introducing in the overture the finest motives of the opera; if only because it robs them of the charm of novelty when they occur again. Besides, it is not easy to divine their relations to one another before the play. But Weber had generous ideas. How charming the entrance of the march in his Concertstück, with the deep clarinet tones! (Rossini sang the first part of it.) I have always loved to hear this piece.

—You must have heard it from Liszt, who in truth played it as no other could! I interrupted.

—Poor Weber! He visited me in Paris on his journey to London. He looked then so weak and suffering, that to me it was incomprehensible how he could undertake such a journey. He hoped, he told me, to be able to earn something substantial there for his family;—he should have prevented him from it. The way in which he approached me, was singular to me, here once stretch me ... I almost comical.

—How so, maestro?

—It seems that Weber at an earlier period had once written a newspaper article about, or rather against my Tancredi, and he thought it necessary therefore to have me asked, through an acquaintance, whether I would be willing to see him. If I had had any ... when as a twenty-year old boy I got ... upon paper. But a foreign composer would ... not ... I should surely have reckoned it an honor. You can imagine, that Weber's visit was none the less welcome to me on this account.

—Newspaper articles have never troubled you much? said I.

—Certainly not! replied the maestro, laughing. To think of all that was written against me when I came to Paris! Indeed the old Berton made verses upon me, in which he called me Mr. Crescendo. But all that passed without danger to life? What does it say more that they have circulated a mass of curious stories about me, in which I sometimes play a strange part enough—but we must put up with all that.

—But you must some day dictate your biography to somebody, said I. The particulars of so rich a life as yours ought not to be lost. I too shall soon be able to furnish a small contribution to it! You perceive, I listen to you as if I belonged to the secret police.

—Keep on asking questions, my dear Ferdinand! as long as you are at all interested.

—For a Maestro! Then you will have to hold forth many a time yet!

Schumann's "Cologne" Symphony (in E flat.)

The Symphony lately played at the Crystal Palace will do more for its composer's fame than any other single work known in the English public. What are the opinions entertained of it by one of Schumann's most consistent admirers, the following remarks taken from the Crystal Palace programme will show:

"This symphony, though numbered the third, is really the last of Schumann's four. It was composed between the 2nd November and 9th December 1850, and therefore very shortly after he entered upon his office as Director of the Music at Düsseldorf, of which he first discharged the public functions on the 24th of the preceding October. The symphony is known in Germany as the 'Rhenish' (die Rheinische), because Schumann used to speak of saying that the first impulse towards its composition had been received on his visit to the sight of the cathedral at Cologne, as I remembered by the grand movement in the introduction, here of the archbishop in that ... which he witnessed while engaged in the composition. The Royal Orchestra ... a small number of soirées in the Saal of the Opera House. They are of course fully attended by the élite of the city. It may sound strange to many of our concert goers, especially those who attend our Harvard Musical concerts, that the holders of season tickets to the Royal Symphony Soirées are privileged to retain them so long as they wish, by sending in their names at the close of each season. Instead of the same few seats—secured by the concert ... —the ... seats ... to be held by their present possessors and for life if they choose. There has been quite an excitement lately in musical circles at the removal of Taubert, leader of the Royal Capelle, a musician who has earned his position by hard labor and long service—for thirty years. It occurred to the Queen while in Stuttgart, that Eckert would be a pleasant change for her Symphony Concerts, and Taubert was quietly ousted from his place. Such a move in conservative Berlin was seldom precedented. The matter was concluded ... however by leaving Taubert his full salary as ... conductorship of the opera performances. Herr Eckert ... promoted at three hundred thalers. Eckert ... will continue the Royal Concerts. To be in the service of Royalty has its charms, but to be dependent for a living on a position subject to the fickle disposal of another has its drawbacks as well.

What combination and unity of action can effect, may be seen in the programmes of the Berlin Orchestra concerts. Stern, the conductor, was two years ago leader of the "Stern'sche Gesangverein," a society of 250 voices under superb training. Having now the orchestra under his baton, the two bodies are made to co-operate, and the voices have an important part in every concert. We have lately had Beethoven's Ninth, besides choruses by [illegible], Schumann, Mendelssohn and last week the Christmas Oratorio of Bach. Next in order are the Messiah and Creation.

The Sing-Akademie sang ... Bach's St. Matthew Passion, probably a more [illegible] ... Tod Jesu of Graun ... by the Great Frederic. The work of Graun's has so rooted itself into the musical soil of Berlin as to be as regular in its return as the new year itself. There are many who make "Tod Jesu" on their new year's calendar and rarely venture otherwise from the concert room. You will doubtless remember that Frederic the Great, after the successful seven years of the ... Seven Years War, ordered Graun's Oratorio ... [illegible] ... in the Chapel of the Charlottenburg Palace. A painting which I recently saw in the exhibition of the Art Academy represents the King alone, sitting ... [illegible] ... forward upon his ... walking stick ... [illegible] ... of the God of battles with whom he wished to commune alone.

The concerts of the Bilse orchestra are much frequented. There is a daily concert and two symphony [illegible] week. Here is the programme of the last.

A long programme, and for the popular price of ten cents. The audience is always large and the programmes varied to suit the taste of every kind of musical palate. I will describe these concerts more in detail at another time, as they are unique and part of the Berlin musical life. Amongst the treats we have had the piano concerts of Tausig and Rubinstein. The former gave [illegible], Rubinstein a series of four. Tausig sits quietly at the piano, not a movement of his form which is not directly necessary. NEW YORK, Jan. 18.—Ole Bull gave another — the "last" of course — concert on Tuesday evening and Mme. Parepa made a second appearance on Friday evening. There was very little ... in the ... audience which always greet these artists. On Saturday evening Theo. Thomas delighted us with his 2nd "Symphony Soirée" which was attended by a large and well behaved audience. Very agreeable was the serious musical and decorous quietness, showing a marked contrast to the turbulence at the Philharmonic on the preceding Saturday evening. This was Mr. Thomas's programme:

[illegible]	[illegible]

interesting Soirée. To praise this noble work, composed about 1812, and of which the composer never heard anything but the roll of the drums, is to go over ground already well trodden. In the present age of musical taste and discernment, how strange does it appear to be reminded that, when it was first produced, a man no less great and true than Von Weber wrote, "That the extravagances of genius had reached their ne plus ultra, and that the author of such a symphony was fully ripe for the madhouse." Weber's judgment only proves to us how much Beethoven was in advance of his time.

To say that the orchestra played well would be a pleasant thing to do, but truth demands a contrary statement; the strings were reliable and accurate, as always, but the wind instruments uncertain. I refer particularly to the brass.

The 3d Soirée will take place on Saturday evening, Feb. 12th, when Mr. Mills will appear and the programme will include Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, and Beethoven's Fantasia in C minor, for piano, chorus and orchestra.

Mr. Thomas's 6th Sunday concert was very well attended and the orchestral selections were very good. I quote a portion of the programme:

Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven.
Scherzo from Reformation Symphony	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Lurline"	Wallace.
Air	Bach.

Mr. Dawson (pianist) and Herr Alves (tenor) were the soloists upon this occasion.

It may or may not be known to your Boston readers that Mr. Bateman has secured the premises of Pike's Opera House and that Mr. James Fisk (of Erie R.R. fame) is "running" the Opera Bouffe in that establishment. Mr. Adolph Neuendorff is manager.

The sale of tickets for the opening nights at Booth's new theatre is definitely announced to take place on Monday Jan. 25th, so far as I hear.

I hear nothing of Messrs. Mason and Thomas' delightful Chamber Music Soirées, which have been so enjoyable for many seasons, and I fear that they have shared the doom of the defunct Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. May they both arise, phoenix-like, from their ashes!

Jan. 25.—An "Amateur Philharmonic Society" has been formed in Brooklyn, and from its prospectus I learn that the Society will give three more concerts during the season, and that the first one took place on Tuesday evening, Jan. 18. The programme included one of Haydn's symphonies, an Overture by [illegible], also solos by Miss Jennie [illegible] (soprano) Mr. J. M. W. [illegible] (tenor) and Mr. [illegible] (piano). The well known [illegible] under the direction of W. F. [illegible]. The President of the Society is R. Allen Smith, Esq., a gentleman of good musical taste. All success to this Society, which may supply to some extent the vacancy occasioned by the untimely demise of the regular Philharmonic Society.

Max Maretzek announces a season of Italian opera commencing on Thursday evening, Feb. 11 and terminating with a "Grand Bal à Opera," on Tuesday, March 8th. Max's manifesto opens with these significant and very ponderous words: "Mr. Maretzek has the honor to announce that, notwithstanding the discouraging condition of musical matters in this city he is prepared in anticipation of a reaction [O Utopian and too credulous Max!] to undertake a season of twenty-eight &c. &c." He also sends many well-aimed shots at the French Opera, which he designates as "An inferior class of entertainments, which now seems to have had its day."

He further announces that this will be the "Farewell Season" of Mme. La Grange, and that he has succeeded in engaging Miss Kellogg and Mme. Agatha States, together with Brignoli, Antonucci, and others. The repertoire will include the standard operas, and among the revivals will be Meyerbeer's "Prophète" and Donizetti's "Belisario" (the latter has very rarely been given in this country): all of which signifies that Max is going to carry the war into Africa and is "more upon the enemy's works."

Mr. Thomas's 7th Sunday Concert added one to the long list of excellent musical entertainments which he has furnished to us at a very moderate price. The programme was unusually good, and I subjoin most of the orchestral selections:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn.
Andante and Scherzo from Symphony in C	Schubert.
Grande Fantaisie, "Tannhäuser,"	Wagner.
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini.
Nachtigall	Vogt.

As an encore to the "Nachtigall" the orchestra played very delicately an arrangement of Schumann's beautiful "Evening Song."

Mr. Hesse (pianist) and Miss Jenny Busk were the soloists; the latter has a soprano voice of good quality and an excellent style. ♯

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The sixth concert of the Harvard Association (Jan. 21) showed no falling off in numbers or in interest. This was the programme:

Overture, "In the Highlands"	Gade.
Concert-stück, for Pianoforte with Orchestra	Weber.
Larghetto [illegible] and Allegro [illegible], Rondo, [illegible]
Miss Alice Dutton.
Symphony in D, No. 2, (first time in these Concerts)	Haydn.
Adagio and Finale: Quintette, Mozart, [illegible]
Overture to "Medea"	Cherubini.
Eighth Symphony, in F	Beethoven.
Allegretto vivace, A tempo di menuetto, Allegro vivace.

Gade's romantic and suggestive Overture charmed not less than when we heard it for the first time last year. It takes hold of the imagination at once, and transports you to real solemn mountain heights and solitude. It opens all serene and tranquil, with a certain look of awe far above and away from all the petty ills of life, the sense of mystery of grandeur reality comes over you. And then the reverie invaded by a gay quickstep rhythm, altogether human, mingled sounds of reeds and flutes and horns, as of some light-hearted company approaching. And again with trumpets and trombones, the strain swells to a martial and heroic pitch full of all Northern fervor. It was rendered with rare delicacy (at least after the wind instruments, beginning up in that cold atmosphere, got settled into sympathetic pitch) and with power; but was attention disturbed quite as much as usual by people entering late.

Weber's Concertstück, both as marking a new stage of development in the kind of composition, —romantic, without ceasing to be classical—and for its thoroughly Weberish individuality of thought and phrase, and new transitions, new mysterious charm of color, was too important a work to be left out of a sample from these programmes. There were several who could be called special competent interpreters in the piano part; and Miss Alice Dutton, though yet very young and hardly past the stage of pupilage, has so distinguished herself not only by her talent, but by what she has [illegible] to me rare, a true musical spirit, an earnest faithfulness of the right direction that she could well be reckoned "understanding," as the Germans say, [illegible] It is not necessary always to have [illegible] she has not sometimes enjoyed the above performance of one of [illegible] more than that of most of the famous ones? The arrangement at least was due to one so well controlled in a good direction. In this case the preparation in the young artist's favor, which her agreeable and modest presence won, was well confirmed by her clean, clear, intelligent and fervent rendering of the music. Some of the want of strength for that great hall, perhaps, will account for some excess of strength (particularly in the left hand), and hence a certain frigidity of touch, in the beginning of the piece. This melted away as she warmed to her work, and the swift passages of the Rondo [illegible] were beautifully bright and liquid. The rich orchestration, too, was realized and the March, for wind instruments, was supplementary to the scene.

The Haydn Symphony — one of the lightest, brightest, gracefulest,—though it begins with a short serious introduction in D minor (24 measures) before the volatile Allegro so full of fire and sweetness [illegible] rily to mock you as the [illegible] put the whole audience in the pleasantest humor and the sunniest also. The Andante by its even pendulum swing and tick of the accompaniment upon which the charming melody displays itself, used once to give it the name of the "Clock" Symphony. Both theme and accompaniment pass through charming phases of variation as naturally as the clouds change shape and color. The temperate Minuet and Trio are in the happiest vein and well worthy Haydn's art and genius in the [illegible] simplicity. The Finale has a fine, quick, subtle movement that is truly fascinating. The pianissimo of the violins in the fugue passage near the end was beautifully crisp and even, and held the audience in breathless hush. Of course, it was not Beethoven; but it was Haydn!

Cherubini's Overture to "Medea" is a model of classical conciseness, unity and beauty. We were reminded, when we first heard it last year, of Beethoven's Coriolanus overture, though that of course takes hold much deeper down. For its suppressed passion, its intensive [illegible] and the fine fire smothering and the nervous little violin phrases, of which there is an ample [illegible], this has a certain affinity with that. A lovely tender [illegible] the episodical theme later. With the rendering we could find no fault.

Beethoven's eighth Symphony, shortest of the nine, is all [illegible] written during [illegible] the deafness period, after his deafness had become complete. It is too well known here, both through [illegible] and other concerts to require description. Every hearing only intensifies one's feeling of its breathing beauty, its [illegible] genius (as if defiant in itself in those dark days!) and its faultless perfection as a work of Art. What an exhilarating life as in one perfect June or October day, bright through the instrumentation, all so rich, so wholesome and through the [illegible] You feel it and are part of it, if not in the very first chord, in the cheery salutation of the first bar. This Symphony as well as Haydn's, has its "clock" movement, in the over-delicate Allegretto Scherzando, only a much livelier one, more marvellously poetic and original, and, if you give yourself wholly up to it, as indeed you must, so thoroughly transporting and bewitching! A sensitive "clock" is this one: one wishes time might travel at that rate forever and through such flowery paths. We have it in our heart to thank Mr. Zerrahn for the more moderate tempo than usual at which he took the Minuet and Trio with the smiling horns, and for the marked nervous accent without which the piece loses so much of its character. On the other hand we should like for once a chance to learn whether a little less of lightning speed would not render more of the fine details of the final Allegro more appreciable.

Next Thursday's Concert offers for a novelty the Third, or "Cologne" Symphony of Schumann (of which some hints are told upon another page); also Beethoven's early light Overture to the Ballet: "The Men of Prometheus," and Mendelssohn's Overture "Becalmed at Sea and Happy Voyage." Miss ANNIE RYAN will sing, with orchestra, Mozart's "Non più di fiori," from La Clemenza di Tito, besides songs by Mendelssohn and Stöhr; and Mr. HUGO LEONHARD will play Beethoven's most poetic Concerto in G, which (we learn) we have not had for two years.

The "New Family" are friendly [illegible] not to overlook a slight appendix to the last programme, to-wit:

"SPECIAL NOTICE.—In justice to those who wish to hear the first piece on the programme undisturbed by persons seeking their seats, none after the Concert has begun can be [illegible] to the conductors and performers, these doors, hereafter, will be [illegible] during the first Overture, (or first movement of the opening Symphony.)"

CAMILLA URSO. The esteem in which this lady is held by the musical profession here, both personally and as an artist of the first [illegible], was shown by the Testimonial Concert tendered her last Sunday evening in the Music Hall by "the musical fraternity of Boston." The tables [illegible] many good artists, several of our best, bore part, and the programme was made up [illegible] a fine company, of choice musical material. The concert was far better than most concerts of the kind,—scarcely those which [illegible] by over-crowded programmes, to over-crowd a hall scarcely [illegible]. [illegible] interesting in the "grand" [illegible] of many instrumental and the occasional guards of rather more consciousness, of such heterogeneous variety [illegible] on the same stage to the best of [illegible]. [illegible] the [illegible] of all in the imposing array of performers could be seen [illegible] representative light [illegible] the [illegible] of goodwill tending for the violinist of the [illegible]. They all met on the common platform of a cordial purpose to do honor to an artist and a [illegible]. There was the grand orchestra [illegible] (although we counted only one or two [illegible]) representing the Boston Music [illegible] there was [illegible] from [illegible] of 25 [illegible] as Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, [illegible] and a chorus of 20 ladies and 25 gentlemen made up of leading musical soloists and choristers (among the sopranos: Mrs. Wm. Barnes, [illegible], Mrs. [illegible], Miss [illegible], Mrs. Gregory, Miss [illegible], &c.; among the contraltos: Mrs. [illegible], Miss Ryan, Mrs. [illegible], Mrs. [illegible], Macdonald, Tuttle, Davis, &c. Basses: Rudolphsen, Powers, Ainsworth, Ryder, [illegible], &c.) Then there was Mr. LANG for pianist, Mr. [illegible] ([illegible]) and four Conductors: ZERRAHN, KOPPITZ, B. C. HALL and GILMORE. These were the selections:

Overture, "Ruler of the Spirits,"	Weber.
Grand Orchestra and Military Band.
Chorus, "I [illegible]," [illegible]	Mozart.
By the Chorus.
Grand Aria, "[illegible],"	Handel.
Miss Adelaide Phillips.
Quartet, "[illegible],"	Wallace.
Hall's Boston Brass Band.
"[illegible]," Quartet	Lachner.
Sung by Ladies.
Capriccio in [illegible] (Piano Solo)	Mendelssohn.
B. J. Lang.
Overture, "[illegible] and [illegible]"	Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Violin, Op. 61	Beethoven.
Camilla Urso.
Aria, "Return, O God of Hosts" ... Samson	Handel.
Miss Adelaide Phillips.
Ave Maria,	Gounod.
Adapted by Camilla Urso, with Orchestral Accompaniment.
Organ, Flutes and [illegible]. Violin Obbligato by Camilla Urso.
Overture, "[illegible],"	Gade.
Chorus for Male Voices, "[illegible]"	Friedrich.
Sung by Twenty-five Gentlemen.

Of course the [illegible] was Mme. Urso's playing of the Beethoven Concerto, which she had so conscientiously studied for the Harvard Concert and in which (considering that she had never before played and had to learn so late [illegible] of its [illegible] and [illegible] of the tradition as to interpretation) she certainly achieved a very remarkable success. Even in the heterogeneous surroundings of the present programme, and on a much more miscellaneous audience, the piece and her interpretation made a profound impression. Next in interest to us was Mozart's Ave Verum, that short and perfect model of rich, even harmony, so seldom heard among us; it was beautifully sung. Mr. Lang's playing of the Mendelssohn Capriccio was clean, finely artist-like, as usual. But let us not forget the large and noble singing of Miss Phillips, in airs which she has made her own.

Mendelssohn's fresh Ruy Blas Overture was well played under Mr. Koppitz; also the fine Overture. Gade's "Ossian" was not [illegible], where there is a [illegible] of things [illegible] the best that go to the world. The [illegible] is nothing but a pot-pourri of [illegible] melodies, ending with a weak and jejune fugue and was conducted by Mr. Gilmore. The chorus singing was all good. [illegible] simple to end the concert with [illegible] simple little students' part-song. [illegible] In fine, the programme, in spite of so many good things, was too [illegible], and the feeling [illegible] such various elements involved to [illegible] "Monster" concerts may be [illegible] the improvident "makes for a sign" [illegible] but they are certain to be felt. Mme. Urso doubtless appreciated the good will and enthusiasm of the demonstration, [illegible] a light as a tribute worthy of a great artist, [illegible] and [illegible] so [illegible] and [illegible] though not in names she has already had.

Two evenings after the Harvard Concert, Camilla Urso played the Beethoven Concerto also at the New York Philharmonic, with equal success; and more recently has signalized the opening of the newly formed Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, by her brilliant performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto. [illegible] be en route, west and for California, to fulfil a lucrative engagement of some months. From the Philadelphia Society she has received the following mark of honor:

Philadelphia, January 27, 1869.

MME. CAMILLA URSO:—I take great pleasure in informing you that at a full meeting of all the members of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society held this afternoon, you were elected unanimously an "honorary member" of said Society.

Trusting that you will accept it in the same kindly feeling with which the vote was given, I remain,

This also a new College Song, both a tune and song also, [illegible] and expressive, charmingly arranged by Mr. [illegible] was sung at last week's Cambridge concert of the Pierian Sodality, part of which [illegible] years ago the Harvard Musical Association [illegible] and the Harvard Glee Club. The instrumental portion consisted of a couple of light Overtures, a couple of Strauss waltzes, and a Cornet solo, the novel, of [illegible], such as Mendelssohn's "Voyage" [illegible] Water-Lily, and A la Marie by the same for cornet solo and chorus, the Latin song above named, also the tenor solo and chorus, a tenor solo by [illegible], a Duet from Semiramide and College Songs.

NEW YORK.—The revival of the old Madrigals in the concerts of an amateur club, described by our correspondent "[illegible]" has inspired more gay and festive pen than usual of the [illegible] to hold forth in the Tribune:

OLD FASHIONED MUSIC.—[illegible] the Dirty Drama and Opera Bouffe got to the end of their tether, no wonder [illegible] is only the charm of novelty will [illegible] turned us back all at once to the music of our grandfathers and [illegible] and [illegible] toward the stately country dance instead of kicking up our heels to the can-can, and watch up the [illegible] tune of the lobby? Last night, at Steinway Hall, there was a performance—the second within a few weeks—of the lovely old madrigals in which gentlemen and beruffled ladies of the seventeenth century used to delight; and it drew forth one of the largest, most brilliant, most truly fashionable audiences that have assembled at any place of public amusement in New York for a year or more. And they all liked those dear old love songs. They smiled and nodded with pleasure over the joyous choruses; they applauded generally in the right place; they encored perhaps a silly ballad or so, as the way of musical audiences is, but they asked for a repetition of the best of the songs, and it was clear enough that, good company [illegible] for once in New York a company of [illegible]. There are fine voices of [illegible] a [illegible] old [illegible] to the delicate perfume of [illegible] songs in a [illegible] laid aside in lavender for [illegible] generations. The flavor belongs to [illegible] of the golden age of good manners, when Amaryllis [illegible] for someone under the [illegible] and Alexis wooed his shepherdess on an [illegible] reed and Corydon and Phillis [illegible] down beneath the [illegible] of a [illegible]. These [illegible] and [illegible], got [illegible] perhaps [illegible] in the shade of the [illegible] and [illegible], in brocade breeches, courted Madrigals with [illegible] of a [illegible]. To be sure this was very [illegible], but there is [illegible] very pretty. The [illegible] of [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] sure [illegible]—but why shall [illegible] like the [illegible] of [illegible]? The [illegible] of the [illegible] is a better than the [illegible] of the [illegible]. Anyhow, he has never [illegible] food is better than a [illegible] or a [illegible]. And as for [illegible] the music to [illegible] these [illegible] a [illegible] to [illegible] a son wedded, [illegible] that it was not only pretty, but good. It [illegible] among sweets and flowers, but it is [illegible] wholesome nonsense, like the songs which infest modern concert rooms; there is true inspiration in the sparkling melodies, and sound science in the accompaniments, and therefore the bravest knight of the 16th and 17th centuries will last long years after the [illegible] verses in which they are wedded, have sunk into hopeless oblivion.

The success of the two performances of this sort of music which have been given this winter at Steinway Hall we regard as an encouraging sign of the existence of a true love and appreciation of the beautiful. It is a community which we have been hopelessly [illegible] to be [illegible] and [illegible]. Wherever else we may have learned, we have not learned to [illegible] sing. We can do no better than, so [illegible] an [illegible], and evidence can not, seeing that so large portion of our music-loving public are ready for the change. These madrigal singers are doing a good work. Let us have more of it.

PHILADELPHIA.—The first concert of the Philharmonic Society was given at the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, Jan. 16, to a large audience. The orchestra was very large for Philadelphia, numbering nearly seventy good performers. For a first performance it was excellent, and many good judges have expressed the opinion that there has not been a better one of a Symphony in Philadelphia than that of Beethoven in A, [illegible] by [illegible] orchestra. The overture from [illegible] and the [illegible] overture were admirable given and, for a first concert of the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society, the success was [illegible] gratifying, although the orchestra may have [illegible]. Mme. Urso [illegible] performance was wholly and very [illegible] and M. [illegible] gave a Chopin [illegible] with the [illegible]. It is [illegible] that the February [illegible] will [illegible] an excellent programme, including Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, a Trombone [illegible] played by Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, and a [illegible] piece by that excellent artist Rudolph Hennig.

The popularity of the Berlin Musical Union amongst [illegible] was shown on Saturday by the immense audience in the Musical Fund Hall. The Reformation Symphony was received with great favor. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven's First Overture gave universal satisfaction by its elevated style and [illegible]. [illegible] held the popular favor both for its superior instrumentation and beautiful content. The [illegible] was announced by the [illegible] striking effect. Much curiosity was expressed to hear Senor Rophael whose active efforts in New York [illegible] his range [illegible] and [illegible]. [illegible] style [illegible] and [illegible] on [illegible] as a [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] to the end of the piece. His Mermaid [illegible] was uniformly applauded and warmly deserved an encore. Next Saturday Mr. M. R. Theodor will play a solo by Mendelssohn for piano and orchestra. A splendid programme is under preparation for Schubert's birthday, to be made up of the works of that great modern German master. —Bulletin, Jan. 16.

Mr. Jacob's third Soirée was given on Saturday evening at Mercantile Hall and was more largely attended than ever. The whole programme was admirably performed, Mr. Jacobs playing superbly in every one of the five pieces. Mr. Gabrielsson was now [illegible] by his fine execution, and Mr. Hennig gave his violoncello solo, a romance by Franchomme, with an earnestness of expression that delighted the audience. The concert closed with Schumann's Quartet, op. 44, by Messrs. Jacobs, [illegible], Kammerer and Hennig, who gave this fine composition with charming effect.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn's programme, Jan. 15, was as follows:

Sonata in major, Piano and Violin [illegible] Allegro, Andante, Scherzo, Allegro finale. Messrs. Wolfsohn and Gaertner.	Raff.
Andante, Solo Violin, etc. Rudolph Hennig.	Molique.
Fantaisie-Stücke. "Des Abends"—"Traumeswirren." Carl Wolfsohn.	Schumann.
Fantasie, Solo Violin. Edmund Gaertner.	[illegible]
An Eard [illegible] Carl Wolfsohn.	[illegible]
Trio, D minor. Messrs. Wolfsohn, Gaertner and Hennig.	Mendelssohn.

Mr. Wolfsohn claims for the first piece in the list that it is the very best sonata of its peculiar class [illegible] known. It is a representative composition of the new romantic school of which Mr. Wolfsohn has been the apostle in this city.

Drexel's Musical Library.

(From the Philadelphia Age.)

Joseph W. Drexel, Esq., has just printed, for the use of himself and his friends, the first part of the catalogue of the contents of his Musical Library. It is of great interest to the lover of music and the litterateur. This first part is devoted to an enumeration of "Musical Writings." Autographs of celebrated musicians, prints relating to music, including portraits of composers, etc., and music for the church, theatre, concert-room, &c., will be comprehended in three additional parts. In a short prefatory note, Mr. Drexel informs us that in this department will be found a copy of the first edition of Handel's [illegible] . . . It was that this library was formed by the union of libraries of Mr. H. F. Albrecht, of the late Germania Musical Society, and the late Dr. H. La Roche, being augmented by frequent purchase and importation of works from Europe. Mr. Albrecht spent some fifteen years in different countries in the formation of his collection, and it is to his unwearying energy that the present collection is due."

Few American gentlemen have the taste and disposition to form a musical collection, and few amateurs of Germany or any other country have the means to indulge such an expensive gratification. Hence it should be of those who are so fortunate as to possess a private collection devoted to this special object. . . . Herr C. F. Becker's, in Leipzig, which was . . . incorporated in the city library, the authorities . . . upon him a handsome life annuity with the privilege of using the books as if still his property . . . death. Private collections generally contain less than a thousand volumes, rarely so many as eight hundred. The Drexel Library contains over 1,000 works, and about 3,000 volumes. There is no public musical library, we believe, in the United States, the student of musical writings being driven from the scanty and unavailable libraries in the country to purchase whatever books he may need, to his inconvenience and loss. We would commend such enthusiasts not to expect specimens, as a whole, from a library or scientific pursuit so . . . whose rise is of such recent growth . . . can scarcely be . . . of the . . . American mind in realizing . . . in this specialty of a perfect whole. There are in Europe some musical libraries of great resources and [illegible] value. The royal library [illegible] has one department of music in Berlin is supposed to be worth over a million of dollars. It is proposed to pay $12,000 for a copy of a work of which only one copy is now known to exist, namely the Imperial Library at Vienna; and the other is the collection at Gotha. It is a [illegible], the first printed book on music, believed by Dr. Burney to have been published at Naples in 1480. The Library of the "Society of Friends of Music" in Vienna, the Imperial Libraries at Paris and Vienna, the Royal Library at Munich, the City Library at Leipzig, and many others, contain [illegible] especially in musical works, of [illegible] to be of the great [illegible] importance. There are some books, MSS., etc., in the British Museum, but not separated from the other parts of the library.

In Mr. Drexel's collection may be found some very rare and interesting works, viz.: The first edition of Rousseau's "Dictionnaire de Musique," in folio; several works from the sixteenth century, by Faber, Caffarini, Zarlino, Glareanus, Agricola, and others; a copy of Aristoxenus, a philosopher and musician, born at Tarentum, (a city in Magna Græcia, now Calabria,) who lived three hundred and thirty years before Jesus Christ. This is the oldest work on music, and was printed in 1616, with the title "Auctores Musicæ Antiquissimi." There is also a fine facsimile copy of Philodemus's "Tractatus de Musica" (in Greek), with a Latin translation, the original of which was found about one hundred years ago in the ruins of Herculaneum. The author lived in the time of Cicero.

The first collection of musical writings was made in the eighteenth century by Martini, Forkel, Marpurg, Forkel and Gerber. These celebrated authors used first the words "musica de libris" (music writings), and these have been continued to the present day. But the words "musical writings" are not found catalogued in any English library. This is explained by the absence of such libraries in England until a comparatively recent period. New things require new, new words must be found for them, and no more appropriate designation [illegible] can be formed.

The classifications made by Mr. Albrecht (who is now in charge of Mr. Drexel's Library) are calculated to greatly aid in finding any book desired, and might be adopted with advantage in forming the catalogues of all large libraries where the variety of subject, diverse languages, etc., often makes confusion and embarrass the student. In as condensed a form as possible we will attempt to illustrate this admirable and original plan:

1. The number of works in each language.
2. The same divided into materials.
3. Each language separated, and ... [illegible].
4. A division of certain [illegible] in each [illegible].
5. The library of books separated in language into twenty:

I. Biographies treated in the same manner.
II. Dictionaries.
III. Bibliography.
IV. Theory of musical composition.
V. Instruction books for vocal and instrumental.
VI. [illegible]
VII. Acoustics, [illegible]
VIII. [illegible]
IX. [illegible]
X. [illegible]
XI. History, treatise on music, description of works, ballads, . . . etc.
XII. [illegible] volumes [illegible] parts.

IV. [illegible] languages works and editions.

Then follow under the head of

divisions the greater of languages in which the works are written, and a division having the same [illegible] in large type, with a smaller type indicating how many volumes, other small marks indicate the century in which one lived.

The others of the twelve heads "Biographie," "Dictionnaire," etc., are treated with the same careful detail and minute attention. Finally we come to the full and exact description of the work. In a plain and orderly manner . . . found. . . . The advantages of this . . . arrangement—for it occupies very little space—are apparent to everyone, by description, but upon inspection and examination they must be apparent and well probable had to look for . . . We are indebted to Mr. Albrecht, and hope that due credit may be given to this modest musician who [illegible] that his name be not mentioned. As Mr. Drexel has said, [illegible] as we warmly admire for such a rich and . . . in our city, . . . we hope and . . . it may be retained. Now that Mr. Drexel has gone so far, only to be persuaded to continue to add the . . . works on music which appear from time to time. We miss the works of . . . Hindenberg, Helmholtz, [illegible] Marburg, Chevé, the . . . for [illegible], . . . more valuable papers and the English journal's sermons, and pamphlets which are . . . well interesting from the . . . standpoint. With a collection so nearly complete . . . and we wish for a perfect full monument. To the composer or the professional . . . amateur and the . . . by Mr. Drexel may add to his heart to prove . . . having been . . . public but feature which may feel the responsibility of the changes . . . to it, and where the members of the press and . . . of the divine . . . may have free access for their enlightenment and information.

My Recollections of Mendelssohn.

BY EDWARD DEVRIENT.

II.

Meanwhile came the summer of 1822, and, while the whole Mendelssohn family were preparing for a grand tour of Switzerland, I entered upon my first tour of profession and of studies, which led me to Dresden and to the Rhine, but from September onward kept me for some time in Frankfort on the Main.

There in the street one day I met Doctor Heyse with Felix, who had undergone a change externally. The beautiful brown locks had been cut short to the nape of the neck; the child's dress had given place to a boy's suit with open jacket over the waistcoat. The reform was suited to his age, but I was sorry to miss the peculiar appearance which he had before.

The family on the journey home, rested a few days in Frankfort, during which I was there occupied as a companion. Here Ferdinand Hiller, another boy with long brown curls, scarcely a year or two younger, was presented by his father at grand the leg [illegible] of a warm friend of [illegible]. The three dear ex-[illegible] composer André of Offenbach, a corpulent [illegible] laughing man, came also to make the acquaintance of Felix and produced some of his new song compositions. He urged Felix to improvise on the piano, not so much in favor of that free [illegible], to the example of Hummel, and looked upon as the extension of a genuinely musical piano player. Felix, who had already shown an extraordinary talent for it, gave himself the quiet satisfaction of weaving together and working up the theme of a song which he had just heard of André's with one of my modest compositions,—which I had shown him once and which he retained with that memory of his that never lost anything. He laughed about it afterwards, and was fond of recounting how André, sitting beside him close to the piano, signalized each recurrence of his theme by loud chuckles, while I, standing behind Felix, recognized my own theme with low reverence, and how he kept on making us repeat them again. But in the Cecilia Verein, where Felix also improvised at the request of the Director Schelble, he took it more earnestly. Began from the Motet of Bach which had just been sung; such, by the richness of invention, by the severe style of treatment, as well as by the astonishing facility and energetic endurance, carried us all away with admiration. That hour won the boy Schelble's friendship, and gave me full conviction of Felix's great calling.

Returning to Berlin, our relation to the Mendelssohn family grew continually warmer. Therese became the intimate friend of Fanny and the confidant in the growing tenderness between her and my friend the painter Hensel. As he likewise made me the confidant of his love and of the difficulties interposed by the mother on account of his Romanist tendency—which just then lay in the air of Berlin—a sort of sympathetic chain was hung between the lovers through Therese and myself, although we ourselves had been married only since. When I went to Vienna in the autumn of 1823, to learn something from the famous Italian singers who were there engaged together, Lablache at their head, I met by previous agreement Hensel on his way to Rome and the sympathetic chain was kept up unbroken during this time through my letters to Therese.

Meanwhile Felix was growing stronger and stronger in his social studies and productions. Besides the orchestral meetings repeated from time to time on Sunday forenoons, he was not less drawn in another direction by the Friday music at Zelter's. Here used to meet a small number of members of the Singakademie, for the sake of becoming acquainted with the difficult works of old composers. Here we sang the "Breaking pieces," as Zelter called them, of Sebastian Bach, who generally passed at that time for an unintelligible musical arithmetician, of astonishing skill in fugue writing; and of whom the Singakademie sang only a few Motets, and those but seldom.

Zelter had drawn me into these Friday meetings, as his pupil, soon after I entered the Singakademie (1819). I had also met Felix and Fanny there as they both sang alto in the chorus and whom Zelter occasionally set to accompanying this or that piece on the piano; but now this place was yielded up entirely to Felix.

There he learned to know such great musical works, which Zelter kept concealed, like a mysterious sacred treasure, from the world, for which, as he opined, they had no longer any value. Here too Felix made acquaintance with some single pieces in Bach's sacred Passions, and it became his most ardent wish to possess the great Passion according to the Gospel of Matthew, a wish which was gratified by his grandmother at Christmas, 1823. It was no easy thing to beg of Zelter this jealous collector permission to copy the work. Eduard Rietz had undertaken it,—a young and excellent violin player, a rich[?] silent, thoughtful musician, who had taken Henning's place as Felix's violin teacher, and had received from his pupil the feelings of a tender youth of friendship. At the Christmas festival, to which I was invited with Therese, Felix, with face beaming, full of reverence showed me the inexpressible copy of the sacred masterwork which now served for his darling study.

In the next year, 1824, Felix besides some instrumental compositions, had also finished a comic opera in three acts, called "The Uncle from Boston," the text again the work of Dr. Casper. Therese and I took part in a number of rehearsals and two musical performances of it, interspersed with reading of the dialogue.

Compared with the first operas, the work showed a manifest progress in the conduct of the melody and the treatment of the voice parts, particularly a Terzet for tenor and two soprano and an Aria for soprano. But what pleased most was a contradictory chorus of women with accompaniment which some words of his family very aptly compared with the then new Weber's Chorus in Der Freyschütz. Ludwig Robert who had accompanied the Varnhagen couple from Carlsruhe to Berlin and who was very much liked at the Mendelssohn's house, offered to write for Felix an opera in which the piece of music should form the nucleus and through its reminiscences sustain the whole work. The Mendelssohns had sense enough not to enter into the project.

A few days after the second performance of this opera I celebrated my wedding with Therese with the warmest sympathy of the Mendelssohn family. With Felix this chapter of my life produced a certain reserve toward me; for the young man of fifteen much was changed in me by marriage. The gate-feeling inspired him with a sort of respect; the idea of me being married to a woman awakened a gentle shyness in him.

As newly married people are wont to isolate themselves, it happened that for some time we were less often in the family than we had been before, and I knew less of Felix's labors. But I was well enough aware what influence the social intercourse of the ever open house must have had upon him. The still prevailing custom in Berlin at that time of the free and easy evening call, with the most cordial hospitality, granted to the Mendelssohn house in its full force and brought the most numerous and [illegible] intellectual intercourse. Among the attracted, ever welcome guests belonged, besides the lively and apropos via Dr. Casper and his bright young wife, the young Secretary to the Hanoverian Legation, Klingemann, son of the professor, theatre director and writer August Klingemann. A man of refinement, of sagacious and delicate feeling, who, though veiled himself in rather circumstances diplomatic, was understood by Felix and became his friend, one of the warmest friendships. Very different from him, but almost always in his company, was Dr. Marx, who much of cool steadfast striving, independent outwardly and inwardly, who busied himself as a journalist, so far as the heyday of the censorship in those days allowed, especially as one who loved to express his sharp opinions roughly, albeit with good tone. His grasp held much with Felix's father and had no sympathy at all with the music of the son. There too was Ludwig Robert, the clever witty writer, with his beautiful wife, who wrote lovely poems and always brought excellence into society. Robert's sister, the celebrated Rahel, and her husband Varnhagen, who had begun to exploit his liberal reputation by inactivity in Berlin, were of the number. In the circle Felix at that early age heard much to encourage and clarify his thought and feeling. Moreover form abroad continually came commended to the house, and brought with them various kinds of entertainment and for Felix and Fanny much musical incitement. For a long time the violinist Boucher, a strange man, full of talent, kept himself in vogue in Berlin through his resemblance to the first Napoleon, and was a notability in the Mendelssohn house. He turned his Bonapartist profile to account in his concerts, laying aside his violin during the tutti of the orchestra and exhibiting the well known imperial attitudes to the public. Occasionally he held the violin upon his back as he played; and these tricks, together with his surprisingly fine delivery ... of full concerts. There was in him a curious mixture of naiveté, eccentricity and a Frenchman's shrewd eye to advantage. He gave proofs of it even in the Mendelssohn family.

Other guests were the flute Fürstenau who pushed his virtuoso bravura almost beyond the capacity of his instrument; and the composer Bernet, who on the contrary cultivated a soft tone and the utmost fluency; and Moscheles whom Felix highly admired; and Reissiger before us entered upon the duties of capellmeister in Dresden. Felix inevitably received the most ... praise from all these personalities.

With me meanwhile the enterprise of his writing for the Opera, and the opinion that he ought to try his hand in opera of the higher kind had become so firmly rooted that I tried an experiment upon a poem for which I chose a favorite theme from my Italian studies, the episode of Olindo and Sophronia in the "Jerusalem Delivered." In November of the year 1824 I read this work before Heyse and Felix. It is unpleasant but Felix thought it a would not. The undertaken upon so serious a subject could ... the experiment failed. I was not aware that Felix had been at work upon a new opera ever since July and he was not inclined to tell me now. Klingemann had made the poem for him taking for his subject the episode of Camacho's wedding in "Don Quixote." This work he finished toward August in the year 1825.

With this composition, and with the removal from the grandfather's house on the New Promenade, Felix's boyhood closed. His father had bought and altered the so-called Reck palace on the Leipziger Strasse (now the seat of the Herrenhaus or House of Lords) and the family moved into it late in the summer of 1825.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

Does Spohr still play the violin much? asked Rossini one day.

—He still plays splendidly, but only in small circles, I replied.

—I lament that I never had the pleasure of hearing him, said the maestro. Festa, in Naples, who was quite distinguished in the quartet especially, the eye spoke of him to me with the greatest enthusiasm; and said that he owed the best that he could do to Spohr. He had not been his pupil exactly, but had had much intercourse with him in Naples. He was never weary of celebrating his large tone, his grandiose delivery.

—No one probably has gone beyond him in that regard, said I. But you have heard Paganini a great deal surely?

—For many years he was almost continually near me. He declared that he followed my steps as he called it; and I was not able, at places, that he had not come after me. He sat whole days and nights with me, while I composed.

—Was it interesting to listen to him in conversation?

—He was full of original suggestions, a rare fellow. But what a talent!

—A genius!

—One should hear him play at sight! He took in half a page at a glance. You know the story of him and Lafont in Milan?

—It was frequently referred to in the newspapers, but ...

—I was present at the time, Rossini interrupted. Lafont came to Milan, prepossessed with the idea that Paganini was a sort of charlatan; and he proposed to make short work with him. So he invited him to play something with him in his concert in La Scala. Paganini came to me and asked me if he had better accept this invitation. "You must do so," said I, "in order that he may not believe that you fear; and the courage to measure yourself with him." Lafont sent to him the solo part, but Paganini would know nothing of it, and thought the orchestra rehearsal was sufficient. At that he played his part very smoothly and fairly through at sight. But in the evening he repeated the variations, which Lafont had to play before him, in octaves, thirds, sixths, so that the poor Frenchman was extremely confused, and did not play as well as he was able. I reproached Paganini for this want of musical loyalty; but he laughed and was bound. Lafont went beforehand back to Paris in a rage and I assure you, I passed there for a charlatan until at length he taught the Parisians to know better.

—Is it true, I asked, that he had formerly a fuller tone, and played on thicker strings?

—The greater the difficulties he undertook and the more of mere stringing on several parts at once, the ... the thinner the strings had to be. In any case ... besides, I was no longer on the full wave of youth when he and I played; and so there may be something in the assertion. What always most astonished me in him, was the alternation of excitement and repose, of which he was capable when he passed from the most impassioned excitable to the fullest calm. Then he would become suddenly rigid as an automaton. I almost believe that he grew physically cold.

—Of the many strange adventures, related of his early life, is even the smallest part true? I asked.

—No, he was for a long time established at the court of prince Bacciocchi and afterwards went about Italy giving concerts. He could not have grown rich by it; Italy is not the land for that.

—And he was extravagantly fond of money as they say.

—His avarice was as great as his talent, and that is saying not a little. When he was earning his thousands in Paris, he would go with his son into a restaurant at two francs, order one dinner for the two, and carry home a piece and a piece of bread for his boy's breakfast. He had a morbid desire to become a baron, and he found in Germany a man who helped him to attain his end, but charged him a round sum for it. From ... that time on and forgot he fell sick and continued in that state since then.

—And yet he made Berlioz a right royal gift, suggested I.

All Paris knows it, said Rossini, shrugging his shoulders. I must believe it, and yet at bottom I hold it to be impossible.

—There are so many wonders, dear maestro, that it can be but one more or less. Is it not one of the greatest that you have written nothing sometimes since ... so many years? What do you do with all the musical thoughts which must, be I am saying through your head?

—You joke, said the maestro, laughing.

—Indeed I do not;—how can you exist without composing?

—Without the occasion, without the prompting, a thing the desperate purpose to create a heart's rest with I did not need much to excite me to composition, as my opera-books bear witness—yet I needed something.

—You have indeed often contented yourself with a very bad libretto text, said I.

—But this was not only that, exclaimed Rossini. In Italy I ... had a part-book ready made, when I began to write. I composed the introduction before the words of the following number were ... And how often I have had for poets people who wrote indeed not badly but had no idea of the requirements of the composer. I had to work with them, instead of having them work for me.

—That was not without its advantages, maestro?

—True, if I had not always had to write in haste! When I was established with Barbaja in Naples, I had to bother myself about everything connected with the opera, to watch over all the rehearsals. Barbaja paid no bill which I had not approved—and besides that, I had bound myself to write two operas every year.

—And did write four, I interposed.

—I had moreover a bank of gamblers in which I availed myself my whole salary amounted only to 8,000 francs. To be sure I lived in Barbaja's house, and had no housekeeping to provide for.

—Barbaja must have been a genial man in his way.

—He managed his business with a certain largeness, and made it his peculiar pride to have the best people in opera. And he succeeded too, although it cost considerable generous sacrifices. But he would easily lose them as soon as in favour of the public, grown interested in some new opera. His assistance was his extraordinary versatility and his ... He thought that he knew best about everything himself he which means he affected the most ... His buildings swallowed up immeasurable sums for him, and he left his son at last only a ... million.

—Only one million! said I, mournfully.

—He might have left him a dozen, answered the maestro.

—Verily then, one must drop a tear of sympathy for him.

—What a splendid orchestra there was then at San Carlo, continued Rossini. Festa, of whom I spoke just now was as musical director. The orchestra at that time in Naples was, next to the Grand Opera in Paris, the best I ever found in any theatre.

—The latter is still always excellent, said I, but I have always had a deep impression of it in regard to power.

—The house is too large, answered the maestro; I am especially shy of these altogether too large houses—they kill all. The influence of locality has not been highly enough estimated. Transplant the orchestra of the Conservatoire with all its splendor into the Opera—you will not recognize it.

—Let us transplant ourselves, dear maestro, into the salon, where one of you are so positively expecting us, and I breakfast all the conversation. If we linger here much longer we shall get a scolding.

—Eh bien, allons!

We talked one day a long time about Cherubini. Rossini who had lived in the greatest intimacy with him and his family told me many things before unknown to me. The conversation turned upon his peculiar character in which a generous kind mean lay hidden under a somewhat ... which also frequently presented as it in an ... I was unable to communicate to the maestro many a trait which interested him. "Here and there something of that occasional stern one of his passed into his music," said he finally. "But what a great musician! and the honest man was one can imagine. But do you know any composer who has effected such a total transformation in his style?"

—His earlier operas, to be sure, said I, give you not the remotest anticipation of the composer of the Medea. But he was a little ashamed of those works and he wrote no more, when I asked him for some of them to look through, that they were attempts of a young man just out of school.

—Yet I caused him great pleasure one day by reminiscences from his Giulio Sabino, said Rossini.

—How so?

—He had written that opera for the tenor Babini, of whom I afterwards took singing lessons. Babini had sung over a good deal of it to me, which I remembered when I came to Paris. One day after dinner at Cherubini's I sat down at the piano and sang to him those songs of his early youth. He could scarcely contain himself for amazement, since naturally he could not guess at the connection,—but the tears came into his eyes.

—It must have carried him some forty years back, said I. That must have affected him!—And that you should have brought it to his hearing!

—Did you know old Salieri too? and Winter? asked Rossini.

—Neither of them.

—I saw the latter in Milan, said the maestro, when he brought out there his Maometto II. There were very fine things in that opera. I remember especially a Terzet, in which one person behind the scenes had a [illegible] [illegible], while the other two carried on a dramatic duet on the stage. It was capitally made and very effective. What annoyed me in Winter was his disreinlichkeit (Unsauberkeit). He was a man of lofty and imposing exterior, but cleanliness was not his strong side.

—I dare [illegible]

—One day he invited me to dinner. There came on a huge dish of polpetti, to which he helped me, and he still his [illegible] [illegible] with his fingers. That ended the dinner for me.

—That was a fatal occurrence. And Salieri? Did you not know him in Vienna? I inquired.

—Oh surely, the good old gentleman! At that time he had a passion for composing canons, and came pretty regularly to supper with us.

—To compose canons?

—To get them sung. My wife and I, David and Nozzari, who commonly ate with us, formed quite a respectable vocal quartet together. At last we grew quite tired of those intolerable canons, and we begged him to hold in a little.

—His opera, Axur is among my earliest musical recollections, said I.

—It contains capital pieces, as do all his operas. In his Grotta di Trofonio, to be sure, he was not up to [illegible] post. Casti's libretto is a real masterpiece. Poor Salieri! Have they not accused him of Mozart's death? said Rossini, smiling somewhat wryly.

—Nobody believes in it, said I, in a pacifying tone.

—At all events, the accused was very uncomfortably situated. I asked him d'auriti one day after a canon: "Did you really poison Mozart?" He planted himself before me proudly and said: "Look at me. Really, do I look like a murderer?" And certainly he did not.

—Yet he may have been jealous of Mozart, I suggested!

—That is very likely, said Rossini; but you well understand, it is a long way from that to mixing poisons.

—Which, thank God, is not readily undertaken. Italian composers would then die like flies. But since we are talking of these old masters, tell me something more of Simon Mayr, of whom I know as good as nothing. Had he a strong gift of invention?

—He made himself as great a name less by that, perhaps, than by the fact that he first drew more attention in Italy to the dramatic element. Moreover in the expansion of instrumentation in my country he and Paer have had the greatest influence.

—I saw him once in his extreme old age, I said, a man at Verona—said I,—or rather I heard him. Briefly, for he directed choir and orchestra by tapping with a roll of paper which served him for a baton.

—He was a worthy man, said Rossini, and one of comprehensive scientific culture. His Medea, which he composed in his later years for Naples, is a distinguished opera.

—What an expansion the Italian opera has gone through, since the time of Metastasio! It began when a composer set down arias and a little chorus formed the musical contents of a lyric drama!

—Not to forget the Recitatives, said the maestro, which were admirably treated by the good composers, and with which the best singers of that time often produced more effect and earned greater applause, than with the bravura airs. The latter considered with reference to the text were scarcely fort élégants. They consisted most of a pathetic image, and at the most repeated an expression of feeling, which had before been uttered to satiety. But Metastasio has, after Zeno, the great merit of having peculiarly adapted our language to music. He brought into use a genuine selection of euphonious, singable words, and in that remains a model for all times. Do you know any compositions of Jomelli?

—Church compositions, but no operas, I answered.

—He was the most gifted of our composers of that time, continued Rossini. No one knew how to treat the voice so well. His slow movements especially are often of wonderful melodic beauty.

—But no one would seek to produce an effect with them to-day, said I inquiringly.

—The forms, to be sure, of our Art are so changeable and so important, replied Rossini. Surely no one nowadays would be able to write those things; they require a rendering, of the conception, of which only the castrati were capable, and as it were away [illegible] through studies, so [illegible] [illegible] compensation.

—The only thing we have not taken quite otherwise than those of our time, said I, if one might judge by accounts of their extremely [illegible] with the simple songs, which the composers often wrote for them.

—True, the opera composers of that time commonly played a part in schools and [illegible], and gave the singers merely sketches, and they [illegible] out at pleasure. Nevertheless men like Durante, Leo and Jomelli will remain great masters for all time, exclaimed Rossini.

In the summer of 1836 Rossini came to pass a week at Frankfort. Felix Mendelssohn was there at the same time, and I had the pleasure of seeing them two meet, the one of whom had a rather [illegible] [illegible], the other his first great work, together almost daily in my mother's house. The nearly young man and the celebrated maestro had in [illegible] felt also upon Mendelssohn, and he played before him very much as he wanted, and what he wanted; both of his own and others' compositions. Rossini thought with great interest of those days, and often in the conversation back on the master [illegible] so early from us. He told me he had heard his Octet well performed in Florence, and I had to play to him the Symphony in A minor for four hands, with a very clever pianist in a Florentine house, who was here in [illegible]. With what, however, what could Mendelssohn have been to treat the smallest matters! said he afterwards one day. But how comes it, that he wrote no opera? Had he not applications for the same from every theatre?

—You do not know our German theatrical management, I answered. We try the works of all times and nations, from Gluck to Balfe, to Verdi, and let the living German composers make a trial when they can. In order an opera is a thing which seldom occurs to any theatre director.

—But, exclaimed Rossini, if young talents are not encouraged, if you do not give them opportunity to get experience, nothing can ever come of it!

—And nothing will come of it, I answered. As Beethoven and Weber wrote for once a couple of masterpieces but from a [illegible] and progressive German nation! I ignore not the rest. Moreover, I believe that the German composers will always incline mostly toward instrumental music.

—They commonly begin with instrumental music, said Rossini, which perhaps makes it hard for them to accommodate themselves afterwards to the conditions of vocal music. They have difficulty in being simple; whereas it is hard in the [illegible] not to be simple.

—You are very severe, maestro, indeed it may be the most difficult of problems to remain noble and simple. Speaking of that, I am not come back again to my hobby, that you did not continue to us after "William Tell" to write for the Grand Opera. Had you not the intention to compose a Faust?

—It was long a favorite thought of mine, and I had already sketched out a whole scenario with Jouy. Naturally upon the basis of Goethe's poem. But about that time a real Faust mania sprang up in Paris; every theatre had its separate Faust, which quite destroyed my relish for it. Meanwhile came the July revolution; the Grand Opera, formerly a royal institution, passed into the hands of a private impresario; my mother had died; my father found it intolerable to live in Paris since he understood no French,—so I decided, in summer, after [illegible] [illegible] to furnish four more grand operas, preferring to remain quietly at home and cheer the last years of my aged father. I was far away from my good mother when she breathed her last; that had been an unspeakable grief to me, and I felt the greatest anxiety lest the same thing should happen to me with regard to my father.

—And so you went home to your Bologna, where I found you in '41 where you were dignifying a work of admission to a public rehearsal at the Lyceum. You took great interest in that institution at that time.

—I have done all that was in my power for it during my whole residence in Bologna down to the year '48. It was the school in which I got my side struck! And I had my fun there having all sorts of works played to me by the pupils, who formed a complete orchestra. It often sounded, to be sure, like groans and turnips: still it was young and fresh and entertaining.

—You preferred Bologna to Florence for a residence? I asked.

—Bologna is my proper home, and as such I realized and gave it heartily preferite there. Florence is more of a society, and that is nothing to me, although I like to think of all the friendliness so constantly shown me by the Grand Duke.

—But it appears to me you never found it very irksome, d'autrement marcher, to have a tête-à-tête with high and even supreme powers; and you have had opportunity enough for it. In fact you took part in the Congress of Vienna.

—I went there at the invitation of Prince Metternich, who wrote me a most amiable letter. Since I was le Dieu de l'harmonie, so he hoped I would come there, where there was so much need of harmony. All Cantatas could have done the thing I should have accomplished in. I had to compose for them in the shortest time five pieces, for the Naps [illegible] and for the Nobili, for the [illegible] of Congress—and what not?

—How did you contrive to do all that?

—In part I patched all things together and put a new inscription to—so that you can take it all as I could scarcely get through in season. In a chorus about Concord it happened that the word Alleanza (Alliance) stood beneath a certain chromatic sigh. I had no time to alter it, but I thought it fit to leave Prince Metternich beforehand of that mournful trick of accident.

—He recognized in it perhaps the work of a higher destiny, said I.

—At all events he refrained to it smilingly, proceeded the maestro. But the festival which took place in the arena was wonderfully beautiful, and is still a most lovely recollection. The only thing that gave me trouble was that I had to direct my Cantata [illegible] to stand under an enormous statue of Concord in constant terror lest it should fall upon my head.

—Concord would certainly have had a downfall then.

—Merci. But there were fabulous carryings on at that time in Verona. I was presented there among others to the emperor Alexander. He and king George the Fourth of England were the most amiable crowned heads that I ever met. Of the personal attractiveness of the latter one can scarce a form an idea. But Alexander also was a splendid and imposing man. I went from there to Venice, to write Semiramide. There again I found many of those high personages, in [illegible] Prince Metternich, who interested himself in an uncommon degree for music and really understood something of it. He was present out every evening in the Fenice at the rehearsals of my new opera, so I seemed to be very happy to be able to escape there somewhat from the political circles.

—Apropos of that story of the chromatic Alleluia, said I, it seems to me it used to be related how, during the occupation of the Church States by the Austrians, you received an order from the new governor of Bologna for a Cantata, and you executed the commission in such a way, that you cunningly set the new text to a much sung patriotic song of your own composing.

—There is not a word of truth in it. They left me quiet, and I really had no desire to joke with those stern gentlemen. I also never mixed myself up in any way in politics. I was a musician and it never occurred to me to wish to be anything else, although I take the liveliest interest in what is going on in the world, particularly in my country's fate. In truth I have lived through and seen all sorts of things.

Herr Manns on Musical Pitch.

(To the Editor of the "Musical World.")

SIR,—The well [illegible] article in the Daily Telegraph of the [illegible] and the [illegible] in the Athenæum [illegible] concerning the [illegible] of England [illegible] to lay my views on the question [illegible] before my brother conductors [illegible] be effected through the lowering of the present pitch. It [illegible] to evoke the fullest inquiry on all points in connection with the movement, before any decisive steps are taken.

I beg to say that I not only think it desirable, but absolutely necessary that the present pitch should be lowered, and I have strong reasons to believe that most, if not all of my respected colleagues entertain the same view since nearly all the first-class performances of those choral works upon which England justly prides herself with her own and [illegible] have [illegible] from the fact that it is [illegible] the [illegible] who can [illegible] different temperaments and [illegible] has also from the [illegible] that choral singing [illegible] a perfect [illegible] instead of a pleasure, as I [illegible] to be.

As to the more [illegible] of the [illegible] practical excellence [illegible] by [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] in the pitch, it [illegible] to be [illegible] or [illegible] of [illegible] of all good [illegible] would revolt against seeing [illegible] too sharp. The tendency to force a rise [illegible] the beginning of a concert performance has [illegible] of being prepared for the [illegible] of the [illegible] caused by the warm breath which gives life to the bodies of wood and brass, and also from the presence of the heated atmosphere of a crowded [illegible] concert rooms.

According to [illegible] history the rise in the pitch commenced [illegible] the pitch of Chor and Kammerton, which, a couple of centuries ago [illegible] more than a whole tone—the Chorton being the highest. When, from the beginning of the 18th century, the orchestra gradually became an [illegible] accompanying instruments in [illegible] [illegible] had caused [illegible] according to the Chorton, [illegible] to the pitch of the church organs of the time. But the [illegible] when the orchestra was [illegible] and [illegible] independent musical body [illegible] of wood and brass instruments [illegible] composed for [illegible] the whole [illegible] performances which had [illegible] all [illegible] in the same room in the [illegible] the evening performance, when [illegible] tuned the wind instruments up considerably. After that the [illegible] up [illegible] in order to [illegible] for the next morning performance, [illegible] evening performance [illegible] artificial light and [illegible] too sharp. The wind instruments were [illegible] to [illegible] to sharpen their pitch for the next morning concert; and so things went on, becoming more rapidly [illegible] with the introduction of the brilliant gaslight into concert rooms, until they reached the present unendurable climax—a musical pitch which forbids tenors and [illegible] to venture to perform the instrumental classical works of the great masters of the 18th and the greater part of the first half of the present century; which forces [illegible] the first and [illegible] of trumpet and French horn players before they reach the prime of life; makes [illegible] drums, [illegible] of [illegible] like the [illegible] of a [illegible] orchestra, [illegible] of all the [illegible] violins, [illegible] too high pitch [illegible]

How can a further [illegible] of the [illegible] and a [illegible] be effected? [illegible] to [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] establishment [illegible] the [illegible] representations of such a [illegible] the commercial part of the question with willows [illegible] instrument makers, &c. and [illegible] in all England and [illegible] members [illegible] instruments [illegible] the same pitch after [illegible] usual [illegible] of flutes, clarinets, &c. and the [illegible] share of [illegible]

To suggest [illegible] orchestra should lower its pitch [illegible] that the [illegible] old pitch large while orchestral [illegible] this [illegible] quite impossible. There is also another weighty reason why it cannot be done [illegible] the [illegible] orchestra as well as other bands—the Crystal Palace band for instance—frequently play with military bands. Of course this could not be done so long as the military bands of London [illegible] adopting the new pitch. A lowering of the pitch by [illegible] by [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] make [illegible] the [illegible] instruments would be [illegible]

The most practicable means of lowering the pitch would be to lower it a full half tone. In doing this the [illegible] wind instruments for an orchestra would be confined to flutes, oboes, clarinets [illegible] A and C and bassoons. The present A [illegible] would [illegible] clarinets. All the brass instruments would only be [illegible] by the old [illegible] shanks or crooks, but the military [illegible] French horn, [illegible] of the [illegible] the whole family of [illegible] and trombones. Organ builders would [illegible] such trouble and expense [illegible] the higher pipe and adding one of lower pipe [illegible] the present [illegible] the [illegible] a [illegible] where such alterations would only be effected [illegible] by transposing [illegible] a semi tone lower. Military bands would [illegible] have to [illegible] bass, [illegible] and [illegible] and bassoons, [illegible] the Calciferous [illegible] [illegible] respectful, as private competent.

The question whether lowering [illegible] should [illegible] [illegible] composers [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] composers part [illegible] brilliance being adopted, the expense to regimental [illegible] and societies, military bands, organ builders, and brass instrument makers, would be reduced to a minimum, because, as already pointed out, most of the existing instruments could be utilized, and the material already shaped or finished off for instruments being made could be used without important loss or trouble.

Having now stated my views as to what, to the best of my knowledge and practical experience, are the most essential points in connection with this important matter, I trust that all who are concerned will come forward and express their plan [illegible] so that [illegible] and practicable an [illegible] satisfactory result [illegible] be possible.

[illegible] this long letter I [illegible] the following question: Would it not be [illegible] by whose [illegible] an [illegible] voluntary [illegible] percentage of every [illegible] of a fund for the purchase of instruments? [illegible] pounds per week, [illegible] A [illegible] with [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] with [illegible] in all [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] The general [illegible] the [illegible] because the pitch would [illegible] a [illegible] be [illegible] through the [illegible] of old pitched wind instruments.—Your obedient servant,

Music at Home.

Seventh Symphony Concert.—For the first time this season has the success of these concerts ... [illegible] ... a streak of stormy weather. Thursday, the ... inst., was undeniably a bad day outside, yet the Music Hall had scarce an empty seat to show. Moreover the ... [illegible] ... and everybody was in his seat when the first Overture began, so that it was heard and enjoyed in perfect quiet,—a ... [illegible] ... what everybody wanted who really cares much for the music. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The ... of Prometheus"	Beethoven.
Aria, ... [illegible] ...	...
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, (Rhenish) ...	Schumann.
1. ... 2. Scherzo ... 3. ... 4. ... 5. Finale ... [illegible] ...
Fourth Pianoforte Concerto ... Op. 58	Beethoven.
Songs: a. ... b. ...	Mendelssohn. ...
Overture ... [illegible] ...	Mendelssohn.

Beethoven's earliest Overture, composed, with other music, in the year 1800, for an allegorical Ballet, founded on the old Greek legend of Prometheus, has been but little heard of late years. It is a genial, light, graceful work, with hardly so much of the Promethean fire as ... Beethoven got from heaven later without stealing. Indeed you would hardly imagine it to be by Beethoven. It sounds much more like Mozart. It was nicely played (that being the quality chiefly needed) and was pleasant for a beginning. Nothing could be more unlike it than the concluding Overture, that vividly imaginative, felicitous piece of descriptive (suggestive) music, which seems as remarkable in its way as Schiller's "William Tell" or Scott's "Lays of Lancaster" ... [illegible] ... for Mendelssohn composed it when he was hardly twenty—his second overture—and where he could have known but little of the ... [illegible] ... But here the ... [illegible] ... wonderfully brought home to one who has had any experience of this kind. This, too, was more vividly reproduced in the rendering than at any time before.

But the point of special interest in the concert, of course, was the E-flat Symphony of Schumann,—which was indeed to Boston an important novelty. There are very various opinions about it, as there always are about a work of Schumann. Some had clear impressions of it, and some had very vague ones, of at least some parts of it;—we do not know that the score is wholly answerable for that: we do know that the performance was not, for with all its remarkable difficulties, it did find a ... [illegible] ... the ... [illegible] ... being all that we would question. We are sure that it will always grow in favor with any really musical person of some depth of nature, who shall hear it often and study it as such things deserve. Even the English prejudice is giving way slowly and steadily before Schumann; and this very Symphony during the past London season has won reluctant homage, not without reservations, from nearly all the critics. Its thoughts are ... great ones, and may well have been inspired by the Cologne Cathedral and the Rhine "the ... [illegible] ... " so big with all its wealth of memory and history beneath its waters. (It is called sometimes the "Cologne," sometimes the "Rhenish" Symphony.)

The opening theme of the first movement (Lebhaft, equivalent to vivace), a very broad and stately ... [illegible] ... on the ... [illegible] ... of its syncopated rhythm, seems to move majestically ... [illegible] ... the wide and noble river; and this is genial ... may characterize the entire movement, though it is full of lesser tributary thoughts, and ... [illegible] ... melodious second subject, introduced by the reeds, is of fascinating beauty. The London Musical World, which went so far as to print in notes all the striking themes and motives of the Symphony, says, after quoting the first theme: "It is a good ... [illegible] ... entire movement, about which curiosity is at once aroused. It is impossible not to feel that the composer has something original to say, and means to say it ... [illegible] ... " And again, after ... [illegible] ...

"It is not too much to say that in this movement Schumann appears at his best. Elsewhere he often ... [illegible] ... power of expression ... [illegible] ... Moreover there is about the ... [illegible] ... the composer is thinking of the ... [illegible] ... Without doubt wherever it is ... [illegible] ... the claims of Schumann to be ... [illegible] ... in higher form will have the advantage of powerful advocacy."

The Scherzo is a sort of ... [illegible] ... The first subject in C major, having a heavy ... [illegible] ... with a will. Violas, 'cellos and bassoons give out the quaint first section of it, which is repeated with the addition of second violins and clarinets. In the second or answering section, the figure is reversed, and now with more light and airy ... [illegible] ... (first violins and flutes above) ... [illegible] ... of Schumann's ... [illegible] ... and the ... of melody. Then in the words of the writer above quoted,

"After repeating the first section with full orchestra ... [illegible] ... the composer becomes humorous, and ... [illegible] ... with pleasant laughter. ... [illegible] ... bassoons ... [illegible] ... among the ... [illegible] ... the trombones ... [illegible] ... the first ... [illegible] ... All through this, however ... [illegible] do not forget the little joke of the [illegible] which they keep whispering to each other till once more the jovial first strain bursts forth. Finding this congenial, they join in heartily.

The whole piece is fascinating; there is most delicate beauty and poetic feeling in the [illegible] reverie, as it were, before the return of the first theme with full orchestra; and indeed all that last part, with its commingling of the several subjects and phrases of such different forms, yet all [illegible] related, forms an enchanting labyrinth of melody. [illegible]

The third movement, [illegible] Andante [illegible] is full of sweet, deep, tender feeling and its beauty would be almost cloying but for the [illegible] [illegible] by the clarinets and bassoons, as in four-part song with slight accompaniment [illegible] new melodic figure [illegible] too [illegible] to describe. [illegible]

The fourth movement, marked Feierlich, solemn, is said to have been inspired by [illegible] of an Arch bishop [illegible] in the Cologne Cathedral. [illegible] Music Hall. [illegible] trombones [illegible] [illegible] the Ninth Symphony [illegible]

The last movement [illegible] [illegible] Would that we could give the notes! [illegible] full career of the gay movement, we drop from a [illegible] [illegible] a sudden reminiscence [illegible] of that [illegible] phrase in the [illegible] movement; and again [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] solemn movement is unexpectedly heard after a succession of [illegible] chords. A brilliant Coda, with accelerated tempo, closes the movement and the Symphony, with which we are [illegible] [illegible] interested as to wish to hear it many times. It was our fortune to hear it played [illegible] years ago, [illegible] we enjoyed it, but by no means so much as now.

[illegible] added to [illegible] the Schumann Symphony [illegible] than the Concerto [illegible] Beethoven,—the most finely [illegible] of all Concertos, we are inclined to say [illegible] Two years ago he played it [illegible] Complete master of his instrument [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

Altogether it was one of the [illegible] programmes and the most satisfying concerts in all the [illegible] series of the Harvard Musical Association.

The next concert offers two [illegible] new to this country [illegible] Haydn [illegible] Symphony [illegible] Beethoven's [illegible] Symphony. The Overtures will be "The Hebrides" (Mendelssohn) and "The Naiad" (Bennett), and the Concerto [illegible] will be played by Mr. Leonhard.

Chamber Concerts.

[illegible] The [illegible] Mozart in C [illegible] Mendelssohn's second Trio [illegible] [illegible] Lento [illegible] Allegro [illegible] [illegible] Beethoven, No. 11 [illegible]

[illegible] with his brother [illegible] have organized a new Quartet [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] Chickering's before which date this paper has to go to press; but we shall speak of it next time. At the second [illegible] Feb. 26, will be given a Quartet in [illegible] by Haydn, and the first of Schumann's, in A minor. Success to the [illegible] Quartet!

Vocal Culture.

The general neglect to cultivate the voice is very strange when we consider what a charming accomplishment it is to have a pure, brilliant, powerful tone and voice [illegible] in conversing, reading, or singing. The neglect is equally strange when we think how profound an influence is exerted on health [illegible] [illegible] Thousands of persons go through life with feeble, squeaking [illegible] [illegible] For this purpose we [illegible] recommend Mr. W. J. [illegible] who has devoted many years to the elaboration of a [illegible] for securing the most desirable qualities of speech and song. He is to be found at [illegible] Street, Boston, room No. 3. Those desiring to improve their voices cannot do better than to call on him.

Offenbach.

Dear Mr. Dwight:— [illegible] Offenbach fever is raging, it may be interesting to many of your readers [illegible] by Dr. Joseph Schlüter [illegible] in the year 1865, says: "What Meyerbeer achieved on a large [illegible] Jacques Offenbach (from Cologne, but [illegible] in Paris) [illegible] Le Mariage aux Lanternes, La Fille d'Elizondo, [illegible] Les Bouffes Parisiens [illegible] Orphée aux Enfers, Geneviève de Brabant, Le Pont des Soupirs [illegible] Orphée [illegible] [illegible] applause."

Musical Correspondence.

New York, Feb. 1.—A Grand Charity Concert was given [illegible] [illegible] Mr. Von [illegible] The former played, for his [illegible] Chopin's Ballade in G minor, op. 23, [illegible] [illegible] "virtuosity" [illegible] [illegible]

On Tuesday evening the "Madrigal Concert" (which I mentioned in a previous letter) was repeated with some slight changes in the programme.

The repertoire, I am told, was equally as successful as the original entertainment.

"A Missionary Meeting" and Concert will occur at the Academy on Friday evening of this week, and the programme will comprise various selections from Mr. Bristow's Oratorio "Daniel," while the whole performance will be directed by that gentleman. The entertainment will be of a somewhat "mixed" character, for there are to be prayers, addresses, and several old congregational tunes.

Mr. Thomas' 10th Sunday Concert presented an attractive programme, of which I quote a portion:—

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52	Schumann.
Overture, "Genoveva"	[illegible]
"Lied (Spring)"	Vogt.

Herr Alves and Miss Mehlig were the soloists. The former is a pianist who has studied in Europe and who made her debut on this occasion. Her style is small, and she works her fingers finely, but on the other hand her touch is crisp and neat, and her scale passages are all really praiseworthy.

Miss Raymond, Ritter and Mr. S. B. Mills are about to give three "Historical Recitals of Vocal and Pianoforte Music." To show the purpose and plan of the undertaking, I quote a few words from the printed programme. "The programme of these concerts will be laid in two branches of art, Song and Pianoforte composition, and the idea will be to give a complete sketch of the development of both branches in their most prominent points as can possibly be accomplished in a short series." It is not yet definitely announced when the first Recital will take place.

FEB. 8.—Last Saturday evening we had the third Philharmonic Concert with the following programme:

Reformation Symphony	Mendelssohn.
Capriccio, G major	Ole Bull.
Ole Bull.
Two movements from posthumous Symphony in C	Schubert.
Polacca Guerriera	Ole Bull.
Ole Bull.
Overture, Leonora, No. 3	Beethoven.

The Reformation Symphony (we were fortunately spared an infliction of a description sent you on the back of the programme) would have made a reputation for a man of less note than Mendelssohn, but it adds nothing to his fame and is indeed, in many respects, inferior to either the Scotch or the Italian. The last movement—an ever employing the Luther and popular Choral—is (to my mind) the sheer Andante, in G minor, which immediately precedes the vigorous Finale. It is simply an orchestral Lied ohne Worte, of which the theme is sung by the violins.

The Schubert fragments have now become quite familiar to us and grow in favor upon each hearing. If any criticism were to be made, it would simply be with regard to the prolixity of the composer. Yet Schumann (speaking of the C major) called it a "heavenly length" and I am not disposed to rebel against his opinion.

Ole Bull played his two selections in his own well-known familiar and peculiarly unapproachable style. It is useless to criticise his compositions, for they are scarcely such in the usual sense. In the Concerto, for instance which is supposedly in A, the final opens abruptly in E major, continues in that key for a very long time and then suddenly without warning a sudden winds up with about 16 bars in A. "To paraphrase a famous bon mot of a certain celebrated wit, I imagine that his compositions will be played and admired when those of Mendelssohn and Beethoven shall be forgotten"—and not until then. Ole Bull was encored—in a somewhat labored way—at the close of the concerto, and responded to the compliment by drawing about ten or more of valuable time to a sort of modern nightmare . . . in which he exhibited his mechanical dexterity and the beauties of the chromatic scale in a most ingenious manner.

At the next concert—to occur on March 6—we are to have Schumann's 4th Symphony in D minor, a Suite by Bach (first played here by Thomas at a Symphony Soirée in last season) and Mendelssohn's Overture to "The lovely Melusina." The soloist or soloists not yet announced.

Mr. Thomas' 11th Sunday Concert presented these, among other attractions:

Overture, "Les Deux Journées"	Cherubini.
Allegretto, 8th Symphony	Beethoven.
Overture, "Preciosa"	Von Weber.
"Träumerei"	Schumann.

Mrs. Farnsworth (soprano) and Mr. Mariner (pianist) assisted upon that occasion. Of the former I have already given my opinion. Mr. M. played Mendelssohn's well known "Rondo Capriccioso" in quite a timid way, but seems to be possessed of some considerable mechanical dexterity. F.

PARIS, JAN. 24.—The 6th concert of the Conservatoire was, as usual, a repetition of the 5th, of which I gave an account in my last letter. The programme for the 7th concert I give below:

Symphonie en A mineur	Mendelssohn.
Adagio . . . . (Double chœur sans accomp.)	[illegible]
Sur Allegro du concerto en si mineur pour violon	Beethoven.
[illegible]	J. Reuberg.
Exécutée par M. E. Sauzay.
Marche religieuse de Lohengrin (Chœurs)	Wagner.
Symphonie en sol mineur	Mozart.

The "Scotch" Symphony is the one which established Mendelssohn's fame for excellence in this branch of composition. It is called the third Symphony, but it became famous while the second (in A major) was comparatively unknown. The charming Scherzo may have gained for the work the title of Scotch Symphony, and, both that and the other movements abound in the peculiar grace so wonderfully outlined in Chanter Ambroise.

It may be superfluous to say that the performance, both of this and of the Mozart Symphony, was above criticism, and indeed, the same may be said of the Andante and of M. Dancla's playing, which was such as to gain for him an enthusiastic recall,—a compliment which with this audience, is not to be had for the asking.

The Popular Concerts continue to pursue an evenly smooth tenor of their way, and I give below the programme of the last one:

Overture de Fidelio	Beethoven.
Symphonie en Si bémol, op. 38	Schumann.
Intermède	Weber.
Prélude et Romance pour Solo de Violoncelle	Vieuxtemps.
Marche religieuse de Lohengrin	Richard Wagner.
Ouverture de Euryanthe	Weber.
[illegible]	Meyerbeer.
Sakuntala Marche	Goldmark.
Ouverture, solo, fantaisie, orchestre, Mr.	Robert Schumann.
Andante de Rosamunde, Schubert	Schubert.
Sérénade, pour Alto	W. Sor.
Par M. Weber.
Symphonie en ut majeur	Beethoven.

For to-day are announced a Symphony by Haydn (No. 42) an Andante by Schubert, Beethoven's 8th Symphony, a Concerto for Violin by Vieuxtemps, and Wagner's Rienzi Overture. A fine concert is to take place to-morrow at the Salle Herz for the benefit of the Société Italienne de Bienfaisance, at which Mmes. Albani and Cotrone will assist together with the principal Italian artists. Mme. Albani will sing an air from Semiramide, and with M. Tamburini a duo from the same work. She will also sing with Mme. Castano the duo from the Stabat in which she sang so magnificently at the funeral of Rossini. This concert is given annually and has therefore been held at the Theatre Italien, but this year owing to some misunderstanding between the Committee and the Director of the Theatre, the Salle Herz has been chosen.

Mlle. Nilsson is said to be returning to the Italian Opera. Tuesday she took for the matinee from the rôle of Ninetta, in Il Barbiere. At the Grand Opera the representations of Hamlet are interrupted by the illness of Faure; but Les Huguenots still continue as before. To-day at the Théâtre Lyrique we have Mozart's Don Juan. Rienzi, Violetta and La Flauta are soon to follow. A. A. M.

My Recollections of Mendelssohn.

BY EDUARD DEVRIENT.

III.

In this new house Felix entered upon the period of youth with the new tendencies and occupations of freshly aroused energies. With the same zeal and order with which he used to take hold of everything, he threw himself into bodily exercises. The father had built a little gymnasium for the boys in the fine large garden adjoining the house. Felix trained himself to the utmost exertion and endurance in the well-known manœuvres. With great zeal he learned to ride and gave me glowing accounts of the horses and of the jokes of the old riding master which [illegible] now experienced. His swimming exercises during the following summers were pushed with juvenile enthusiasm. A little swimming club had been formed for the purpose. Klingemann, who lived with the Hanoverian Minister in the upper story of the Mendelssohn house, belonged to this club, and wrote swimming songs, which Felix composed, and which they used to sing while swimming in the water; when they got home there was possible fun and merriment enough to tell of at the supper table. Klingemann, who was soon transferred to the embassy at London, came into nearer and nearer relations with Felix. He enlisted his and Fanny's sympathy in Jean Paul, whose full hearted mysticizing and deep-souled humor exerted a great influence on Felix; these were kindred natures.

His musical calling now became an earnest matter and the profession of his life. His father, fain to satisfy himself of the sufficiency of Felix's capacity, had made a journey with him to Paris in the autumn of 1825 to call on Cherubini; and he, after examining his compositions and hearing a piano Concerto and a string quartet, had granted the youth an undoubted talent of great promise. So in the winter the opportunity of a concert of the violinist Maurer was availed of for Felix to play Beethoven's piano Fantasia and bring out his latest composition, the grand Overture in C major. We called this the "Trumpet Overture," on account of the trumpet call which dominates the piece. He performed it once more in the great garden hall of the house, where now the Sunday music had its home, and again at the musical festival at Düsseldorf; nevertheless—and even though his father was so partial to the piece that he told me he would like to hear it in his dying hour—Felix did not find it ripe for publication. Therefore he did not scruple afterwards to use the trumpet call in the "Hebrides" Overture.

And now there was to be a public trial of his operatic talent, the teacher's love being supported by a great success for the one. After many alterations, the opera "Camacho's Wedding" was declared finished and was soon to appear. It was handed in to the Royal Theatre in 1826. The General Intendant, Count Brühl, showed himself favorably inclined to further the first work of the young composer; but Spontini, who as general music-director had the deciding voice about the acceptance of operas, who was hostile to everything which he apprehended might win the favor of the public, and who omitted no opportunity of [illegible] asserting his own supremacy and his official importance,—Spontini demanded the score that he might examine it.

Dignity required that this examination should last a long time. [illegible] for such business was not his forte. Finally the young composer was summoned, the opera was spoken of in a tone of compassionate disparagement, and Spontini's concluding advice in regard to the completion of a comic opera consisted in his leading the young man to the window—he lived opposite the dome of the French Church—and saying to him: "Mon ami, il vous faut des idées grandes grandes comme cette coupole." It was finally decided that the opera should be performed; but other works claimed precedence, and so long a delay [illegible]. But the old Mendelssohn had a talk with Spontini and [illegible]—he had known him from the Paris days and had met him with his wife at large parties and in vocal performances in his own house. Finally the mediation of Count Brühl, in the beginning of 1827, brought the work into the usual course of the opera studies of that time.

I had not till then only heard isolated pieces of "Camacho's Wedding" at the piano, had read the poem, and had not been able to suppress a certain uneasy doubt whether all this was so much more than "The Uncle from Boston" as to be likely to produce sufficient effect upon the public as Felix's first opera. Now I took part in all the rehearsals in the character of Carrasco, and gradually various scruples became clear to me.

The subject of the opera—already used and more well known in "The Village Barber" (Dorfbarbier)—is only suited to a comical catastrophe. The rejected lover's feint of having taken poison and his sudden recovery after his [illegible] seemingly upon the point of death, must of necessity produce a laughable effect. In the Dorfbarbier the confirmation of the doctrine that honor is a universal remedy evidently makes a more satisfactory conclusion than the intervention of Don Quixote in "Camacho's Wedding." Such questionable materials, together with the poet's inability to produce really dramatic situations and effects, made rather a tame affair of it. Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, in fact, only run along beside the action.

The composition still bore essentially the same character with all the boyish works of Felix. What made the chief impression on the hearers was, who he had possessed with his great gift to learn, the extraordinary cleverness in form, the skill shown in the right construction of musical pieces, the intelligent expression of the singing persons. All this was undeniable and claimed respect for the composer of sixteen, but did not all promise something to win and to anchor the career. In [illegible] the humorous moments in account he did not get beyond what he had accomplished in his boyish operas; in invention the work was not rich; indeed [illegible] preserving it was not equal to "The Uncle from Boston," to which whole course of the rehearsals I learned to like so entirely as well as several in that earlier work. One song from "Camacho's Wedding" was afterwards included by Felix in a second book of Songs;* but it has remained the one of a [illegible] to suit all singers, and clearly shows the still unripe stand-point of the composer for direct passionate expression.

To confirm these observations that would have been very unanswerable; but upon one point, the musical treatment of Don Quixote, I fell into dispute with Felix, because he attached great importance to it. Throughout the whole opera every appearance of Don Quixote, intended to [illegible] extreme his knight-errantry, was introduced by a heroic and imposing entree of trombones. Real heroism could not have been heralded with more dignity. But here [illegible] the point was to [illegible] one befooled with the mania of knight-errantry,—although a respectable and honest fool,—here, in my opinion, the entire ought—through the [illegible] of instruments [illegible]—to characterise the crazy knight himself [illegible]? Felix on the contrary maintained that The Knight of the Rueful Countenance felt himself entirely a hero and capable of world-subduing deeds; but the composer must express the [illegible] of the dramatic figure, not his own. I remarked on the other hand, that Cervantes everywhere holds up the image of [illegible] knight-errantry in Don Quixote, and that the composer ought to follow the poet; moreover, that no [illegible] of the old knight of La Mancha would ever play him as a real hero, but only as a crack-brained fool, who deems himself a knight; and how would the chase with the high idea of him announced by the trombones [illegible]?

The proposed theme was discussed at great length, and I was struck by the fact that Felix's father took the side [illegible]—perhaps only because it was too late to alter it.

The production of the opera seemed to be undergo all the [illegible] and fatalities of the [illegible]. After all sorts of delays, when we finally came to the final rehearsals, the singer Blume, to whom the part of Don Quixote had been assigned, was taken ill with jaundice, and the physician demanded his exemption from all active labor.

And now we had to face the question, whether the study should be broken off and the opera postponed for four or six weeks, and the rehearsals be begun anew after the recovery of the invalid. This would have been the right thing for the success of the work. But people had become impatient; who knew what other hindrances might still arise? But Rossi promised to work with them the best he could until the last moment fixed by the physician for beginning the treatment! and so they could count upon the possibility of two performances. Accordingly it was resolved to put the opera through. As a parting blessing, the chorus director also brought up difficulties, protested against the day fixed and declared that the choruses were not yet sure enough. The open hand of the father put this difficulty aside; but other hindrances, pertaining to the repertoire, delayed the first performance until the termination of Rossi's engagement, the 29th of April, and cut off all possibility of any repetitions.

* [illegible], Ed.

The opera was at once given in the Opera House, but in the little anglo-house. It modest way appeared to Felix better suited to the nature of the work. The house was filled to overflowing with well-wishers and therefore the applause was zealous and noisy enough; but in a hearty sense the opera did not please. It was the same with the young composer. He had outgrown this music since the nearly two years; he felt so dissatisfied regarding the applause, that he ran away before the close of the performance, and when the public called him out, I was obliged to go out and excuse him.

While the family enjoyed the seeming success, Felix remained out of humor and dissatisfied but would not talk about it. When the Don Quixote was restored to health some booksellers from the experience showed their unskilled Success with whom they finally spoke to Felix himself of a resumption of the opera, he answered as he proceeded: "That is the affair of the general Intendance, not mine." After that of course the thing was out of the question.

A malicious criticism—only in Saphir's Schnellpost to be seen—also wounded Felix. He then already felt, as he has often said to me afterwards, that the most splendid praise in the first of papers does not gladden one so much as the most contemptible abuse, in some low and dirty sheet annoys him. Moreover he soon found out that the author of the aforesaid article was a very unusually gifted student who had found a friendly reception at Mendelssohn's house, had shared all the excitement of the family during the preparation of the performance and who even knew the score of the opera.

This chain of most contrary experiences prevented the first stage of aversion to the state of things in Berlin into Felix's soul.

Later, after the excitement about it had passed over, I asked him to consider whether the structure of the opera itself had not had a great part in that strangely adverse concourse of circumstances? He half assented, brought up this and that, but ended with saying: "The opera was not so bad, that one need have dealt so meanly with it." In that I surely could not contradict him.

But these occurrences were in no way destined to oppress his creative energy; on the contrary it took a grand upward impulse at this moment of his life. He wrote his Overture to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream,"* in November, when Moscheles visited Berlin, he was able to play as the finished composition for four hands with Fanny.

Evidently this character-piece indicates the clarifying crisis in Felix's power of composition. He had shaken off the school dust and was now completely himself. In the conception of a poetical masterwork his characteristic faculty, in one mighty leap of development, had grown astonishingly. In his previous opera compositions he had characterized intelligently and vigorously enough, but here the representative was striving and convincing irresistibly winning the hearer and carrying him away with itself. The Moonlit-landscape, where the world possesses now and loves, dates from this composition.

After we had often heard the work played with four hands, and then also in the garden hall with full orchestra—which first placed the structure of the composer fully in the light—all the friends recognized the epoch-making worth of this creation. Here appeared the fine conception, the delicate feeling, the fine appreciation of poetic beauty, the sensibility and the graceful humor of Felix's nature, at once in their fullest flower—all peculiarities, which show that he was eminently called to characteristic, to dramatic music.

His father also recognized the cropping out of self-reliance in the talent of the son, and that henceforth the self-reliance could only limit and impede him; accordingly he put an end to Zelter's last tuition, which made the old gentleman very sensitive, for he still thought that Felix had learned all from him and had not yet outgrown his guidance.

Marx who had a short time before been introduced into the Mendelssohn house said: "Zelter has seen the job sewn, and imagines that he taught him." But Felix, as his tender piety was troubled by the teacher's sensitiveness, and sought to compensate him by redoubled tokens of respect and honor.

* As we are still further indebted to Mendelssohn for the introduction of such character-pieces as the "Hebrides," "Melusine," and "Meeresstille," it seems a pity that he did not give them the name or that of overture. [illegible] it is a work like those without Words" which after the old custom might have been called Etudes.

Chat with Rossini.

BY FERDINAND HILLER.

(Concluded from page 395.)

After dinner I generally smoked a cigar with Rossini. For some time, he has entirely given up the noble art of smoking, having been compelled, on account of his health, to give up taking snuff, a practice of which he was most passionately fond. As he was resisting offered me a regalia, with a magnanimity repeated every day, he observed:

"These cigars were first made for Ferdinand VII, after whom they are named."

"The King was a man of delicate taste," I replied, but merely drawing from the cigar a thick cloud of smoke.

"He used to smoke all day long," said Rossini. "On the occasion of my making a short trip to Madrid with Aguado, I had the honor of being presented to him. He was nothing, when he received me in the presence of the Queen. The monarch was not awkward nearly discourse, or even clear. After the interchange of a few phrases he offered me, in a most friendly manner, a cigar [illegible] smoked away but I declined with a bow and did not accept it. You ask a song to refuse, and Maria Christina, in a low voice and good Neapolitan: 'It's a mark of favor that does not fall to every body's lot.' 'Your majesty,' I replied, in the same accent (I had known her formerly at Naples), in the first place, I do not smoke, and in the second I would not, under the circumstances, answer for the result. The Queen laughed and my audacity was attended with no evil consequences.

"It was at any rate a mark of favor that had its drawbacks," I observed.

"The favor from any drawback was the condescension evinced towards me by Don Francisco, the king's brother," continued Rossini. "Maria Christina had already given me to understand that I should find in him an ardent admirer, and recommended me to go to him, immediately after my audience with the King. I found him playing, and with only his wife; I believe that one of my operas was lying open on the table. After a short conversation, Don Francisco turned towards me in the most friendly manner [illegible] to beg a particular favor of me. 'Give me, he said, the song the air of Assur in you, only distinctly.' Rather astonished, I sat down to accompany him on the piano, and was not quite sure what he meant when he proceeded to the other end of the room, struck a theatrical attitude, and then to the great amazement of his wife began to sing the air with all kinds of movements and gestures. I must confess I never witnessed anything like it."

"How you must have amused yourself!" I exclaimed. "Not only did you have Pasta and Malibran, but even a descendant of Henry IV, to interpret your works. But this excursion of yours to Madrid was the cause of your composing your Stabat Mater, was it not?"

"I composed it for an ecclesiastic, a friend of Aguado's," replied Rossini. "I did so merely from a wish to oblige, and should never have thought of making it public. Strictly speaking it is even true at only some parts, and in the first instance I got Tadolini to compose three pieces, as I was ill and should not have been ready in time. The great celebrity of the Stabat Mater by Pergolese would have been alone sufficient to prevent my setting the same text to music for public performance."

"Do you think so highly of Pergolese's Stabat Mater then?" I inquired. "It is true that I never heard it performed, but on looking through it, I found I was more pleased with certain details than with the work as a whole."

"I once had it performed in Naples, and it produced no ordinary impression," said Rossini. "But there must be two good voices; they must sing it well and even elevate by nobleness of expression certain antiquated passages. The original simple instrumentation must be retained. Lately I saw pieces by larger horses, and with so lavish instrumentation somewhere or other, but where I do not know—that is a very great mistake."

"It always appeared to me," said I, "that Pergolese enjoyed a celebrity which was rather exaggerated." "He died young, it is true. There are plenty of persons too, who confound him with Piccinni, and who know nothing of the one or of the other. Is there anything in the Serva Padrona so often mentioned?"

"It has," replied Rossini, singing me a number of motives out of that old opera, without entering into any further explanations.

"There is a certain amount of sentimentality in Pergolese's compositions, I must allow," I remarked, "and I must say that the more I observe an yours, the more I admire at what is simple and expressive. There is a reproof in that!"

"Not at all times habit," replied the maestro, "the feeling will grow on you more and more."

"What should properly be the reason for sensations of that description?" I inquired.

"In your heart," said Rossini, "who liked and do a great deal here, so it appears new and unusual. But the heart is developed in domestic life and in love of child in a more mature years—you will find I am right."

"I am quite willing to believe it, my dear maestro!" said I. "The great influence that our mode of life and those by whom we are surrounded, exercise upon us, even as artists, will be denied by no one."

"I, at least," said Rossini, "was always dependent in the highest degree upon external influences. The different orchestras and the various singers and in different ways I adapted myself always to the peculiar tastes which predominated among the audiences of this or that place. For instance; in Venice they could never have enough of my Cenerentola, and I, therefore, scattered it about, although I myself was tired of it. In Naples, I was able to lay it aside. The people there did not seem like it."

"Have you been present as a calm spectator, to many representations of your works?" I enquired of the maestro.

"Behind the scenes, I have been so often enough, but never in the front of the house," replied Rossini.

"Never?" I exclaimed.

"I had a lesson in this particular, which again my [illegible]," answered Rossini. "One evening I was invited, in Milan to go to a friend's house in a Ricotta. It was rather too early, and, as we passed the Scala where my Pietra di Paragone was being performed my host dragged me, almost in spite of a [illegible] into the pit. A trio—one of the best pieces of the opera—was just being sung; but my neighbors far from being edified by it, amused themselves by abusing me in the most vivacious manner, not sparing me a word for a single redeeming point. I did not feel any inclination to receive any further lessons of this description; for, in such cases, you may take the part of any one, yourself excepted."

"The Pietra di Paragone has played rather an important part in your life, then; for if I am not mistaken, you were indebted to it for your exemption from the conscription," said I.

"Certainly I was a good enough soldier, and there was no possibility of getting off as I was the protector of a house. But what I [illegible]. My [illegible] brought me in forty [illegible]. But the success of the opera rendered the general commanding in Milan favorably inclined towards me—he applied in my behalf to King Eugene who was absent at the time, and I was left to a more peaceable occupation."

"But one's [illegible], perhaps, not less wearing," said I.

"A fiasco is not a masked ball," replied the maestro, "and there are plenty of people who grow old at the business."

One day as I was playing something to Rossini, he begged me, as usual, to play one or two of Bach's fugues.

"Those accursed fugues!" he subsequently exclaimed in a comically-angry tone. "When I was at the Lyceum in Bologna, I became acquainted with the overture to the Zauberflöte. My head became so full of it that I determined to attempt one myself. I set to work, wrote a fugued overture, and had it copied out and played. But, when I heard it, I was so [illegible] at the effect of my patchwork that I tore up the score and parts into a thousand pieces, in presence of my school-fellows and audience."

"This was a bold step, maestro," said I. "The work would have afterwards been a great [illegible] of some use to you."

"A man has always something better to do than to busy himself with past follies," answered Rossini.

"Talking of these fugues," I observed, "reminds me of your Raimondi, lately deceased. He must have been a perfect wizard. To write two oratorios, which could be performed after each other, and next to each other and simultaneously was of itself a miracle, supposing there was not even any confusion."

"He was really very skilful in such artifices," said Rossini, "and tried his hand at the most adventurous combinations. On the other side, he [illegible] real [illegible] and musician and it was only with his last work [illegible] successful. When I was in Naples I procured for him an appointment at the theatre, in order to give him an opportunity of earning something—he had to superintend and arrange the ballet music—a wretched occupation for a real musician. He subsequently obtained an honorable post in the Lyceum at Palermo, but [illegible] not go on well too long as we here."

"A passionate lover of a maestro Cologne," said I, "applied to Raimondi after the performance of his oratorio in Rome and enquired whether it were possible to obtain a copy. Raimondi demanded the bagatelle of 60,000 francs. His success must have turned his brain."

"I should not be surprised if it had," said Rossini; "he had never presented two pictures at one and the same time, and never obtained such a triumph before."

We were interrupted by a most graceful French lady, who was introduced to the maestro, and, in the course of conversation, thanked him enthusiastically for all the hours of enjoyment his music had already procured her. It is true that such scenes occurred every day; but the warmth with which a great many persons gave utterance to their feelings was, at times, something really [illegible] up.

"In spite of your being used to this sort of thing, maestro," said I, "the manner in which people meet you here must be highly agreeable to you."

"Marks of attention which come from the heart have certainly something satisfactory about them," said Rossini.

"It must be confessed," observed I, "that the French possess, in the highest degree, the gift of manifesting their respect for celebrated men in the most suitable manner."

"Certainly," replied the maestro, "if they could be made only a few less compliments, and speak to a man less about his own works. But this is it that they cannot give up, from persons of the highest rank down to the concierge. I think I never met a Frenchman who did not ask me which of my operas I liked best. You can imagine how little I am the man to enter upon a discussion of this kind. The French are friendly and appreciating, but, at times somewhat too loud."

"Do you prefer the Italian fashion?" I inquired.

"In Italy the people are distinguished by a noble indifference," answered Rossini; "but, on the other side, you may be too loud."

"You certainly have no reason for complaint either on this side of the Alps, or on the other, maestro," said I, laughing, "and yonder comes like a proof son of Albion who adores you—I would lay any wager about the evening he first heard your music and saw you and the tears stood in his eyes the while."

"I have experienced from Englishmen," said Rossini, "marks of attention which are not to be met with every day. For instance, I shall never forget the behavior of the Duke of Devonshire towards me."

"What did he do, maestro?" inquired I.

"On my way to London I was stopping for a day at Milan," said Rossini. "The Duke of Devonshire happened to be there also, and an acquaintance of mine, who was about going to see the Duke, made me come and so I accompanied him, although my travelling costume was not adapted for dancing in the drawing-room of an English nobleman. The Duke, a great lover of music, overwhelmed me with politeness; we dined together and after dinner, I sang him two or three songs."

"That was a bad time for doing so," said I.

"According to what my pen says," replied the maestro, "I must at least confess I have never sung more willingly and better than after a good dinner. But in return for this I must add that he gave me the most powerful letters of recommendation which were highly serviceable to me in London. He himself was not in England during my stay there."

"All you have hitherto related is but very natural, my dear maestro," said I.

"A little patience; it was soon," continued Rossini. "Twenty years had elapsed since the period in question, without my having again met the Duke. One morning very early I go to the market at Bologna. You must know that there is nothing like the market at Bologna. It is impossible to form any conception of the various productions [illegible] there, and [illegible] about the place. To my great astonishment I perceive, about in the middle of the square, a gentleman very confidently smoking a cigar. I approach, and the moment he perceives me, he stretches out his hand in a quiet friendly manner, to shake hands with me. It was the Duke of Devonshire. 'I am very glad that I have seen you here; I intended calling on you in an hour or two,' said he. 'I know your residence and your habits.' We chatted good-humoredly together for some time. I accompanied him to his hotel, and he subsequently paid me the visit he had announced. 'I am still greatly in your debt,' said he, on taking leave, 'and up to the present time have found no opportunity of taking my revenge.' With these words, he handed me an extremely valuable snuff box. It was [illegible] far from the costliness of the present than the [illegible] on the part of the donor which afforded me great pleasure. To pay a supposed debt [illegible] after the lapse of twenty years [illegible] but he who was under an obligation to me but I to him."

"That depends upon how you look upon the matter," said I.

"At any rate, the behavior of the Duke was that of a nobleman, and the best occupation of the world. But it is fated [illegible] today, yonder comes an elegant pianiste compositeur who has certainly got his eye upon you."

"I only trust that he does not wish to play me a fantasia on motives from my own operas," said Rossini, "for nothing in the world annoys me so [illegible] of this description, added to which you are expected to express your thanks, at the same time, for the honor done you."

[illegible] the maestro passed quietly by. It was, however, his last evening he spent at Trouville. On the following morning he left the place. I accompanied him to his carriage, and although I was to see him again in a few days in Paris, my heart felt moved as he drove off.

"I expect you on Friday to dinner, caro Ferdinando," he called out to me.

"Friday and every other day," exclaimed Madame Rossini.

I sauntered home, with half-melancholy half agreeable feelings of having spent one or two nights that for me were memorable ones. May the readers of these pages of reminiscences—[illegible] at these conclusions—[illegible] from these [illegible] notion of one of the most genial and notable men of the present century—one who, besides all his other [illegible], possesses the highly [illegible] virtue of being extremely well-disposed towards the author of these pages.

The Stabat Mater of Various Masters.

Among the innumerable crowd of musicians who, from the end of the fifteenth century down to the present day, have tried their powers on the words of [illegible] a work which I have [illegible] of celebrity. These are Josquin des Prés, Palestrina, Pergolese, [illegible], Haydn, Boccherini, and Rossini. There is nothing more interesting than to compare these works, [illegible] in form and in the manner [illegible] we separate each one from its own epoch; [illegible] thoroughly imbue the conditions that inspired the composer [illegible] to form an impartial judgment on the subject. [illegible] a well-founded opinion of the value of each work and our judgment will be [illegible] enlightened impartially.

Behold us, then, face to face with the Stabat of Josquin Després, who ruled the art of his own time. Choral music was then written for voices alone without any accompaniment save of the organ. The art [illegible] just emerged from its swaddling clothes, and harmony [illegible] chord. For Josquin, the Stabat was a [illegible] prayer; his wisdom was simply [illegible] its penitential and devout character. The Saviour on the cross and the grief of Mary [illegible]. The author did not [illegible] the work he had to produce, [illegible] a work of calm devotion, and for this he possessed what he required the pure sounds of the human voice and consonant harmony. The composition is written for five voices on the ancient Roman chant of the sixth tone (F major). One of the voices sings uninterrupted plain chant, in long sustained notes, and, upon this theme, the remaining four voices join in such sweet harmony, in something displaying such intelligent treatment of [illegible], imitations, and the opposite character distinguishing the different classes of [illegible], that, if we bear in mind the circumstances amid which the work is really beautiful and worthy the attention of every educated and impartial musician.

The [illegible] elapsed from the moment that Josquin wrote his Stabat Mater [illegible] period which [illegible] Palestrina produce his. The [illegible] compositions [illegible] as I have seen, [illegible] improved in form and Palestrina brought to it the power of his [illegible]. The composer literally [illegible] Palestrina's Stabat Mater, for eight voices in two choruses. The latter alternately [illegible] combined, produce some striking effects. [illegible] composition we perceive most plainly that the composer was deeply imbued with the words of St. Matthew: "Now from the sixth hour there was darkness all over the land unto the ninth hour. [illegible] And behold the veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks were rent." It is a sentiment of terror which reigns in the work of the Pope's chapel-master. The three [illegible] with which the first chorus commences on the words "Stabat Mater," and to which the second sings the words "Juxta Crucem," are something terrible, something, however, which [illegible] than those of grandeur. It is something [illegible] of Palestrina's [illegible] style, always so [illegible]. But Palestrina [illegible] he could [illegible]. The [illegible] the words "O quam tristis et afflicta fuit illa benedicta Mater Unigeniti!" It produces [illegible] up to the end of the work, and leaves no doubt as to the feeling by which the artist was moved when writing the latter.

Between Palestrina and Pergolese there was a period of one hundred and fifty years, [illegible] formed; a new system of tonality had arisen [illegible] and instrumental [illegible]. Such were the elements placed at the disposal of the Neapolitan composer. Feeble as regards his physical constitution, his soul alone possessed energy [illegible]. His Stabat Mater is consequently [illegible] grandly developed [illegible] the powerful effect of choruses [illegible] all the vocal portion, while the orchestra consists of only two violin parts, a tenor and a bass. [illegible] The work [illegible] the other. It seems as though Mary's [illegible]. When [illegible] the Stabat of Pergolese [illegible] moved [illegible] we well deserved [illegible] the influence of a [illegible].

Although Haydn's talent does not shine so much [illegible] in his church music as in his instrumental work, he was happily inspired in his Stabat Mater. The [illegible] of character which [illegible] He appears to have [illegible] We [illegible] the world of [illegible] the formula of the time about [illegible].

The least known of all the Stabats which I have [illegible] of the Marquis de Ligniville [illegible] whose genius was not inferior [illegible] Marcello, [illegible] His Stabat [illegible], Salve Regina [illegible] and a "Dixit Dominus," for four voices and orchestra, are all I know of his. Looking at his subject from a point of view very [illegible] to that of the other composers I have named, the Marquis de Ligniville did not endeavor to portray sentiments above human nature, nor to make us [illegible]. What he wished to express was the [illegible] tenderness for God expiring on the cross, and we must confess that he has succeeded admirably. Three voices, sometimes all similar, as in the first verse, sung by three sopranos, and as in "Quae moerebat et dolebat," for three contralti, and sometimes mixed, for soprano, tenor, and bass, or for soprano, contralto, and bass, as in the other verses, three voices, I say, without accompaniment of any kind, are sufficient for the [illegible] of this [illegible] composition to produce the most touching expressions. The Marquis [illegible] the form of [illegible] but these [illegible] which [illegible] injure the expression of the words.

Regarding his subject from the same point of view as the Marquis, [illegible] a work [illegible] more powerful resources for the production of effect, [illegible] accompanied by an orchestra. The [illegible] a few words under consideration [illegible]. Though known only to [illegible] and perhaps never performed, this composition is worthy of the greatest [illegible].

One of the most powerful geniuses of the [illegible] century, Rossini, wrote a Stabat. It [illegible] under the form of an oratorio [illegible]. In [illegible] resources, [illegible] To appreciate properly the [illegible] of the work we must look at it from his point of view [illegible] the church [illegible] chance of forming a very erroneous judgment of it. [illegible] richness of [illegible] "Stabat Mater" [illegible] the quartet "Quando corpus" [illegible] Stabat Mater [illegible] among his [illegible] works.

FETIS, Sen.

Pitch.

(From the London Musical World.)

"Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" Mr. [illegible] in the Athenaeum, briefly [illegible] the [illegible] Harmonic Society, [illegible] pitch [illegible] the whole musical world [illegible] in a blaze. Not only [illegible] the [illegible] of performers [illegible] have been offered [illegible] "vibrations" [illegible]. As the [illegible] press [illegible] in words few and plain, what it is all about.

[illegible] the lowering of our present diapason [illegible] of course, being [illegible] proportion. The [illegible] There [illegible] independent [illegible] the observation of [illegible] parts of Europe [illegible] a French Imperial [illegible] Halévy, Auber and Meyerbeer [illegible] investigated [illegible] years ago. [illegible] in favor of [illegible] satisfied [illegible] Handel, Haydn, and Mozart [illegible] why the pitch has been [illegible] the effect produced upon [illegible] the [illegible] of concert rooms. We shall not enter minutely into his argument, because there appears to [illegible] fatal objection on the very threshold. The [illegible] will be, in [illegible] therefore [illegible] that the pitch has been always rising, that it must inevitably rise, and that the operation of setting back will be periodical. We [illegible] Mr. [illegible] the opinion of the French Commission [illegible] in the report. After an elaborate inquiry, the [illegible] both composers and singers [illegible] before the law of [illegible] the [illegible] brilliancy resulting from a high [illegible]. In support of this [illegible] which took place [illegible]. When the late Emperor Nicholas [illegible] an Austrian regiment [illegible] a set of new instruments for his [illegible] with an eye to [illegible] brilliancy [illegible] that every other [illegible] followed [illegible] the orchestral [illegible] compelled to [illegible]. Here we have a [illegible] brilliancy has done it all.

The question now presents itself—ought the pitch to be lowered? The balance of testimony [illegible] in favor of an affirmative reply. The French commission [illegible] Europe [illegible] agreed [illegible] majority of [illegible] prepared [illegible] therefore, [illegible] pitch is [illegible]. Here we come face to face with another question—What shall it be? [illegible] On the one hand we [illegible] who say "Let us adopt the normal diapason of France. [illegible] uniformity, with what will very soon be the common diapason of the European Continent." In opposition to this there are others who [illegible] the adoption of the French pitch [illegible] because of the [illegible] cost. New wind instruments would be [illegible] at a very large cost, [illegible] with the Continent, the difference between half-a-tone reduction [illegible] and the French pitch being [illegible] the plan, on the contrary, [illegible]. In [illegible] and economy of a half tone reduction [illegible] Mr. [illegible]. We give [illegible] full half-tone [illegible] the material [illegible] of the facility [illegible] of Mr. [illegible] Choral Society's performance [illegible] half a tone lower than usual. [illegible] The question, therefore, [illegible]. A matter of principle [illegible] we should prefer to see the French pitch adopted. Uniformity [illegible] desirable [illegible] difference between [illegible] French pitch [illegible] advocated by Mr. [illegible] which [illegible].

A good deal has been said about the effect of a lowered diapason upon performances. This, also, was tested on Wednesday night by Mr. Mapleson's [illegible], and we must candidly own that at the outset our impression was decidedly unfavorable. The [illegible] flat to an unexpected degree. But as we did not succumb to the depression, the result proved all, and before the close we were inclined to regard the experiment as a success. Certain of the wind instruments—trumpets and horns, for example—came out with increased power, the chorus gained in solidity and lost much of the [illegible] [illegible] on former occasions, and the principal singers were able to give their high notes with [illegible] [illegible]. So far the trial [illegible] [illegible] to hand [illegible] [illegible] desirable at present. Our hope is that musical people will work together in the matter as far as possible, and eventually come to some general understanding, instead of the present movement [illegible] result in a general [illegible], every conductor [illegible] his own pitch, placing his faith in, and [illegible] by a certain number of vibrations in which nobody else believes.

Christmas Music.

COMPOSITIONS, as we [illegible] are rarely acquiring [illegible] repute. This remark applies to works on passing [illegible], and [illegible] alike. Dryden says somewhere [illegible] of his dedications the [illegible] character of [illegible] the garden that [illegible] of April a [illegible] when they please but [illegible] the god [illegible] on them and [illegible] [illegible] which they are not able [illegible] [illegible] which puzzling [illegible] [illegible] own, he accounts for the [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. And as with panegyric. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] upon the [illegible] [illegible] canvas of an historical incident, [illegible] of its occurrence, possesses but worth which belongs to [illegible]. Imitation of the same subject in which the [illegible] and consequently the imagination, of [illegible] brought into play [illegible] this with commemorative poetry and painting, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] popularity than either. Of all [illegible] composed there are but two—"God [illegible] Queen" and "Gott erhalte den Kaiser"—which still fulfil the object for which they were originally intended. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by a [illegible] of being unpersonal. Ballads and music of all kinds, [illegible] marches, songs, [illegible] and overtures, composed for special occasions, are neglected and forgotten as soon as they have served their use.

Such, however, is not the case with certain music, [illegible] has become identified with certain recurring events. Carols, for instance, are associated with Christmas, although they are equally appropriate to many other festivals of the church. They seem to have [illegible] [illegible] and some magic association with the anniversary of the Nativity. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from the time of year at which these songs are now sung.

According to Dr. Rimbault, "the practice of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] may be traced back to the [illegible] of the early Christians." This custom is referred to both by [illegible] and St. Jerome and Pliny the younger in his letter to Trajan respecting the Christians [illegible]. They were wont to meet together on a stated day before it was light and sing [illegible] [illegible] to Christ as to God. The term carol, continues Dr. Rimbault, appears originally to have signified songs intermingled with dancing, a sort of [illegible] [illegible], and is used in that sense in "Le Roman de la Rose," and by Chaucer and other old writers. It was afterwards applied to festive songs, and those became prominent during Christmas [illegible] [illegible] for a long time [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sung during that feast. Then again, the melody known as the "Christmas Hymn," although of [illegible] origin, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] church [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] but is common [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. No more [illegible] [illegible] is made by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by the pure and simple melody, [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] of old Sermons, and recalling [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the past.

But music written [illegible] for this [illegible] season affords an exception to the observations I have made on music composed for special occasions. Christmas [illegible] of any importance [illegible] [illegible] very scarce. I do not, of course, allude to carols and hymns, which are plentiful. By Christmas music I mean such musical compositions as are composed in importance as Corregio's "Night," Raphael's "Holy Family," and other celebrated paintings. Musical works of that standard of excellence having reference to the Nativity are rare.

Handel's "Messiah" stands first on the list, although not composed expressly as such, it is Christmas music in every sense of the word. It is so well known that any description of it here would be quite superfluous. There is, however, a circumstance connected with the [illegible] pastoral symphony, that is worth notice. It has been frequently asserted that Handel was indebted for the subject of this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. "But singularly enough," says an author [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "all those who have examined the original MS. of the Messiah have concluded the very point which [illegible] be question." Over the pastoral symphony [illegible] [illegible] has written the word "Pifa," an abbreviation of Pifferari [illegible] [illegible] which at once [illegible] [illegible]. During the festivities of Christmas and of the New Year at Rome, the Pifferari, or Calabrian peasants perform a kind of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to the principal shrines of the Virgin. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] from century to century [illegible] the [illegible] of the Romans [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. This [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of several [illegible] in [illegible] was probably that listened to by Handel when he was at Rome in 1709, and afterwards [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Next comes a Christmas [illegible] by Sebastian Bach, one of the finest compositions of the old contrapuntist. It is a sacred [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] of the whole. The text, [illegible] from the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] St. Matthew [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] has been [illegible] by the German poet. Although [illegible] that which has been designated [illegible] [illegible] music the expression of joy and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] throughout the work which [illegible] [illegible] has [illegible] writing than might be expected from a master whose specialty was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the art.

No [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] pieces out of the sixty [illegible] of which the Christmas oratorio consists, were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] other compositions of his own—an example followed by Handel some [illegible] years later when writing the "Messiah." The different [illegible] of the oratorio are intended for performance on [illegible] [illegible] succeeding Christmas-tide. The work itself is a remarkable instance of the fate of occasional music, being [illegible] [illegible] its native land and nearly unknown elsewhere. One or two of the detached pieces are sometimes performed in the German churches, especially the chorale to which a note is added by C. Ph. E. Bach, to the effect that the work was composed in 1734, in the fiftieth year of the musician's age. The oratorio has within the last few years, been published by the Bach Society of Berlin in full score and in a form [illegible] [illegible] to the publications of the London [illegible] Society.

A sacred cantata [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "L'Enfance du Christ," by Hector Berlioz, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] yet been universally accepted. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and grand [illegible] character of his music (if such a word can be applied [illegible]) [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for the great [illegible] of the composer as a master of the art of instrumentation.

There is no [illegible] [illegible] capable of [illegible] the works of others by the [illegible]—no more able [illegible] [illegible] Hector Berlioz [illegible] [illegible] composer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The cantata, "L'Enfance du Christ," [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] into three parts. Part I. [illegible] Herod's [illegible]. Part II. The Flight into Egypt. Part III. The Coming to Saïs. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] vague and [illegible] so profound or so unintelligible as to be beyond the power of an ordinary mind to understand, is a fair type of the prevailing character of the whole work. To borrow a comparison from the sister art, the outlines of the music lack precision, and the effect produced is unfavorably bewildering and unsatisfactory.

The text of the sacred trilogy has been translated from the French by Mr. Chorley, whose English version is called "The Holy Family." Considering its subject, and the reputation of the composer for classic severity, some of the stage directions for performance are, to say the least, remarkable. Thus, in scene [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the door of which should be left open," and further on "the door of the room is to be closed." Then it is said, "if the work [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the chorus should be placed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] before them. [illegible] should be far down on the level of their [illegible] [illegible] the beginning of the [illegible] in order that by [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the sound may be softened. Further on the chorus [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] them from out in the [illegible] [illegible] produce the [illegible] [illegible] possible. That such a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] by a composer, shows [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the work. They are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], and [illegible] inconsistent with the [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] Hector Berlioz so deservedly enjoys.

Amongst the English musicians who have composed [illegible] and other pieces for Christmas [illegible] [illegible] Purcell, Gore Ouseley, Hopkins, Hatton and others. A [illegible] collection of these [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Musical Times. They are [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Gounod has [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the form of a chorus and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] specimen of his peculiar style of harmony and [illegible] effects.

[illegible] Christmas music is even scarcer than that of a [illegible] character. The sacred festival has not been chosen as the subject for an elaborate musical work except [illegible] Macfarren who [illegible] cantata called "Christmas," consisting of choruses, songs, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] English [illegible] [illegible] the jollity of Merry England at this season of the year. The poem of the cantata is by John Oxenford and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of healthy strength and genuine sentiment, [illegible] expressed. One of the principal features of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a chorus in F [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of which [illegible] [illegible] old carol arranged [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] all [illegible] [illegible], and then in simple harmony—[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the same [illegible] would do [illegible] [illegible]. When the [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] which goes on in common time. Nothing can be more effective than the contrast [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] all the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible]. Of the songs [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. The [illegible] choral [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the song. On the other hand [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] a very gem of inspiration—"a thing of beauty and a joy forever" to all who take delight in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] may not be so [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of Offenbach. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the same word. A [illegible], [illegible] [illegible], purely English in its nature, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] close. The work [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] symphony. As an important specimen of secular Christmas music, it would alone, and as combining [illegible] excellence with the elements of nationality, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] English composer but Macfarren [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

In this [illegible] we have [illegible] [illegible] two [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible]. Placing Handel on the topmost [illegible] of one as [illegible] [illegible] Bach and then, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Hector Berlioz, from whose position in the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. On the other [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Macfarren [illegible] the most prominent position [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] on the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Christmas [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], all [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] merry season [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. fore and what noise they make, nor how appropriate or otherwise is the clamor raised. Some in the churches are ambitious, and disdaining the simple tunes so well known, and so fine in their congregations, give forth new-fangled compositions of their own, in contempt of the churches of [illegible] all the works of good harmony; some in the theatres set their fiddles to play vulgar songs and horrible medleys, which distract the ears of many and degrade the taste of all. More terrible still, those in the streets scatter [illegible] neighborhoods with the most discordant notes at the dead of night. There, now and all [illegible] art, [illegible] is worthy of being called Venetian music.

Monday Popular Concerts.—Of the concerts since Christmas we find a resume in the Saturday Review, Jan. 31, from which we take the following:

The return of Herr Joachim, whose yearly visit is now the most interesting event of the London musical season [illegible] possible, excited greater enthusiasm than at any former season. A host of display— like Franz Liszt the pianist, [illegible] dazzle Il Maestro and Tausig [illegible] would, on Paganini likewise, [illegible] an occasion [illegible] of the first appearance before a London public would have induced the director of the concerts at which he was to appear to arrange the programme that the virtuoso should be a [illegible] all [illegible] the music nothing. But Herr Joachim is made of different stuff. [illegible] only [illegible] has been selected for his [illegible] (we must use a French term) one of those divine quartets by Mozart, and as some of those [illegible] quartets by Haydn in which the [illegible] passages [illegible] Beethoven [illegible] the only way [illegible] Schumann's [illegible] quartet in C of Mozart, and [illegible] of Haydn's quartets in the key of E flat. And how Herr Joachim [illegible] we shall no more attempt to describe than we shall attempt to describe the extraordinary enthusiasm with which he was received by an audience that crowded St. James's Hall in every part. But the quartets were not the only performances of Herr Joachim. He also played with Miss Arabella Goddard the last, the most original and the most beautiful of the ten sonatas composed by Beethoven for pianoforte and violin—the one in G (Op. 96). So perfect a [illegible] executed by both artists—and so [illegible] ever harmonized Miss Goddard being no less consummate a musician [illegible] than Herr Joachim [illegible] that they [illegible] charmed all in by the music and the performance [illegible] to the end. Not the least remarkable feature of this interesting concert was Herr Goldkorf's performance of Schubert's solo sonata in D, one of the those below which Schubert's [illegible] Schubert's genius [illegible] have been greater than Schubert—was last [illegible]. Here again came forth the irrepressible musical love of the time, and [illegible] power not to be denied.

Herr Joachim's two other appearances have been no less interesting than his first. At the second he led Cherubini's fine quartet in E flat. Two of the only three works of the kind [illegible] presented from the [illegible] of Halm: Les Deux Journées, Faniska, and other dramatic masterpieces [illegible] to speak of chamber music that few but the highest masters have [illegible] Cherubini [illegible] composers [illegible]. The quartet of the [illegible] of which we are indebted to the [illegible] of research which has [illegible] the Monday Popular Concerts, was readily admitted [illegible] the charmed circle [illegible] by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, an [illegible] being [illegible] to Spohr. So, not long hence [illegible] be hoped may be admitted in fellow quartets in D minor and C [illegible]. Cherubini is one of the few really grand musicians, and whatever he wrote merits consideration and respect. Herr Joachim has also introduced for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts Mozart's most graceful quartet in B flat, one of the three written expressly for the Court of Berlin, [illegible] there was a [illegible] the composer's own heart. He has led, too, the second quartet in E minor of Mendelssohn—the second of the [illegible] of which the one in D [illegible] already [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] thoroughly Mendelssohnian of [illegible] where [illegible] effect, being [illegible] readily [illegible]. But perhaps that [illegible] we have [illegible] the great Hungarian violinist is [illegible] in his making the general public acquainted with J.

S. Bach's [illegible] violin concerto in A minor, which he played at the most recent concert—with accompaniments of double string quartet, an accompaniment quite strong enough for Bach's music—in a style as perfect as Bach himself could possibly have contemplated. That Herr Joachim knew his audience was proved by the result. No work has been more earnestly welcomed since the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted; and never was a more unanimous encore awarded to any piece of music than that which followed the finale of Bach's concerto,—finale in nine-eight measure, with a theme in the gigue style, of which Bach and Handel have left so many [illegible] [illegible] and considerably [illegible] distinguished from the ordinary dance movement often met with at the end of their artwork suites.

At the same concert M. Charles Hallé made his first appearance for the season, playing Schubert's pianoforte sonata in A major (which he had already played in St. James's Hall) with his wonderful accuracy and neatness [illegible] ever since in 1862 he first paid England the homage of a visit. This work is one of the three sonatas Schubert intended to dedicate to Hummel, but which Schubert dying [illegible] Vienna publisher Diabelli [illegible] wished to Schumann (then an adroitly [illegible] critic) and which Schumann would never [illegible] [illegible] These [illegible] Schumann was [illegible] accounts for [illegible] the [illegible] period of that composition. M. Hallé also joined Herr Joachim in Beethoven's last sonata, C major, Op. 30—a capital performance on both hands.

Leipzig.—The eleventh Gewandhaus Concert took place on New Year's Day. The programme included among a few compositions [illegible] Lobgesang, a Aria and Mozart's Symphony in C with [illegible] Fugue. Herr [illegible] performed the first movement from [illegible] Concerto of [illegible] and the [illegible] of Ernst, Mme. [illegible] the vocalist.—The General Musical [illegible] of Germany [illegible] to pay a tribute of respect to the late [illegible] Franz [illegible] [illegible] Scott from Dresden [illegible] [illegible] of the deceased and [illegible] arranged by Mohr [illegible] Feste [illegible] Gott" arranged by [illegible].

Eighth Symphony Concert. The programme this time was peculiar,—perhaps too uniformly (through the larger half) of that romantic we say [illegible] associate with Gade's Symphonies and these two Overtures by Mendelssohn and Bennett.

Overture. "The Hebrides,"	Mendelssohn.
Symphony, in A major, (No. 3), (first time), Introduction and Allegro—Andante—Scherzo and Finale.	Gade.
Overture, "The Naiads,"	Bennett.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in G minor, Allegro con fuoco—Andante—Finale. B. J. Lang.	Mendelssohn.
Short Symphony, in B major, for Strings, two Oboes, and two Horns. Allegro vivace—Largo—Minuet—Finale Presto.	Haydn.

There was strong relief to be sure, in the Mendelssohn Concerto, and a character as different as possible in the quaint little Symphony by Haydn. But that too suffered, as did the whole programme, by the accidental arrangement,—the retiring of a dozen of the musicians in the middle of the concert (to fulfil a distant engagement) making it necessary to place the smaller pieces out, as well as to change one of the Overtures before announced. Still, if not the most effect as we have had the concert was made up of choice and interesting subjects, which were in treatment, if not in order, happily presented.

There could be found nothing better in its way than "The Hebrides,"—no better Overture, no better work in any form, of Mendelssohn's. It was beautifully played and it was enjoyed in silence undisturbed. Mendelssohn's Island Dervises, (see our today's translation) tells us something about the trumpet call that rings so wildly in it now and anon.

The new Gade Symphony (No. 3 of the seven) has much of the same wild, sombre, Northern character with the others that we know (in C minor and in B flat). Opinions will be more divided about it than about the first one, which is over a favorite. We find it, as a whole, a very interesting work, and full of poetry, though not perhaps so smooth and happy always in the working. The first movement was to us less impressive than the others, rather monotonous in its swift pounding rhythm. A sweet and distant horn passage ends it—at first in slower measure, [illegible] Symphony—the art of holding [illegible] which forms the staple of the Allegro, whose speed relaxes now and then to give room for a musing episode in a more songful strain. The Andante, opening with mysterious subdued beat in A minor, has more greatly sonorous chords before it swells into a gorgeous fortissimo in A major, and is altogether an impressive piece. The Scherzo is charming, [illegible] a couple of quaint gay melodies together, with different instruments, so that they dance like one [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] in the fondest manner. The Scherzo proceeds itself and leads naturally into the Finale, of which the leading subject seems to be some old national or people's song, of a strong, heroic character. It is elaborated and varied with surprising art, and the whole movement, full of fantastical and bold effects, sometimes full of beauty forms, with the Scherzo, which is part and parcel of it, the most interesting portion of the Symphony.

The "Naiads" Overture was interesting to hear so soon after Bennett's other character-piece of the same sort, [illegible] beauty. Its exquisite finish of detail were as enjoyable as ever.

Mr. Lang made a new selection in the Concertos of Mendelssohn, whose first and last has been more played here, and by more pianists, than any other Concerto. But it stands ever as one of the noblest of the tribe, and it was well for once to have this in these concerts, inasmuch as we had no pianist [illegible] last year. Mr. Lang surpassed his own best mark hitherto in the rendering,—and that is saying a great deal. As nearly perfect technically and in point of taste as we can think of asking, there was a delicate individuality in the [illegible] which quite harmonized with that of the composer, [illegible] the whole [illegible] had a [illegible] which [illegible] seem that he was more than usually [illegible] by the music of his favorite master.

The quaint little overture Symphony by Haydn scored for so few instruments, simple so short and [illegible] in a cut, and in so strange a key —B major—or as the Germans say H-dur—is yet a real work of art, and fascinates the more one listens. It sounds almost like a Quartet of chamber music, with the strings multiplied as they sometimes do those things in Paris. It did not prove so be as short as was expected, owing to the unnecessary observance of all the repetition marks,—especially in the Adagio, which is most beautiful and only wearies by the doubling of its already frequent almost literal repeats. There is life and delicacy in the first movement, and the Minuet, as well as the Finale, are gems, clear and sparkling. The sudden return of a part of the Minuet in the middle of the Finale is a good fancy, not a grand inspiration as in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and the coming out again into the fresh current of the Finale is managed with fine tact. Only it ends there so abruptly and nothing more is made of it. This earnest little work, which shows the master's hand as clearly as a greater, was appreciated by many, but not at its full worth, coming as it did before a few of the works more richly scored.

Quintet Matinees. The opening performance of the new Quartet party organized and led by Mr. Bernhard Listemann was highly satisfactory and full of excellent promise. It occurred at Chickering Hall on Friday afternoon, Feb. 19. An audience nearly filling the room, and of the very best character, rendered a noticeably [illegible] interest in it as the renewal of that [illegible] element long missed among our musical opportunities. Certainly a real music-lover needs to hear more really Quartets. The Concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, few and far between, can hardly give us of one crafts. Besides it is well [illegible] to be able to hear more than one group of interpreters; a little emulation may be good for both. Mr. Listemann's party consists, besides himself, of his brother Mr. Fritz Listemann (second violin), Mr. Ernst Weiss (viola) and Mr. Anton Hekking (violoncello). In the rendering of their part of the following programme they proved themselves well matched:

Quartet in B flat, No. 6	Mozart.
Song "Serenade"	Schubert.
Miss Whitten.
a. Nocturne, Op. 1 / b. Rondo Capriccioso	Rubinstein. / Mendelssohn.
W. Carlyle Petersilea.
Song "Sehnsucht [illegible]"	Mozart.
Miss Whitten.
Quartet in F major, Op. 59, No. 1	Beethoven.

The familiar Quartet of Mozart was here scarcely heard before so smoothly, delicately rendered with such clear individuality yet such good blending of the parts. There was spirit and expression throughout, enough to atone for some slight imperfections. The leader proved himself, as we had confidently hoped, the right man for the first violin. With his ample execution for mere technical facility and the sure finish, he has large, firm, but sustained and marching tone, with command and use of all shades of expression, which he rarely exaggerates (unless now and then in a slight excess of portamento in a legato passage); he can infuse a life into his co-workers, as well as keep before them an inspiring standard. The middle parts also were excellent; the tenor rang musical in its tone, which is rather a rare thing; and Mr. Hekking, we all know, is a most finely accomplished among our violoncellists. Perhaps we may be allowed to say that a little more of positive force and vital power on the part of the latter would have secured ... in one or two of the agitated variations of the Beethoven Andante. That Quartet, also one of the old favorites, was for the most part very clearly and effectively interpreted. — Verily a good beginning, in so short a time for the four artists to become such a band!

Miss Whitten sang her two songs very tastefully, with charm and real feeling, particularly the lovely melody of Mozart. Mr. Petersilea played the very taking Nocturne of Rubinstein and the fantastic thing of Mendelssohn with all his brilliant execution, the aplomb and the unflagging energy of a pianist fully armed and trained for those unerring tasks.

Of the second Matinée (yesterday) we must speak next time.

(Crowded out last time.)

Mr. George Pfeiffer, a pianist of the modern Romantic school, who has been chiefly known in Southern Europe and in South America, yet who has made in these two past winters in New York gave a couple of concerts in Chickering Hall last week, which were not by any means so well attended as they deserved to be, although the pleasure given to the few was the first drew many more to hear the second. Mr. Pfeiffer is a son of the famous German pianist Mme. Pfeiffer, and himself has seen a good deal of the world. He is a modest, refined, gentlemanly person, who understands [illegible] makes no pretension to what is not wholly in his heart and power to do, and therefore is more enjoyable than most of the glorious virtuosos of the fine new school. As an executant, his technique is admirable, his touch remarkably clear and crisp and vital, and there is no lack of strength or delicacy. There is a certain individuality and freshness about all he does.

With the exception of Weber's Rondo Polonaise and the Scherzo from a Sonata by the same (in A flat) [illegible] his selections were of his own compositions of course pieces. Of the former an Etude in F and a piece called "Fairy Secret" had delicate charm and freshness. The latter were very cleverly elaborated [illegible] transcriptions of Kreutzer's "Nachtlager" overture, and themes from Ernani, Lucrezia Borgia, and Trovatore, and it is a long time since anything of that kind has given us so much pleasure.

The concert was enriched by well chosen vocal songs sung by the Ernani ... Rosa, whose smooth but rich tones were always acceptable and who sang with taste and spirit. Rossini's "La Promessa" Cannonet, and "Non è ver" by Mattei were the first two pieces. But Franz's "O, wert thou in the cauld blast," and Mendelssohn's "Song of Spring" well suited to her voice and effective manner pleased the most.

The concerts were of more than exemplary shortness, neither of them filling an hour. Mr. Pfeiffer will find friends when he comes again to Boston.

Music in Order

This Season. We have our series of Quintet and of Quartet concerts and now we are to have one of Trios — a medium with violin and cello — a branch of musical literature particularly rich. On Tuesday next, Mr. Ernst P. D. [illegible], than whom we have not a more conscientious scholarly and high-toned interpreting artist, will give, at Chickering Hall, a series of four such soirées; and every one who knows him knows they will be choice, with none but sterling matter in the programmes. For the first: the Trios are Beethoven's No. 2, in C minor, and Schumann's first, in D minor. For piano solos, Mr. [illegible] will play an Etude in A flat by Mendelssohn and a Valse by Hiller. Miss Whitten will sing songs by Beethoven, Mozart and Weber.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Third Chamber Concert next Tuesday evening. The novelty and chief point of interest in the programme is the last (13th) of the Quartets of Beethoven, in B♭, — the one in the finale of which the composer has realized the mysterious idea "Der schwer gefasste Entschluss" (the resolution that must not so fare), followed by a grave theme "Muss es sein?" and an Allegro "Es muss sein!" We must all go and try to solve the riddle.

Ninth Symphony Concert. (Last but one) — Next Thursday is the 4th of March, the day of the inauguration of the new President of the United States. Accordingly the programme has been slightly changed so as to show some recognition of the day. Besides it has been found impossible to get ready the parts for the promised "Alfonso und Estrella" Overture by Schubert. The programme now stands: Part I. Overture to "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; Symphony No. 1 in B flat (first time), Schumann. — Part II. Inaugural Overture (Weihe des Hauses) op. 124, Beethoven; Symphony No. 1 in D; Mozart. Wedding March, Mendelssohn.

Gounod's Mass. The Mendelssohn and Haydn Society are industriously rehearsing, getting ready to produce Handel's "Samson" (new in this country), and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at Easter, March 28.

Letter from Berlin

Dear Journal:— Somebody has said somewhere that in criticising a work of art one does not think so much of the amount of the artist's knowledge as of his self-identifying of ... [illegible] with himself. Not the ingenuity of a work, as it stands out, in half so-to-be the life and soul of the poet who made it, appeal most strongly to us. The mastery of skill and the subtleties of technique is but a means to an end, scarcely appreciable. Nowhere more than in music is this expression part and parcel of the artist's own life. How strongly we are reminded of this in Chopin. And do not the noble symphonies of Beethoven — especially the later ones — give us more than a faint idea of the world-wide struggle of the latter. He is fully expressive in those wonderful creations of his genius, the pyramids of orchestral music. A "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage" is the type of Mendelssohn's life and career.

We were reminded of this lately in hearing the "Paradise and Peri" of Schumann. The whole work is so imposing and one could not but recognize the genius of Schumann throughout. This, with his other compositions, "The Rose's Pilgrimage," has enough of themselves to place the name of Schumann on the list of great composers. Both of these lyrical themes were recently given, the "Peri" by Stern in the Sing-Akademie, and the "Rose" by Schwiegl in Arnim's Hall. Stern's chorus numbered about three hundred and was well supported by the Union Capelle. The former has been performed but once in Berlin and is quite a novelty. Like the "Rose's Pilgrimage" it is sometimes found to give rise to other ... large a chorus as the Stern society numbers, ... of course ... better calculated to give the hearer an idea of the breadth of the composition. Indeed for an orchestral accompaniment a strong chorus is an indispensable and sufficient back-ground to the many "Schumannische Unterphase" which would otherwise be as gems are in disorder.

Like everything else that Stern undertakes, the Peri was finely performed. The beautiful and romantic chorus in G major commencing with "Schmückt die Stufen" was exquisitely sung, and with a fineness and purity really artistic. The Messiah, on the contrary, given by the Sing-Akademie Society was a very unsatisfactory performance. Any one who had heard it from our Handel and Haydn Society in Boston would have pronounced the performance very inferior. And then who cares to hear the Messiah with a harmonium, without the organ? It is a fine picture without its frame and by the ... of the Mozart arrangement of the orchestral score, the land was but too evident, and the very ground-work was gone.

The Quartet Soirées — of pleasant memory — are even better than ever this winter. On the 30th ult. we had for the first concert:

Quartet, E minor, op. 59	Beethoven.
Quartet, D major	Haydn.
Quartet, A major, op. 41	Schumann.

The favoring of quartets ... is due to Concertmeister de Ahna and his [illegible], Dr. Rietz, cornist [illegible]. With each season the four give us more and more that ideal of purity of intonation and unity of conception. One rarely finds four men alike who have grown into such a musical oneness. The last movement of the Beethoven quartet, so full of humor and romance, was given with an energy and in the same time purity of tone and unity of interpretation seldom equalled and possible only through long acquaintance of the players. One of De Ahna's pupils, a certain Fräulein Friese, has recently come before the public as a violinist. The young lady is but fourteen years of age, and good ... predict for her a bright future. [illegible]

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The Sun does not mince matters in speaking out thus boldly about the last concert.

The concert itself was not an interesting one. The simple truth is that Mr. Ole Bull spoilt it. This gentleman has won the universal esteem by his very noble qualities of head and heart, but it is impossible for his most ardent admirers to claim for him any special merit as a composer. Being invited by a Society that has for its object the production of works of the great composers to play for them, one would naturally suppose that a man having the artistic reputation that Ole Bull has gained, would have chosen the [illegible] [illegible]

HANDEL AND SHAKESPEARE.—The name of Gervinus is a sufficient guarantee for the artistic value, if not the critical infallibility, of his work on Handel and Shakespeare. Whatever he may write on such lofty topics is sure to be eagerly discussed, and to arouse a powerful influence upon opinion. It is, however, entirely beyond our power to convey an adequate notion of a work which, although the author disclaims technical proficiency, presupposes on the reader's part a thorough acquaintance with the great masterpieces of music. We shall only observe, then, that Gervinus appears to maintain that the parallel between Shakespeare and Handel is complete, and that the latter reigns in the world of music with as absolute and unprecedented a sway as the former in the world of poetry. Rossini's "Petite Messe."

Translated from the French by A. A. Cowles.

One Saturday in the month of March, 1864, on my return home, I found upon my table a pencilled card, the only autograph of Rossini which I possess. Upon one side of it I read, "Chez le comte Pillet-Will, 12 rue de Moncey; I une heure et demie, dimanche 13 courant," and upon the reverse the words "Pour une personne. G. Rossini."

There was no mistaking! The celebrated man who wrote the Falcon and the Stabat had kept an obstinate silence, was lately convicted of having written a new masterpiece. I had the confession of the culprit in a hand very legible writing, although back-handed, and on some words a little tremulous; moreover, it bore his own signature. The great production of Rossini was his "Petite Messe" with solo, choruses, piano and cabinet organ. The master had composed it at Passy in the summer of 1863, and the first hearing was with a general rehearsal, at which he had promised to be present. He kept his word. Before the two hundred or two hundred and fifty hearers were fairly seated, he was installed at one of the two pianos, all ready to turn the page for M. Georges Mathias, having at his right Carlotta and at his left Barbara Marchisio, and the two Ferraresi sisters, a name for which they were indebted to public report and the jealousy of their companions. M. Jules Cohen, placed behind the master, held the bâton.

The hotel of the host of Moncey contains three grand salons, in one of which were the ladies, seated in a sort of amphitheatre around the piano and harmonium, while the men stood at the back of the room, crowded themselves into the four rooms of communication, or decided to [illegible] and see nothing, seated themselves at their ease in the two salons at the right and at the left. M. Auber who had arrived very unobtrusively and was seated apart from the others, had taken shelter in one of the most remote corners of the apartment, where his head resting upon his hand, he listened without casting a single glance about him. During each interval between the different movements he would chat with Marie, who stood behind him; but when the first chord struck upon the piano, the old master would resume his attitude of immobility and seek a retreat, his inward emotion being manifested only by the desperation with which he bit his nails.

Meyerbeer had arrived a little later and taken his place near Rossini. The light from a window fell directly upon his face, heightening the intellectual and powerful expression of his fine head. Between two doors stood the tenor Duprez with his frank, kindly face, and the form of a Hercules; while the tallest Arnold, near the author of the Huguenots, had the aspect of a mode[illegible]ed he Count Montalembert, near the author of La Dame aux[illegible]. During the execution of the Eucharistic chef-d'œuvre, Meyerbeer was no less demonstrative than Auber was self-contained. He stared at the ceiling, applauded noisily, and sat as uneasily in his arm-chair as Saint Laurence upon his gridiron. After the last chord of the Agnus Dei, he ran to Rossini, fell upon his neck and embraced him.

I have given a faithful account of the picture which I had under my eyes, but it would be a little more difficult to share my recollections and fix my impressions of the music. However, having been present at two hearings of Rossini's mass, if it has been possible for me to forget the [illegible] of its impression, I can, at least, reproduce the emotions of my heart and the resentment of my ears, recall the immortal work in its picturesque grand outlines. Memory is like a blank sheet of paper which the soul covers with sympathetic but invisible characters. It is only necessary to submit the virgin leaf to the action of a chemical re-agent and the ink will flash to forms. In all lines of the paper the words will start into life, color and arrange themselves in [illegible] lines from left to right upon the page. The need or the occasion, like chemistry, has its re-agents, and memory when questioned with enthusiasm will write clearly and rapidly upon the black tablets of the brain, the characters of the past.

At the two hearings of the work inspired by Rossini—and wherefore?—Petite Messe, the circle of select auditors was struck by the imposing grandeur of the Kyrie, the Gloria, and the Credo. The principal motif of the Kyrie reposes upon an accompaniment which pursues an obstinate design. The measured and solemn march takes at once a strong hold upon the imagination; we seem to hear the tramp of invisible feet, walking in the infancy of darkness and seeking to reach those mortal sources which cry "Oh Lord have mercy upon us!" It is beautiful, absolutely beautiful.

The explosion of the Gloria is like a powerful and dazzling sheaf of flame ascending to the heavens. In the Gratias, a quartette for soprano, contralto, tenor and bass, we have a fine burst of harmonies and make a home, piquant in their [illegible] specialties, exchanging and leading the melody in leisure. The Domine, a tenor solo, reminds one of that charming, though somewhat irreverent Cujus animam of the Stabat. The Qui tollis, a duo for soprano and contralto, opens to us the world of the angels. What melody, what sweetness! The variety of the severe style is worth some way a[illegible]ah—like Rossini opening his eyes in the paradise of Chateaubriand—"Are I on earth or in heaven?" I asked that seraphic half way. "You are on earth, gentlemen," I say, "but in that land where God placed his Eden and where the apple-tree of our mother Eve bears, not apples, but melodies."

The Cum sancto, which terminates the first part of the mass, is a fugue.

"Une fugue, ce n'est pas vrai ou comment bien dire," says Crispin. Ah! that is the moment of expressed character [?]. The very structure of the same fugue, sufficient to put Berlioz into a fury. Well disciplined in the grades of Rossini [illegible] tremendous [illegible] [?] because the Cum sancto, the grandest and most powerful page of his mass, a passage truly Michael Angelo-like. Over the storm of notes, raging, surging, muttering and tormenting each other, passes the breath of the master's inspiration and behold the immense mass subsiding, stilled and harmonized. To that vocal and instrumental tempest succeeds a murmur like the murmur becomes a voice, the voice a song, the song a universal world, ever expanding and going higher and higher until it seems to lift all humanity to the foot of the Eternal Throne. That fugue is the contest between inspiration and learning; it is victory at the mercy of victorious genius.

After the fugue I must name the Credo, which is written in very fine style, and the symphonic movement of the Offertoire, a sonata sparkling with gems of sweet harmony and sweet or grand modulation. The Offertoire are painted by an Italian. Again, what page like the Agnus Dei! Nothing is more original than the way in which the chorus comes in, after each of the three strophes declaimed by the contralto, the softly dying choral response, like a faint and far-off echo of angel voices answering from highest heaven the prayers of the unknown upon earth!

Rossini's spirited and swinging waltz which would fashion itself to my fancy without much caring to take so seriously,—how was it you name the earnest and noble spot of the work?—Who knows? I believe that I caught sight of it—that lies [illegible] a design of the accompaniment. The voices sing "Holy, Holy, Holy!" while the orchestra murmurs as Don Juan's mandolin, dogging his serenade to Elvira's maid, forced to subsist upon the wings of a polka. An indecent and charming badinage which prevents not the heart from rising nor the ear from understanding.

Madrigals.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

This Easy Chair has heard much good music far and near, but never any more satisfactory or so easy than the singing of the madrigals in Stuyvesant Hall. Long ago, in the days and nights of the Apollo, the hall below Canal street upon Broadway in which the Philharmonic Society first gave its concerts on its way of small things—the hall in which Caradori made her debut in [illegible] lands, and in which so much good music was heard, there was a madrigal concert. The tone music was quaint as one way of the old literature and the old music. Phillis, Corin, Daphne, Damon, Chloe—all the gentle life and the dreams of the pastoral poetry and the past, a life that never was—warbled and frolicked and danced: and I say such lover as we have mentioned ever forget that concert. He has gone about ever since hungering and thirsting for more madrigals.

They did not come; and it was impossible not to reflect that the young singers of the ancient Apollo could not be always young, and that time, which steals so much, does not spare the sweetest birds. The Easy Chair for one, gradually sank [illegible] hope of ever hearing that old music. It fostered many and many a tune for them in the music-hall and listened as "ears." The ancient Apollo has been so long gone that the generation of to-day knows nothing of it. But it was one of the [illegible] pleasures of Broadway to look at it in passing and say, "There I heard the [illegible]," as Quevedo looks at Park Row and [illegible], as if its past triumph were greater than all future successes, as if an [illegible] theatre were more real than [illegible] — "There I heard Malibran!"

A philosopher who said that none of his friends, so far as he knew, read Plato, also remarked that Plato was a man to be taught, and that there were a certain number of persons evidently read him. It is not so [illegible] as with Plato. The church of [illegible] does not become a fact. It may be [illegible] the Cate [illegible] the desert, but still the faith [illegible] and the service proceeds. Perhaps no form of music has been [illegible] developed [illegible] to hold upon human interest. And so it [illegible] that Arethusa, which disappeared from public view at the Apollo, did reappear far away [illegible].

By a pleasant fiction half a dozen lovers of music, [illegible] and [illegible] sat [illegible] Mendelssohn, not too much [illegible] single opera [illegible] and vocal music of the [illegible] and [illegible] forms, among which of course, the madrigal music was [illegible]. It was sung for its own sake, not for profit [illegible]. Some of the best company sang in [illegible] but they were [illegible] as a [illegible] Shakespeare [illegible] may be, for the [illegible] pleasure. And all [illegible] remembering and [illegible] old Easy Chairs were [illegible] upon the [illegible] the present generation [illegible] hearing of these old lovers, was singing here. Had their ears been [illegible] fine enough they would have heard through all the rattle of [illegible] and the [illegible] of feet, through the chill wintry air and the blinding [illegible] —

[illegible]

Such lovers attract all others, and [illegible] little groups [illegible] themselves, and finally [illegible] made themselves heard by the public as a madrigal concert at Steinway Hall [illegible] to Mr. James A. Johnson. Madrigals, madrigals! what are madrigals? asked the good public, which is familiar with cavatina, [illegible] and the rest of the opera phraseology, but which knew not the word which, from the form [illegible] should hang [illegible] an honest old English word [illegible] to be of Italian origin. Christopher Marlowe [illegible] —

[illegible]
[illegible] madrigals."

And Milton:—

[illegible]
The [illegible] to hear his madrigal."

Indeed it [illegible] especially English, but the authorities derive it from the earliest hymns to the Virgin [illegible] others from a Greek word meaning a [illegible] of cattle and so [illegible] a pastoral song. As such we have it [illegible] in pastoral [illegible].

The pretty programme of the concert says that the madrigal originated in Italy [illegible] the earliest of the kind were [illegible] about the year 1510 and not until 1583 was any attempt made to adapt them to English words. For a century it was the most popular form of music in England, and [illegible] Morley's Introduction to Practical Music [illegible] of the [illegible] of the custom of taking part in madrigal singing in well-bred society. "Supper being ended and music books, according to the custom, being brought to the table, the mistress of the house presented me with a part, earnestly requesting me to sing. But when, after many excuses, I protested unfeignedly that I could not, every one began to wonder; yea, some whispered to others demanding how I was brought up. So that, upon shame of my ignorance, I go now to seek out mine old friends, Master Gnorimus, to make myself his scholar."

How proud Master Gnorimus would have been of the fifty or sixty ladies and gentlemen who [illegible] upon the platform and proceeded to give the most conclusive proof of the manner in which they had been brought up! After Mr. Warren had played Weber's "Jubilee Overture" upon the organ they rose—Master Gnorimus, the most modest of men, concealing himself under the [illegible] the boy upon the piano, and instantly [illegible] one [illegible] and with the most delicate and [illegible] [illegible] they [illegible] and then [illegible] applause [illegible] young song, and when [illegible] and suddenly ended [illegible] delight [illegible] audience burst forth [illegible] of the sincerest applause, with [illegible] murmur of satisfaction. And so it went through the whole evening, the madrigals and the [illegible] glees, and Mendelssohn's "It [illegible]" It was [illegible] which every singer was a master—or a mistress, which, in music, at least is the same thing. There was therefore [illegible], no [illegible] no confusion but the tone was [illegible] and [illegible] the gentle [illegible] Every [illegible] was as fine and faultless as the loudest.

The madrigal music is often very elaborate, [illegible] of imitation and fugue. Often the [illegible] closely following the words. One of the most charming is that of Thomas Morley in 1595:—

"Now [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]."

Here too, the melody follows, and wanders, and doubles and fugues, and [illegible] until there is no more doubt and the audience [illegible] that [illegible] but be rewarded, that it [illegible] that delightful [illegible] all over again. The best of the madrigal composers—Morley, Wilbye, Ford, Orlando Gibbons—were all represented. As the Easy Chair looks over the programme the flavor of that [illegible] feast returns, each separate joy is remembered, and each [illegible] remembrance [illegible] slowly traveling the [illegible] reaches the [illegible] order. But when just before the end a [illegible] voices only into the "[illegible] of Pearl [illegible]," the melody [illegible] with the noble words of [illegible] was [illegible] of the [illegible] that the [illegible] so [illegible] not justify [illegible] heart that heard.

How greedy of the [illegible] all to the beautiful concert [illegible] to the end. It was [illegible] Easy Chair that remembered the madrigal concert at the ancient Apollo, and compared [illegible] would be about forty [illegible] century of which it had now heard [illegible] and [illegible] of the "Integer" will follow up the [illegible] only that those but heard also, it [illegible] —[illegible] calls, and [illegible] and that good [illegible] of the music hall. [illegible] happy [illegible] but is [illegible] story. It was pleasant to hear [illegible] Broadway and look [illegible] Easy Chair [illegible] of the [illegible] and to be reminded that the [illegible] so full from what such rills as the concert had [illegible] of sweet waters however [illegible].

It is the cheery part of travel that it teaches us how charming every land is, and how full of people worth knowing—people [illegible] feeling that our [illegible] not monopolize the worth of mankind. And [illegible] the world to that [illegible] New York [illegible]. There is very little local pride in the [illegible] there are very few local and [illegible] traditions. [illegible] lives in a fine house in a fine street, but his heart and his treasure are [illegible] among the hills. He does not [illegible] a city as a [illegible] to satisfy the Common Councilmen that rowl in the Park; but he gives an organ to that village church and an iron fence to that rural cemetery where, once released from Wall street, he shall tranquilly repose. Folly and mad extravagance and [illegible] and crime live also in superb houses, and are [illegible] conspicuous. Juvenal can scarcely say anything of the city that is not too mild, and Addison cannot smile severely enough. But how much humanity and heroism and self-sacrifice are here also! How much [illegible] would [illegible] It is modest, and refuses to assert itself. Horace Walpole sneers at Oliver Goldsmith [illegible] but Burke and Johnson and Sir Joshua knew him and loved him. Then they [illegible]. And Florence Nightingale as well as Cora Pearl? And the brothers Cheeryble as well as old Ralph Nickleby? And [illegible] years [illegible] the [illegible] may be [illegible] the finest ball [illegible] Alas! if there was but a Mrs. Easy Chair, how surely she would have heard [illegible] the [illegible] with her companion. "My dear, it was a very sweet entertainment." "Pshaw! Mr. Easy Chair for a sensible piece of furniture you are guilty of great folly. Is that all you can say for this beautiful concert?" "My dear, the concert [illegible] of the city and of human nature in general." "Very well, now," would that comely but impossible she respond, "now you are speaking the truth."

Franz Schubert.*

We hail this book in its English form as another act of justice to poor Schubert. Its appearance is [illegible]. The man's works after long obscurity have come out into the light and the world has found itself richer than it dreamed. Knowing the music, a desire to know the man was the most natural of sequences. Years ago when Schubert walked about the streets of Vienna, the people that met him [illegible] shoulders [illegible] about him. Either they passed [illegible] without notice, or merely pointed him out as a [illegible] and [illegible] told [illegible] latest [illegible] Beethoven. Probably [illegible] of Schubert [illegible] but never looked on with the [illegible] to so [illegible] it was. How all this is changed! Justice may have feet of lead, but she plods steadily on, and is [illegible] of [illegible] here. She [illegible] Schubert, and placed him high in the Temple of Fame, and the world [illegible] to [illegible] eyes. Now [illegible] in the man's personality [illegible] an interest in him is [illegible] while, as in the book before us, the [illegible] with whom he [illegible] There who knew and loved Schubert [illegible] in all this [illegible] —Mendelssohn [illegible] have been [illegible] of the world's [illegible] greatest men.

The life of Schubert is [illegible] Roof [illegible] and commonplace, as the world understands these terms. It presents no salient points which the biographers can make so many centres of interest.

"It is sad," remarks Schindler, "that we do not [illegible] to Schubert's life and [illegible] only a [illegible] which he [illegible] The [illegible] of his [illegible] too, which resembled the [illegible] further [illegible] a mere [illegible] which he [illegible] and [illegible] many [illegible] It must be [illegible] that his days glided away as well [illegible] be it a poverty and dying in poverty."

Besides this, Schubert's [illegible] and [illegible] nobody [illegible] study his character or [illegible] life. There is hardly an acknowledged great man without half-a-dozen Boswells [illegible] him at every turn ready to make a note of every [illegible] done or said. Poor Schubert had not a single Boswell and all we know of him is derived from the more or less vague recollections of those who are now assembled to find [illegible]. To make matters still worse, Schubert left behind him but scanty memoranda [illegible] and appears not to have written many letters [illegible]. We are thus shut off from the man's inner life by an impassable barrier, and his true biographer will be he who can best interpret the utterances of his genius. The real Schubert is not seen in the [illegible], who lived a very ordinary life and died without the means of burial; but in the genius who has given to the world numberless things of beauty, such as [illegible] "a joy for ever." An analysis of Schubert's music is the best means of his life.

We are not now going to examine either Dr. Kreissle's book or Mr. Coleridge's translation [illegible] [illegible]. The one is of more consequence than the book, and we [illegible] to find the latter bringing us [illegible] that we are not [illegible] as to the style in which it is done. Among these [illegible] we can read Dr. Kreissle's [illegible] chapters [illegible] on the personality of his hero, [illegible] and the world. The picture is not very charming, but there is [illegible]. Looking at it we cannot help being struck by the contrast between [illegible] the material surroundings on the one hand and the creations of his genius on the other. The former seem to have been of not absolutely [illegible]. About the composer's personal appearance Dr. Kreissle says:—

"He was small [illegible], low forehead, projecting lips, bushy eyebrows, [illegible] look which one [illegible] found at the [illegible] Churchyard. He was under the average height, round backed and [illegible], all plump arms and hands, and short fingers. The expression of his face was neither [illegible] nor pleasing, [illegible] Beethoven was the [illegible]."

[illegible] his personal appearance were [illegible] of the composer's habits and [illegible] of mind.

"One reason," says Dr. Kreissle, "for Schubert's [illegible] his long [illegible] the love of man. [illegible] peculiar [illegible] and [illegible] independence, [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] on the part of many well meaning friends."

He appears to have offended many of these friends by his [illegible] —

"If he [illegible] happy [illegible] and [illegible] evening, [illegible] lovely scene and pleasant [illegible] before him he would [illegible] had as speed for the evening."

In [illegible] society he was "[illegible] of talk."

[illegible] in the place his face became [illegible] and [illegible] would be [illegible].

[illegible] his own friends he was very different [illegible] and practical jokes, [illegible] laughing with [illegible] suppressed chuckle," and, we are sorry to say, [illegible].

"Franz," says his biographer, "liked good wine [illegible] refused [illegible] with water, and [illegible] head, it happened that [illegible] right sort of vintage was on the table, our friend would [illegible] and then rather become boisterous and [illegible] off to a corner where, out [illegible] his [illegible] there could be [illegible]."

There [illegible] to be in the drink had [illegible] Dr. Kreissle says, [illegible] Three [illegible] one side of his [illegible] prospect. Great are [illegible] who [illegible] the queer-looking character [illegible] for [illegible] and [illegible]. We are told that he was "a good and [illegible]," "high souled" and "free from all envy and hatred," "of [illegible] placed and contented spirit," and [illegible] character made up of tenderness and subtlety, [illegible] and melancholy. Unfortunately these noble features in his character could only be known to his intimate friends.

"In ordinary life," said one who knew him, "the spontaneity was only offered to a narrow few, and to those only on the [illegible] occasions, of convincing themselves of Schubert's [illegible] of soul."

Hence the world judged him by his [illegible] appearance, and it is little to be wondered at that the world neglected him. Poor, without influence, and overshadowed by Beethoven, Schubert [illegible] from all the gifts of nature, [illegible] of genius which, as is too often the case, stood him in but little stead.

We will here venture to indicate how the seeming contradictions in Schubert's character may be possibly explained. The [illegible] of [illegible] in [illegible] graceful fancy [illegible], and the evidence is given of the [illegible]. "[illegible] grapes of [illegible]" [illegible] forth [illegible] beautiful [illegible] the [illegible] upon [illegible] have been a beautiful creation of the Supreme Dreamer. [illegible] of Schubert [illegible] what can be gathered from [illegible]. The music [illegible] should [illegible] a Nature [illegible] of that great [illegible] refinement [illegible] beauty, added to more than [illegible] of [illegible]. None of us would [illegible] given to drink. [illegible] Dr. Kreissle, [illegible] man [illegible] [illegible] book [illegible] would [illegible] the [illegible] between [illegible] genuine biographer. He says:

"In the preceding pages we have pointed to certain features of Schubert's [illegible] so far as they [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] of his [illegible] from these we [illegible] every-day life of [illegible] average [illegible] of his character. [illegible], and of course, [illegible] pictures could have been made of [illegible] peculiar and [illegible] and we [illegible] of his [illegible] the [illegible] between the [illegible] life and [illegible] of the composer than we have done in this particular instance. Schubert [illegible] perhaps [illegible] of [illegible]. He [illegible] some of all proportion [illegible] like a [illegible] [illegible] estimate of the [illegible] concealed in the inner of Schubert's heart and spirit."

This is just what Dr. Kreissle does not attempt, and the result is as [illegible] an example of [illegible] biography as any with which we are acquainted. We shall hardly be expected to do what the doctor has left undone, but we cannot help suggesting that the contrast between Schubert the man and Schubert the musician may have been largely due to circumstances [illegible] of himself. We heartily agree with Goethe's [illegible]:—

"Instead of saying [illegible] in the creature of circumstances, I would be nearer the mark to say [illegible] of circumstances. [illegible] From [illegible] house or palace; [illegible] bricks and mortar are mortar and bricks until [illegible] make them something else."

The truth of this Schubert himself illustrated since [illegible] sat down to [illegible] himself an [illegible]. [illegible] There [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] much, the [illegible] which he held [illegible]. Let the reader [illegible] through which Schubert passed the poverty of his home, [illegible] the years of [illegible] the half-loaf of hope [illegible] struggle for fame and [illegible] a [illegible] public. [illegible] and [illegible] than Schubert [illegible] the house of life and [illegible] There from the [illegible] he had [illegible] his soul. Need we wonder [illegible] state of public [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible].

[illegible] hopes [illegible] Surely he, of all men, was tempted to [illegible] cares and disappointed hopes in wine.

We shall not even so sketch the life of Schubert from the details of Dr. Kreissle's book. It was not, as we have already observed, a very heroic life; for [illegible] and [illegible] it had little on us. Schubert [illegible] as a musician, [illegible] character as a man.

With regard to the works and treatment of the biography, Mr. Coleridge has made accessible to English readers [illegible]. He [illegible] and we will at once [illegible] our opinion that a more [illegible] life of a [illegible] than [illegible]. The author [illegible] in words left undone that which [illegible] he [illegible] would have [illegible] and [illegible] as a result. He is [illegible] of Schubert's life. Look [illegible] the [illegible] and finding [illegible] not only [illegible] but apparently common-place, he [illegible] up [illegible] he brought [illegible] of a complete record of the best of [illegible]. The consequence is a [illegible] of details, for a large proportion of which nobody [illegible] and the meaning of which [illegible] and [illegible] on the [illegible] a book [illegible] the number of its pages. Credit is due to Dr. Kreissle, however, for the pains he took to obtain the requisite amount of [illegible]. When Schubert was a student at the [illegible] he had schoolfellows numbers and [illegible] composers as a matter of course. With [illegible] of a true German [illegible] through the [illegible] of most of their lives. He tells about Joseph [illegible] Hüttenbrenner, Anna Milder, [illegible] Grassmann, and a [illegible] to [illegible] with a [illegible] for [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] to Dr. [illegible] should have [illegible] to have [illegible] Among [illegible] composer [illegible] to Schubert's opera, the history of [illegible] part of [illegible] "fresh notes and [illegible] now" for the [illegible] book [illegible]. We can imagine his delight [illegible] how to [illegible] and how he [illegible] upon the [illegible] of pages his [illegible] At [illegible] the story of the opera [illegible] length and [illegible] him [illegible] the Zauberharfe, the [illegible] and their [illegible] companions. [illegible] may have been fair for the [illegible] to his readers. [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] with [illegible]. Useful enough for purposes of reference, Kreissle's "Schubert" is hardly [illegible] in any other respect.

We shall not attempt [illegible] of Mr. Coleridge's translation, [illegible] good authority for believing [illegible] not so fairly successful. As to the English [illegible] the [illegible] reader can judge of this for himself. We are [illegible] in the case of a book which, whatever its faults, [illegible] the best [illegible] of Schubert [illegible] something [illegible] English readers [illegible] Mr. Coleridge's preface, however, must not be passed over. [illegible] those who have had a share in making Schubert's genius known in England, [illegible] Mr. Grove, [illegible] Mr. Manns, [illegible] Charles Hallé, and Mr. Arthur Chappell, but makes no allusion whatever to Mme. Arabella Goddard. The [illegible] Mme. Goddard has kept Schubert before [illegible] performances of his [illegible] and [illegible] Mr. Coleridge [illegible] should be [illegible] required.

We have now done with Dr. Kreissle's work, yet the best part of the [illegible] remains to be noticed. This is not the [illegible] however, a good deal could be said), [illegible] Mr. George Grove's appendix. [illegible] most interesting subject for a [illegible] article.

Tomaschek.

Mr. Editor:—As Tomaschek is less widely known than he [illegible] to be, a slight sketch of his life and works may not perhaps prove unacceptable to the readers of your excellent Journal.

W. J. Tomaschek was born in the year 1774, at Skutsch, in Bohemia. He was educated for the law, and was about receiving his final degree as Doctor of Laws, when Count Buquoy, one of the magnates of Bohemia, having accidentally heard the young lawyer's music to Bürger's "Lenore," thought it a pity such a talent should be lost to the musical world, and hence offered him a place [illegible] in his service as "Composer." Tomaschek had then time to devote himself entirely to his art; and, bringing the resources of a highly cultivated mind to bear upon the subject, he made the most severe [illegible] and critical study of music, examining and comparing all known systems, from the earliest to the latest, and finally constructing one of his own, based upon the [illegible], so rational, logical, simple and condensed, that we are told it would avoid [illegible] and [illegible] superior to all previously taught. Unfortunately it was never published.

Tomaschek lived chiefly in Prague. With the Conservatory of Music in that city he had no official connection, though the judgment of so excellent an artist was of course often consulted. His connection with musical associations was principally as follows: he was honorary member of the great Society of the Netherlands for the promotion of Music. Corresponding member of St. Anna Musical Association in Vienna, and honorary member of the great German National Association and [illegible] Art and Science, as also of the great musical Associations in Vienna, [illegible], and Lemberg.

After a long, useful, and blameless life, Tomaschek died suddenly in 1850 of a disease of the heart.

Although exacting and somewhat severe in his judgments, and impatient of all pretension and shallowness, he was a most delightful companion, with whom no man could converse without being attracted toward all that is truly noble and exalting in life and in Art. He never had an enemy, and seems equally to have won the admiration of those who knew him best. He left behind him many works, some of which were published during his life, while others remain in manuscript to this day, if indeed they exist at all. The following list of his compositions is from memory, and by no means complete.

WORKS NEVER PUBLISHED.

Two Operas. The first Seraphine, one of his earliest works, produced in Prague; the second a singular work, never produced.

Several Symphonies for full orchestra.

Several church works: chorales, motets and orchestral compositions. Several large portions of Faust: [illegible] &c.

About seven piano Sonatas.

Numerous Songs with orchestral or piano accompaniment.

WORKS PUBLISHED, BUT NOW OUT OF PRINT.

One Quartet for piano and stringed instruments.

One Trio for piano, violin and violoncello.

These works are said to be models of beauty of form and [illegible] treatment; but they are now out of print and the [illegible] plates have been destroyed.

WORKS PUBLISHED, STILL TO BE OBTAINED.

A solemn Requiem, vocal and orchestral. Op. 70.

A second Requiem, vocal, with accompaniment of double basses and violoncellos, Op. [illegible].

A solemn Mass in C major, Op. [illegible], composed for the coronation of the Emperor Ferdinand, when crowned in Prague King of Bohemia.

Another orchestral Mass in E flat, never published entire, only the separate parts.

Te Deum, for orchestra and chorus, Op. [illegible].

The Lord's Prayer, arranged for voice with piano-forte accompaniment, and ending in a fine fugue.

Many Songs. Lyrics of Goethe and other poets, with two sets of songs in the Bohemian language.

Two Overtures. One to Seraphine, Op. [illegible]. One in fugue style, Op. [illegible]. Both are arranged for four hands on the piano by Tomaschek himself.

4 Piano Sonatas.

4 [illegible]

[illegible] Books of Rhapsodies.

[illegible] Books of Eclogues.

The Allegri [illegible] di bravura. Op. 52.

Tomaschek was the first who wrote in the four forms last mentioned.

Those desirous of acquiring a knowledge of Tomaschek's style and power as a composer, are directed especially to his Requiem, Op. 70, a noble work, challenging comparison with the two most renowned the world has known, that of Cherubini for full orchestra and chorus, in C minor, and that of Mozart in D minor. A patient and impartial student of the three, considering all things, science, melody, adaptation of music to words and [illegible] effects, would not, we think, long hesitate to which to award the palm. The following are the among his most characteristic compositions:—The Missa Solemnis, Op. [illegible]. Nos. 4 and 5 of The Allegri di bravura, [illegible] 2 books, Op. 11 and Op. [illegible], of the Rhapsodies and many too numerous to mention of the various Eclogues.

These works are characterized by clearness and freshness, majesty, grace and energy, tenderness, passion and grandeur. However large or small the form, each whole is complete in itself. There is never a measure or a note too much or too little. Nothing can be omitted; for everything has a meaning. There is no mumbling of notes, mere passages to fill up a vacuum; though [illegible] these compositions require for their performance and proper appreciation, brilliant and conscientious artists.

[illegible] as Tomaschek possessed of course preserved him from many [illegible] of taste into which others of his day had fallen. We cannot [illegible] with Chopin, being constantly [illegible] by the search of novelty and novelty of effects à la Thalberg, and the mastery with which he moved through the most intricate contrapuntal mazes, reminds one of Sebastian Bach's wonderful skill in the independent and flowing treatment of combined parts. (Is our day it is the successes rather than the [illegible] parts which are apt to be [illegible] independent.)

Tomaschek was constantly [illegible] and finding [illegible] and his productions result in an noble [illegible] that every part dwells upon each care and love, and each minute portion highly finished, although of course, with all proper subordination to the general effect of the whole.

This tribute to the memory of a great man has been drawn forth by a sense of the just [illegible] deserved praise and worth. Let the world, if it must, ignore [illegible], but at least, [illegible] and the [illegible] of genius [illegible] where it is truly due.

[From the same, March 5, 1858.]

JOHANN WENZEL TOMASCHEK, born April 17, 1774, at Skutsch in Bohemia, lived in Prague and died there April [illegible], 1850. I find him [illegible] spoken of "as a giant second only to Beethoven in all that rendered Beethoven [illegible]," &c. His works, among which are sonatas, symphonies, [illegible] variations, masses, and other church music, two operas, a cantata or two, [illegible] trios and quartets, &c. [illegible] perhaps a hundred in number. He was quite a famous teacher in Prague, and his autobiography is a pleasant sketch with many anecdotes of his contemporaries, Beethoven, Vogler, Zumsteeg, and others. Of his greatness I certainly never dreamed. Mendelssohn once spoke of him to me without conveying any such impression, and [illegible] that and the exception of two or three performances of symphonies in Leipzig long ago, I found no account of any of his similar compositions having been played outside Prague and Vienna, where apparently they are all now forgotten. I know of notices of him in the musical journals from 1798 to 1850, which lead one to the idea that he was above and beyond the standard of the average good musician. A. W. T.

Leipzig.

The correspondent of the Western Musical Review ([illegible]) keeps the readers of that journal au courant of the Gewandhaus and the other concerts. We copy from his issue of Jan. 21.

At the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, Jan. 6, we heard a fine old symphony by Haydn (in E flat) and the overture and entr'actes to the fifth act from Reinecke's opera, King Manfred. Although his music is thoroughly modern in its mood, Reinecke has something in common with "Papa Haydn" after all, for he is very skilful in thematic work. The distinguishing features of the music to King Manfred, however, are its [illegible] grace and tender poetic sentiment, and the masterly instrumentation by means of which the composer gives [illegible] to his charming conceptions. Herr Brüll, from Vienna, played an original piano forte concerto, and two solo pieces (1) Moment Musicale, F. Schubert. (2) Scherzo-Capriccioso, Mendelssohn. The concerto contains many phrases in the modern [illegible] mood, and its graceful themes are not logically developed, [illegible] and cleverly wrought. As a pianist Herr Brüll possesses many fine points, but his [illegible] does not always do justice to his [illegible] conceptions, [illegible]. Frau [illegible] from Medea by Hardegger. [illegible] a little "overdone."

The Euterpe Association resumed their Concerts on the twelfth of January, producing Volkmann's [illegible], Op. [illegible], and Schumann's fresh and [illegible] B flat symphony. [illegible] the symphony [illegible] one of the best performances which the orchestra has given in this season. Fräulein [illegible] from Freiburg, was the vocalist, and gave [illegible] satisfactory interpretations of two of Franz Schubert's finest songs, Wanderer and [illegible] marked success in her first selection, the celebrated aria from Mozart's Titus. Of far greater artistic worth were performances of the Concertmeister Edmund Singer from Stuttgart, who played Mendelssohn's violin-concerto and a long concert allegro by Paganini. [illegible] refined expression and finished phrasing, and his bowing is smooth and graceful. [illegible]

The thirteenth Gewandhaus Concert brought Cherubini's stately "Abencerages" overture and Beethoven's grand symphony in F [illegible]. The overture is one of the Gewandhaus orchestra's specialities, [illegible] pieces and its performance upon this occasion was simply perfect. [illegible] Herr de Ahna from Berlin played the first movement from Joachim's Hungarian concerto and a Romance [illegible] accompaniment by [illegible]. He is a fine artist, [illegible]. Frau Peschka-Leutner made her third appearance for the season (i.e. in the Gewandhaus Concerts) and sang Beethoven's grand dramatic scene "Ah Perfido" [illegible] vocalisation. This admirable singer possesses a versatility of talent and education which qualifies her to appear in classic or sensation opera, or in the most refined Cantatrice, with equally pronounced success. Leipzig is so enamoured of the lady that her stay here has already exceeded by half the time stipulated in her first engagement, and this engagement has recently received still another renewal. In a finale from Weber's (seldom played) Euryanthe, Frau [illegible] Fräulein Thoma, Hass and Herr [illegible] sang the principal roles in excellent style, assisted by a good but exceedingly "rocky" chorus of boys from the Thomasschule, who could just barely hold their ground in the orchestral crossfire.

The fifth soirée of chamber music offered Mozart's Quartet for two violins, viola, violoncello and bass, [illegible]; Trio for piano-forte, violin, clarinet, bassoon and horn, Op. 11, by Beethoven, and Octet for violins, viola, violoncello and bass, clarinet, bassoon and horn, by F. Schubert, Op. 166. Herr Landgraff, of the Gewandhaus orchestra, distinguished himself by a delightful clarinet playing in the Mozart Quintet. Beautiful, pure, and unwavering tone, which he modulates with a mastery of all forms, from piano to pianissimo, and crescendo, and diminuendo, all coupled with a perfect taste, are the characteristics of his playing, which I shall be fain to hear ... [illegible] Reinecke showed himself the master in his smooth rendering of the pianoforte part. The grand Octet by F. Schubert is a highly dramatic and impressive composition, glowing with sentiment, and most tender and poetic fancies, the charm of which is only heightened by the subtle melancholy which hovers over all.

LEIPZIG (Feb. 4).—At the fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert Mlle. Camilla Schmidt, from Breslau, made her appearance both as singer and pianist, and was warmly applauded for her rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major, of the scena and aria from Orpheus, [illegible], and of two songs by Rubinstein and Gluck [illegible]. The orchestral pieces were: Overture to Die Zauberflöte; Spohr's overture to Jessonda; Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, Op. 38. Owing to the overthrow of [illegible] and the small proportion of her success in favor of [illegible], Herr R[illegible] has been appointed leader in the [illegible]. The Musikverein, the oldest firm of [illegible] celebrated the 150th anniversary of its existence. It was founded, in 1719, by Bernhard Christ. Breitkopf, of Klausthal. In 1745 Johann Gottlob Immanuel Breitkopf succeeded and completed [illegible]. The catalogue of the firm now comprises 11,000 numbers, among which are some works which have been set down, as well as the complete edition of Beethoven.

(Feb. 20.) A new Symphony (No. 140 in C major, No. 1) by Herr Raff was produced under the direction of the composer, and was warmly received at the fifteenth Gewandhaus Concert. At the conclusion of the Symphony Herr Raff was recalled. Herr Japha performed Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and was much applauded.—Concert of the Paulinergesangverein: Overture to Coriolan, Beethoven; choruses for male voices, Schumann, Rubinstein, and Mendelssohn; Harold the Harp for solos, male chorus and orchestra, Ed. Kretschmer, etc.

DRESDEN.—Herr R. Wagner's last work, Die Meistersinger, was produced a short time since before an audience filling every nook and corner of the house. A [illegible] finely and artistic and result that has been done for Weber's successor here nothing was ever so [illegible] for the [illegible] of fresh, spontaneous melody in the work. Herr Degele, as [illegible], Herr Schmitt, Herr Bachmann, as Walther, and Herr Scaria, as Hans Sachs, covered themselves with glory, and were repeatedly recalled. Herr R. Wagner directed the rehearsals, but left Dresden before the performance. There is a report going the round of the German papers that the great Zukunftler of the Future has had a desperate quarrel with his Royal Patron, the King of Bavaria. So much the worse for the latter, if the report be true. The management of the Theatre Royal has just published a regulation by which any member of the company singing in [illegible] or [illegible], after singing in any concerts not given by the management, or in a private party, shall forfeit a whole month's salary.

BRUNSWICK.—Concert of the Association for Classical Sacred Music: Chorale, Præstorius; Motet, Palestrina; Ricercare for Organ, [illegible]; Toccata in F major for Organ Solo, Cantata [illegible] Bach; Toccata and Fugue for Organ, Eberlin; Fourth [illegible] Hymn for Soprano, Mendelssohn, and Fugue on the name "Bach" (Op. 60 No. 1), Schumann.

MUNICH.—During the summer, the stage at the Theatre Royal is to be rebuilt, for the performance, in autumn, of Rheingold, the prelude to Herr R. Wagner's Nibelungen Trilogy. The scenic difficulties in the work are said to be somewhat tremendous.

DÜSSELDORF.—Meyerbeer's Africaine has been produced very splendidly, and, as a matter of course, has proved exceedingly attractive.—The following are the arrangements for the approaching Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, which will be celebrated in the grand "Tonhalle," or Town Music Hall; First day, "Judas," Handel; Second day, portion of The Seasons, Haydn, and the Lobgesang, Mendelssohn. Third day, Miscellaneous Vocal and Instrumental performance.

STUTTGART.—The "model" performance, got up by Herr von Wolzogen, of Mozart's Don Juan, took place on the great composer's birthday. The opera was given with recitatives and the original conclusion. The distribution has been made difficult, it is true, but managed very well with the [illegible], with the exception, the performance was highly satisfactory. The German version of the book was that published in the periodical entitled the Anger by Herr [illegible] in 1854. The eight new scenes are very well painted. The orchestra was in long covered with credit, and, in a word, everything and everyone connected with the opera were so [illegible], save the singers. These, with the exception of Mlle. Ubrich, as Donna Anna, and of Herr Hill as Leporello, were certainly not up to the mark.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN.—This was revived on Mozart's birthday.—The eighth Museum Concert was exceedingly interesting from the fact that the programme contained with reference to the years dating from the year 1600 down to the time of Sebastian Bach. The Eleventh and Seventeenth centuries were of course represented by an unusually small one (but wonderful) song by the members of the St. Cecilia Association, while the Eighteenth and the Nineteenth centuries were represented by [illegible] productions. Bach's overture in [illegible] formed a part of the concert, and Beethoven's mighty C minor Symphony concluded it. The Swedish violinist, Mme. Wilma Norman-Neruda, who had come here from Cologne, played Bach's Sonata and Mendelssohn's Concerto, being greatly applauded for each.—A few days subsequently the members of the St. Cecilia Association gave a performance of Handel's Solomon.

VIENNA.—It is now definitely settled that the new Operahouse is to be opened on the 15th May with Gluck's Armide, Mlle. [illegible] playing the part of the heroine, and Herr Walter that of Rinaldo. Nothing more is heard about the production of Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger.

London.

HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.—At the three subscription concerts, the following works are selected: Beethoven's Mass in C, Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream; Mozart's Requiem or Cherubini's Requiem; Beethoven's Choral Fantasia; the music to Antigone and Œdipus. Concert: Mass, Schumann; Schubert's Mass in E flat; Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, and Bach's Mass in B minor. If only a moiety of these are actually produced, the subscribers will have no reason to be satisfied. The choral concerts will be of the character to which lovers of part-music are so well and pleasantly accustomed.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.—Over 3000 people were drawn to the Crystal Palace on Saturday last, no doubt chiefly by a programme which included Handel's Ode to St. Cecilia's Day, with Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Cummings as soloists, and Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 10, and Spohr's Overture to [illegible]. The most successful part of the performance, one of the singing of Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, whose admirable vocalization in one of the solos elicited a well-deserved encore. Mr. Cummings was in very fine voice, and sang his parts with great care and taste. The orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. Manns, was most efficient, and the Crystal Palace Choir deserved more praise than has been lately afforded them.—Orchestra, Jan. 30.

Feb. 11. On Saturday a novelty was offered in the shape of an overture by Schubert, one of the relics brought from Vienna in 1867. The date of its composition is believed to be 1817. In character it is light, sparkling and full of melodious charm. Opening with a brief adagio which introduces an allegro vivace, wherein a simple and pleasing theme is ... distinctly worked out ... with the chief instrument in the eight time forms a fitting climax. At the close there was a general demand for an encore of the overture, a satisfaction which Mr. Manns at first opposed, but to which he ultimately yielded. The symphony at this concert was Beethoven's in A, No. 7, written in 1812, and performed in the next year at Vienna. It was performed in a manner consonant with its magnificent merit. Miss Agnes Zimmermann's performance of Mozart's pianoforte concerto in D minor was that of a cultured artist. It may also be noticed that she played the concerto as the composer wrote it, rejecting the additions made by subsequent editors. [illegible] was warmly applauded. Mr. G. A. Macfarren's splendid romance Clary Clare was played for the first time at these concerts. Miss Edmonds sang Handel's recitative, "But one her hope is lost," and "Where'er you walk"; and Mr. Vernon Rigby's solos were an English version of F. Schubert's song, "Rest our journey," and the "Slumber song from Masaniello."—Ibid.

ORATORIOS.—Handel's "Jephtha" was performed on Friday evening, the 5th inst., at St. James's Hall, by Mr. Barnby's choir, with an excellent band, and with more effective artists for the solo parts, including Mr. Sims Reeves, who naturally signalized his adherence to the modern pitch of St. James's, as opposed to the sharper pitch of the Crystal and Exeter Hall. A large number of the audience, who have a very fair taste, were doubtless pleased at no sticking at the sanguine use of the new diapason; but in so far as he announced, have been decidedly concerned to his marvellous rendering from the tone and varied parts. Mr. Reeves intimated his wishes that the change was only a step in the right direction; having got the song this pitch a minimum lower, Mr. Barnby may have to come down still further if he wishes to retain the "great tenor." We need not criticise Mr. Sims Reeves in giving noble expression to that when he chooses to put forth his powers. Of the other vocalists, Miss Banks and Madame Patey deserve commendation. Mme. Dowell does not improve. On the whole, Mr. Barnby's oratorio concert, where, as the programme will those of the Sacred Harmonic Society, accepting as a questionable basis of comparison and power every other had wanted to be numbers of the larger society is greatly exaggerated in its merits.

The performance of "Elijah" under Mr. Martin's direction at Exeter Hall calls for little remark beyond the recognition of Mr. Leslie's good promise. He sang of Elijah's arias creditably, and Miss Annabella Sand [illegible] also be named [illegible]. Some weeks ago we [illegible] the composer that Mr. Martin had lowered [illegible] a means of attracting attention. The event has justified our surmise. At his coming two concerts at [illegible] he has declared to return, as announced, on Wednesday, to the usual English pitch. This is simply trifling with the questions, the singers and the public. We shall be curious to note [illegible] Mr. Sims Reeves shall sing for the National Choral Society.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The following selection was given Feb. 8.

Septet, in E flat	Mozart.
Song, "O ruddier than the cherry"	Handel.
Variations Sérieuses, Pianoforte	Mendelssohn.
Chaconne for violin, Violin	Bach.
Songs: a. "Wanderer's Nachtlied" / b. "Hark! hark! the lark"	Schubert.
Sonata in F, Op. 24, Pianoforte and Violin	Beethoven.

The Chaconne is too well known by Bach, a first performance [illegible] the grace and amplitude always associated with this master, and at the close of the fine movement a burst of applause called for and obtained an encore. So again at the end of the larger and [illegible] the conclusion of the concert. Bach's method of fugal writing is well calculated to bring out the executive of the performer in alternation, as is in contrast, and from Herr Joachim. Mr. Santley gave the fine song that as sung was received with an encore, well suited to an encore advantage. Herr Pauer [illegible] was also one of these contents, and its pathetic and [illegible] is supposed to the composers' well-known and [illegible] interpretation. Mme. Schumann's playing was admirable as ever both in the Variations Sérieuses and in association with Herr Joachim in Beethoven's charming sonata.

The Athenæum (Feb. 20) says:

The Trio in B flat, heard for the first time in public at last Monday's Popular Concert, will not add to Schubert's repute since, which, by the way, stands in need of no strengthening. It is clearly an early work, and I must be admitted it is a spring of Schubert's grand style, with the exception of the episode of the andante, which almost approaches triviality. Were the latter a composer of no weight, he would probably com [illegible] from the vein of lighthearted poetry that pervaded it that it was the production of some Viennese musician, but he would not imagine [illegible] the name of the Viennese we did show. This was some of the pieces recovered by Mr. Grove and it had probably never before been publicly played. There was, therefore, a peculiar interest in Monday's performance. The Rosamunde [illegible] in E minor—one of the most [illegible] of Beethoven's [illegible]—was superbly played. Herr Joachim's enthusiasm, and something of his incomparable skill, he seemed to communicate to his partners. We have certainly never before heard so full and broad a tone from New Hall. The long quartet was listened to with devout attention—another proof that the good seeds played twice a week in the [illegible] at St. James's Hall is not thrown away upon them. In Beethoven's [illegible] Mr. Charles Hallé's facility was tested to the utmost and [illegible]. He was in an unusual [illegible] a sonata in the Op. [illegible] there may be too much of the tempo rubato and if Mr. Hallé indulged in it less he would do the composer fuller justice. In acknowledgment of the complete success of [illegible] that characterizes Herr Joachim we should mention that he played the difficult part in the [illegible] Trio, sung by Mr. Vernon Rigby. At last Saturday's morning concert Mozart's Septet was given, and Herr Joachim played the adagio from Spohr's ninth Concerto.

Music at Home.

Harvard Musical Association. The Symphony Concerts are drawing to a close. The ninth and last but one fell on the 4th of March, the day of the inauguration of the new President of the United States; and in honor of the occasion the opening and closing pieces of the programme were selected. (For the floral decoration of Beethoven's statue and the stage the Society must disclaim all responsibility; it was not authorized by the managers of the concerts and done entirely without their knowledge.)

Inaugural Overture: "Weihe des Hauses," op. 124.	Beethoven.
Symphony No. 1, in B flat	Schumann.
Andante, Allegro vivace—Larghetto—Scherzo—Allegro animato.
Overture to "The Water Carrier"	Cherubini.
Symphony in D, No. 1	Mozart.
Adagio and Allegro—Andante—Presto.
Wedding March	Mendelssohn.

The dignity of Beethoven's grand Overture in C, "Weihe des Hauses," so grand and stately and inaugural in character, was felt by all. It had twice before been given in these concerts—"inaugurating" the season both of last year and of this,—but its power and beauty were more realized this time. Cherubini's noble overture to the Wasserträger (or Les deux Journées), too, is beginning to be appreciated as one of the classical models among overtures, a thoroughly genial, masterly and charming composition. It has been played every winter in these concerts and, we are sure, is more welcome now than ever.

The first of the four Symphonies of Schumann, in B flat,—the only one that had become at all familiar to Boston ears before the Symphony Concerts were instituted—appeared for the first time in these programmes. It has generally been the most popular of the four; and, even in the crude attempts of our old Musical Fund orchestra, and while all we knew of Schumann here was hearsay, it did win a certain admiration among the more earnest and inquiring music-lovers. It was carried again once or twice a few years ago in the Afternoon Concerts of the Orchestral Union with considerable interest, though presented on too small a scale. And now after six years' brothers, the noble one in C, and in D minor and especially the superb one which has association with the Rhine and with Cologne and its Cathedral (the one in E flat) have made their mark it was high time to do equal justice to the elder. It is throughout a fresh and vigorous work, full of original and fine ideas, treated in an original and masterly manner. It is so clear, after you have heard it fairly rendered and been become a little used to Schumann's individuality, as some Symphonies of Beethoven; the interest never flags; its poetry and passion are uplifting to the end. The way the bold impulse one throws of the first Allegro, after a serious introduction, sets out upon its arduous heroic journey is most exciting to the imagination; and we follow with more and more zealous interest to the end. The man was all alive, thoroughly possessed with his own theme when he did that. The Larghetto, full of refined deep feeling is only less winsome than the other movements. The Scherzo, with its two Trios, in the first of which the rapid rhythm changes for a moment to 2-4,—short breathings of subdued harmony—is wonderfully original charged with unmistakable electric life. Richest of all and most exciting is the Finale, with the frequent return of that most cheerful, happy theme under so many changes of disguise. Every instrument has some charming part to play which brings it for a moment to the foreground in the gay and finely peopled drama. The work had been severely rehearsed, and the execution if not fortunate in every passage, was on the whole quite satisfactory.

For those whose taste, formed from youth up upon the older models, perfect in their way, of Haydn and Mozart, is slow to find itself at home in the more modern creations reared by bold architects of later date than Beethoven, of the farthest one of those perfect ones was offered and was no doubt keenly relished by them and by all, in the Symphony in D by Mozart,—by far the more important of the two in that key which are without a Minuet. This exquisite creation, new to our public until last year when it was once performed, can never lose its charm. It was perhaps the best interpreted of all the pieces in Thursday's programme. The stirring Wedding March made a sufficiently jubilant and popular conclusion for the Inauguration day, though, after the retirement of one or two of the brass instruments, it did not get its full effect.

Mr. J. C. D. Parker's Trio Soirées. The two already given, on the last two Saturday evenings, realized a programme and in execution the highest expectation which the mere announcement of so true an artist must have raised in any real friends of Chamber music whom it reached. But strange to say it did not more to have reached many, the audience a number was scarcely anywhere of so fine an offering. A handful of people listened in Chickering Hall to the following choice selections, most to their own edification, more that they felt the want of other sympathizers around them both for the artists and their own sake.

Trio in E flat, op. 1.	Beethoven
Allegro.—Andante con variazioni.—Scherzo.—Presto.
Allegro.—Finale.—Presto.
Song: "Adelaide"	Beethoven
Piano Solos. a. Etude in A flat.	Wolfgang.
b. [illegible]	[illegible]
Songs. a. [illegible]	Schubert
b. [illegible]	Mendelssohn.
Trio in D, op. 49	Mendelssohn.
Allegro agitato.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Allegro. [illegible]

Beethoven's early Trio said to have been composed before the other two of op. 1 wrote before he had left Bonn for Vienna (1791-2), is ever fresh and full of genius. The mere sound confessed in that fine rounded span. It was finely played by Messrs. Parker, Listemann and Fries; and so was the more difficult and unfamiliar first Trio of Schumann, a very interesting work though doubtless portions of it were obscure and strange to some. Our own impression of it is by no means so vivid as we could wish and we await a chance to know it better. Mr. Parker plays with more aplomb, more spirit and effect than ever before; his renderings were always nice and delicately finished. Now the fervor with which he always entered into such works, has become more apparent and he has his audience with him. The Etude, a fresh piece of the best period of Moscheles, and the Valse of Hiller were highly enjoyable.

Miss Whitten was the singer and though indulgence was asked on the ground of hoarseness, she showed such good taste in all attending her voice, that a severe betrayed the want of power or sweetness enough to record her true feeling and conception of the beautiful songs which she had chosen.

The second Soirée drew a large audience of more than [illegible]. It opened with a Trio in B flat by Haydn; a clear bright, cordial piece in three movements, as welcome as an old friend though we never saw that member of the family before. But I recognized the likeness and were glad. Much in contrast with its complexity of structure, is the intense feel valuing of the instruments (the Instance, giving the 'cello so much more to say upon its own account). As well with the work and boldness of ideas, was the highly dramatic Trio of Schubert, op. 100 with the [illegible] the Andante con moto, which closed the concert. It was very finely played. Mr. Parker's piano solos were the Adagio and Rondo from the Sonata by Weber, good contrasts severity of the Sonatas and impressions and of the brilliant vein of that imaginative composer.

The vocal contributions were by a lady of whom we had not heard before, Mrs. A. P. Brown, whose mezzo voice is a fresh, clear soprano of good power and volume, correct as true, musical and sure on good. But the style is yet too immature and gay like for so great an air (and recitative) as the Letter Aria in Don Giovanni. There was less of effort and it is chosen in the pleasing song by Mr. Parker "Touch for me thy magic string," and in Schumann's "Nussbaum."

The third Trio Soirée, this evening, must surely draw still larger audience.

Quintette Matinées. Mr. Listemann and party furnished another delightful feast of Chamber music on Friday afternoon, Feb. 26. The programme was as follows:

Quartet, in G major.	Haydn.
Scena ed Aria, "Softly Sighs the Voice of Evening"	Weber.
Miss [illegible]
Sonata, Piano and Violin.	Dussek.
Mr. B. J. Lang and Mr. B. Listemann.
Song: Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro"	Mozart.
Miss [illegible]
Quartet in A minor.	Schumann.

The two familiar Quartets, strongly contrasted were on the whole well rendered, the leader infusing into a little of his own fire into his fellows, although not up to enough. The Sonata by Dussek not merely interesting as a specimen of the piano-writers of that group (Dussek, Clementi, Cramer, Field, &c.) whose music is so rare a treat here, proved a charmingly elegant and graceful work full of refinement and spirit and with the tender so on the part of both Mr. Lang and Mr. Listemann these qualities were placed in the happiest light. It hardly escaped an encore.

Miss [illegible] wisely dropped the French version or perversion, of Der Freyschütz, and sang instead the aria "Sombre forêt" from William Tell. But it was taken so exceedingly slow that the mind of the listener will run forward and had to wait for the those to come up. Surely we never heard it sung, at such a tempo. The soft and heavenly melody of Tamino Ach, ich fühl's, es ist verschwunden, is not particularly suited to so bright and cold a quality of voice as hers, yet we were surprised by the good [illegible] with which it was sung!

The Quartets in the third concert, yesterday, were Mozart's No. 6, in C major; Beethoven's in A minor, op. 13.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fifth Chamber Concert, March 2, experienced a complete turning over of the programme, in consequence of the illness of Hans Alvin Ernest, who had been announced at the piano. Chickering Hall was filled to overflowing and the concert began with a capital rendering of the [illegible] favorite, the Kreutzer Quartet of Mendelssohn, op. 44, which was greatly enjoyed.

Then came Mr. LANG, who played sixteen little piano pieces of rare charm and freshness: to wit, three of the twenty "Eclogues" by an old composer (born about the same time with Beethoven, though he outlived him twenty years), the Bohemian Tomaschek, an account of whom, written for our journal one years ago we reprint to-day —partly for the benefit of the newspaper critics all of whom the day after the concert, hailed the Eclogues as the works of a new composer rising into fame! and charging them with an "affectation of Chopin" (!), and another treating them as imitations of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" (!)—which, considering the they probably were written before either of those models, would seem to amount to a confession that there is some genius in the Bohemian's eclogues. They were part of a collection of almost [illegible] upwards of piano pieces by composers of more merit than fame, sent from Leipzig by Mr. Ernst to the library of the Harvard Musical Association. Mr. Lang had a good [illegible] in the [illegible] of these. The Eclogues are all cheerful, naïve, charming pieces, after one pattern: the original subject returning after a well contrasted episode. We do not remember a dull movement among them all. The ideas are simple, but genial and original, the style of an older fashion, faith[illegible], rather akin to harmony, but showing a masterly habit of outline and expression. It is sincere music, simple and so [illegible] that we should think it would be excellent material for pupils. Mr. Lang had selected three of the very best among them and the experiment was not thrown away upon the audience, for they were [illegible] all one encore, with a quick true feeling of their character.

The next piece proved a puzzle to most listeners —Beethoven's last Quartet, No. 17, in F, marked op. 135. It was too much to expect that it should be fully comprehended or appreciated on the first hearing; and there are peculiar difficulties in the way of a clear rendering of a thing so [illegible]. It has moods so complicated so changeable, so fitful; where the parts cross each other often, the tones mostly stake, for instance, suddenly leaping [illegible] [illegible], and the individuality of the parts carried to the extreme of frank [illegible] self-assertion. But it bears a peculiar [illegible] of the movements, especially the second, [illegible], beginning in a sort of rustic, playful humor, which is soon crossed by harsh, strange harmonies; there is [illegible] all the grotesque and the [illegible], of sunshine and of mystery. But there is no difficulty in following the last movement, a perfectly continuous tempo, etc., [illegible]. A [illegible] the mood is playful and the [illegible] you they are the playful [illegible] of a deep and much tried spirit, and the development is strictly logical. The third movement (Lento assai e cantante tranquillo) opens at a deep, solemn, [illegible] style, that is most impressive; presently the rhythm is more broken up, and it is perplexing to follow. But that may be only has to novelty. To the last movement Beethoven has prefixed two short [illegible] question and answer, with words under them. One is slow (Grave): "Muss es sein?" (Must it be?) —The other is Allegro: "Es muss sein," (it must be); and over both he wrote: "Der schwer gefasste Entschluss" —the difficult decision. It is understood that the conclusion of the Quartet was written after the earlier movements had been laid aside some months; and possibly making a humor of necessity in the dark days when he was hard pressed by the petty wants and annoyances of life, he reluctantly set about to finish it. At any rate, the two themes are worked up in interesting alternation. We would not be so bold as to [illegible], to call the composition entirely [illegible], the [illegible] and [illegible] of a divested [illegible] of mighty genius struggling with dissolution. To us it is full of interest, though passages indeed do baffle us. We understand it is to be played again, and will be a test for us with a surer judgment.

Schubert's splendid Quintet in C, for two violins, two violas and two 'cellos, so rich and full in sound was [illegible] of the 'benefit.' It is a rare [illegible] always.

MLLE. G[illegible] DE LA MOTTE AND HER PUPILS.—This energetic and accomplished lady who for years has been the pioneer in Boston of the Cine system of piano forte instruction, gave a very interesting entertainment to an invited audience, at Chickering's, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 17. It was simply an opportunity to see how her pupils are taught and what they have accomplished, how they begin with a [illegible] a point they carry it. The [illegible] are so beautiful. After some happy remarks and explanations by Mlle., the exhibition opened with the playing of scales and simple exercises by the youngest, seated in pairs, at [illegible] grand pianos. And perhaps this was the most interesting part. It was pleasant to behold four youngsters so good foundations laid. What most struck us was the habit of precision, certainly and firmness of [illegible] all seemed to be acquiring, as well as the ease and neat with which the pupils [illegible] a wilderness entered into it. —Then came, by older and older pupils, the execution of the following ambitious, yet most creditable programme:

Duet, Kermessen Blumengruss	Hendel.
Air for Children by Mendelssohn
Rondeau	[illegible]
Allegretto	Mendelssohn.
Andante	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	Schumann.
[illegible]	Thalberg.
Concerto in C major, for three pianos	J. S. Bach.
With quartet accompaniment, by Mlle. [illegible]
March	[illegible]
Prelude in E, [illegible]	Chopin.
Nocturne in C [illegible] op. 32, No. 2	Beethoven.
Fugue, op. 35	Mendelssohn.
[illegible]	Haydn.
Prelude & Fugue in C major [illegible]	Beethoven.
[illegible]	Chopin.
[illegible]	Chopin.
[illegible] op. 67	Mendelssohn.
Ballade I [illegible] op. 47	Chopin.
Quartet, "William Tell," 8 hands.

Of course much of this music —belonging as it does even to the transcendental poetry of the art —was beyond the mental and emotional experience of such young interpreters; but one could not but be surprised and pleased at the general excellence of the rendering. The technical facility and power were better executed than the conception; but, taken all together, it was far more than one could expect. The Ballade by Chopin was indeed admirably played,— and that on by a substitute called in at the moment to take the place of another. The most satisfactory performances were naturally the smaller pieces, such as the Bach Concerto and the arranged "Tell" Overture. This is the best sort of culture, especially the Bach. In this way they become not merely piano players but musicians. Something less of Chopin and Schumann (if only on psychological grounds) and more of those and high [illegible] arrangements of Haydn and Mozart Symphonies for instance would seem more practical. But it is obviously an interesting fact and does credit to the [illegible] and the artistic tendency of Mlle. [illegible] Motte, that she can inspire so many young girls with the aim and will to master compositions of so high an order.

NEXT OF DUTIES. To-night Mr. PARKER'S third Trio Soirée.

Thursday March 18, the tenth and last SYMPHONY CONCERT, when the programme will consist of three great works of Beethoven, the Triple Concerto, by PERABO, LISTEMANN and FRIES with orchestra, the Seventh Symphony, the "Leonore" Overture, preceded by Schubert's Overture to "Fierabras."

A fortnight later (April 1) the Harvard Association will give an Extra Symphony Concert in aid of the Musical Education of the Blind at South Boston. Mr. LEONHARD will play Chopin's E minor Concerto, and Schumann's "Cologne" Symphony will be repeated —both at the request of many.

Musical Correspondence.

Historical Concerts in New York.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8. —Mme. Ritter and Mr. Mills gave their last "Historical Recital of vocal and pianoforte music" at Steinway Hall last Saturday afternoon, before an intelligent and appreciative audience. The last programme consisted of twenty selections from the old Italian and English schools, taken from the works of some of the most prominent composers who flourished between 1600 and 1700. Mme. Ritter brought to her task a fine fresh voice, intelligence and remarkably warm expression and uncommon linguistic acquirements. Of Mr. Mills's fine technique and spirited manner of playing, so well known and recognized, it is needless to speak.

Among the many pleasing novelties musically this numbers, nearly all of which were performed for the first time in public in America, many of them expressly arranged from old scores by Mr. F. L. Ritter (and some of the Folk-songs by Mme. Ritter herself) were Dr. Blow's elaborate and elegant "Song to Tea"; Byrd's quaint and [illegible]; The Carman's Whistle (1590); Scarlatti's Sonata and "Cat's fugue" (second) of which so many stories have been related; the lovely little canzona "Alla Trinità" (A.D. 1400); Marcello's splendid setting of the 8th Psalm —many readers will remember the effect with which George Sand wrote of one of Marcello's psalms, on the occasion when her heroine Consuelo sang in the Venetian Church; and a fine Sonata by Galuppi; Arne, Purcell, Pepusch, Pergolesi, etc., had also a place on this programme.

The Folk-songs were a fine addition, possessing great original and melodious charm, and most of them taken from the rarest sources. How superior are such genuine poetic songs to the [illegible] ballads so commonly found on the concert table! In this part of the programme Mr. Mills displayed his elegant modern touch and separately in compositions by Chopin founded as these are on the Folk-song form. Though, indeed strictly speaking every natural form has sprung from that primal germ, the Song,—and necessarily the Folk-song is the root of songs. And how is it that our pianists most entirely neglect the fine old [illegible] compositions of Bach's, [illegible] and others? Do they fancy that there are all old quaint themes? What an error! Some of the oldest things are the youngest, and some of the [illegible] oldest; they in the eyes of a true artist, a composition whose [illegible], perhaps bristling with modern [illegible] difficulties, perhaps formidable on any fanciful paper as sparse, a haggard wrinkled [illegible] without a single spark of youth's buoyancy to [illegible] over the [illegible] of the [illegible], but those charming works, those genuine old works are yet

Ever fresh and fair and young,
And do they remain the poet's tongue."

And for the [illegible] as well as the instruction of our audiences of to-day [illegible].

[We hope to number a motto, to find room for these whole programmes, with the interesting explanatory remarks, referred to in the above.—ED.]

New York, Feb. 24.—On Saturday evening, 15, Mr. Thomas gave his 1st Symphony Soirée, at Steinway Hall, with this programme:

Overture, Scherzo and Finale	Schumann
[illegible]	Rubinstein
Concerto, Op. 37, Piano, Chorus and Orchestra	Beethoven
Concerto [illegible]	Thomas
[illegible]	Liszt

The choruses were sung by the Mendelssohn Union, and Mr. Mills was the pianist. The concert was extremely well attended, and the programme one of uncommon interest.

At the 13th Sunday Concert there were some of the orchestral numbers:

Andante and Scherzo from the 5th Symphony	Beethoven
Overture, [illegible]	Mendelssohn
[illegible]	Tayl.

Mr. C. F. Daniels [pianist] and Miss Jenny Busk [second appearance] were the soloists upon this occasion.

During the week just ended we have had various miscellaneous concerts, none of them being of any especial interest, with the possible exception of a concert, for the benefit of Mrs. Robert Goldbeck, which occurred on Tuesday evening.

At Mr. Thomas 17th Sunday Concert (Feb. 22) we had a mixed programme. Miss Sterling (contralto), Mr. Werner (pianist), Mr. [illegible] (cornet), Mr. Schmitz (French horn) and Mr. Sheller (flute) assisted. Mr. Werner played Chopin's A-flat [illegible], B flat minor and Thalberg's Fantasia on [illegible]. Mr. W.'s performance was [illegible] and he used the pedal without discrimination. The orchestral [illegible]—the [illegible] "[illegible]" which has become such a favorite [illegible] of these entertainments. P.

March 1.—I mentioned in a former letter that Mme. [illegible] and Mr. S. B. Mills are about to give three "Historical Recitals of Vocal and Pianoforte Music." They will occur on the Saturday afternoons March 6, March 27 and April [illegible] at 2.30 P.M. At the first one there will be illustrations of the Old English School, "Old Italian School," and "Folk Songs and pianoforte compositions founded on Folk Songs." Among Mr. Mills's solos will be Sebastian Bach's Gavotte, Fugue and Sonata in D major (1720); also Chopin's Mazurka, Opus 6, No. 1; Valse, Op. 64, No. 2; Polonaise in E flat, op. 22. Mr. S. I. Warren will be the accompanist at these recitals, and they will doubtless prove very interesting entertainments.

At the [illegible] Symphonic Concert, which will occur on Saturday evening of this week, Mme. La Grange will be the soloist, and the Action and [illegible] Fantasie will be given.

As I had surmised, the Mason and Thomas Chamber Music Soirées have been given up for the present, and perhaps for all time. Although musically successful and enjoyable, they have been failures pecuniarily, and therefore they have been discontinued. It is a shame and a disgrace to musicdom that this step was found to be necessary. While we are thankful to these two gentlemen (who constitute the Quintet party) for past favors, we cannot expect that they will continue their entertainments at a pecuniary sacrifice.

At the 14th Sunday Evening Concert Mr. Thomas gave us a programme of good taste. I quote many of the orchestral numbers:

[illegible]	Mozart
Adagio [illegible] Symphony	Beethoven
[illegible]	Liszt
[illegible]	Schumann
[illegible]	Meyerbeer

Mme. Clavetti [soprano] made her first appearance, and also Mr. Angelo Arnold (pianist), who played Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, op. 25, and Chopin's splendid and brand-new Polonaise in A flat, op. 53. Mme. C.'s singing was beneath contempt. Mr. Arnold is a pianist of [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] ability. His rendering of the Concerto showed that he possessed remarkable technique, while he was no [illegible].

The evening Faust will be produced at the Academy of M[illegible] and Miss Kellogg will make her first appearance during the present season. But will again appear on Wednesday evening (in the Barber of Seville) and on Saturday there will be a grand "Kellogg Matinée." Q

Paris, Feb. 14.—On the occasion of the 4th concert at the Conservatoire the programme underwent a slight change viz. the substitution of Beethoven's Romance in F (executed by M. White) [illegible] of Spohr's Concerto. The programme of the 4th concert which took place to-day is as follows:

Symphony in [illegible]	Beethoven
Chœur [illegible] Concerto de Violon	Mendelssohn
Ouverture [illegible]	Beethoven
[illegible]	Haydn
Symphonie [illegible]	[illegible]

The symphony in D major belongs to the earliest of the so called three styles of the composer. The Beethoven spirit is here, but still fettered by the bonds of [illegible] conventionalities. It is genius trying its wings before rising splendidly in the grand Eroica. And yet, had the composer stopped here and given us neither the Fidelio and the Leonora, the noble Fifth and the great Seventh been denied us, still we might still have held him who wrote the Symphonies in C and D. The overture [illegible] of the work and of the unequalled Coriolanus Overture, seemed to me admirably performed and I may say the same of the [illegible] from the [illegible]. Mlle. [illegible] has a voice of a remarkably pure and fine timbre, great power was not required in this case. The accompaniment is remarkably different—a rare work in itself.

[illegible] has taken place at the Grand Opera. During a recent indisposition of Mme. [illegible] her place was supplied by Mlle. [illegible] who took the rôle of Valentine in Les Huguenots—an opera role, with Faure as [illegible] and Villaret as Raoul, will retain [illegible] upon such a [illegible]. M. Auber "conducted" at a recent representation. He slept well until the fourth act [illegible] then woke, apparently much refreshed and applauded Mlle. [illegible] quite warmly. The recent cold of [illegible] is [illegible] [illegible] of Auber [illegible]. A hero of [illegible] [illegible] at the Opera as [illegible], amid the crashing of trumpets and the shrieks of [illegible], [illegible] according to popular report the only opera he is ever known to take. On the [illegible] he enters upon his eighty-eighth year. In the evening he attended the grand ball at the Hôtel de Ville, and Strauss, aware of his presence directed the orchestra to perform quadrilles from La Muette. La Premier Jour de Bonheur [illegible] La Dame de [illegible], &c., a delicate attention, which the composer seemed to appreciate.

The most important musical event of the season is announced to take place soon at the Théâtre Italien, where Rossini's posthumous "Petite Messe" will be rendered with a grand profusion of voices and instruments. This mass, purchased by M. [illegible] for the trifling sum of 100,000 francs, was composed in 1863. It has never been publicly performed, but by those who have been favored with a private hearing it is said to be a work of wonderful solemnity and beauty. Add to this the fact that Mme. Alboni has consented to sing the contralto solo, while the soprano will be Mlle. Krauss, and you may imagine what we have to expect.

I give below the list of selections performed at the three Popular Concerts since my last letter:

Symphony in [illegible]	Haydn
[illegible]	Gounod
[illegible]	Beethoven
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible] Joyeuses Commères de Windsor	Nicolai
Symphonie [illegible]	Haydn
[illegible]	Robert Schumann
[illegible]	Mendelssohn
[illegible]	Lecarpenter
Executée par Mme. Norman-Neruda
Ouverture [illegible]	H. Berlioz
Symphonie [illegible]	Beethoven
[illegible]	Haendel
[illegible] de Manfred	Robert Schumann
Concerto pour violon	Mendelssohn
Par Mme. Norman-Neruda
Ouverture [illegible]	Weber

Of the opera at the Théâtre Lyrique I will speak in my next letter. S. C. C.
